START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

APRIL 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER
NEGATIVE
NUMBER:
BSO-56-021

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library
(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959

VOL	TITLE	DATES
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:

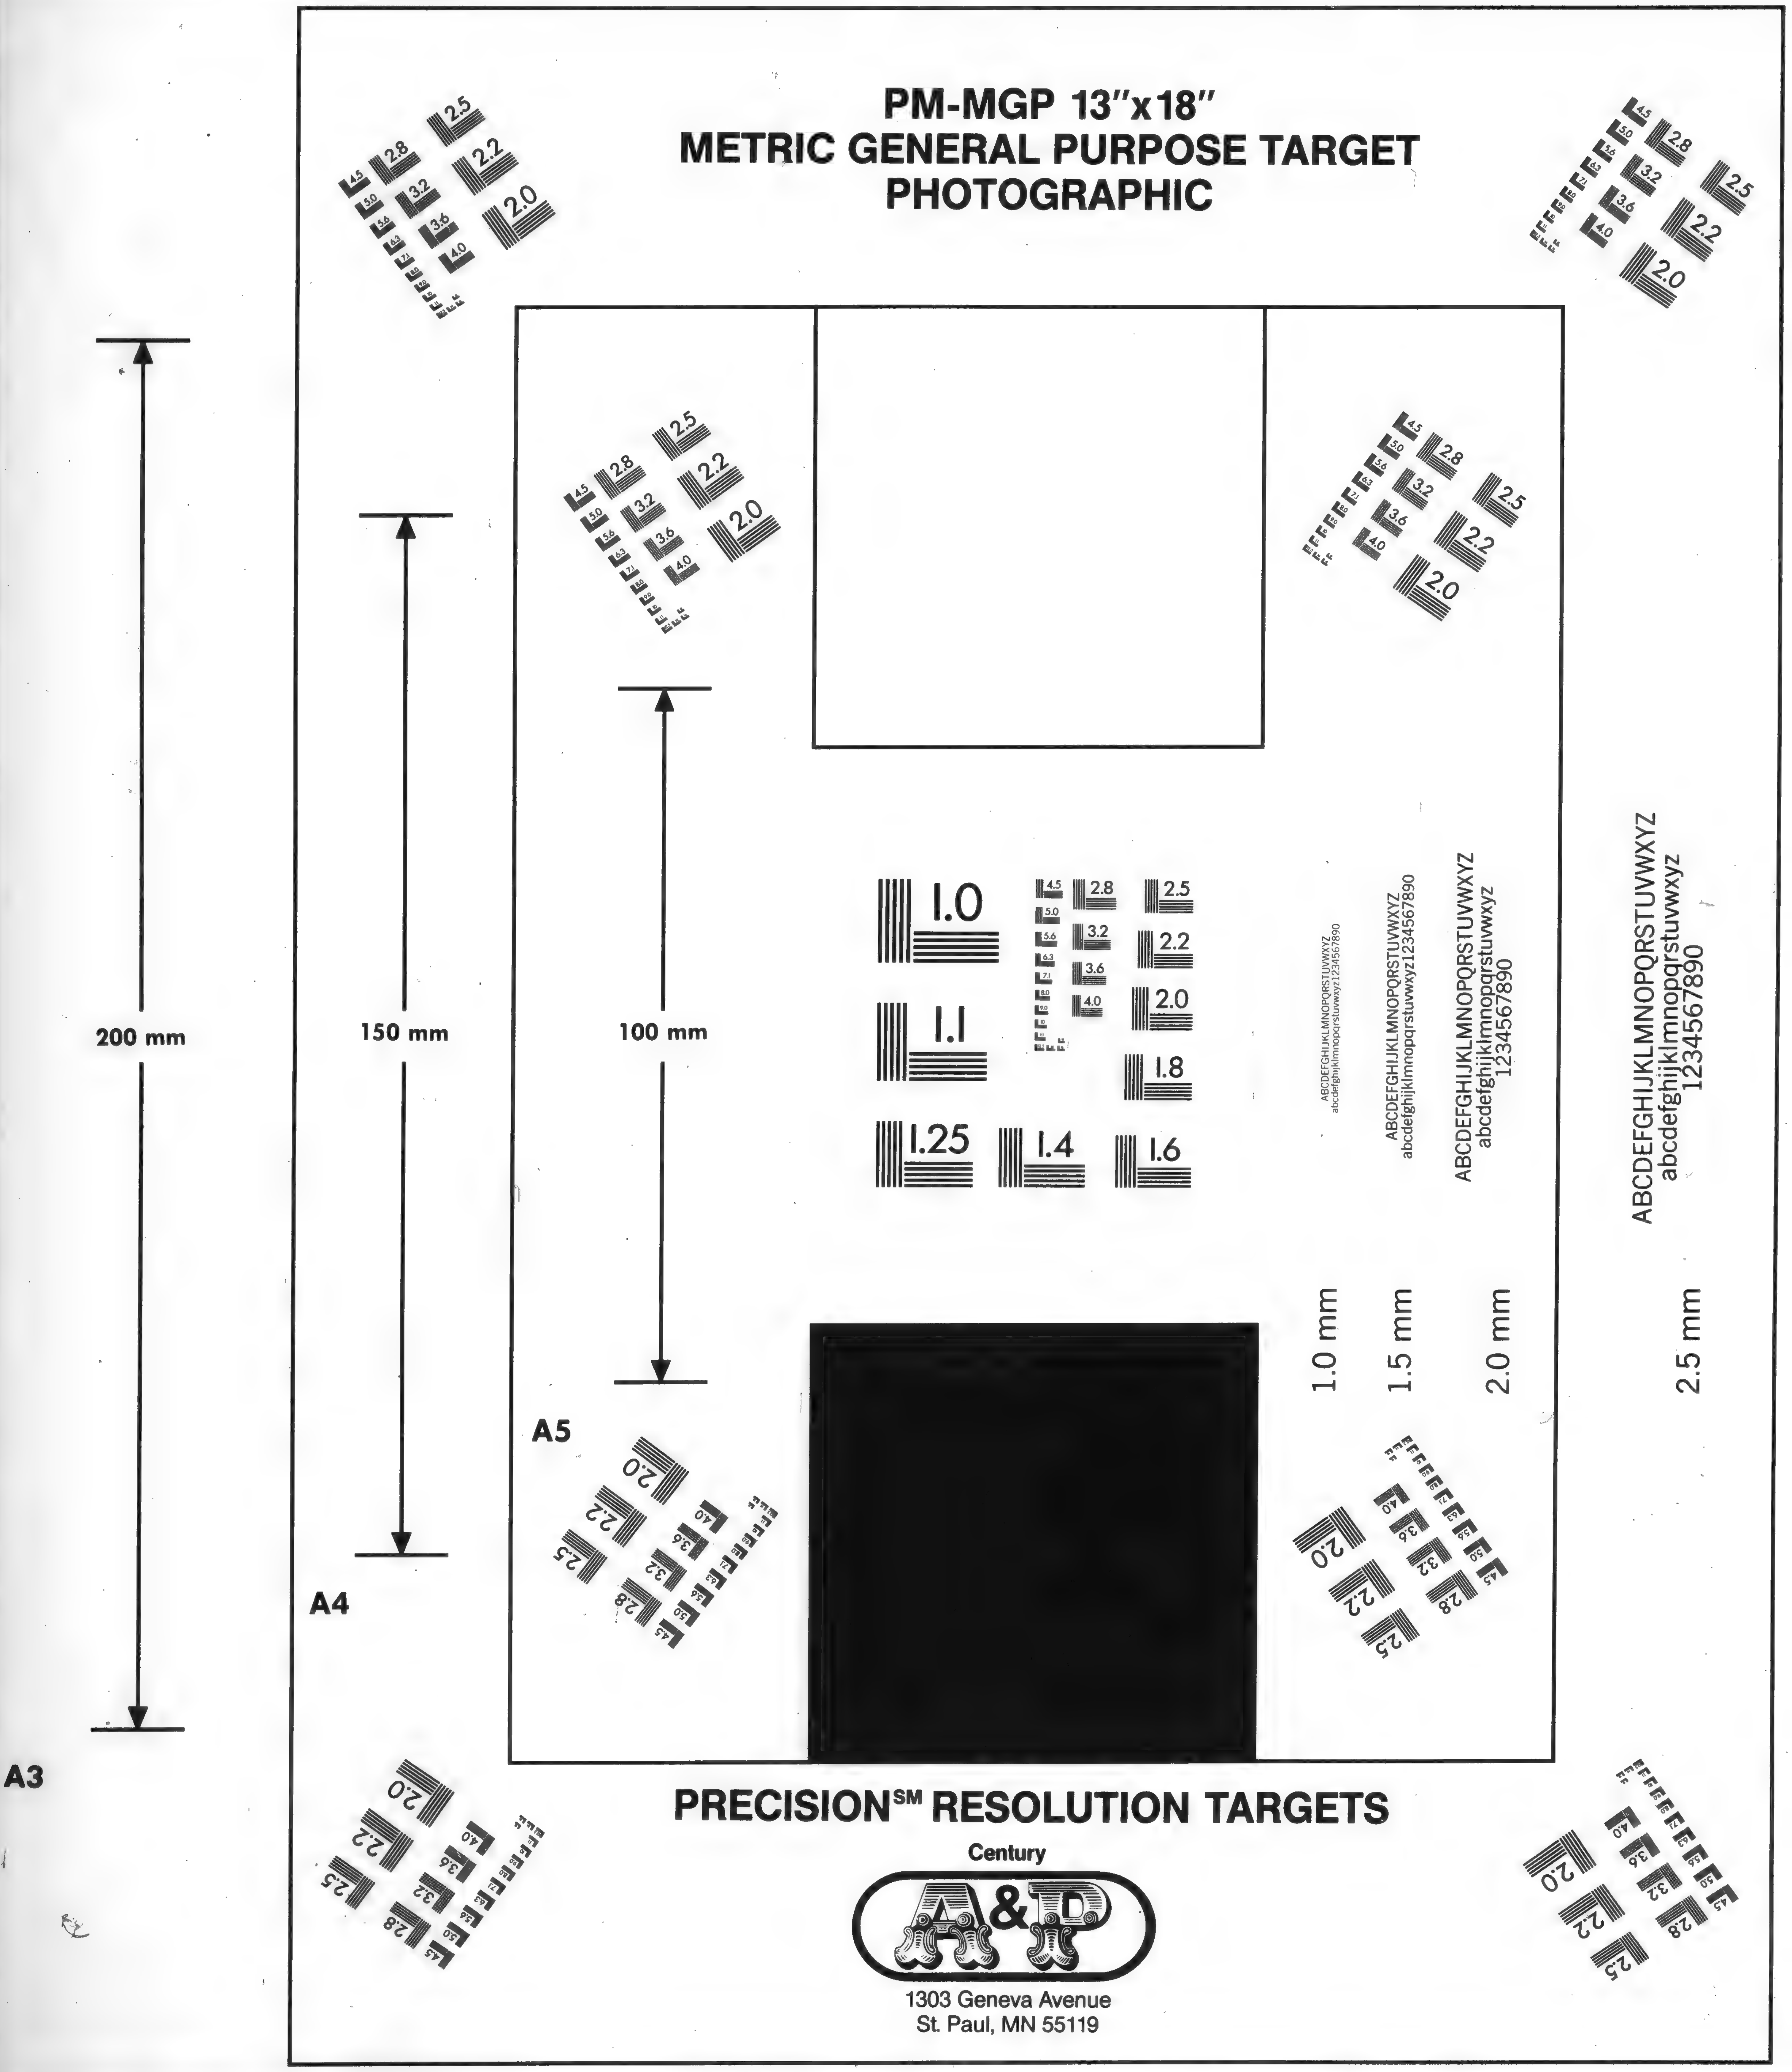
Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35mm x 30.5m · 100ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 08/1995
1461-0322-036-05
CAT 840 3594
12-13

REEL 21

Volumes 42- 43

BSO,Pops
1921-1922
to
Pops
Advertisements
1922-1923

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 42

BSO
Pops

1921 - 1922

HILL, SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS
AND BLANK BOOK
MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET,
OLD SOUTH BUILDING, BOSTON.
Job No. [illegible]
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

BLANK PAGE

h Cost of phonic Music

As Worcester partakes of the enjoyment Boston has in its Symphony Orchestra, in the annual concert given here each year, y frequent visits to Symphony Hall during the rt season, there will be interest here, if not ncern over the announcement of a deficit of some 1,000 for the current season and of the announced re for a guarantee of $150,000 a year for the next e years. The assertion that symphonic music n never be anything but caviar to the general pub is not made as confidently as it was 20 years ago, hanks to the elevation of musical taste through mechanical contrivances, but it is equally certain that because of the skill necessary in those who compose the orchestra the expenses can never be met by the amount received from sale of admissions. Those who realize the cultural value of symphonic music to a community therefore assume responsibility for supplying the deficit. Major Henry Higginson's service in that respect with the Boston Symphony needs but mention. The work he undertook has been carried on by others, but the three year guarantee period now expires, and renewal of such guarantees, in increased amount, is sought.

Of course, this system of guarantees is at best but expedient, and it is therefore good to notice that already there is talk of provision of an endowment fund of $3,000,000, which would do away with the necessity of such appeal. Until that is established, there must be short-term guarantees—but while these be given the work for the endowment goes on. Nor is such plan beyond practicability. There is today an example of accomplishment of such measure in Philadelphia, and those interested to find how that dream was made fact may read account in Mr. Bok's autobiography. What can be done once can be done again. Not only Boston, but all Massachusetts, which takes a deserved pride in the accomplishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hope for speedy response to the present appeal and steady progress toward the ultimate goal of the endowment, knowing as it does the orchestra's value to not only community and state, but to the country.

WORCESTER. TELEGRAM APRIL 27

NEW YORK EXPR
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM MAY -7 1921 Z
TLAND, ME.

A deficit of $131,289, exceeding by more than $75,000 that of last year is shown in financial report for Boston Symphony Orchestra for 1920-21 season. It costs $650.816 to run orchestra

---

PIONEER PRESS
St. Paul, Minn.
MAY 15.

and airy.

Trustees of the Boston Symphony, in a letter mailed to subscribers, request contributions to overcome a deficit of approximately $150,000. Efforts are being made to raise an endowment fund which will take care of future deficits and insure the continuation of the orchestra on a high basis.

From MAY 1 6
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

e trustees of the Boston Symphony hestra are seeking contributions to cover a deficit of $150,000 at the end of the season just closed. More than that, they are hoping for an endowment fund of that amount for a yearly deficit which is acknowledged inevitable. This appeal is in common with that of other large orchestras. To give music of the Boston Symphony class to the many, the few who can must pay. Such was the basis of the appeal of the Detroit Symphony recently.

The Boston Herald, in a resume of the Boston Symphony's season, says of the leader, Pierre Monteux: "Not only has Mr. Monteux brought the orchestra to its high state by means of his technical skill as a disciplinarian, he has revealed himself as an interpreter to whom no school, ancient or modern, is foreign."

Established 1881
FROM AUG 31 1921 L
WORLD,
New York City

Judge F. B. Cabot of Boston, President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also was a passenger. He said there is no sign of labor trouble besetting his organization and looked forward to a highly successful and artistic season. The Judge said he always wondered where money to support the organization would come from, but friends of the organization invariably came nobly to the support of good music.

TIMES
New York City AUG 7 1921 M

SOME RECENT PUBLICATIONS

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S fortieth season is brought into convenient record and review in a bound volume, just issued by Manager W. H. Brennan, of the twenty-four programs of forty-eight afternoon and evening concerts given in the home town last season. In the 1,540 pages are included Philip Hale's notes on native music performed for the first time anywhere, with foreign works new to America and others not before heard in Boston. Practically all of these novelties were also repeated in the Bostonians' fifteen concerts in New York.

Mr. Hale's readers will find further "Entr'actes and Excursions," after his accustomed graceful style, on Beethoven as pianist, Haydn in England, Mendelssohn and Scotland, Schubert's compositions in Boston, Elgar's "Cockaigne," Verlaine's "La Bonne Chanson," which C. M. Loeffler turned to a tone-poem, and Wilde's "Birthday of the Infanta," similarly used by John A. Carpenter in a ballet. The exquisite dance itself, produced Dec. 23, 1919, in Chicago, and but once thereafter in New York, failed to reach Boston, as promised last year, because the dancers' train from this city became stormbound on the way.

From AUG 31 1921 A
Morning Telegraph
New York

Judge F. B. Cabot, of Boston, and the president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from a vacation trip to England and France. Judge Cabot said there was no sign of labor troubles besetting the orchestra this season as all that had been settled and that Pierre Montreaux, the French conductor, would arrive early in September to lead the orchestra as he did last Winter. What the noted conductor's plans were for the season would not be known until he arrived. As to the financial condition of the orchestra organization, Judge Cabot said there was always worry as to where the money was coming from as the orchestra is supported by voluntary contributions, but he felt it had many good friends who would take care of the financial part.

TIMES AUG 31 1921 K
New York City

MUSICAL FOLK RETURN.

Cabot Says There Is No Sign of Labor Trouble in Boston Orchestra.

Several musical people returned yesterday from Europe on the Cunarder Scythia. Among them was W. B. Tyler, head of the New England Conservatory of Music, who left for Boston, and Judge F. R. Cabot, President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra organization, who had been in France and England.

Judge Cabot said that there was no sign of labor trouble interfering with the orchestra this season. Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, would arrive early in September, he said, to lead the orchestra and his plans would be made known after his arrival. As to the financial condition, Judge Cabot said there was always worry as to where the money was coming from, as the orchestra is supported by voluntary contributions, but he had no doubt that the money would be found.

Ernest Kiralfy, who was for years the tenor in the Royal Opera House in Budapest, arrived on the Scythia to sing in the Lexington Opera House.

From SEP 3 1921 K
Brooklyn Life
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY.—The soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season in Brooklyn will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. The Orchestra is to be congratulated upon obtaining this attractive list of artists which will not fail to interest the subscribers. The advance sale for these concerts is comparable with Boston being greater than it has ever been at this time of the year. In Boston the Friday Concerts are entirely sold out and only four hundred

---

ESTABLISHED 1881
From SEP 4 1921
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season in Brooklyn will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. The orchestra is to be congratulated upon obtaining this attractive list of artists, which will not fail to interest the subscribers. The advance sale for these concerts is comparable with Boston, being greater than it has ever been at this time of the year. In Boston the Friday concerts are entirely sold out and only four hundred seats left for the Saturday concerts.

From SEP 4 1921
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

MUSIC NOTES

The soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn the coming season will be Ferenc Vecsey, Olga Samaroff, Louise Homer, Jean Bedetti and Emilio De Gogorza.

TIMES SEP -4 1921
New York City

SINCE Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore are understood to be omitted from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's monthly tours this season, it appears that Brooklyn hereafter will be to these players their goal "furthest South."

For some years the Bostonians have appeared without soloists in New York. There will be soloists, however, at the Brooklyn Academy, where the bulletins say these will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio de Gogorza, baritone.

The Boston orchestra in its home town reports the advance sale for the concerts opening in October as being greater than it has ever before been at this time of the year. The Friday afternoon concerts are entirely sold out and only 400 seats left for the Saturday nights in Symphony Hall.

SEP 4 1921
WORLD,
New York City

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS.

Soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard in this borough in the coming season will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza

---

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

SOLOISTS ANNOUNCED.

The soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn the coming season will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. The advance sale for these concerts is greater than it has ever been at this time of the year.

The High Cost of Symphonic Music

As Worcester partakes of the enjoyment Boston has in its Symphony Orchestra, not only in the annual concert given here each year, but by frequent visits to Symphony Hall during the concert season, there will be interest here, if not concern over the announcement of a deficit of some $131,000 for the current season and of the announced desire for a guarantee of $150,000 a year for the next three years. The assertion that symphonic music can never be anything but caviar to the general public is not made as confidently as it was 20 years ago, thanks to the elevation of musical taste through mechanical contrivances, but it is equally certain that because of the skill necessary in those who compose the orchestra the expenses can never be met by the amount received from sale of admissions. Those who realize the cultural value of symphonic music to a community therefore assume responsibility for supplying the deficit. Major Henry Higginson's service in that respect with the Boston Symphony needs but mention. The work he undertook has been carried on by others, but the three year guarantee period now expires, and renewal of such guarantees, in increased amount, is sought.

Of course, this system of guarantees is at best but expedient, and it is therefore good to notice that already there is talk of provision of an endowment fund of $3,000,000, which would do away with the necessity of such appeal. Until that is established, there must be short-term guarantees—but while these be given the work for the endowment goes on. Nor is such plan beyond practicability. There is today an example of accomplishment of such measure in Philadelphia, and those interested to find how that dream was made fact may read account in Mr. Bok's autobiography. What can be done once can be done again. Not only Boston, but all Massachusetts, which takes a deserved pride in the accomplishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hope for speedy response to the present appeal and steady progress toward the ultimate goal of the endowment, knowing as it does the orchestra's value to not only community and state, but to the country.

WORCESTER - TELEGRAM APRIL 27

ESTABLISHED 1881

FROM

A deficit of $131,289, exceeding by more than $75,000 that of last year is shown in financial report for Boston Symphony Orchestra for 1920-21 season. It costs $650,816 to run orchestra

---

PIONEER PRESS

St. Paul, Minn.

MAY 15

and airy.

Trustees of the Boston Symphony, in a letter mailed to subscribers, request contributions to overcome a deficit of approximately $150,000. Efforts are being made to raise an endowment fund which will take care of future deficits and insure the continuation of the orchestra on a high basis.

From

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

e trustees of the Boston Symphony hestra are seeking contributions to cover a deficit of $150,000 at the end of the season just closed. More than that, they are hoping for an endowment fund of that amount for a yearly deficit which is acknowledged inevitable. This appeal is in common with that of other large orchestras. To give music of the Boston Symphony class to the many, the few who can must pay. Such was the basis of the appeal of the Detroit Symphony recently.

The Boston Herald, in a resume of the Boston Symphony's season, says of the leader, Pierre Monteux: "Not only has Mr. Monteux brought the orchestra to its high state by means of his technical skill as a disciplinarian, he has revealed himself as an interpreter to whom no school, ancient or modern, is foreign."

Established 1881

AUG 31 1921

FROM

WORLD,

New York City

Judge F. B. Cabot of Boston, President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also was a passenger. He said there is no sign of labor trouble besetting his organization and looked forward to a highly successful and artistic season. The Judge said he always wondered where money to support the organization would come from, but friends of the organization invariably came nobly to the support of good music.

TIMES

New York City

AUG 7 1921 M

SOME RECENT PUBLICATIONS

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S fortieth season is brought into convenient record and review in a bound volume, just issued by Manager W. H. Brennan, of the twenty-four programs of forty-eight afternoon and evening concerts given in the home town last season. In the 1,540 pages are included Philip Hale's notes on native music performed for the first time anywhere, with foreign works new to America and others not before heard in Boston. Practically all of these novelties were also repeated in the Bostonians' fifteen concerts in New York.

Mr. Hale's readers will find further "Entr'actes and Excursions," after his accustomed graceful style, on Beethoven as pianist, Haydn in England, Mendelssohn and Scotland, Schubert's compositions in Boston, Elgar's "Cockaigne," Verlaine's "La Bonne Chanson," which C. M. Loeffler turned to a tone-poem, and Wilde's "Birthday of the Infanta," similarly used by John A. Carpenter in a ballet. The exquisite dance itself, produced Dec. 23, 1919, in Chicago, and but once thereafter in New York, failed to reach Boston, as promised last year, because the dancers' train from this city became stormbound on the way.

From AUG 31 1921 A

Morning Telegraph

New York

Judge F. B. Cabot, of Boston, and the president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from a vacation trip to England and France. Judge Cabot said there was no sign of labor troubles besetting the orchestra this season as all that had been settled and that Pierre Montreaux, the French conductor, would arrive early in September to lead the orchestra as he did last Winter. What the noted conductor's plans were for the season would not be known until he arrived. As to the financial condition of the orchestra organization, Judge Cabot said there was always worry as to where the money was coming from as the orchestra is supported by voluntary contributions, but he felt it had many good friends who would take care of the financial part.

TIMES

New York City

G 31 1921 K

MUSICAL FOLK RETURN.

Cabot Says There Is No Sign of Labor Trouble in Boston Orchestra.

Several musical people returned yesterday from Europe on the Cunarder Scythia. Among them was W. B. Tyler, head of the New England Conservatory of Music, who left for Boston, and Judge F. R. Cabot, President of the Boston Symphony Orchestra organization, who had been in France and England.

Judge Cabot said that there was no sign of labor trouble interfering with the orchestra this season. Pierre Monteux, the French conductor, would arrive early in September, he said, to lead the orchestra and his plans would be made known after his arrival. As to the financial condition, Judge Cabot said there was always worry as to where the money was coming from, as the orchestra is supported by voluntary contributions, but he had no doubt that the money would be found.

Ernest Kiralfy, who was for years the tenor in the Royal Opera House in Budapest, arrived on the Scythia to sing in the Lexington Opera House.

From SEP 3 1921 K

Brooklyn Life

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY.—The soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season in Brooklyn wil be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza baritone. The Orchestra is to be congratulated upon obtaining this attractive list of artists which will not fail to interest the subscribers. The advance sale for these concerts is comparable with Boston being greater than it has ever been at this time of the year. In Boston the Friday Concerts are entirely sold out and only four hundred

---

ESTABLISHED 1881

SEP 4 1921 A

From

STANDARD UNION

Brooklyn, N. Y.

The soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season in Brooklyn will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. The orchestra is to be congratulated upon obtaining this attractive list of artists, which will not fail to interest the subscribers. The advance sale for these concerts is comparable with Boston, being greater than it has ever been at this time of the year. In Boston the Friday concerts are entirely sold out and only four hundred seats left for the Saturday concerts.

From SEP 4 1921 D

EAGLE

Brooklyn, New York

MUSIC NOTES

The soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn the coming season will be Ferenc Vecsey, Olga Samaroff, Louise Homer, Jean Bedetti and Emilio De Gogorza.

TIMES

New York City

SINCE Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore are understood to be omitted from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's monthly tours this season, it appears that Brooklyn hereafter will be to these players their goal "furthest South."

For some years the Bostonians have appeared without soloists in New York. There will be soloists, however, at the Brooklyn Academy, where the bulletins say these will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio de Gogorza, baritone.

The Boston orchestra in its home town reports the advance sale for the concerts opening in October as being greater than it has ever before been at this time of the year. The Friday afternoon concerts are entirely sold out and only 400 seats left for the Saturday nights in Symphony Hall.

SEP 4 1921

WORLD,

New York City

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS.

Soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be heard in this borough in the coming season will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza

---

CITIZEN

Brooklyn, N. Y.

SOLOISTS ANNOUNCED.

The soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn the coming season will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. The advance sale for these concerts is greater than it has ever been at this time of the year.

TIGHT BINDING

SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

NINA KOSHETZ.
(Photo Copyright by Elsin, N. Y.)

JOSEF HOFMANN.
LOUISE HOMER.
(Photo Copyright by Mishkin, N. Y.)

SOLOISTS FOR SYMPHONY ANNOUNCED

Several Great Artists as Well as Well Known Stars Will Sing Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, about to begin its forty-first season, is ready with its list of soloists. The appearance of a guest conductor for one pair of concerts is a matter of moment, particularly when the guest is Vincent D'Indy, the great French composer.

The soloists this season include not only a number of well-known stars but several great artists from Europe who have yet to make their reputations in America. The list includes Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, baritone; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Olga Samaroff, pianist; Yolanda Mero, pianist, all prominent artists.

Among the newcomers may be noted Ferenc Vescey, the Hungarian violinist, a pupil of the great Joachim. Paul Kochanski, a new Russian violinist, will be a prominent performer. Also Alexander Siloti, the pianist who was a pupil of Liszt and of Nicolai Rubenstein. Another remarkable pianist was Erno Dohnanyi. Twenty-one years ago he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a very young man. Since then his fame has spread throughout the old world. Another Hungarian pianist is Erwin Nyiregyhazi, whose amazing technique has stunned audiences in New York and elsewhere. A new soprano is Nina Koshetz from the Russian opera houses, who goes to the Chicago opera this season.

AMER. SEPT. 10

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

isting Artists" for the New Season—ngers, Pianists and Violinists Va-usly Arrayed—Rising and Risen lents Well Matched in a List That capes Routine—Mr. d'Indy as Visit-
Conductor

HERE has been no reason to hasten the announcement of the "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts tumn, winter and spring, and only to- does it come to hand. With every sable seat for the matinées of Friday dy taken by subscription and with y more than 300 places still available he evenings of Saturday, it was plain the public needed little fillip to its for orchestra and conductor, pieces programmes. It took pleasure in the ent prowess of the band; it watched ent Mr. Monteux's progress in his work in the regard of audiences; it discov- the range and the vitality of his pro- mes; the interest of his chosen music, ic, modern and of the newest men. with it took its seats for the new sea- and let the "soloists" be as chance d assemble them. In turn, the man- nt has been free to weigh its choice ers, to consider rising as well as abilities, to keep no more than the proper modicum of "old"—and sometimes trite—favorites, and to open wide the doors to newcomers of promise and performance. The outcome is a list that departs auspiciously from routine; that is not cribbed by precedent of the past or "drawing power" in the present and that by every sign will enliven the progress of the concerts.

So regarded, two of the announced singers are familiar and applauded figures at the Symphony Concerts—Mme. Homer, the alto, returning once more in maturity of voice, skill, mind and spirit, and Mr. de Gogorza, the baritone, less frequently called to the orchestra than the richness of his tones and the ripeness of his abilities warrants. No longer ago than Mr. Rabaud's day he carried all before him at a pair of Symphony concerts. The third singer is an unknown quantity to nearly all those who will hear her — the Russian, Nina Koshetz, highly reputed in her own country, discovered in the West by Miss Garden and by her called to the Chicago Opera Company. By these signs Mme. Koshetz is a large-voiced dramatic singer.

Two of the promised pianists are likewise familiar figures from whom hearers "know what to expect"—Mr. Hofmann, long since on friendly terms again with the orchestra and at the height of powers some of which no pianist of our time surpasses; and Mme. Samaroff, whose progress Bostonians have steadily and admiringly followed. They heard her beginnings; they enjoy now her maturity. Hardly newcomer, yet relatively unfamiliar is Mr. Dohnanyi, returned to America last spring after years variously spent as composer, teacher and virtuoso in his own country. He came back with grave mind, fine sensibilities, poised spirit, heedless of himself so long as he truly served the composer, truly kept to his own sober standards—precisely such a man and a musician as the Symphony Concerts should encourage. Another European nearly as long absent from America has also returned and will play with the orchestra—the illustrious Russian, Siloti, warming the wisdom of ripe years with the glow of a temperament they cannot subdue. And last, a pianist in his first youth, the Hungarian, Nyredghazi, in aspect recalling the young Liszt, of superlative technical skill, of a way of his own with tone, of a mind of his own with the music in hand. The elderly reviewers of concerts in New York, whom newcomers irritate to harsh words, often wrote bitterly of him last winter. By that sign he should be able and interesting.

Both the violinists are also newcomers. One is the Pole, Paul Kochanski, heard in New York late in the spring, but discovered at once as a virtuoso who put ripened skill and keen sensibilities at the service of his music and instrument, who possessed, no less insight and imagination, who was musician as well as violinist. The perceiving, the discriminating applauded him beyond any new violinist of the year. His companion is Frans von Vecsey, whom the elder generation will remember as a black-haired, round-faced, bright-eyed little boy in a sailor-suit brought to America as a prodigy. Speedily he vanished into seclusion and study out of which he emerged as a violinist of high merit. Before the war, he had risen far in German concert-halls; then it hid him. This season audiences in America are at last to hear him. Two other "soloists" should also have place, by merit, in the list, though they do not come afar, but merely rise from their places in the orchestra. There are not many violoncellists to excel Mr. Bedetti. Violinists hardly comparable with Mr. Burgin have also "assisted" at the Symphony Concerts. Solo-conductor, as some may say, will also be Mr. d'Indy, when by invitation of the powers that be he leads the orchestra through a pair of concerts—in part, of his own music. That austere Parisian may be this, that or the other as man and composer; but he remains the one and only musician for whom the appointed conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has ever stepped aside through the whole course of a pair of concerts in regular series—once in 1906, again in the impending season.

TRANS. SEPT. 10.

Risen Youth and Proved Maturity as They Will Be Heard at the Impending Symphony Concerts

(Photograph by Underwood & Underwood)
Kochanski — Violinist

Nyredghazi — Pianist

Vecsey — Violinist

Dohnanyi — Pianist
(Photograph by Underwood)

TIGHT BINDING

SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

NINA KOSHETZ.
(Photo Copyright by Elzin, N. Y.)

JOSEF HOFMANN.
LOUISE HOMER.
(Photo Copyright by Mishkin, N. Y.)

SOLOISTS FOR SYMPHONY ANNOUNCED

Several Great Artists as Well as Well Known Stars Will Sing Here

The Boston Sympnony Orchestra, about to begin its forty-first season, is ready with its list of soloists. The appearance of a guest conductor for one pair of concerts is a matter of moment, particularly when the guest is Vincent D'Indy, the great French composer.

The soloists this season include not only a number of well-known stars but several great artists from Europe who have yet to make their reputations in America. The list includes Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, baritone; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Olga Samaroff, pianist; Yolanda Mero, pianist, all prominent artists.

Among the newcomers may be noted Ferenc Vescey, the Hungarian violinist, a pupil of the great Joachim. Paul Kochanski, a new Russian violinist, will be a prominent performer. Also Alexander Siloti, the pianist who was a pupil of Liszt and of Nicolai Rubenstein. Another remarkable pianist was Erno Dohnanyi. Twenty-one years ago he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a very young man. Since then his fame has spread throughout the old world. Another Hungarian pianist is Erwin Nyiregyhazi, whose amazing technique has stunned audiences in New York and elsewhere. A new soprano is Nina Koshetz from the Russian opera houses, who goes to the Chicago opera this season.

AMER. SEPT. 10.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

"Assisting Artists" for the New Season—Singers, Pianists and Violinists Variously Arrayed—Rising and Risen Talents Well Matched in a List That Escapes Routine—Mr. d'Indy as Visiting Conductor

THERE has been no reason to hasten the announcement of the "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts of autumn, winter and spring, and only today does it come to hand. With every disposable seat for the matinées of Friday already taken by subscription and with hardly more than 300 places still available for the evenings of Saturday, it was plain that the public needed little fillip to its [illegible] for orchestra and conductor, pieces and programmes. It took pleasure in the present prowess of the band; it watched [illegible] Mr. Monteux's progress in his work and in the regard of audiences; it discovered the range and the vitality of his programmes; the interest of his chosen music, classic, modern and of the newest men. [illegible] with it took its seats for the new season—and let the "soloists" be as chance would assemble them. In turn, the management has been free to weigh its choice at leisure, to consider rising as well as [illegible] abilities, to keep no more than the proper modicum of "old"—and sometimes trite—favorites, and to open wide the doors to newcomers of promise and performance. The outcome is a list that departs auspiciously from routine; that is not cribbed by precedent of the past or "drawing power" in the present and that by every sign will enliven the progress of the concerts.

So regarded; two of the announced singers are familiar and applauded figures at the Symphony Concerts—Mme. Homer, the alto, returning once more in maturity of voice, skill, mind and spirit, and Mr. de Gogorza, the baritone, less frequently called to the orchestra than the richness of his tones and the ripeness of his abilities warrants. No longer ago than Mr. Rabaud's day he carried all before him at a pair of Symphony concerts. The third singer is an unknown quantity to nearly all those who will hear her — the Russian, Nina Koshetz, highly reputed in her own country, discovered in the West by Miss Garden and by her called to the Chicago Opera Company. By these signs Mme. Koshetz is a large-voiced dramatic singer.

Two of the promised pianists are likewise familiar figures from whom hearers "know what to expect"—Mr. Hofmann, long since on friendly terms again with the orchestra and at the height of powers some of which no pianist of our time surpasses; and Mme. Samaroff, whose progress Bostonians have steadily and admiringly followed. They heard her beginnings; they enjoy now her maturity. Hardly newcomer, yet relatively unfamiliar is Mr. Dohnanyi, returned to America last spring after years variously spent as composer, teacher and virtuoso in his own country. He came back with grave mind, fine sensibilities, poised spirit, heedless of himself so long as he truly served the composer, truly kept to his own sober standards—precisely such a man and a musician as the Symphony Concer's should encourage. Another European nearly as long absent from America has also returned and will play with the orchestra—the illustrious Russian, Siloti, warming the wisdom of ripe years with the glow of a temperament they cannot subdue. And last, a pianist in his first youth, the Hungarian, Nyredghazi, in aspect recalling the young Liszt, of superlative technical skill, of a way of his own with tone, of a mind of his own with the music in hand. The elderly reviewers of concerts in New York, whom newcomers irritate to harsh words, often wrote bitterly of him last winter. By that sign he should be able and interesting.

Both the violinists are also newcomers. One is the Pole, Paul Kochanski, heard in New York late in the spring, but discovered at once as a virtuoso who put ripened skill and keen sensibilities at the service of his music and instrument, who possessed, no less insight and imagination, who was musician as well as violinist. The perceiving, the discriminating applauded him beyond any new violinist of the year. His companion is Frans von Vecsey, whom the elder generation will remember as a black-haired, round-faced, bright-eyed little boy in a sailor-suit brought to America as a prodigy. Speedily he vanished into seclusion and study out of which he emerged as a violinist of high merit. Before the war, he had risen far in German concert-halls; then it hid him. This season audiences in America are at last to hear him. Two other "soloists" should also have place, by merit, in the list, though they do not come afar, but merely rise from their places in the orchestra. There are not many violoncellists to excel Mr. Bedetti. Violinists hardly comparable with Mr. Burgin have also "assisted" at the Symphony Concerts. Solo-conductor, as some may say, will also be Mr. d'Indy, when by invitation of the powers that be he leads the orchestra through a pair of concerts —in part, of his own music. That austere Parisian may be this, that or the other as man and composer; but he remains the one and only musician for whom the appointed conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has ever stepped aside through the whole course of a pair of concerts in regular series—once in 1906, again in the impending season.

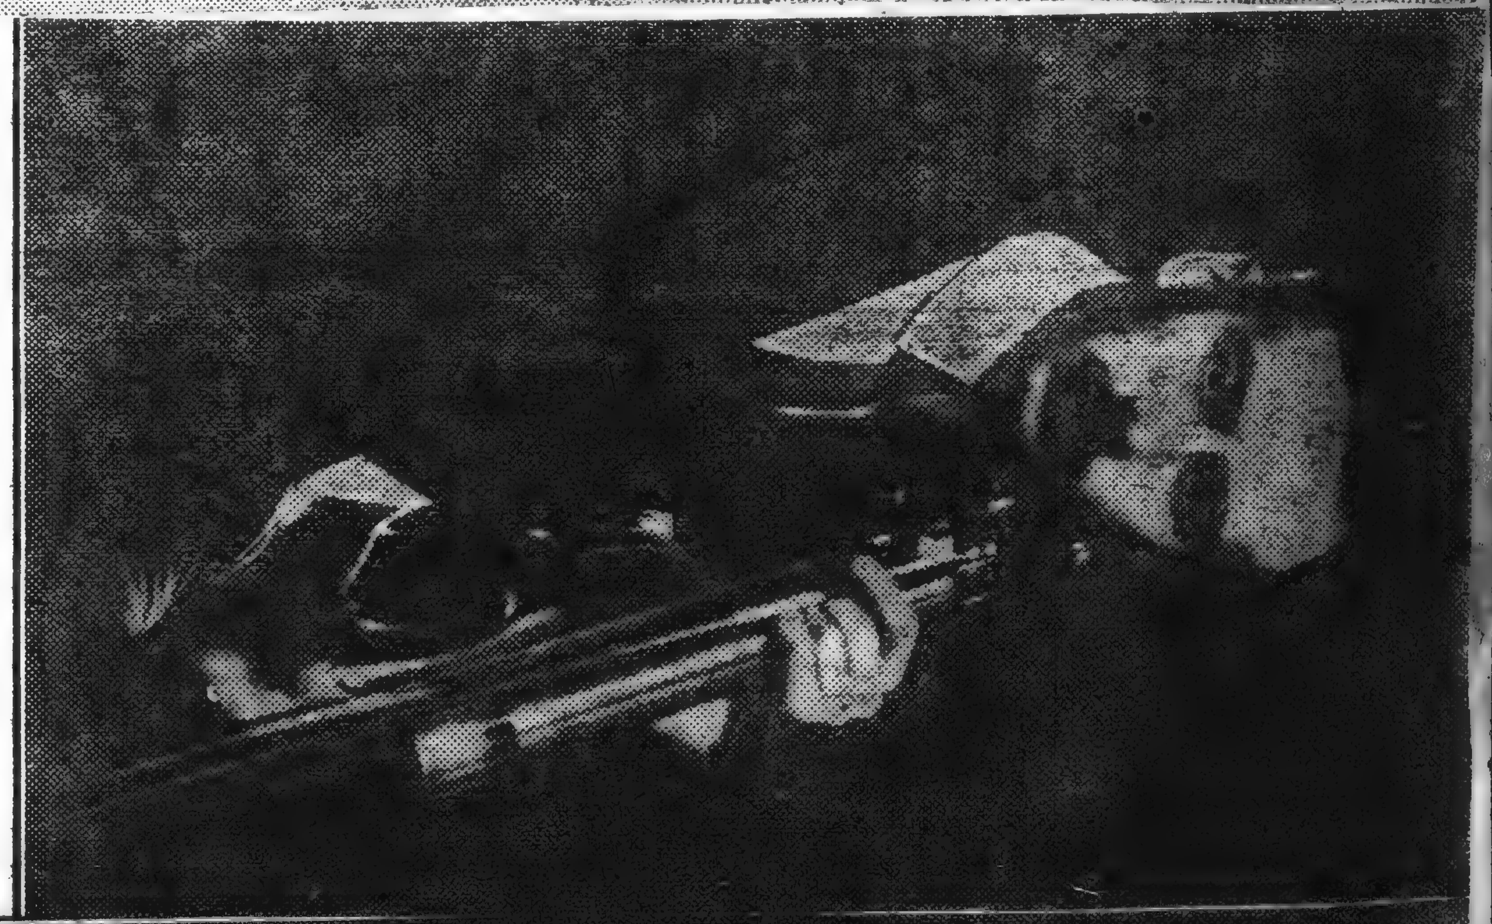
TRANS SEPT. 10.

Risen Youth and Proved Maturity as They Will Be Heard at the Impending Symphony Concerts

(Photographs by Underwood & Underwood)

Kochanski — Violinist

Nyredghazi — Pianist



Vecsey — Violinist

Dohnanyi — Pianist

(Photograph by Underwood)

TIGHT BINDING

SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

NINA KOSHETZ.
(Photo Copyright by Elzin, N. Y.)

JOSEF HOFMANN.
LOUISE HOMER.
(Photo Copyright by Mishkin, N. Y.)

SOLOISTS FOR SYMPHONY ANNOUNCED

Several Great Artists as Well as Well Known Stars Will Sing Here

The Boston Sympnony Orchestra, about to begin its forty-first season, is ready with its list of soloists. The appearance of a guest conductor for one pair of concerts is a matter of moment, particularly when the guest is Vincent D'Indy, the great French composer.

The soloists this season include not only a number of well-known stars but several great artists from Europe who have yet to make their reputations in America. The list includes Louise Homer, contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, baritone; Josef Hofmann, pianist; Olga Samaroff, pianist; Yolanda Mero, pianist, all prominent artists.

Among the newcomers may be noted Ferenc Vescey, the Hungarian violinist, a pupil of the great Joachim. Paul Kochanski, a new Russian violinist, will be a prominent performer. Also Alexander Siloti, the pianist who was a pupil of Liszt and of Nicolai Rubenstein. Another remarkable pianist was Erno Dohnanyi. Twenty-one years ago he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a very young man. Since then his fame has spread throughout the old world. Another Hungarian pianist is Erwin Nyiregyhazi, whose amazing technique has stunned audiences in New York and elsewhere. A new soprano is Nina Koshetz from the Russian opera houses, who goes to the Chicago opera this season.

AMER SEPT 10

AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

"Assisting Artists" for the New Season—Singers, Pianists and Violinists Variously Arrayed—Rising and Risen Talents Well Matched in a List That Escapes Routine—Mr. d'Indy as Visiting Conductor

THERE has been no reason to hasten the announcement of the "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts of autumn, winter and spring, and only today does it come to hand. With every dispensable seat for the matinées of Friday already taken by subscription and with hardly more than 300 places still available for the evenings of Saturday, it was plain that the public needed little fillip to its zest for orchestra and conductor, pieces and programmes. It took pleasure in the present prowess of the band; it watched content Mr. Monteux's progress in his work and in the regard of audiences; it discovered the range and the vitality of his programmes; the interest of his chosen music, classic, modern and of the newest men. Forthwith it took its seats for the new season—and let the "soloists" be as chance should assemble them. In turn, the management has been free to weigh its choice at leisure, to consider rising as well as established abilities, to keep no more than the proper modicum of "old"—and sometimes trite—favorites, and to open wide the doors to newcomers of promise and performance. The outcome is a list that departs auspiciously from routine; that is not cribbed by precedent of the past or "drawing power" in the present and that by every sign will enliven the progress of the concerts.

So regarded; two of the announced singers are familiar and applauded figures at the Symphony Concerts—Mme. Homer, the alto, returning once more in maturity of voice, skill, mind and spirit, and Mr. de Gogorza, the baritone, less frequently called to the orchestra than the richness of his tones and the ripeness of his abilities warrants. No longer ago than Mr. Rabaud's day he carried all before him at a pair of Symphony concerts. The third singer is an unknown quantity to nearly all those who will hear her — the Russian, Nina Koshetz, highly reputed in her own country, discovered in the West by Miss Garden and by her called to the Chicago Opera Company. By these signs Mme. Koshetz is a large-voiced dramatic singer.

Two of the promised pianists are likewise familiar figures from whom hearers "know what to expect"—Mr. Hofmann, long since on friendly terms again with the orchestra and at the height of powers some of which no pianist of our time surpasses; and Mme. Samaroff, whose progress Bostonians have steadily and admiringly followed. They heard her beginnings; they enjoy now her maturity. Hardly newcomer, yet relatively unfamiliar is Mr. Dohnanyi, returned to America last spring after years variously spent as composer, teacher and virtuoso in his own country. He came back with grave mind, fine sensibilities, poised spirit, heedless of himself so long as he truly served the composer, truly kept to his own sober standards—precisely such a man and a musician as the Symphony Concerts should encourage. Another European nearly as long absent from America has also returned and will play with the orchestra—the illustrious Russian, Siloti, warming the wisdom of ripe years with the glow of a temperament they cannot subdue. And last, a pianist in his first youth, the Hungarian, Nyredghazi, in aspect recalling the young Liszt, of superlative technical skill, of a way of his own with tone, of a mind of his own with the music in hand. The elderly reviewers of concerts in New York, whom newcomers irritate to harsh words, often wrote bitterly of him last winter. By that sign he should be able and interesting.

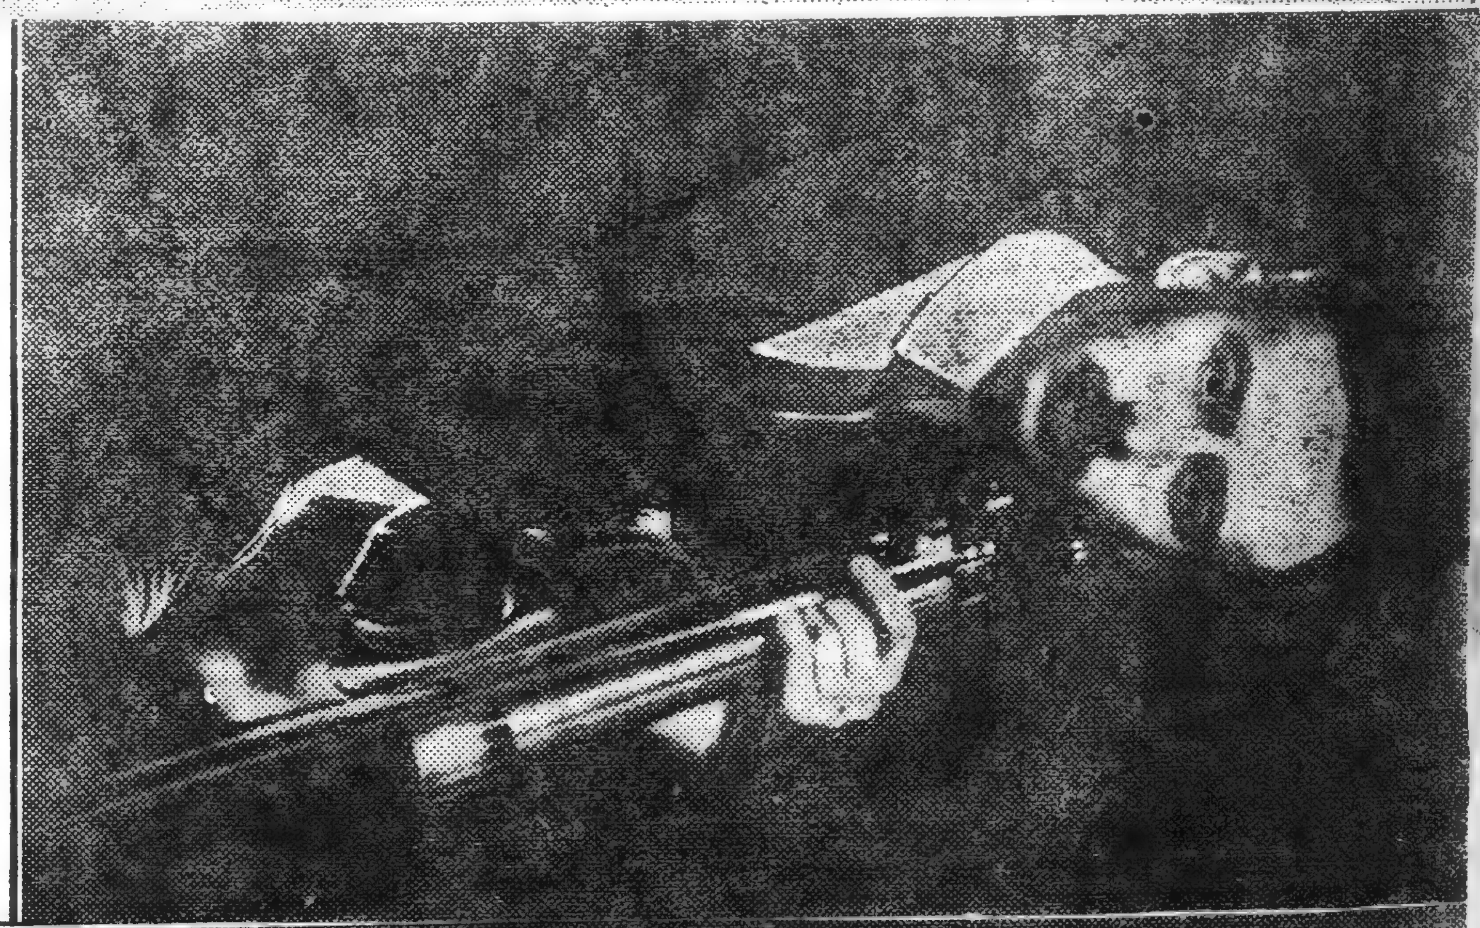
Both the violinists are also newcomers. One is the Pole, Paul Kochanski, heard in New York late in the spring, but discovered at once as a virtuoso who put ripened skill and keen sensibilities at the service of his music and instrument, who possessed, no less insight and imagination, who was musician as well as violinist. The perceiving, the discriminating applauded him beyond any new violinist of the year. His companion is Franz von Vecsey, whom the elder generation will remember as a black-haired, round-faced, bright-eyed little boy in a sailor-suit brought to America as a prodigy. Speedily he vanished into seclusion and study out of which he emerged as a violinist of high merit. Before the war, he had risen far in German concert-halls; then it hid him. This season audiences in America are at last to hear him. Two other "soloists" should also have place, by merit, in the list, though they do not come afar, but merely rise from their places in the orchestra. There are not many violoncellists to excel Mr. Bedetti. Violinists hardly comparable with Mr. Burgin have also "assisted" at the Symphony Concerts. Solo-conductor, as some may say, will also be Mr. d'Indy, when by invitation of the powers that be he leads the orchestra through a pair of concerts—in part, of his own music. That austere Parisian may be this, that or the other as man and composer; but he remains the one and only musician for whom the appointed conductor of the Symphony Orchestra has ever stepped aside through the whole course of a pair of concerts in regular series—once in 1906, again in the impending season.

TRANS. SEPT. 10

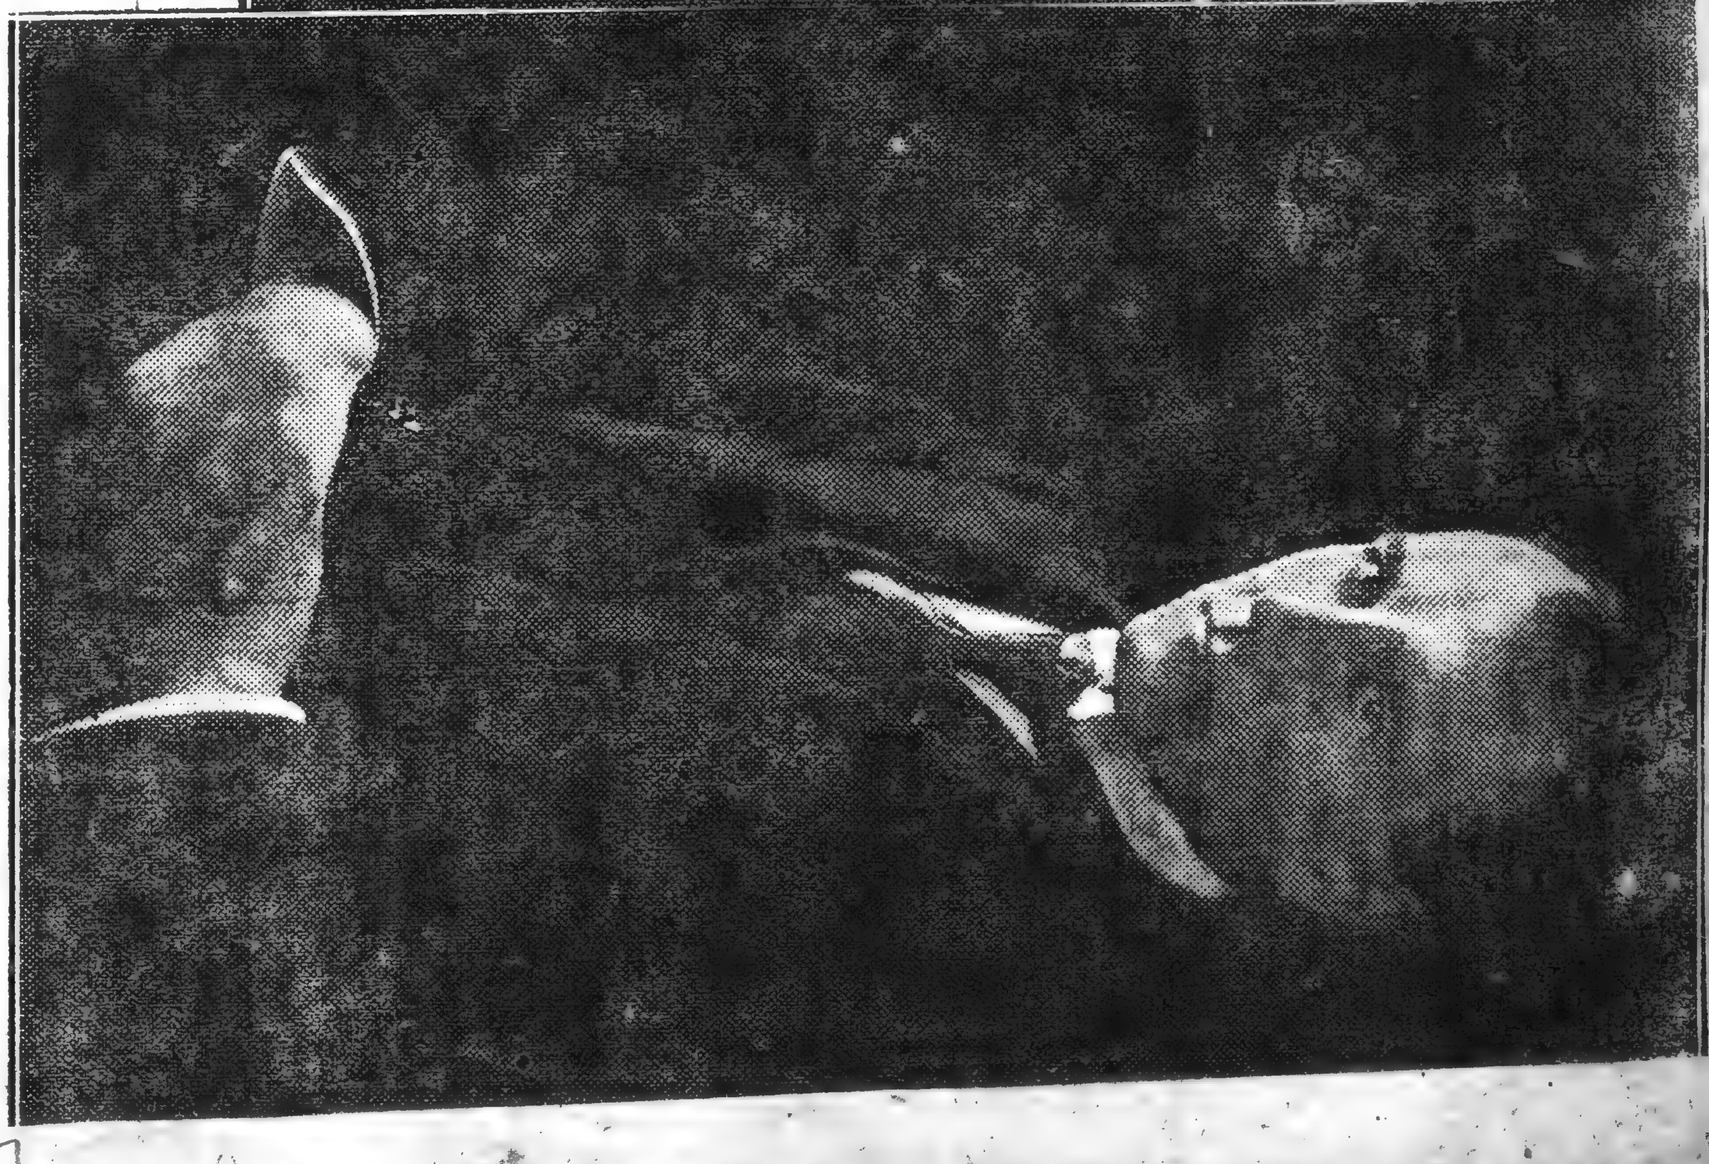
Risen Youth and Proved Maturity as They Will Be Heard at the Impending Symphony Concerts

(Photograph by Underwood & Underwood)
Kochanski—Violinist

Nyredghazi—Pianist



Vecsey—Violinist



Dohnanyi—Pianist
(Photograph by Underwood

[4]

Symphony Season Rich in Promise

One sign, at least, of the success of the pending 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will consist of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts to be given at Symphony Hall beginning Oct. 7-8, is the extent of the advance sale of seats by subscription which at this time of year has in no former season been so large. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts all seats were re-engaged last spring.

As large a schedule as possible of concerts in other cities will be undertaken, dates being reserved, however, for a number of Young People's concerts in Boston, according to the plan so successfuly carried out during the last two seasons.

Having spent the sumer in Europe, Piere Monteux, with his valuation of new works, succeeded in finding a number of scores of genius and interest, which will figure upon his programs from time to time in this, his third season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For one pair of concerts he will yield the baton to Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who crossed the seas to conduct Boston Symphony concerts in 1905 and has since added materially to his already great reputation.

The list of soloists to appear at these concerts, now announced, includes some favorites of long standing, whose former appearances with the orchestra recall many delightful concerts. There is also, however, an unusual number of names familiar to us only by nearsay.

TRAV. SEPT. 10.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra season, consisting of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, to be given at Symphony Hall, begin October 7-8. The large traveling schedule which the orchestra will undertake includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, eight concerts in Cambridge, Massachusetts, five in Providence, Rhode Island, as well as engagements in the various larger cities of New England, and a trip through the west and north extending to Montreal, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played for a number of years. Besides the regular Boston concerts, there will be a number of young people's concerts for school children of Greater Boston, according to the plan so successfully carried out by this orchestra during the last two seasons.

Having spent the summer in Europe, Pierre Monteux, the conductor has succeeded in finding a number of scores of manifest talent and unusual interest which will figure upon his programs from time to time in this his third season with the orchestra. For one pair of concerts in Boston he will yield the baton to Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, who also conducted Boston Symphony concerts in a number of cities during his American visit in 1905. The soloists announced for the Boston series include Nina Koshetz, Louise Homer and Emilio de Gorgoza, singers; Josef Hoffman, Olga Samaroff, Alexander Siloti, Erno Dohnanyi and Erwin Nyiregyhazi, pianists; and Yolanda Mero, Ferenc Vecsey and Paul Kochanski, violinists.

MONITOR. SEPT. 10

COMING SYMPHONY SEASON

(Photographs of Symphony soloists in today's Pictorial Section.)

It is an earnest of the enjoyment of the Boston Symphony concerts as given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux that the advance sale of seats by subscription for the coming series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, to begin on Oct. 7-8, has never been so large at this time of year in any former season.

List of Soloists

The soloists to be heard during the season are such as to make the concerts further eventful. Among them are Louise Homer, the great American contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, the velvet-voiced baritone. A newcomer to Boston and the orchestra is Madame Nina Koshetz, the foremost prima donna soprano of Russia. On account of her fine talents in the interpretation of songs, the Russian composers Medtner, Prokovieff, Gretchaninoff, Taneieff and Rachmarinoff have been her admirers and collaborators.

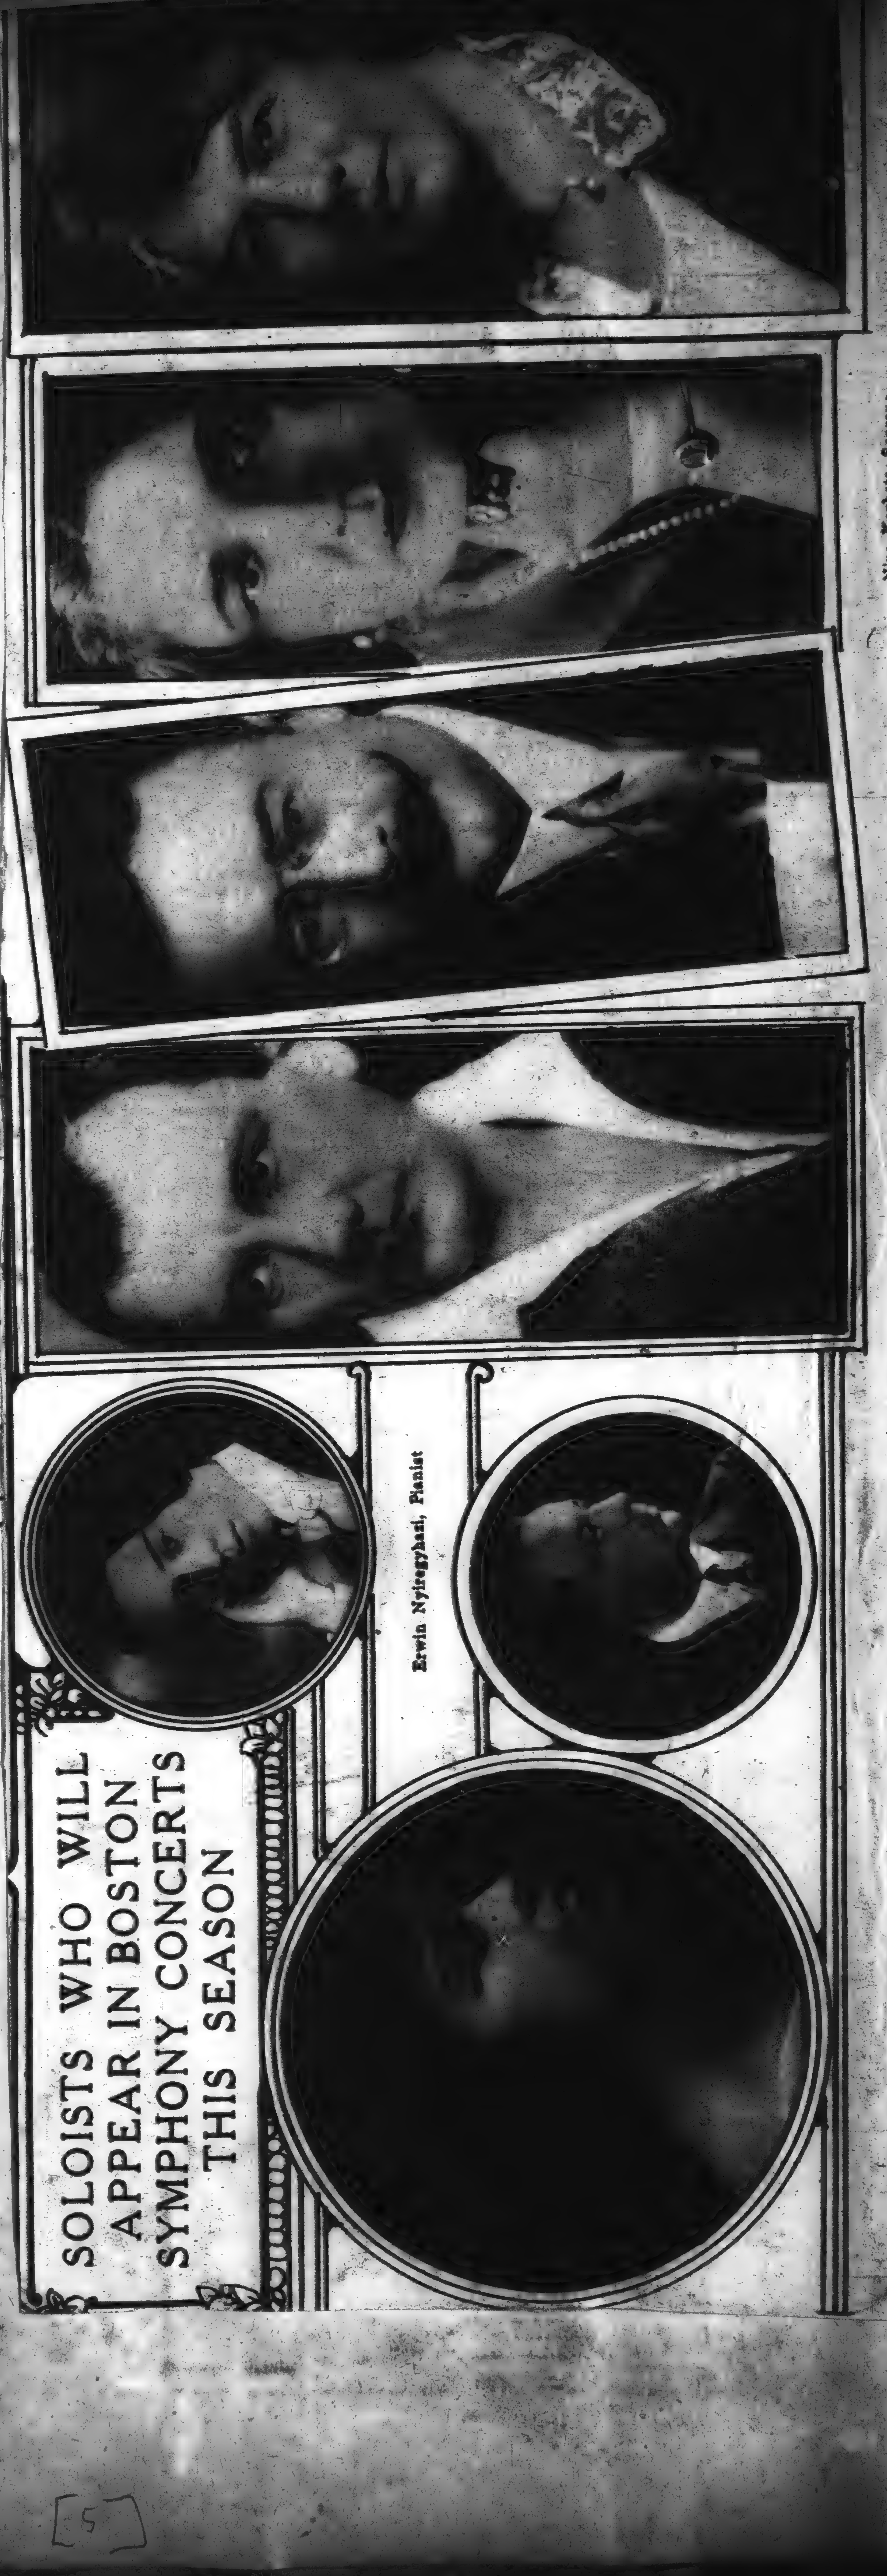
A new meteor upon the horizon of musical America is Ferenc Vecsey, for years hailed in Europe as the matchless master of the violin. Born in Buda Pesth in 1893, of musical parents, he manifested extraordinary musical ability as a child, and, studying under the great Josef Joachim at the age of 10, he made his first public appearance in the same year (1903). His phenomenal success led to tours of Europe and America, and, indeed, a series of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. His early maturity has, according to all accounts, brought new beauties to the wondrous genius of his playing. Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia. Through his studies with Emil Mlynarsky, the Pole, and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian master, he has inherited the great violinistic traditions of the past. His several tours of Europe and his concerts in New York last February herald him as an artist of the calibre not soon forgotten.

Two of the pianists listed among the soloists are favorites of long standing. These are Joseph Hofman, pre-eminent among the pianists now living; and Olga Samaroff, the younger but highly talented artist from Texas, of whom many speak as the finest pianist of her sex.

Familiar only by name to our public, but revered in the highest degree in Europe, the advent to America of Alexander Siloti will surely be an event of considerable importance, as will his appearance as soloist at these concerts. This pianist, who when a youth lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of the abbe's favorite pupils, has ever since then been worshipped as the apostle of the extraordinary pianoforte virtuoso. Siloti also studied under Nicolai Rubinstein, the distinguished brother of Anton, and with Tschaikowsky at the Moscow Conservatory.

Another celebrity of Europe, not only as pianist but as composer-conductor and generally versatile artist, is the Hungarian, Erno Dohnanyi.

POST-SEPT. 11.



SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR IN BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS SEASON

Louise Homer, Contralto

Nina Koshetz, Soprano

Emilio Gogorza, Baritone

Erno Dohnanyi, Pianist

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, Pianist

Paul Kochanski, Violinist

Olga Samaroff, Pianist

HERALD SEPT. 11.

[5]

Symphony Season Rich in Promise

One sign, at least, of the success of the pending 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will consist of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts to be given at Symphony Hall beginning Oct. 7-8, is the extent of the advance sale of seats by subscription which at this time of year has in no former season been so large. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts all seats were re-engaged last spring.

As large a schedule as possible of concerts in other cities will be undertaken, dates being reserved, however, for a number of Young People's concerts in Boston, according to the plan so successfuly carried out during the last two seasons.

Having spent the sumer in Europe, Piere Monteux, with his valuation of new works, succeeded in finding a number of scores of genius and interest, which will figure upon his programs from time to time in this; his third season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For one pair of concerts he will yield the baton to Vincent D'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who crossed the seas to conduct Boston Symphony concerts in 1905 and has since added materially to his already great reputation.

The list of soloists to appear at these concerts, now announced, includes some favorites of long standing, whose former appearances with the orchestra recall many delightful concerts. There is also, however, an unusual number of names familiar to us only by hearsay.

TRAV SEPT. 10.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra season, consisting of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, to be given at Symphony Hall, begin October 7-8. The large traveling schedule which the orchestra will undertake includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, eight concerts in Cambridge, Massachusetts, five in Providence, Rhode Island, as well as engagements in the various larger cities of New England, and a trip through the west and north extending to Montreal, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played for a number of years. Besides the regular Boston concerts, there will be a number of young people's concerts for school children of Greater Boston, according to the plan so successfully carried out by this orchestra during the last two seasons.

Having spent the summer in Europe, Pierre Monteux, the conductor has succeeded in finding a number of scores of manifest talent and unusual interest which will figure upon his programs from time to time in this, his third season with the orchestra. For one pair of concerts in Boston he will yield the baton to Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, who also conducted Boston Symphony concerts in a number of cities during his American visit in 1905. The soloists announced for the Boston series include Nina Koshetz, Louise Homer nd Emilio de Gorgoza, singers; Josef offman, Olga Samaroff, Alexander loti, Erno Dohnanyi and Erwin yiregyhazi, pianists; and Yolanda ero, Ferenc Vecsey and Paul Ko- anski, violinists.

MONITOR. SEPT 10

COMING SYMPHONY SEASON

(Photographs of Symphony soloists in today's Pictorial Section.)

It is an earnest of the enjoyment of the Boston Symphony concerts as given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux that the advance sale of seats by subscription for the coming series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, to begin on Oct. 7-8, has never been so large at this time of year in any former season.

List of Soloists

The soloists to be heard during the season are such as to make the concerts further eventful. Among them are Louise Homer, the great American contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, the velvet-voiced baritone. A newcomer to Boston and the orchestra is Madame Nina Koshetz, the foremost prima donna soprano of Russia. On account of her fine talents in the interpretation of songs, the Russian composers Medtner, Prokovieff, Gretchaninoff, Taneieff and Rachmarinoff have been her admirers and collaborators.

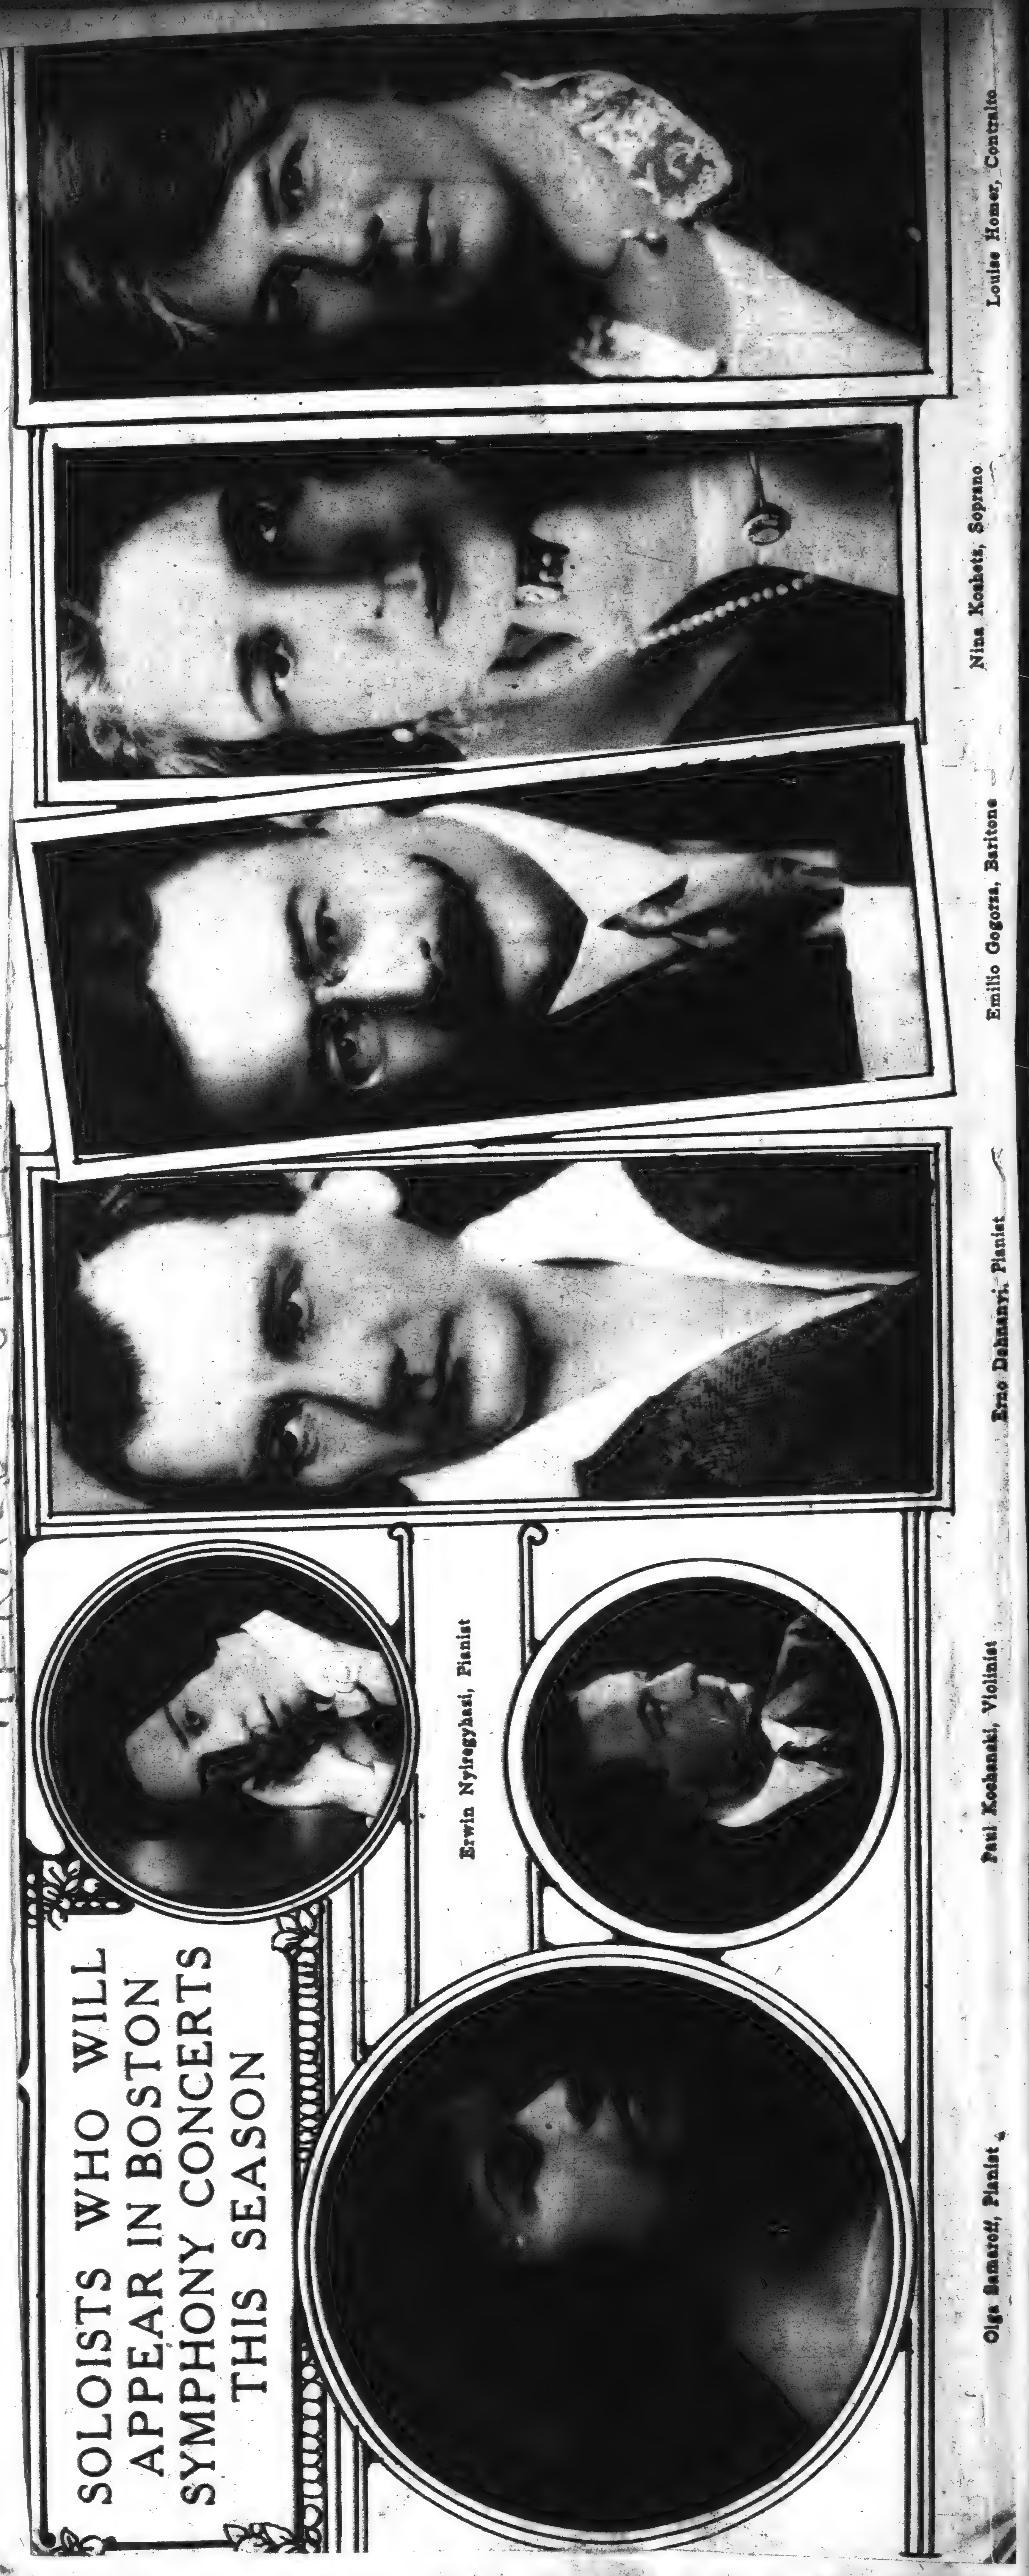
A new meteor upon the horizon of musical America is Ferenc Vecsey, for years hailed in Europe as the matchless master of the violin. Born in Buda Pesth in 1893, of musical parents, he manifested extraordinary musical ability as a child, and, studying under the great Josef Joachim at the age of 10, he made his first public appearance in the same year (1903). His phenomenal success led to tours of Europe and America, and, indeed, a series of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. His early maturity has, according to all accounts, brought new beauties to the wondrous genius of his playing. Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia. Through his studies with Emil Mlynarsky, the Pole, and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian master, he has inherited the great violinistic traditions of the past. His several tours of Europe and his concerts in New York last February herald him as an artist of the calibre not soon forgotten.

Two of the pianists listed among the soloists are favorites of long standing. These are Joseph Hofman, pre-eminent among the pianists now living; and Olga Samaroff, the younger but highly talented artist from Texas, of whom many speak as the finest pianist of her sex.

Familiar only by name to our public, but revered in the highest degree in Europe, the advent to America of Alexander Siloti will surely be an event of considerable importance, as will his appearance as soloist at these concerts. This pianist, who when a youth lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of the abbe's favorite pupils, has ever since then been worshipped as the apostle of the extraordinary pianoforte virtuoso. Siloti also studied under Nicolai Rubinstein, the distinguished brother of Anton, and with Tschaikowsky at the Moscow Conservatory.

Another celebrity of Europe, not only as pianist but as composer-conductor and generally versatile artist, is the Hungarian, Erno Dohnanyi.

POST-SEPT. 11.



SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR IN BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS SEASON

Louise Homer, Contralto

Nina Koshetz, Soprano

Emilio Gogorza, Baritone

Erno Dohnanyi, Pianist

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, Pianist

Paul Kochanski, Violinist

Olga Samaroff, Pianist

HERALD SEPT. 11.

Symphony Season Rich in Promise

One sign, at least, of the success of the pending 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will consist of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts to be given at Symphony Hall beginning Oct. 7-8, is the extent of the advance sale of seats by subscription which at this time of year has in no former season been so large. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts all seats were re-engaged last spring.

As large a schedule as possible of concerts in other cities will be undertaken, dates being reserved, however, for a number of Young People's concerts in Boston, according to the plan so successfuly carried out during the last two seasons.

Having spent the summer in Europe, Piere Monteux, with his [illegible] of new works, succeeded in finding a number of scores of genius and interest, which will figure upon his programs from time to time in this, his third season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For one pair of concerts he will yield the baton to Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, who crossed the seas to conduct Boston Symphony concerts in 1905 and has since added materially to his already great reputation.

The list of soloists to appear at these concerts, now announced, includes some favorites of long standing, whose former appearances with the orchestra recall many delightful concerts. There is also, however, an unusual number of names familiar to us only by hearsay.

TRAV SEPT 17.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra season, consisting of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, to be given at Symphony Hall, begin October 7-8. The large traveling schedule which the orchestra will undertake includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, eight concerts in Cambridge, Massachusetts, five in Providence, Rhode Island, as well as engagements in the various larger cities of New England, and a trip through the west and north extending to Montreal, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played for a number of years. Besides the regular Boston concerts, there will be a number of young people's concerts for school children of Greater Boston, according to the plan so successfully carried out by this orchestra during the last two seasons.

Having spent the summer in Europe, Pierre Monteux, the conductor has succeeded in finding a number of scores of manifest talent and unusual interest which will figure upon his programs from time to time in this, his third season with the orchestra. For one pair of concerts in Boston he will yield the baton to Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, who also conducted Boston Symphony concerts in a number of cities during his American visit in 1905. The soloists announced for the Boston series include Nina Koshetz, Louise Homer nd Emilio de Gorgoza, singers; Josef offman, Olga Samaroff, Alexander loti, Erno Dohnanyi and Erwin yiregyhazi, pianists; and Yolanda ero, Ferenc Vecsey and Paul Ko- tanski, violinists.

MONITOR.

COMING SYMPHONY SEASON

(Photographs of Symphony soloists in today's Pictorial Section.)

It is an earnest of the enjoyment of the Boston Symphony concerts as given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux that the advance sale of seats by subscription for the coming series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, to begin on Oct. 7-8, has never been so large at this time of year in any former season.

List of Soloists

The soloists to be heard during the season are such as to make the concerts further eventful. Among them are Louise Homer, the great American contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, the velvet-voiced baritone. A newcomer to Boston and the orchestra is Madame Nina Koshetz, the foremost prima donna soprano of Russia. On account of her fine talents in the interpretation of songs, the Russian composers Medtner, Prokovieff, Gretchaninoff, Taneieff and Rachmarinoff have been her admirers and collaborators.

A new meteor upon the horizon of musical America is Ferenc Vecsey, for years hailed in Europe as the matchless master of the violin. Born in Buda Pesth in 1893, of musical parents, he manifested extraordinary musical ability as a child, and, studying under the great Josef Joachim at the age of 10, he made his first public appearance in the same year (1903). His phenomenal success led to tours of Europe and America, and, indeed, a series of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. His early maturity has, according to all accounts, brought new beauties to the wondrous genius of his playing. Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia. Through his studies with Emil Mlynarsky, the Pole, and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian master, he has inherited the great violinistic traditions of the past. His several tours of Europe and his concerts in New York last February herald him as an artist of the calibre not soon forgotten.

Two of the pianists listed among the soloists are favorites of long standing. These are Joseph Hofman, pre-eminent among the pianists now living, and Olga Samaroff, the younger but highly talented artist from Texas, of whom many speak as the finest pianist of her sex.

Familiar only by name to our public, but revered in the highest degree in Europe, the advent to America of Alexander Siloti will surely be an event of considerable importance, as will his appearance as soloist at these concerts. This pianist, who when a youth lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of the abbe's favorite pupils, has ever since then been worshipped as the apostle of the extraordinary pianoforte virtuoso. Siloti also studied under Nicolai Rubinstein, the distinguished brother of Anton, and with Tschaikowsky at the Moscow Conservatory.

Another celebrity of Europe, not only as pianist but as composer-conductor and generally versatile artist, is the Hungarian, Erno Dohnanyi.

POST-SEPT

HERALD

SOLOISTS WHO WILL APPEAR IN BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS SEASON

Louise Homer, Contralto

Nina Koshetz, Soprano

Emilio Gogorza, Baritone

Erno Dohnanyi, Pianist

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, Pianist

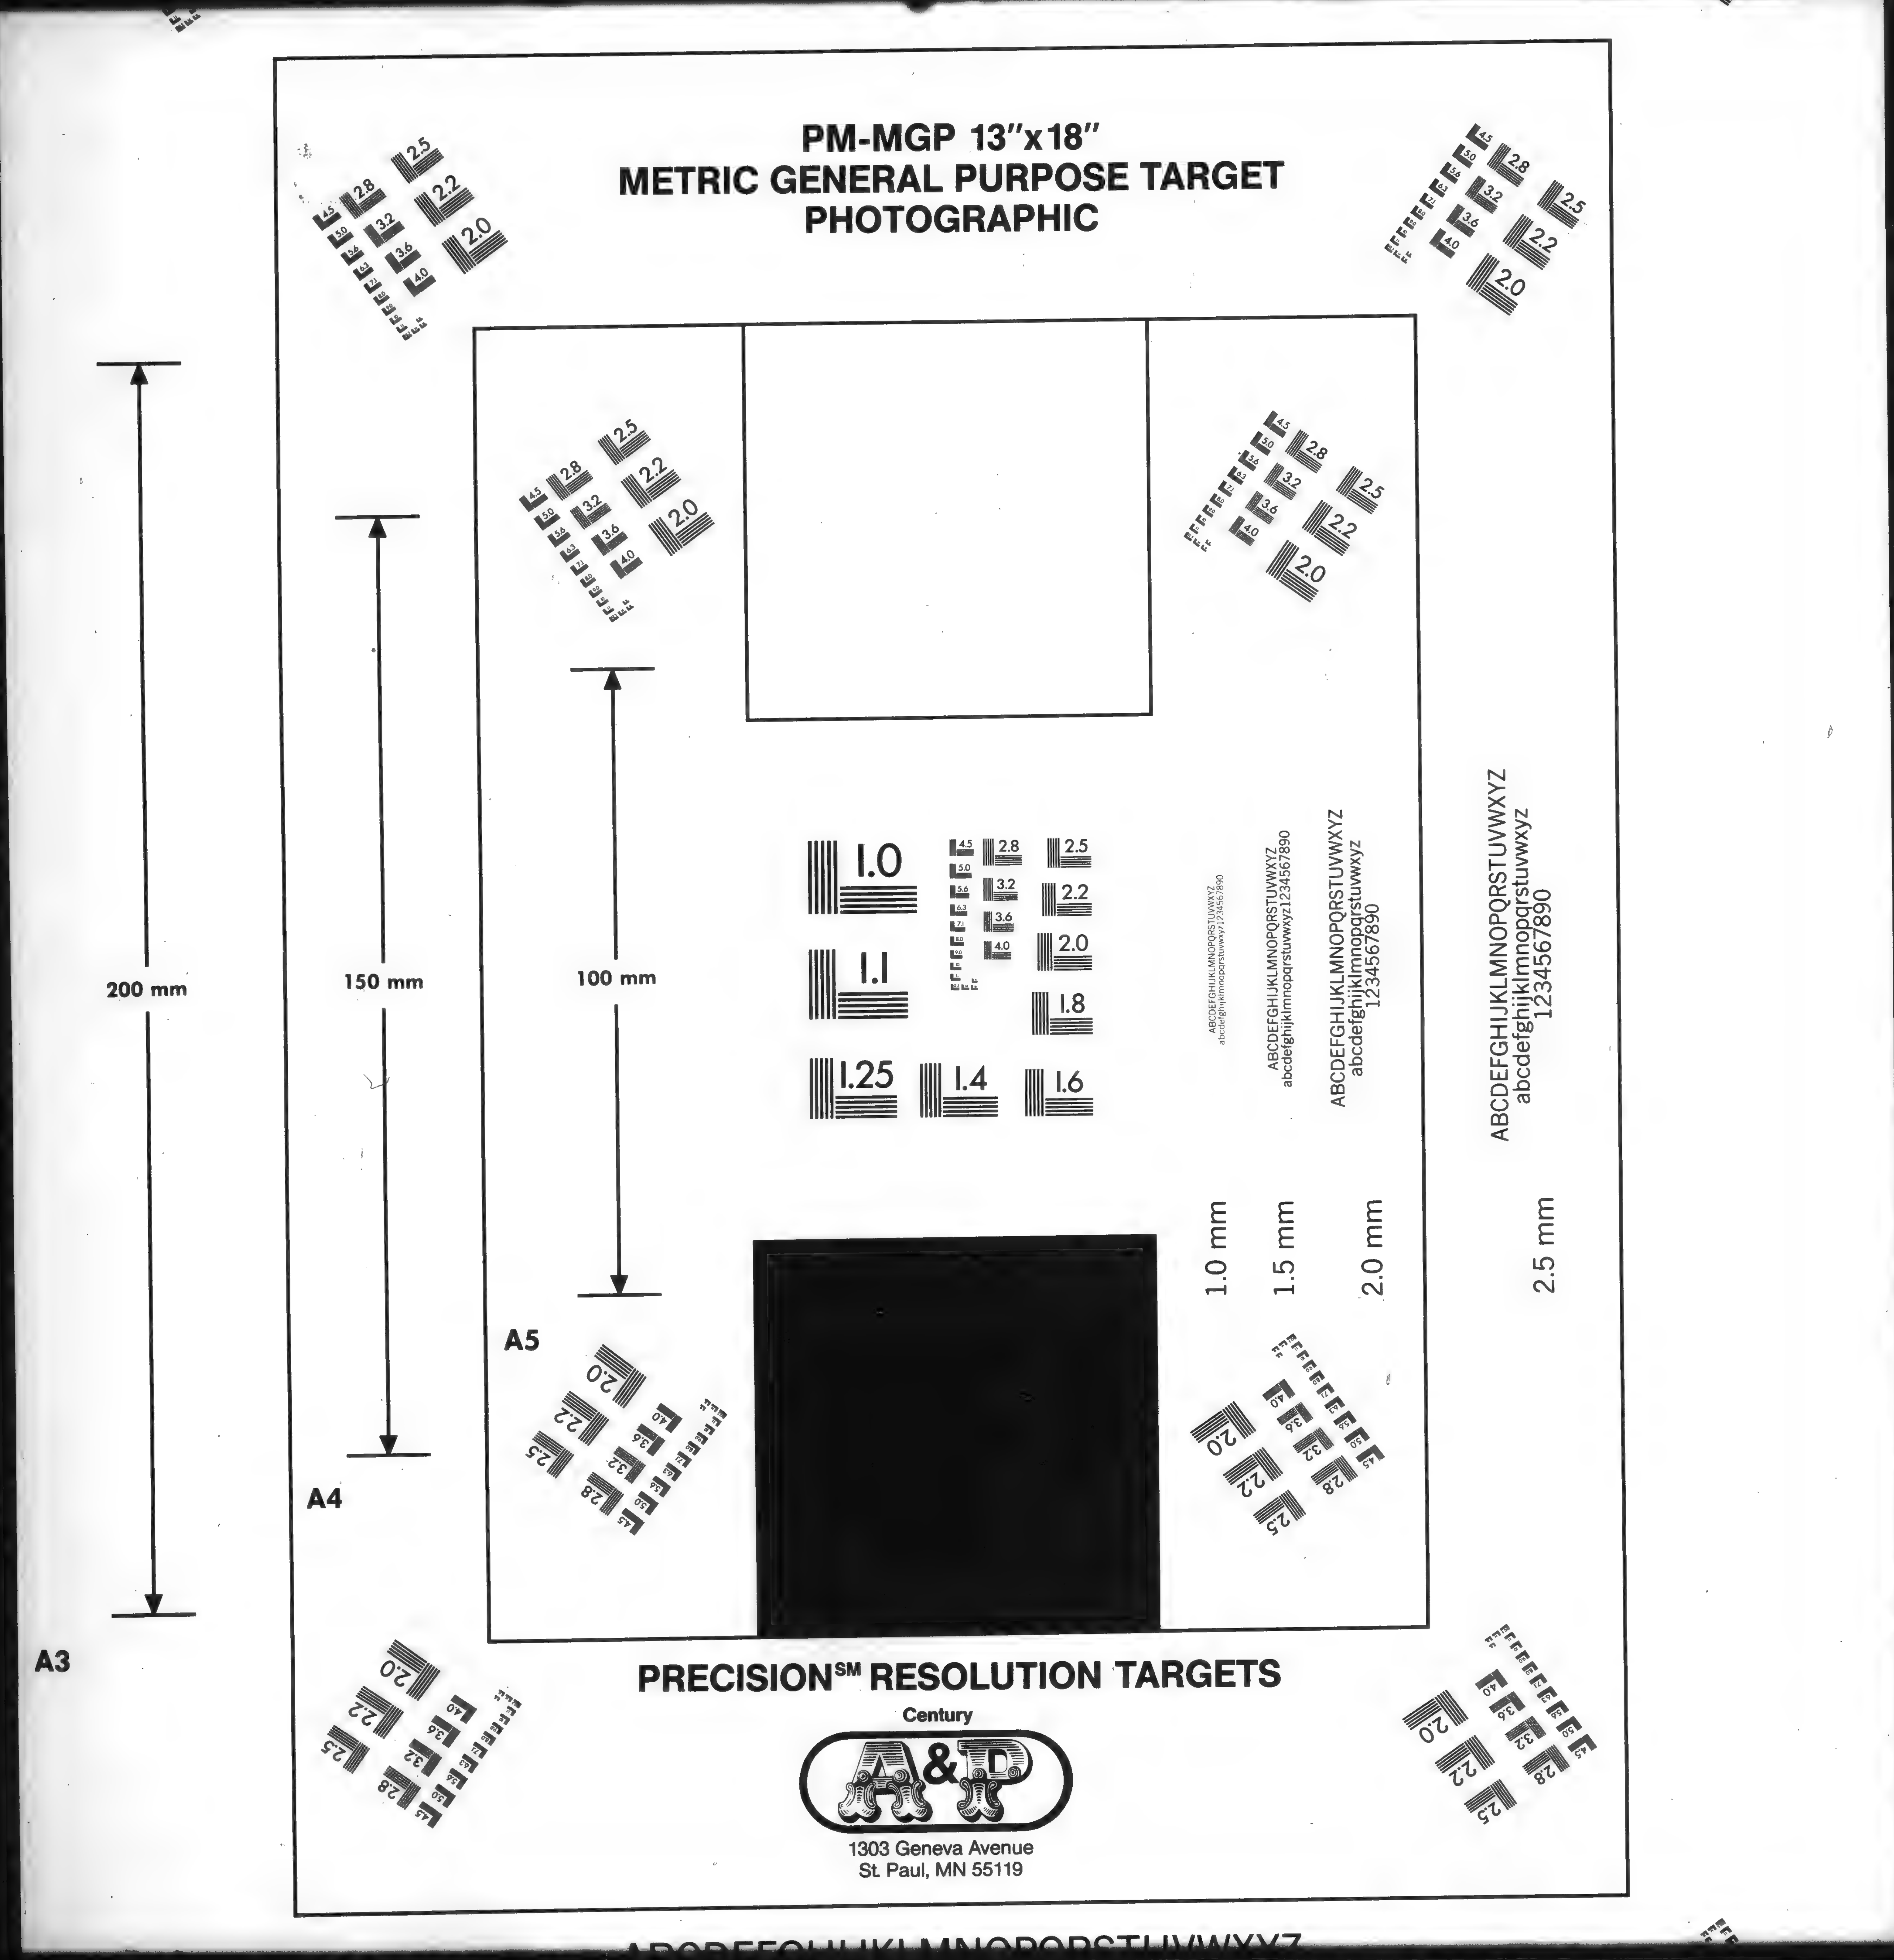
Paul Kochanski, Violinist

Olga Samaroff, Pianist

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x



PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Olga Samaroff, Pianist

THEY WILL APPEAR IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS FALL

Madame Homer and Her Daughters
The family group shows Catherine, Madame Homer, Hester, Ann and Louise, the eldest daughter, who now frequently appears with her distinguished mother in concerts. A few months ago she married Ernest V. R. Stires, Jr., a Harvard '20 war veteran and son of the well-known New York clergyman. (C) Underwood & Underwood.

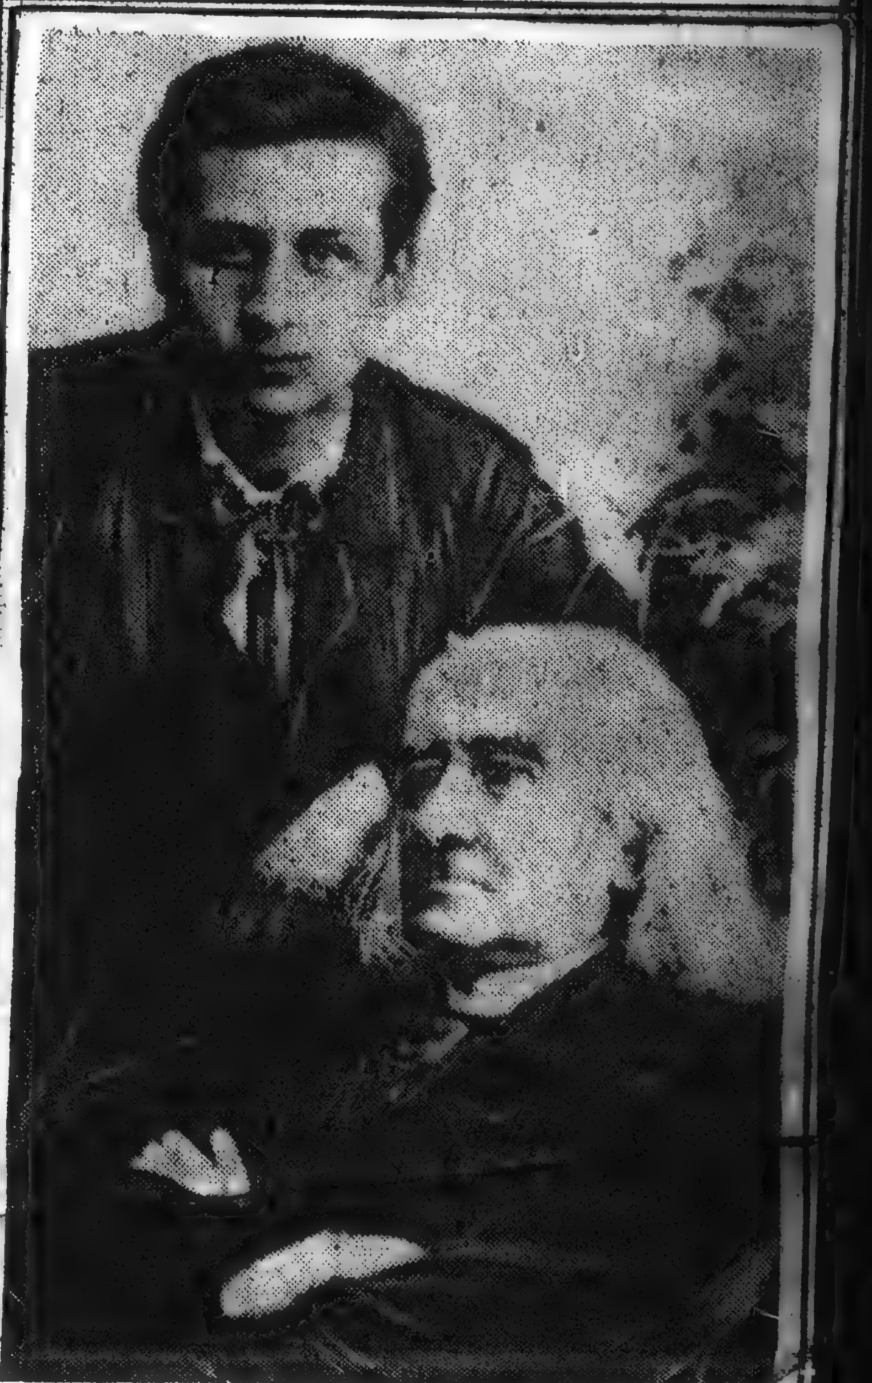
Announced for First Time Today

A page of unconventional photos of famous artists who, it is announced today in the Sunday Post, will appear during the coming season at the Symphony Hall concerts. Some of the musicians and singers will make their Boston debut.

Right—The Hofmans
Joseph Hofman, the noted pianist, on the steps of his summer home at Seal Harbor, Me., with his wife, daughter and pets.

Left—Fled Reds
Mme. Nina Koshetz, prima donna, who will make her debut here, and who scored such a triumph in New York last year, fled as a fugitive from Russia to escape the Bolshevists.

De Gogorza and Emma Eames, His Wife
This is the first published photo in years of the famous opera star, Emma Eames, of Bath, Me. Her husband, although of Spanish ancestry, was born in America. [illegible] Boston this He will sing [illegible] fall. (Bain News Service.)



Rare Photos of Noted Composers

Silotti, the eminent pianist, has given the Sunday Post these quaint photos of himself, taken from an old album and hitherto unpublished. On the left he is shown with Tschaikowsky, the famous composer, and on the right, with the great pianist, Liszt, who was one of the first to recognize the young man's talent. The photos were made in 1884.

Olga Samaroff, Pianist

Upper Photo—Note the Expressions

These six men and women call themselves the "co-optimists." A fitting name, judging by the picture. They gave a wireless concert the other day at the London Marconi works. The music was carried by wireless to another part of the city. (Wide World.)

Photo at [illegible]—Alma Gluck and Kiddies Sail

Alma Gluck, or rather Mrs. Efrem Zimbalist, wife of the famous violinist, sailed for Europe the other day with her husband and the two children, Efrem, Jr., and Maria. On their return to America she is scheduled to appear on the Boston concert stage again this year. (Wide World.)

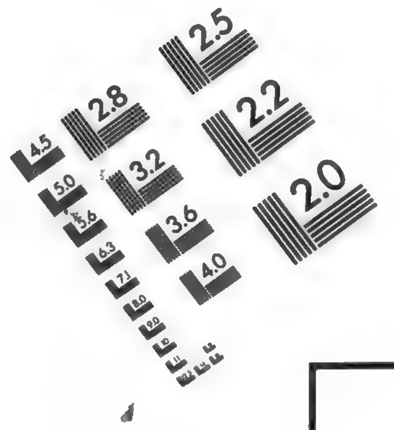
Blue Bloods of China

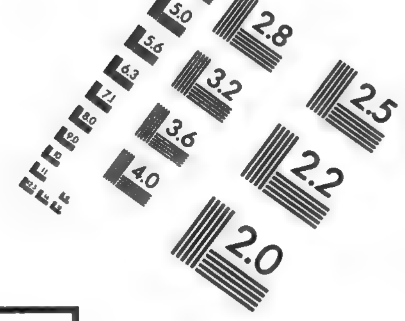
Wa Lee Lo and Tai Lee are aristocratic Pekinese doglets and feel all puffed up because they were adjudged the winners of the litter class at the recent New Rochelle dog show. (Sport-Commercial.)

POST SEPT. 17

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

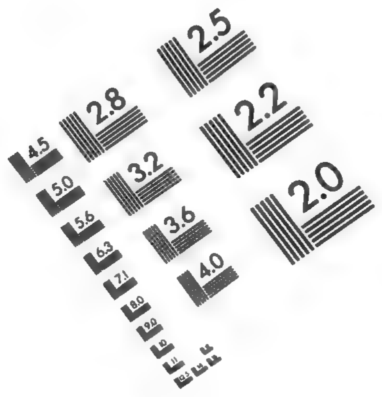


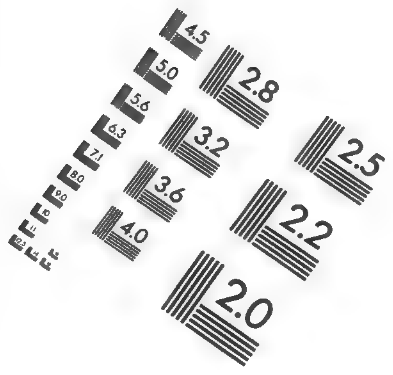


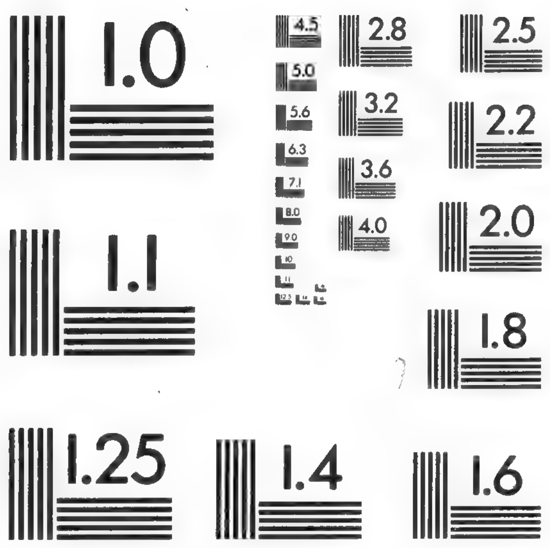
200 mm

150 mm

100 mm







ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

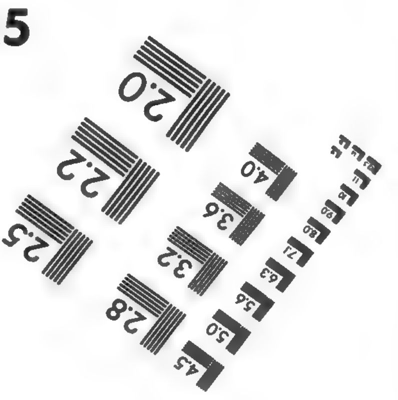
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

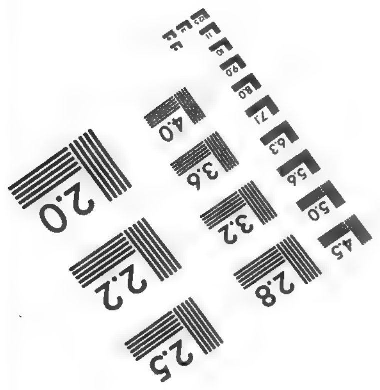
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

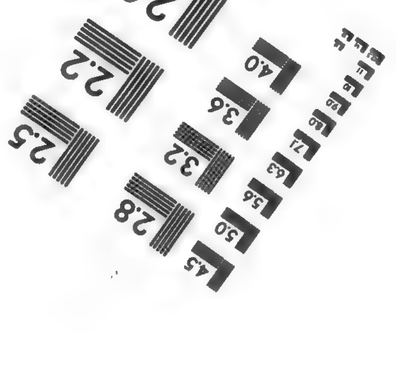


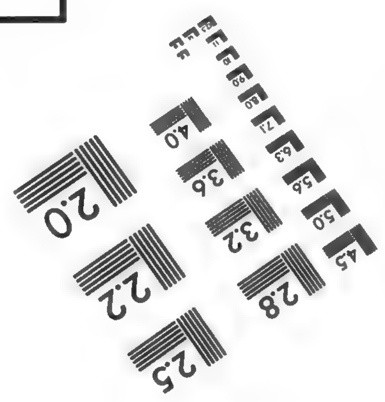


A4

6

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Coming Season of Boston Symphony Concerts

One indication of the success of the coming 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin Oct 7-8 and extend through 24 pair of concerts, is the extent of the subscription sales, which have in no former season been so large at this time of year. All seats for the Friday concerts were reengaged last Spring.

A similar response is observable in the other cities in the full traveling schedule, which the orchestra will undertake. This includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, the concerts in the larger cities of New England, and a trip through the West and North, extending to Montreal, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played for a number of years. Dates are being reserved, however, for a number of Young People's Concerts, which will be given on the basis so successfully carried out during the last two seasons.

As a result of Pierre Monteux' sojourn in Europe during the Summer, and of his acknowledged reputation in seeking out the finest scores of the younger generation, some new music of interest and worth may be anticipated from him in this, his third season with the orchestra.

For one pair of concerts Mr Monteux will yield his baton to Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated French musician, who is to come to this country and appear as guest conductor. This foremost composer has not visited the United States since 1905, when he conducted at the Boston Symphony concerts.

An attractive list of soloists is promised. Among the favorites to be heard again are Louise Homer and Emilio de Gogorza, singers always welcome here, and Joseph Hofmann and Olga Samaroff, pianists of enduring renown.

There will be seven soloists new to these concerts. A woman pianist, perhaps as liked and applauded in Boston as Mme Samaroff, is Yolanda Mero. Perhaps no new figure will stand out more strikingly the coming season than Ferenc Vecsey, the violinist, who is hailed in Europe as the matchless master of his instrument. Born in Buda Pesth in 1893, of musical parents, he manifested extraordinary musical ability as a child and, studying under the great Joseph Joachim, at the age of 10, he made his first appearance in public the same year, 1903. His phenomenal success led to tours of Europe and America.

An older master, whose advent to America will also be an event of considerable note, is Alexander Siloti. This pianist who, when a youth, lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of the Abbe's favorite pupils, has ever since then been revered as the apostle of the extraordinary piano virtuoso, Siloti was also a pupil of Nicolo Rubinstein, Anton's distinguished brother, and of Tschaikowsky at the Moscow Conservatory.

Another celebrity of Europe, not only as pianist but as composer-conductor and generally versatile artist, is the Hungarian Erno Dohnanyi. As a young man of high promise, with several fine, original works to his credit, he crossed the seas and played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1900. Since that time his fame as a virtuoso has spread throughout Europe and was enthusiastically echoed here when he came to the United States last Spring.

Also to be heard at these concerts is Dohnanyi's compatriot and pupil, Erwin Nyiregyhazi (pronounced Near-rej-hah-zy), a young man of 19, who made a striking impression upon his New York audiences when he played several times there toward the end of the past season.

Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia, the country which has brought forth such a surprising number of great violinists. Through his studies with Emil Mlynarsky, the Pole, and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian master, he has inherited the great violinistic traditions of the past.

There is as much interest in Nina Koshetz, accounted the foremost prima donna soprano of Russia. On account of her fine talents in the interpretation of songs, the Russian composers, Medtner, Prokovieff, Gretchaninoff, Taneieff and Rachmaninoff, have been her admirers and collaborators. The last two have accompanied her at recitals and Rachmaninoff was among the first to dedicate a number of his songs to her. Madame Koshetz has been engaged to sing with the Chicago Opera Company the coming season.

GLOBE SEPT. 11.

ONE indication of the success of the coming season, the 41st of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, which will begin Oct. 7-8 and extend through 24 pairs of concerts, is the extent of the subscription sales, which have in no former season been so large at this time of year. All seats for the Friday concerts were re-engaged last spring.

A similar response is observable in the other cities in the full traveling schedule which the orchestra will undertake. This includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, the concerts in the larger cities of New England and a trip through the West and North, extending to Montreal, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played for a number of years. Dates are being reserved, however, for a number of young people's concerts, which will be given on the basis successfully carried out during the last two seasons.

As a result of Mr. Monteux's sojourn in Europe during the summer, and of his reputation in seeking out the finest scores of the younger generation, new music of interest and worth may be anticipated from him in this, his third season with the orchestra. The acknowledged masterpieces of the orchestral repertory will, of course, have their due place upon the programs to come.

For one pair of concerts Mr. Monteux will yield his baton to Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated French composer, who is to come to this country in the course of the season and appear as guest conductor. He has not visited the United States since 1905, when he conducted at

---

Galaxy of Stars at Symphony Concerts

IT is an earnest of the enjoyment of the Boston Symphony concerts as given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux that the advance sale of seats by subscription for the coming series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall (to begin on October 7-8) has never been so large at this time of year. As long ago as last Spring the seats for the Friday afternoon concerts were all re-engaged. The complete schedule of concerts, including Young People's concerts, is as large as can be undertaken.

Now on the high seas, en route for Boston, Pierre Monteux brings with him some new scores of manifest genius and unusual interest. Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated composer, will appear as guest conductor for one pair of concerts.

The soloists to be heard during the season would alone make the concerts eventful. Louise Homer, contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, are both favorites of long standing. A newcomer to Boston is Madame Nina Koshetz, foremost prima donna soprano of Russia. Rachmaninoff was among the first to dedicate a number of his songs to her. Madame Koshetz has been engaged to sing with the Chicago Opera this season.

A new meteor upon the horizon of musical America is Ferenc Vecsey, for years hailed in Europe as the unsurpassed master of the violin. Born in Buda Pesth in 1893, he studied with Joachim; at the age of ten he made his first public appearance. His phenomenal success led to tours of Europe and America. Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia, whose concerts in New York stamp him as an artist of fine calibre.

Two of the pianists listed among the coming soloists, Josef Hofmann and Olga Samaroff, are favorites of long standing. The advent of Alexander Siloti will surely be an event of considerable importance, as will his appearance as Symphony soloist. This pianist lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of the Abbe's favorite pupils. Siloti also studied under Nicolai Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky.

Another celebrity, as pianist, composer-conductor and all around artist, is the Hungarian, Erno Dohnanyi, who first played with the Symphony Orchestra in 1900. Dohnanyi's compatriot and pupil, Erwin Nyirgyhazi, a young man of nineteen, will also be among the piano soloists.

SYMPHONY SEASON STARS

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF.

© ELZIN N.Y.

NINA KOSHETZ

FERENC VECSEY.

© MISHKIN. N.Y.

JOSEF HOFMAN.

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE

Among the singers, pianists and fiddlers to perform at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are a few acquaintances of long standing and some unknown to Boston. The name of Nyiregyhazi is reassuring. Any one with a name like that should be able to do something well. Otherwise there is no excuse for his existence. The joy attending his appearance on the stage will be enlarged by the attempts to pronounce his name correctly. There will be a great opportunity for Miss Know-it-all on Friday afternoons.

Some remembering Mr. Vecsey, when he fiddled here as a boy of 12 or 13 years, will be moderately anxious to find out whether he has grown in musical stature or whether he is merely a glib fiddler. It will be a pleasure to hear that fine pianist Alexander Siloti again. It was rumored a year or so ago that he had died, but he soon took the trouble to contradict the report.

The prospectus of the orchestra for the season includes the words "others to be announced," with reference to soloists. We hope that Alfredo Casella, pianist and composer, is surely engaged. He is one of the most prominent figures today in the musical world, and has already been gladly engaged for symphony concerts in other American cities, even Detroit. Mr. Cortot should certainly be heard, if he is in this country, as should Mr. Robert Schmitz. One or two pianists already announced for the concerts might be persuaded to withdraw in their favor. Musicians have long been famous for graceful courtesies of this nature.

"A NAME TO CONJURE WITH"

"Nyiregyhazi." The name reminds us of a passage in that amusing book of reminiscences, Lord Frederick Hamilton's "Vanished Pomps of Yesterday."

HERALD SEPT.

ADVERTISER, SEPT.

the Boston Symphony concerts. Since that time the interest in his creative genius has been increased by his new and important works, some of which have been played by the orchestra.

Soloists of Long Standing

AN especially fine list of soloists will add further enjoyment to the Symphony concerts during the course of the season. A favorite of the past who will appear once more is Louise Homer, the American contralto, applauded in her own concerts and as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Equally prominent among baritones is Emilio de Gogorza, of American birth and Spanish descent. He has made memorable the Symphony concerts at which he has appeared. This may also be well said of Josef Hofmann. A pianist somewhat younger and yet pleasantly remembered here is Olga Samaroff.

New Soloists

THERE will be as many as seven soloists new to these concerts. Each one of them is more than qualified for the honor by high musical pre-eminence in various parts of the world. Yolanda Mero, pianist, known here by her recitals, makes her debut at the Symphony concerts.

Probably no new figure will stand out more strikingly during the coming musical season in America than Ferenc Vecsey, the violinist, hailed in Europe as the matchless master of his instrument. Born in Buda-Pesth in 1893, of musical parents, he manifested extraordinary musical ability as a child, and, studying under Joseph Joachim, at the age of 10 he made his first appearance in public the same year (1903). His success led to tours of Europe and America, and, indeed, a series of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. His early maturity has evidently brought about new beauty to his playing.

An older master, whose coming to America will also be an event of note, is Alexander Siloti. This pianist, who, when a youth, lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of his favorite pupils, has ever since then been revered as the apostle of the extraordinary piano virtuoso. Siloti also studied with Nicola Rubinstein, the distinguished brother of Anton, and with Tschaikowsky at the Moscow Conservatory.

Another celebrity of Europe, not only as pianist, but as composer, conductor and generally versatile artist, is the Hungarian Erno Dohnanyi, who, as a young man of high promise, with several fine, original works to his credit, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1900. Since that time his fame as a virtuoso has spread throughout Europe and was recognized here when he came to the United States last spring.

Now Comes Nyiregyhazi

ALSO to be heard at these concerts is Dohnanyi's compatriot and pupil, Erwin Nyiregyhazi (pronounced "Near-rej-hah-zy"), a young man of 19, who made a striking impression in New York when he played several times toward the end of the past season. As yet he is known to Boston only by hearsay.

Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia, the country that has brought forth such a surprising number of great violinists. Through his studies with Emil Mlynarsky, the Pole, and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian master, he has inherited the great violinistic traditions of the past. His several tours of Europe and his concerts in New York last February herald him as an artist of a calibre not soon forgotten.

There is as much interest in Nina Koshetz, prima donna soprano, long applauded in the imperial opera houses of Moscow and Petrograd, as in any singer new in this country. On account of her fine talents in the interpretation of songs, the Russian composers, Medtner, Prokovieff, Gretchaninoff, Taneieff and Rachmaninoff, have been her admirers and collaborators. The last two have accompanied her at recitals, and Rachmaninoff was among the first to dedicate a number of his songs to her. Naturally, her repertory of songs and operatic roles exhibits a distinct leaning toward the wealth of music which her own country has produced. Mme. Koshetz has been engaged to sing with the Chicago Opera Company the coming season.

YOLANDA MERO

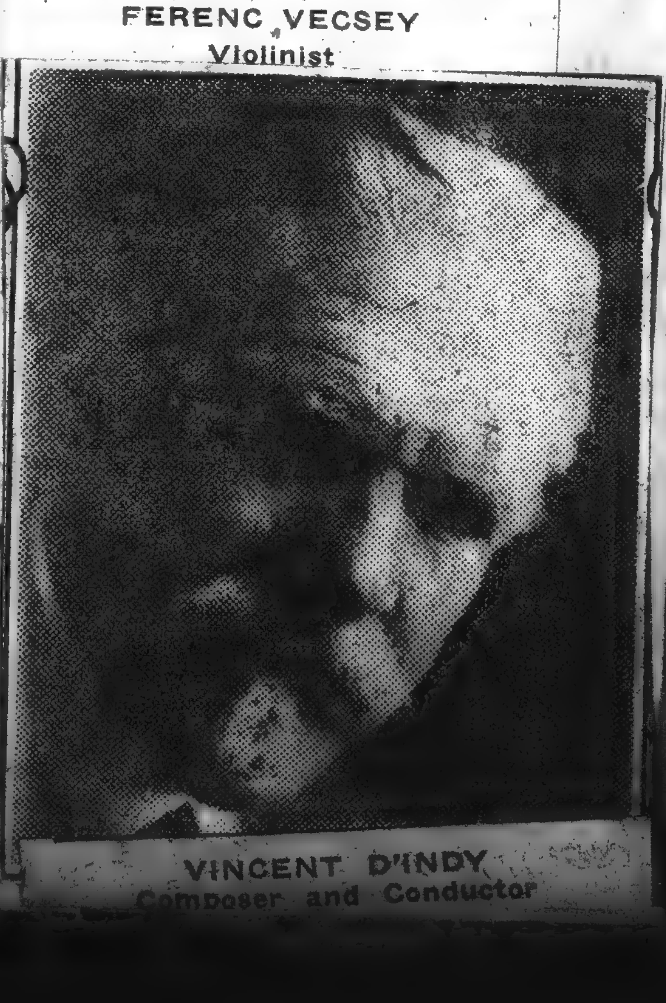
Pianist

ALEXANDER SILOTI

Pianist

FERENC VECSEY

Violinist



VINCENT D'INDY

Composer and Conductor

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mme. Mero at the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Cortot and a Justifiable Omission—Strauss Denies an Interview—Palmgren as Visiting Composer—Incidents and Opinions

BY an inadvertence quite without prejudice, the name of Mme. Mérö, the pianist, was omitted from the list of "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts as printed in this place last Saturday. Now (or then) it is hardly necessary to recall her as a virtuosa of displayful skill, large tone and energetic mood.

Le Temps, the Parisian newspaper, remarks amusingly that, if Carpentier and Miss Lenglen fared none too well in the ring and on the tennis-court in the United States, Mr. Cortot, the pianist, and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, have carried all before them overseas. Somehow, Le Temps fancies, they accord with "the French genius" better than do the defeated pair. Nor does it overlook the acclaimed Mme. Curie.

Apropos Mr. Cortot, there are grumblings because his name does not appear in the list of "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts of the winter. No one disputes his merit and interest as pianist; but to the mere observer there seem two valid reasons to dispense with his services. Whenever Mr. Cortot has played at Symphony Hall, he has tended to monopolize the occasion with two pieces instead of one, and to set the orchestra proportionally in the background—an error of taste; while he is distinctly one of those who would have the Symphony Concerts a polite Parisian dependency. There was enough of that presumption in Mr. Rabaud's time. Mr. Monteux has made them international—and American—again.

TRAV. SEPT. 1

Conductor Monteux Returns

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here last Monday, after a Summer's sojourn in Europe. His vacation was broken only by a concert which he conducted in Paris and by his quest of new scores. The concert was particularly successful, in that it enabled Mr Monteux to introduce to the French public the symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" by the late American composer, Charles T. Griffes. It met with keen and general enthusiasm.

Mr Monteux was also successful in singling out musical works from the various European Nations. The best of these, together with some scores of our own composers, he intends to include in the series of Symphony concerts, that they may show a just recognition of true genius in the music of today and tomorrow.

He has been studying scores by the following composers, reserving the right to select and discard in order that the standard repertory of symphonic music may duly predominate on the programs: From France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger and Marcel Dupres; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella and deSabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff, and from Spain, de Falla.

GLOBE - S

[7]

Coming Season of Boston Symphony Concerts

One indication of the success of the coming 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin Oct 7-8 and extend through 24 pair of concerts, is the extent of the subscription sales, which have in no former season been so large at this time of year. All seats for the Friday concerts were reengaged last Spring.

A similar response is observable in the other cities in the full traveling schedule, which the orchestra will undertake. This includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, the concerts in the larger cities of New England, and a trip through the West and North, extending to Montreal, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played for a number of years. Dates are being reserved, however, for a number of Young People's Concerts, which will be given on the basis so successfully carried out during the last two seasons.

As a result of Pierre Monteux' sojourn in Europe during the Summer, and of his acknowledged reputation in seeking out the finest scores of the younger generation, some new music of interest and worth may be anticipated from him in this, his third season with the orchestra.

For one pair of concerts Mr Monteux will yield his baton to Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated French musician, who is to come to this country and appear as guest conductor. This foremost composer has not visited the United States since 1905, when he conducted at the Boston Symphony concerts.

An attractive list of soloists is promised. Among the favorites to be heard again are Louise Homer and Emilio de Gogorza, singers always welcome here, and Joseph Hofmann and Olga Samaroff, pianists of enduring renown.

There will be seven soloists new to these concerts. A woman pianist, perhaps as liked and applauded in Boston as Mme Samaroff, is Yolanda Mero. Perhaps no new figure will stand out more strikingly the coming season than Ferenc Vecsey, the violinist, who is hailed in Europe as the matchless master of his instrument. Born in Buda Pesth in 1893, of musical parents, he manifested extraordinary musical ability as a child and, studying under the great Joseph Joachim, at the age of 10, he made his first appearance in public the same year, 1903. His phenomenal success led to tours of Europe and America.

An older master, whose advent to America will also be an event of considerable note, is Alexander Siloti. This pianist who, when a youth, lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of the Abbe's favorite pupils, has ever since then been revered as the apostle of the extraordinary piano virtuoso, Siloti was also a pupil of Nicolo Rubinstein, Anton's distinguished brother, and of Tschaikowsky at the Moscow Conservatory.

Another celebrity of Europe, not only as pianist but as composer-conductor and generally versatile artist, is the Hungarian Erno Dohnanyi. As a young man of high promise, with several fine, original works to his credit, he crossed the seas and played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1900. Since that time his fame as a virtuoso has spread throughout Europe and was enthusiastically echoed here when he came to the United States last Spring.

Also to be heard at these concerts is Dohnanyi's compatriot and pupil, Erwin Nyiregyhazi (pronounced Near-rej-hah-zy), a young man of 19, who made a striking impression upon his New York audiences when he played several times there toward the end of the past season.

Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia, the country which has brought forth such a surprising number of great violinists. Through his studies with Emil Mlynarsky, the Pole, and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian master, he has inherited the great violinistic traditions of the past.

There is as much interest in Nina Koshetz, accounted the foremost prima donna soprano of Russia. On account of her fine talents in the interpretation of songs, the Russian composers, Medtner, Prokovieff, Gretchaninoff, Taneieff and Rachmaninoff, have been her admirers and collaborators. The last two have accompanied her at recitals and Rachmaninoff was among the first to dedicate a number of his songs to her. Madame Koshetz has been engaged to sing with the Chicago Opera Company the coming season.

GLOBE SEPT. 11.

ONE indication of the success of the coming season, the 41st of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, which will begin Oct. 7-8 and extend through 24 pairs of concerts, is the extent of the subscription sales, which have in no former season been so large at this time of year. All seats for the Friday concerts were re-engaged last spring.

A similar response is observable in the other cities in the full traveling schedule which the orchestra will undertake. This includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, the concerts in the larger cities of New England and a trip through the West and North, extending to Montreal, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played for a number of years. Dates are being reserved, however, for a number of young people's concerts, which will be given on the basis successfully carried out during the last two seasons.

As a result of Mr. Monteux's sojourn in Europe during the summer, and of his reputation in seeking out the finest scores of the younger generation, new music of interest and worth may be anticipated from him in this, his third season with the orchestra. The acknowledged masterpieces of the orchestral repertory will, of course, have their due place upon the programs to come.

For one pair of concerts Mr. Monteux will yield his baton to Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated French composer, who is to come to this country in the course of the season and appear as guest conductor. He has not visited the United States since 1905, when he conducted at the Boston Symphony concerts. Since that time the interest in his creative genius has been increased by his new and important works, some of which have been played by the orchestra.

Soloists of Long Standing

AN especially fine list of soloists will add further enjoyment to the Symphony concerts during the course of the season. A favorite of the past who will appear once more is Louise Homer, the American contralto, applauded in her own concerts and as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Equally prominent among baritones is Emilio de Gogorza, of American birth and Spanish descent. He has made memorable the Symphony concerts at which he has appeared. This may also be well said of Josef Hofmann. A pianist somewhat younger and yet pleasantly remembered here is Olga Samaroff.

New Soloists

THERE will be as many as seven soloists new to these concerts. Each one of them is more than qualified for the honor by high musical pre-eminence in various parts of the world. Yolanda Mero, pianist, known here by her recitals, makes her debut at the Symphony concerts.

Probably no new figure will stand out more strikingly during the coming musical season in America than Ferenc Vecsey, the violinist, hailed in Europe as the matchless master of his instrument. Born in Buda-Pesth in 1893, of musical parents, he manifested extraordinary musical ability as a child, and, studying under Joseph Joachim, at the age of 10 he made his first appearance in public the same year (1903). His success led to tours of Europe and America, and, indeed, a series of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston. His early maturity has evidently brought about new beauty to his playing.

An older master, whose coming to America will also be an event of note, is Alexander Siloti. This pianist, who, when a youth, lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of his favorite pupils, has ever since then been revered as the apostle of the extraordinary piano virtuoso. Siloti also studied with Nicola Rubinstein, the distinguished brother of Anton, and with Tschaikowsky at the Moscow Conservatory.

Another celebrity of Europe, not only as pianist, but as composer, conductor and generally versatile artist, is the Hungarian Erno Dohnanyi, who, as a young man of high promise, with several fine, original works to his credit, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1900. Since that time his fame as a virtuoso has spread throughout Europe and was recognized here when he came to the United States last spring.

Now Comes Nyiregyhazi

ALSO to be heard at the concerts is Dohnanyi's compatriot and pupil, Erwin Nyiregyhazi (pronounced "Near-rej-hah-zy"), a young man of 19, who made a striking impression in New York when he played several times toward the end of the past season. As yet he is known to Boston only by hearsay.

Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia, the country that has brought forth such a surprising number of great violinists. Through his studies with Emil Mlynarsky, the Pole, and Cesar Thomson, the Belgian master, he has inherited the great violinistic traditions of the past. His several tours of Europe and his concerts in New York last February herald him as an artist of a calibre not soon forgotten.

There is as much interest in Nina Koshetz, prima donna soprano, long applauded in the imperial opera houses of Moscow and Petrograd, as in any singer new in this country. On account of her fine talents in the interpretation of songs, the Russian composers, Medtner, Prokovieff, Gretchaninoff, Taneieff and Rachmaninoff, have been her admirers and collaborators. The last two have accompanied her at recitals, and Rachmaninoff was among the first to dedicate a number of his songs to her. Naturally, her repertory of songs and operatic roles exhibits a distinct leaning toward the wealth of music which her own country has produced. Mme. Koshetz has been engaged to sing with the Chicago Opera Company the coming season.

Galaxy of Stars at Symphony Concerts

IT is an earnest of the enjoyment of the Boston Symphony concerts as given under the leadership of Pierre Monteux that the advance sale of seats by subscription for the coming series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall (to begin on October 7-8) has never been so large at this time of year. As long ago as last Spring the seats for the Friday afternoon concerts were all re-engaged. The complete schedule of concerts, including Young People's concerts, is as large as can be undertaken.

Now on the high seas, en route for Boston, Pierre Monteux brings with him some new scores of manifest genius and unusual interest. Vincent D'Indy, the celebrated composer, will appear as guest conductor for one pair of concerts.

The soloists to be heard during the season would alone make the concerts eventful. Louise Homer, contralto, and Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, are both favorites of long standing. A newcomer to Boston is Madame Nina Koshetz, foremost prima donna soprano of Russia. Rachmaninoff was among the first to dedicate a number of his songs to her. Madame Koshetz has been engaged to sing with the Chicago Opera this season.

A new meteor upon the horizon of musical America is Ferenc Vecsey, for years hailed in Europe as the unsurpassed master of the violin. Born in Buda Pesth in 1893, he studied with Joachim; at the age of ten he made his first public appearance. His phenomenal success led to tours of Europe and America. Another comparative newcomer to this country is Paul Kochanski, a native of Russia, whose concerts in New York stamp him as an artist of fine calibre.

Two of the pianists listed among the coming soloists, Josef Hofmann

SYMPHONY SEASON STARS

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF.

NINA KOSHETZ

FERENC VECSEY.

JOSEF HOFMAN.

ELZIN N.Y.
© MISHKIN. N.Y.

and Olga Samaroff, are favorites of long standing. The advent of Alexander Siloti will surely be an event of considerable importance, as will his appearance as Symphony soloist. This pianist lived at Weimar for the last three years of Liszt's life as one of the Abbe's favorite pupils. Siloti also studied under Nicolai Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky.

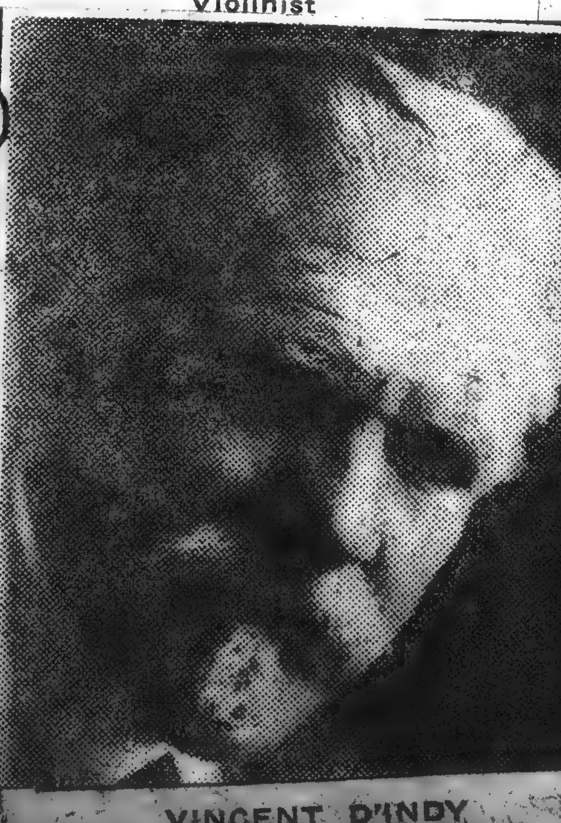
Another celebrity, as pianist, composer-conductor and all around artist, is the Hungarian, Erno Dohnanyi, who first played with the Symphony Orchestra in 1900. Dohnanyi's compatriot and pupil, Erwin Nyirgyhazi, a young man of nineteen, will also be among the piano soloists.

ADVERTISER, SEPT.

YOLANDA MERO
Pianist

ALEXANDER SILOTI
Pianist

FERENC VECSEY
Violinist



VINCENT D'INDY
Composer and Conductor

As the World Wags

By PHILIP HALE

Among the singers, pianists and fiddlers to perform at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are a few acquaintances of long standing and some unknown to Boston. The name of Nyiregyhazi is reassuring. Any one with a name like that should be able to do something well. Otherwise there is no excuse for his existence. The joy attending his appearance on the stage will be enlarged by the attempts to pronounce his name correctly. There will be a great opportunity for Miss Know-it-all on Friday afternoons.

Some remembering Mr. Vecsey, when he fiddled here as a boy of 12 or 13 years, will be moderately anxious to find out whether he has grown in musical stature or whether he is merely a glib fiddler. It will be a pleasure to hear that fine pianist Alexander Siloti again. It was rumored a year or so ago that he had died, but he soon took the trouble to contradict the report.

The prospectus of the orchestra for the season includes the words "others to be announced," with reference to soloists. We hope that Alfredo Casella, pianist and composer, is surely engaged. He is one of the most prominent figures today in the musical world, and has already been gladly engaged for symphony concerts in other American cities, even Detroit. Mr. Cartot should certainly be heard, if he is in this country, as should Mr. Robert Schmitz. One or two pianists already announced for the concerts might be persuaded to withdraw in their favor. Musicians have long been famous for graceful courtesies of this nature.

"A NAME TO CONJURE WITH"

"Nyiregyhazi." The name reminds us of a passage in that amusing book of reminiscences, Lord Frederick Hamilton's "Vanished Pomps of Yesterday."

HERALD SEPT.

TRAV. SEPT. 1

Conductor Monteux Returns

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here last Monday, after a Summer's sojourn in Europe. His vacation was broken only by a concert which he conducted in Paris and by his quest of new scores. The concert was particularly successful, in that it enabled Mr Monteux to introduce to the French public the symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by the late American composer, Charles T. Griffes. It met with keen and general enthusiasm.

Mr Monteux was also successful in singling out musical works from the various European Nations. The best of these, together with some scores of our own composers, he intends to include in the series of Symphony concerts, that they may show a just recognition of true genius in the music of today and tomorrow.

He has been studying scores by the following composers, reserving the right to select and discard in order that the standard repertory of symphonic music may duly predominate on the programs: From France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger and Marcel Dupres; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella and deSabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff, and from Spain, de Falla.

GLOBE-S

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mme. Mero at the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Cortot and a Justifiable Omission—Strauss Denies an Interview—Palmgren as Visiting Composer—Incidents and Opinions

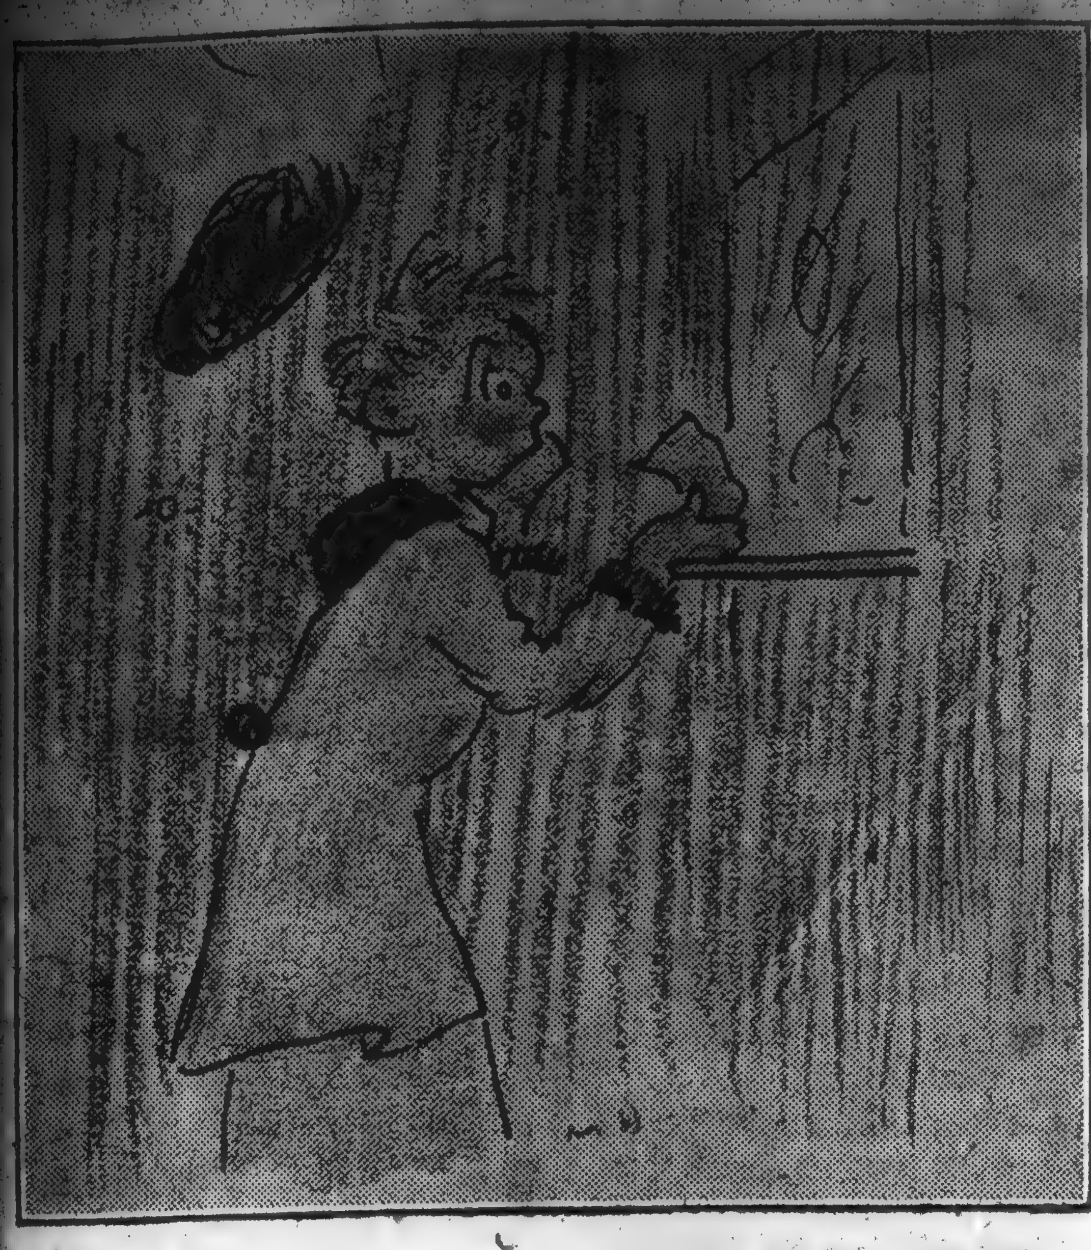
BY an inadvertence quite without prejudice, the name of Mme. Mérö, the pianist, was omitted from the list of "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts as printed in this place last Saturday. Now (or then) it is hardly necessary to recall her as a virtuosa of displayful skill, large tone and energetic mood.

Le Temps, the Parisian newspaper, remarks amusingly that, if Carpentier and Miss Lenglen fared none too well in the ring and on the tennis-court in the United States, Mr. Cortot, the pianist, and Mr. Thibaud, the violinist, have carried all before them overseas. Somehow, Le Temps fancies, they accord with "the French genius" better than do the defeated pair. Nor does it overlook the acclaimed Mme. Curie.

Apropos Mr. Cortot, there are grumblings because his name does not appear in the list of "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts of the winter. No one disputes his merit and interest as pianist; but to the mere observer there seem two valid reasons to dispense with his services. Whenever Mr. Cortot has played at Symphony Hall, he has tended to monopolize the occasion with two pieces instead of one, and to set the orchestra proportionally in the background—an error of taste; while he is distinctly one of those who would have the Symphony Concerts a polite Parisian dependency. There was enough of that presumption in Mr. Rabaud's time. Mr. Monteux has made them international—and American—again.

TIGHT BINDING

"Delays Have Dangerous Ends"



(Drawing by Marion Huckins)

Painful Discovery at Symphony Hall

There Are No Seats Unsold for the Symphony Concerts for Friday Afternoons

TRANS. SEPT 17.

…NTEUX READY …R SYMPHONY SEASON

…sale of the few remaining …s by subscription for the Satur… …evening Symphony concerts is …g on. Pierre Monteux arrived in …on Monday after a soourn …urope. He has been studying …by the following composers, …ing the right to select and … in order that the standard …ry of symphonic music may …edominate on the programs: …France, Roussel, Ravel, Ra… …Honneger, and Marcel Dupres; …ngland, Bantook and Bax; …aly, Davico, Tomassini, Mali… …Casella and deSabata; from … Stravinsky and Prokovieff; …m Spain, deFalla.

…DVERTISER-SEPT.18.

…Prospect

…DAY afternoon, Oct. 2, in Symphon… …all, a concert of old airs, ornat… operatic pieces, light French, Spanis… American songs, by Mme. Galli-Curc… …graces and agilities of voice, flowing … and charm of sentiment all commend… She will sing ancient pieces by Lotti …Donaudy; "mad scenes" from Doni… "Lucia" and Thomas's "Hamlet"; …from "Traviata," in which she ex… …showy waltz by Arditi, and sundry … trifles.

…y afternoon, Oct. 7, in Symphony … the first of the afternoon concerts …Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Mon… …onducting. Mendelssohn's Italian …ny, Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-pic… …Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes of … and "Fetes," and Strauss's tone… …Don Juan," fill the programme.

…ay evening, Oct. 8, in Symphony … first of the evening concerts of …phony Orchestra with Mr. Mon… …ducting and the programme above

…AN. SEPT 24

…GRAM FOR FIRST SYMPHONY

…Monteux, conductor of the Bos… …mphony Orchestra, has decided … the following program for the … pair of concerts, to take place … afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday … Oct. 8, at Symphony Hall.

…first number will be Mendels… …"Italian" Symphony. The other … will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's …ture, "Sanko," Debussy's Two …es, "Nuage" and "Fetes," and … Strauss's symphonic poem, …an."

…EPU…

T…AV. SEPT 24

SEPT 17.

BIG PROGRAM FOR FIRST SYMPHONY

Monteaux Opens Concerts by Noted Orchestra on Friday, October 7

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided upon the following program for the opening pair of concerts, to take place Friday afternoon, October 7, and Saturday evening, October 8, at Symphony Hall.

The first number will be Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, known particularly by the closing movement in Saltarello form. The other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko," Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," now regarded as a standard orchestral piece, although it has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons.

AMER. SEPT 24

First Symphony Program

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided upon the program for the opening pair of concerts, to take place Friday afternoon, Oct 7, and Saturday evening, Oct 8, at Symphony Hall.

The first number will be Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," known particularly by the closing movement in Saltarello form. The other numbers will be Riesky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fete," and Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," which has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons.

GLOBE-SEPT 25.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided upon the following programme for the opening pair of concerts, to take place Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday evening, Oct. 8, at Symphony Hall.

The first number will be Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, known particularly by the closing movement in Saltarello form. The other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko," Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fete," and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," now regarded as a standard orchestral piece, although it has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons.

The Boston musical season starts practically with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts, or perhaps on the Sunday preceding the first concert of the Boston Symphony—as next Sunday, when Mme. Galli-Curci gives the first afternoon concert of Mr. Mudgett's series. The musical life of the city as it is today begins and comes to an end with the activities of Symphony Hall. For a city of the size and traditions and population of Boston that is all wrong.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the greatest and most indispensable musical asset of the capital of Massachusetts. It gave conclusive proof of its value to the community and the public sentiment toward it by the manner in which it survived the strike which ensued on the disgraceful conduct of its former concertmaster two years ago. It pulled through that crisis not only because of its traditions but because the public of the city emphatically wanted it and did not want the tactics pursued to destroy it. But that does not prove that this city is musical.

BOST SEPT 25

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made up the following program for the opening concerts on Friday afternoon, October 7, and Saturday evening, October 8: Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fete," and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan."

ADVERT. SEPT. 25

NEW VIOLA ARTIST IN SYMPHONY

Fourel, Famed in France, Joins Band —Krafft Returns

Georges Fourel, long famous in France as one of the most highly gifted masters of his instrument, arrived in Boston last Tuesday to become the new leader of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be in his place when the orchestra assembles in full force for the opening rehearsals in Symphony Hall this morning.

MR. KRAFFT RETURNS

Before Pierre Monteux, the conductor, lifts his baton to begin, he will introduce Mr. Fourel, the only new member in the leaders of the various selections, and also three other musicians: F. William Krafft, who was long esteemed as one of the most talented members of the first violin section, and left the orchestra in 1912; Hans Werner, the equally gifted viola player, who is returning after an absence of two seasons, and Edouard LeBleu, a new member, who has come from New Orleans to fill, in the percussion section, the vacancy left by the death last summer of Herman Burkhardt.

Famed as Virtuoso

Judging by his splendid reputation in the Old World, the Symphony Orchestra may well possess a valuable virtuoso in Mr. Fourel. In France he is generally regarded as one of the very finest of the many fine viola players of which that country can boast. Born in Grenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining, unanimously, in 1913, the First Prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the Opera, he became viola soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux.

Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross.

After the demobilization he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and, as well, of the Krettly Quartet, the latter devoted particularly to the making known of new music. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The programme for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Oct. 7 and 8 will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Picture, "Sadko," Two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."

POST SEPT 29

FOUREL TO LEAD VIOLA SECTION OF SYMPHONY

Georges Fourel, one of the leading viola players in France, arrived in Boston this week to become the new leader of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be in his place when the orchestra assembles in full force for the opening rehearsal in Symphony Hall this morning. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, will introduce Mr Fourel, the only new leader of the various sections, to the other musicians at this morning's rehearsal.

Three other musicians have been added to this year's orchestra. F. William Krafft of the first violin section, who left the orchestra in 1912, will return; Hans Werner, a viola player, is returning after an absence of two seasons and Edouard LeBleu has come from New Orleans to fill the vacancy in the percussion section made by the death last Summer of Herman Burkhardt.

Mr Fourel was born at Grenoble in 1892 and studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining in 1913 the first prize in the National Academy. After an engagement with the opera he became viola soloist with the famous Concerts Lamoureux. Mr Fourel entered military service in 1913, and served in a regiment of infantry until 1918. was wounded twice and received the war cross. Last Winter he received new laurels as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The program for the opening pair of symphony concerts Oct 7 and 8 will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

GLOBE. SEPT 29.

[8]

NOTED FRENCH ARTIST JOINS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Georges Fourel to Lead the Viola Section of Orchestra

Boston music lovers will see a most unusual personality at the opening of the Symphony concerts next week, when Georges Fourel, long famous in France as a gifted master of the viola, will make his initial appearance in this country with the Boston musical organization.

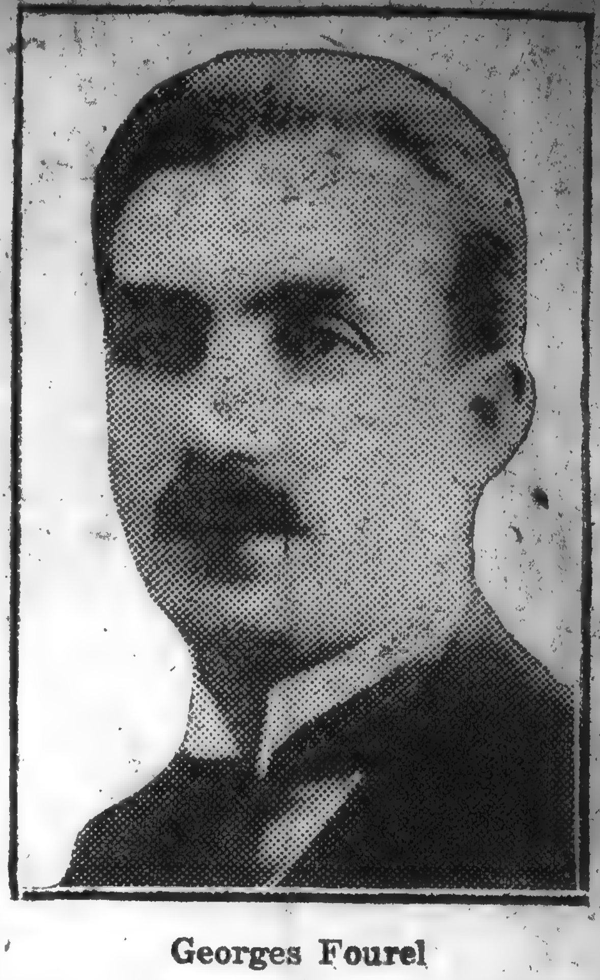
But 29 years of age, M. Fourel, who arrived in Boston Tuesday and took his place with the orchestra at the regular rehearsal this morning, promises to take a conspicuous part in the affairs of the orchestra during the season.

He is to be the viola player in a new quartet of Symphony players led by Concert Master Burgin. In fact, the newer plans to play much chamber music in this country following his great success along this line in Europe.

While a master of the classics, M. Fourel is interested in the modern school of music which lends itself more to his style of instrument.

No such picturesque musical figure of enthusiastic youth has been associated with the Boston musical organization for sometime, and Boston society is expected to open the doors of its drawing rooms to the new-comer. One Georges Carpentier won America with his smile. Georges Fourel, likewise, will win Boston with the same kind of a smile.

Born in Brenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining, unanimously, in 1913, the first prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the opera, he became violin soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux.



Georges Fourel

Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross.

After the demobilization he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris, and, as well, of the Krettly Quartet, the latter devoted particularly to the making known of new music. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

TRAVELER. SEPT. 29

NEW PLAYERS JOIN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble in full force this morning in Symphony Hall for the opening rehearsal of the season. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will introduce to the players Georges Fourel, famous in France for his ability, as new leader of the viola section.

Three other musicians will also join the orchestra: F. William Krafft, first violinist, who left the organization in 1912; Hans Werner, viola player, who is returning after an absence of two seasons; and Edouard Le Bleu, a new member, who has come from New Orleans to fill, in the percussion section, the vacancy left by the death last summer of Herman Burkhardt. Fourel studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot and in 1913 won first prize at the National Academy. Last winter he was soloist with the symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Oct. 7 and 8 will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

HERALD-SEPT 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the full forces of the orchestra last Thursday, and is now rehearsing for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7-8. There are only four changes in the personnel, and the only change in the leaders of the various sections is marked by the advent of Georges Fourel, who has come from France, where he is generally regarded as one of the finest masters of his instrument, to take this post of honor. F. William Krafft, long esteemed as one of the most talented first violinists in the orchestra, and who left in 1912, has returned, and also Hans Werner, equally esteemed as a viola player, who has been absent for two seasons. Edouard LeBleu, a new member, has come from New Orleans to fill, in the percussion section, the vacancy left by the death of Mr. Herman Burkhardt last summer.

Judging by his splendid repuation in the old world, the Symphony Orchestra may well possess a valuable virtuoso in Mr. Fourel. In France he is generally regarded as one of the very finest of the many fine viola players of which that country can boast. Born at Grenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining, unanimously, in 1913, the first prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the Opera, he became viola soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux. Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross. After the demobilization, he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and, as well, of the Krettly Quartet, the latter devoted particularly to the making known of new music. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan."

HERALD-Oct. 2.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BEGIN

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the full forces of the orchestra last Thursday, and is now rehearsing for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7-8. There are only four changes in the personnel, and the only change in the leaders of the various sections is marked by the advent of Georges Fourel, new leader of the violas, who has come from France, where he is generally regarded as one of the finest masters of his instrument, to take this post of honor. F. William Krafft, long esteemed as one of the most talented first violinists in the orchestra, and who left in 1912, has returned, and also Hans Werner, equally esteemed as a viola player, who has been absent for two seasons. Edouard LeBleu, a new member, has come from New Orleans to fill, in the percussion section, the vacancy left by the death of Mr. Herman Burkhardt last summer.

Judging by his splendid reputation in the old world, the Symphony Orchestra may well possess a valuable virtuoso in Mr. Fourel. In France he is generally regarded as one of the very finest of the many fine viola players of which that country can boast. Born at Grenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining, unanimously, in 1913, the first prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the Opera, he became viola soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux. Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross. After the demobilization, he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and, as well, of the Krettly Quartet, the latter devoted particularly to the making known of new music. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The programme for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Picture, "Sadko," Two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."

POST. Oct. 2.

Symphony Season Opens Next Friday

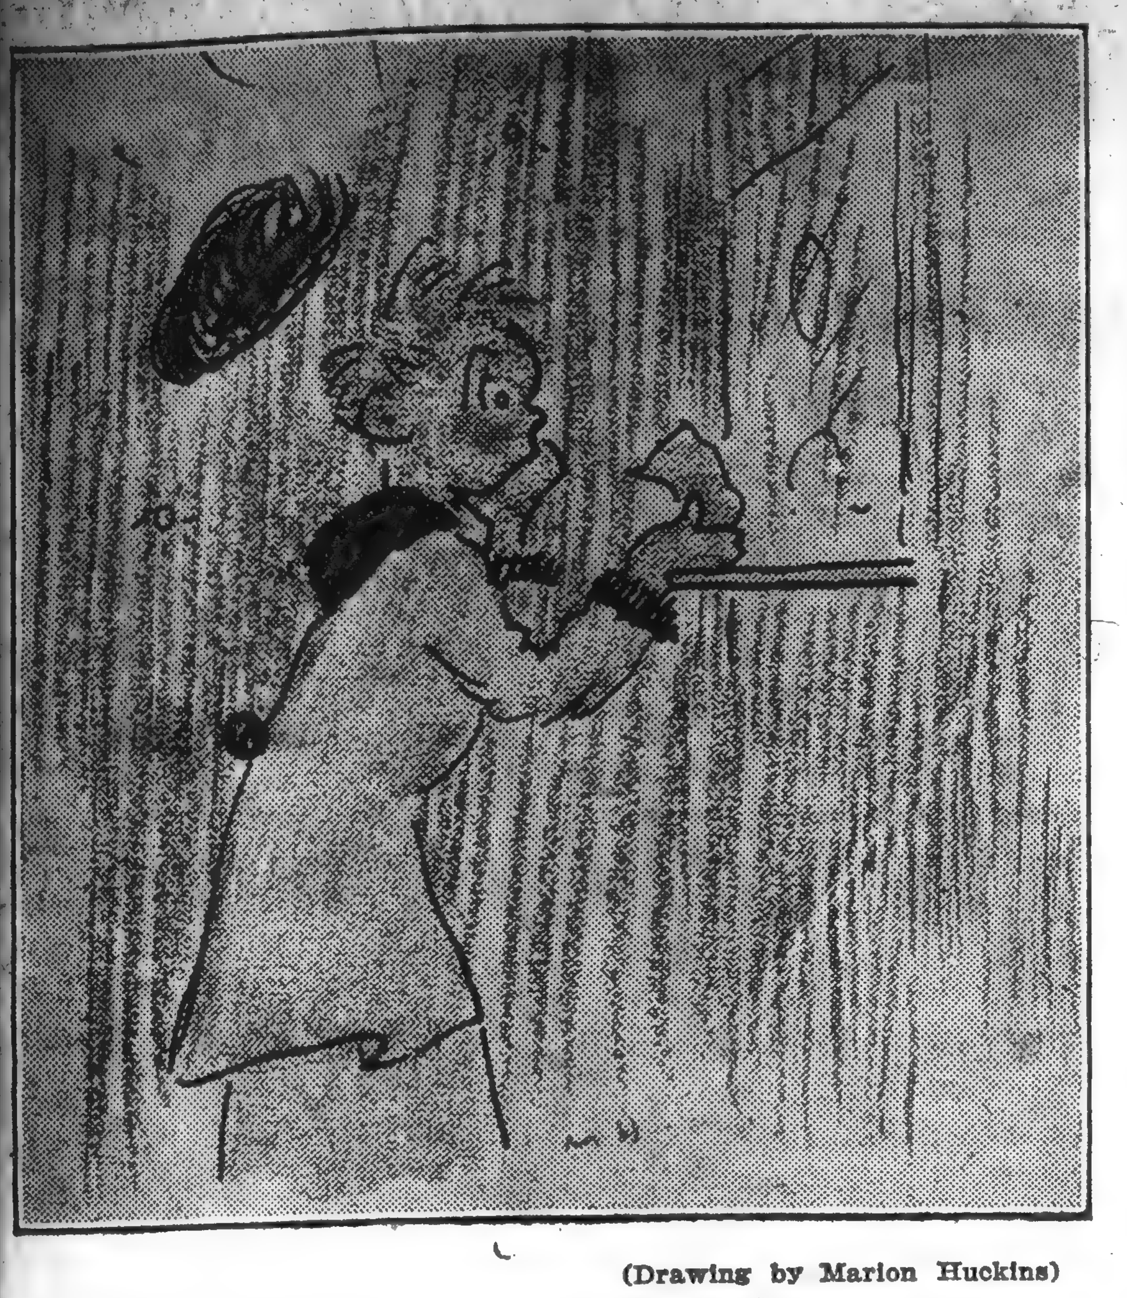
Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now rehearsing for the opening pair of concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. There are only four changes in the personnel and the only change in the leaders of the various sections is marked by the advent of Georges Fourel, who has come from France, where he is generally regarded as one of the finest masters of his instrument, to take this post of honor.

The program for the opening concerts includes: Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Picture, "Sadko"; two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

ADVER. Oct. 2.

TIGHT BINDING

"Delays Have Dangerous Ends"



(Drawing by Marion Huckins)

Painful Discovery at Symphony Hall

There Are No Seats Unsold for the Symphony Concerts for Friday Afternoons

TRANS SEPT 17

ONTEUX READY OR SYMPHONY SEASON

The sale of the few remaining ats by subscription for the Saturday evening Symphony concerts is ing on. Pierre Monteux arrived in oston on Monday after a soourn Europe. He has been studying ores by the following composers, erving the right to select and card in order that the standard ertory of symphonic music may edominate on the programs: m France, Roussel, Ravel, Ra- d, Honneger, and Marcel Dupres; ngland, Bantook and Bax; aly, Davico, Tomassini, Malli- ro, Casella and deSabata; from ssia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff; from Spain, deFalla.

ADVERTISER-SEPT.18.

n Prospect

SUNDAY afternoon, Oct. 2, in Symphon Hall, a concert of old airs, ornat operatic pieces, light French, Spanis American songs, by Mme. Galli-Curci hose graces and agilities of voice, flowing d charm of sentiment all commend he will sing ancient pieces by Lotti onaudy; "mad scenes" from Doni- 's "Lucia" and Thomas's "Hamlet"; from "Traviata," in which she ex- showy waltz by Arditi, and sundry trifles.

y afternoon, Oct. 7, in Symphony he first of the afternoon concerts ymphony Orchestra with Mr. Mon- onducting. Mendelssohn's Italian ny, Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-pic- "Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes of " and "Fetes," and Strauss's tone- "Don Juan," fill the programme.

ay evening, Oct. 8, in Symphony first of the evening concerts of phony Orchestra with Mr. Mon- ducting and the programme above

AN SEPT 24

ROGRAM FOR FIRST SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Bos- Symphony Orchestra, has decided on the following program for the opening pair of concerts, to take place Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday evening, Oct. 8, at Symphony Hall. The first number will be Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony. The other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sanko," Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan."

TRAU. SEPT 24

SEPT. 17.

BIG PROGRAM FOR FIRST SYMPHONY

Monteaux Opens Concerts by Noted Orchestra on Friday, October 7

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided upon the following program for the opening pair of concerts, to take place Friday afternoon, October 7, and Saturday evening, October 8, at Symphony Hall.

The first number will be Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, known particularly by the closing movement in Saltarello form. The other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko," Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuage" and 'Fetes," and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," now regarded as a standard orchestral piece, although it has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons.

AMER. SEPT 24

First Symphony Program

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided upon the program for the opening pair of concerts, to take place Friday afternoon, Oct 7, and Saturday evening, Oct 8, at Symphony Hall.

The first number will be Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," known particularly by the closing movement in Saltarello form. The other numbers will be Ricsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's two Nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fete," and Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," which has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons.

GLOBE-SEPT 25.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided upon the following programme for the opening pair of concerts, to take place Friday afternoon, Oct. 7, and Saturday evening, Oct. 8, at Symphony Hall.

The first number will be Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, known particularly by the closing movement in Saltarello form. The other numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko," Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fete," and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan," now regarded as a standard orchestral piece, although it has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons.

The Boston musical season starts practically with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts, or perhaps on the Sunday preceding the first concert of the Boston Symphony—as next Sunday, when Mme. Galli-Curci gives the first afternoon concert of Mr. Mudgett's series. The musical life of the city as it is today begins and comes to an end with the activities of Symphony Hall. For a city of the size and traditions and population of Boston that is all wrong.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the greatest and most indispensable musical asset of the capital of Massachusetts. It gave conclusive proof of its value to the community and the public sentiment toward it by the manner in which it survived the strike which ensued on the disgraceful conduct of its former concertmaster two years ago. It pulled through that crisis not only because of its traditions but because the public of the city emphatically wanted it and did not want the tactics pursued to destroy it. But that does not prove that this city is musical.

POST SEPT 25.

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has made up the following program for the opening concerts on Friday afternoon, October 7, and Saturday evening, October 8: Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuage" and "Fete," and Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Juan."

HADVERT. SEPT. 25

NEW VIOLA ARTIST IN SYMPHONY

Fourel, Famed in France, Joins Band —Krafft Returns

Georges Fourel, long famous in France as one of the most highly gifted masters of his instrument, arrived in Boston last Tuesday to become the new leader of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be in his place when the orchestra assembles in full force for the opening rehearsals in Symphony Hall this morning.

MR. KRAFFT RETURNS

Before Pierre Monteux, the conductor, lifts his baton to begin, he will introduce Mr. Fourel, the only new member in the leaders of the various selections, and also three other musicians: F. William Krafft, who was long esteemed as one of the most talented members of the first violin section, and left the orchestra in 1912; Hans Werner, the equally gifted viola player, who is returning after an absence of two seasons, and Edouard LeBleu, a new member, who has come from New Orleans to fill, in the percussion section, the vacancy left by the death last summer of Herman Burkhardt.

Famed as Virtuoso

Judging by his splendid reputation in the Old World, the Symphony Orchestra may well possess a valuable virtuoso in Mr. Fourel. In France he is generally regarded as one of the very finest of the many fine viola players of which that country can boast. Born in Grenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining, unanimously, in 1913, the First Prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the Opera, he became viola soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux.

Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross.

After the demobilization he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and, as well, of the Krettly Quartet, the latter devoted particularly to the making known of new music. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The programme for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Oct. 7 and 8 will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Picture, "Sadko," Two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."

~~DR. KENDALL~~

POST SEPT 29

FOUREL TO LEAD VIOLA SECTION OF SYMPHONY

Georges Fourel, one of the leading viola players in France, arrived in Boston this week to become the new leader of the viola section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will be in his place when the orchestra assembles in full force for the opening rehearsal in Symphony Hall this morning. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, will introduce Mr Fourel, the only new leader of the various sections, to the other musicians at this morning's rehearsal.

Three other musicians have been added to this year's orchestra. F. William Krafft of the first violin section, who left the orchestra in 1912, will return; Hans Werner, a viola player, is returning after an absence of two seasons and Edouard LeBleu has come from New Orleans to fill the vacancy in the percussion section made by the death last Summer of Herman Burkhardt.

Mr Fourel was born at Grenoble in 1892 and studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining in 1913 the first prize in the National Academy. After an engagement with the opera he became viola soloist with the famous Concerts Lamoureux. Mr Fourel entered military service in 1913, and served in a regiment of infantry until 1918. was wounded twice and received the war cross. Last Winter he received new laurels as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The program for the opening pair of Symphony concerts Oct 7 and 8 will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

GLOBE. SEPT 29.

NOTED FRENCH ARTIST JOINS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Georges Fourel to Lead the Viola Section of Orchestra

Boston music lovers will see a most unusual personality at the opening of the Symphony concerts next week, when Georges Fourel, long famous in France as a gifted master of the viola, will make his initial appearance in this country with the Boston musical organization.

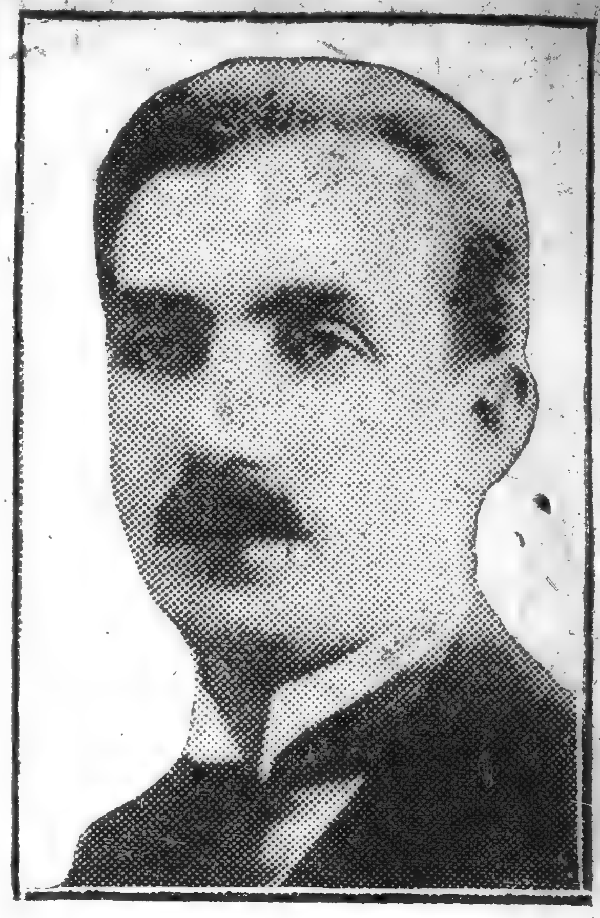
But 29 years of age, M. Fourel, who arrived in Boston Tuesday and took his place with the orchestra at the regular rehearsal this morning, promises to take a conspicuous part in the affairs of the orchestra during the season.

He is to be the viola player in a new quartet of Symphony players led by Concert Master Burgin. In fact, the newer plans to play much chamber music in this country following his great success along this line in Europe.

While a master of the classics, M. Fourel is interested in the modern school of music which lends itself more to his style of instrument.

No such picturesque musical figure of enthusiastic youth has been associated with the Boston musical organization for sometime, and Boston society is expected to open the doors of its drawing rooms to the new-comer. One Georges Carpentier won America with his smile. Georges Fourel, likewise, will win Boston with the same kind of a smile.

Born in Brenchle, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining, unanimously, in 1913, the first prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the opera, he became violin soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux.



Georges Fourel

Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross.

After the demobilization he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris, and, as well, of the Krettly Quartet, the latter devoted particularly to the making known of new music. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

TRAVELER. SEPT. 29

NEW PLAYERS JOIN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble in full force this morning in Symphony Hall for the opening rehearsal of the season. Pierre Monteux, conductor, will introduce to the players Georges Fourel, famous in France for his ability, as new leader of the viola section.

Three other musicians will also join the orchestra: F. William Krafft, first violinist, who left the organization in 1912; Hans Werner, viola player, who is returning after an absence of two seasons; and Edouard Le Bleu, a new member, who has come from New Orleans to fill, in the percussion section, the vacancy left by the death last summer of Herman Burkhardt. Fourel studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot and in 1913 won first prize at the National Academy. Last winter he was soloist with the symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Oct. 7 and 8 will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

HERALD-SEPT 29.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the ull forces of the orchestra last Thursday, and is now rehearsing for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7-8. There are only four changes in the personnel, and the only change in the leaders of the various sections is marked by the advent of Georges Fourel, who has come from France, where he is generally regarded as one of the finest masters of his instrument, to take this post of honor. F. William Krafft, long esteemed as one of the most talented first violinists in the orchestra, and who left in 1912, has returned, and also Hans Werner, equally esteemed as a viola player, who has been absent for two seasons. Edouard LeBleu, a new member, has come from New Orleans to fill, in the percussion section, the vacancy left by the death of Mr. Herman Burkhardt last summer.

Judging by his splendid repuation in the old world, the Symphony Orchestra may well possess a valuable virtuoso in Mr. Fourel. In France he is generally regarded as one of the very finest of the many fine viola players of which that country can boast. Born at Grenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining, unanimously, in 1913, the first prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the Opera, he became viola soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux. Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross. After the demobilization, he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and, as well, of the Krettly Quartet, the latter devoted particularly to the making known of new music. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan."

HERALD-Oct. 2.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS BEGIN

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the full forces of the orchestra last Thursday, and is now rehearsing for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 7-8. There are only four changes in the personnel, and the only change in the leaders of the various sections is marked by the advent of Georges Fourel, new leader of the violas, who has come from France, where he is generally regarded as one of the finest masters of his instrument, to take this post of honor. F. William Krafft, long esteemed as one of the most talented first violinists in the orchestra, and who left in 1912, has returned, and also Hans Werner, equally esteemed as a viola player, who has been absent for two seasons. Edouard LeBleu, a new member, has come from New Orleans to fill, in the percussion section, the vacancy left by the death of Mr. Herman Burkhardt last summer.

Judging by his splendid reputation in the old world, the Symphony Orchestra may well possess a valuable virtuoso in Mr. Fourel. In France he is generally regarded as one of the very finest of the many fine viola players of which that country can boast. Born at Grenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining, unanimously, in 1913, the first prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the Opera, he became viola soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux. Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross. After the demobilization, he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and, as well, of the Krettly Quartet, the latter devoted particularly to the making known of new music. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

The programme for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts will include Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Picture, "Sadko," Two Nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan."

POST. Oct. 2.

Symphony Season Opens Next Friday

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now rehearsing for the opening pair of concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. There are only four changes in the personnel and the only change in the leaders of the various sections is marked by the advent of Georges Fourel, who has come from France, where he is generally regarded as one of the finest masters of his instrument, to take this post of honor.

The program for the opening concerts includes: Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Tone Picture, "Sadko"; two nocturnes by Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

ADVER. Oct. 2.

[8]

JOURNAL SEP 25 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

[illegible] Symphony

99

[illegible] Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returns from summer in Europe energetic with new plans for the full season of concerts in Boston, New York, Providence and through New England, and one or two tours in other parts of the country, though the monthly trips to Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington have been abandoned this year.

The programmes which M. Monteux has in mind for the winter, will have works of the newer composers of France, Italy, England and Germany which he has brought back with him, though Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn and Schubert are to be by no means displaced.

From Italy he brings tone-poems by Tomassini, de Sabata and Davico, says the Boston Transcript. Tommassini, vaguely remembered by a string quartet played years ago by "The Kneisels," is recently noted as adapter from Scarlatti of the Russians' ballet. "Youth," a large-voiced tone-poem, played in Boston last winter by Mr. For Toscanini, will recall de Sabata. other Italians, he purposes to add the second set of Malipiero's "Nature-Pictures" to the first that he made known last year; he still has in hand Casella's tone-picturings, "The Convent by the Water;" while he has reason to expect a new piece from Respighi of the Roman Fountains, twice heard and applauded a year ago.

The Parisians have rewarded less generously the conductor's search for new matter. Ravel has handed him his tone-poem, "The Waltz," music of Vienna, dancing to forget; Rabaud has made ready for the concert-hall sundry dances in his light opera of the Orient, "Marouf;" and Roussel, of the fanciful ballet-music, "The Spider's Feast," will send a piece to Boston as soon as it is played in Paris. Again, too, Mr. Monteux has been spying out work of the debated and, as some say, the detested "Six"—young innovators all. Last spring there was example of them in a Suite by Milhaud. Before next spring those who attend these concerts will hear from them Honegger's "Summer Pastoral." Another rising talent has also caught the conductor's ear—the organist, Marcel Dupre, who is composer as well, of a setting of the hymn, "De Profundis," for orchestra, organ and chorus. If performance is possible with the forces at command, the public of the Symphony concerts will hear it. Through Paris also from Spain, comes a composer whom only songs have yet heralded in America as a maker of highly colored, warmly imagined music—da Falla. In England, in France, in his own country, his music has already won him individual place. Mr. Monteux's choice from it fell upon three dances in the Spanish ballet, though the Russians set it on the stage, of "The Three-Cornered Hat." Possibly de Falla will be the most interesting discovery of the winter.

The largest piece in prospect from an Englishman is Bantock's symphony, "The Hebrides," held over from last winter and warmly praised when it was revived last spring in London. It is sea-music, with Bantock's usual vigor of imagination and hand; it is music of misty, bleak and also sun-touched islands; it takes body and color from folk-piece and folk-tale. From Bax also—the maker of music to Irish legends and mysteries—Mr. Monteux expects a new piece, to be shared with Mr. Stock, since the two first disclosed the composer to American ears. As for the Americans, Mr. Monteux as yet is only scrutinizing their manuscripts, but he is already resolved to revive Mr. Carpenter's gay-humored suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," and, for contrast, Mr. Converse's sober symphony. From the other end of the world, but again by way of Paris, the Russians have also come at call and the boldest of them, so far as the Western world knows—Strawinsky, with a tone-poem from his opera-ballet, "The Nightingale," and Propofiev with a [illegible]acteristic music. As yet "The Nightingale," as opera, ballet or tone-poem [illegible] known in America. Andersen's fairy [illegible] of the wondrous bird, the envious [illegible]se court and an Emperor snatched [illegible] death by song, suggested the music. Among the new Germans Mr. Monteux has also pried—to find only the dubious Schrecker of the opera house.

Back to Mozart and Haydn and also to Handel and Bach will Mr. Monteux further go. He is even minded to delve among the moribund moderns and resurrect Raff's symphony, "The Forest." Among moderns more surely alive, he is disposed to "Zarathustra" or "Don Quixote" from Strauss's larger tone-poems and to "Don Juan" as well, while he purposes to restore Franck's "Psyche" to the form in which the composer wrote it—that is with the choral as well as the orchestral numbers. Hitherto, the music has been heard in Boston only as "symphonic" and obviously detailed "fragments." The conductor, like the rest of us, that feel our own time, know the progress of music in it and warm to its rising youth, craves his novel pieces. At the same time his catholic mind, his sense of obligation, to a manifold public, his regard for the old with the new, the familiar with the strange, holds time and even the course of the Symphony concerts.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Behind the musical achievement which the name of the Boston Symphony orchestra has come to represent, there lies a long record of the application of musical genius, the constancy of high purpose, and the expenditure of wealth. The aim was an ensemble as close to the ideals of perfection in performance as humanly possible. Only gradually, through tireless years of upbuilding effort by one after another of the world's greatest conductors, has the goal been won. During the last two years the orchestra has profited signally by the illustrious powers of its present conductor, Pierre Monteux. His splendid record as conductor of concerts, opera and ballet in the largest cities of Europe and America has been confirmed and enhanced by his success at this post of honor; indeed, never have the Boston Symphony concerts been more evidently enjoyed and generally praised than under his direction.

Never in the musical history of Hartford has such an imposing array of artists been marshalled under one management and presented under such pleasing auspices as the coming Sedgwick Concert Course. The artists are of undisputed magnitude and Parsons's theater as a concert hall possesses advantages in acoustices and comfort unequalled by any other auditorium in Hartford, but the capacity of Parsons's theater is limited and as the bare announcement of these concerts is sufficient to insure sold out houses the management urges music lovers to take immediate advantage of purchasing seats en bloc for the three artists. The purchase of Boston Symphony seats must be made separate. All applications should be sent to F. A. Sedgwick at Sedgwick and Casey's Asylum street.

HARTFORD CONANS. SEPT. 18

ROM [illegible]
SEP 2- 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

PROPOSED ENDOWMENT FUND FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A campaign to raise a permanent endowment fund of $2,000,000 for the Boston Symphony is soon to be launched, according to an announcement by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Orchestra Association. The plan has been in contemplation for some time, but has been deferred owing to other fund drives that have occupied the attention of the public. The date for the inauguration of the campaign will be announced after a conference between the board of trustees and a committee of business men. Bostonians will subscribe liberally to the project of placing the orchestra on a sound financial basis, in the opinion of Judge Cabot.

The decision to take this step as soon as possible was the result of the large deficit of last season, when an appeal was made for voluntary contributions to relieve the orchestra from debt. At that time it was rumored that the existence of the Boston Symphony was threatened by reason of its financial difficulties. These reports, according to Judge Cabot, were utterly without foundation, but actuated the guarantors with a desire to avoid the uncertainties of former years by establishing a permanent endowment fund. The backers of the orchestra have this year pledged a sufficient amount to relieve the organization from embarrassment.

The project of providing a permanent endowment for the Boston Symphony was first mentioned in February, 1920, shortly after the death of Major Henry Lee Higginson, who had been the chief backer of the organization during the first 37 years of its existence. Major Higginson, who had resigned from active participation in the management of the orchestra after the resignation of Dr. Muck, had been expected to provide for an endowment after his death. His will, however, left nothing to the Boston Symphony expect his musical library.

In the winter of 1920, when the musicians made demands for increased salaries, the guarantors suggested the advisability of insuring the future of the organization by raising an endowment fund by public subscription. The deficit for that year was $100,000, and according to Judge Cabot, the present guarantors have paid for larger sums for the maintenance of the orchestra than was ever given by Major Higginson. The plan for instituting the fund drive was deferred after the guarantors had settled the deficit.

Symphony Orchestra's "Novelties" for Coming son—Sousa Today—Sunday Concerts—Worcester Festival—The Boston Society of Singers

Soloists to appear at Symphony Hall, Sophie Braslau in centre. Upper inserts, left to right—Schumann-Heink and Clement; lower—Kathryn Messle and Samaroff. (C) Kubey-Rembrandt.

When the winter season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a season of over 100 concerts in 24 weeks, comes to an end, Mr. Monteux shuts up shop and sails for London or Paris. It is not a vacation. One wonders whether there is a vacation in heaven or earth for the conductor of a world-famous orchestra, who is inevitably and perforce the target of every composer in the world with a new score. Mr. Monteux conducted one symphony concert in Paris, at which he made known the composition of Charles Tomlinson Griffes, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Kahn," but that was an incident. Out of an avalanche of new music has come the list of "novelties" which will be added this season to the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Post is the first paper to publish this list in detail. That it is as interesting as previous lists of new works arranged by Mr. Monteux in previous seasons is the best of news for audiences which have come to rely on Mr. Monteux, as on no previous conductor of the Boston Orchestra, for programmes which neglect no prominent composer or school of composition.

A Russian work certain to be of interest, provided the publishers finish in time their printing of it—it is already engraved and in readiness to be put on paper—is the symphonic poem, "Le Chant du Rossignol" which Strawinsky arranged from the music of his ballet-opera, "Le Rossignol," mounted some years ago in Paris. The original work is a strange medley of Strawinsky's several styles. His talent has developed so rapidly and surprisingly that no man may know what kind of music Strawinsky will be writing ten years from any given date. Not that he completely alters his musical speech, but he goes with breath-taking rapidity from one discovery to another, as anyone will realize who has examined, for example, the three works, "The Bird of Fire," "Petrouchka," and "Sacre de Printemps." The first act of "The Nightingale," if memory serves, precedes the composition of the ballet, "The Bird of Fire." It is in fact Debussyish, with many a darkling ninth. A considerable period elapsed between this first act and the composition of the rest of the opera.

Try it on the piano and see if you can understand a note. A very strange new music, much influenced, one imagines, by the music of the Chinese, an association which doubtless came irressistibly to Strawinsky's mind with the thought of the emperor and his courtiers in Hans Christian Andersen's story.

What will this new symphonic poem, which is of a period and a piece prove to be? Will it be a synthesis of all the ground covered by Strawinsky or will it, too, puzzle the hearer by the gaps and incongruities of manner? One is justified in hoping from this score one of Strawinsky's most matured and significant artistic expressions. It has been performed as a ballet by Diaghileff and his troupe in Paris.

In the same place there has been given, by the same organization, Ravel's ballet, "Le Valse," and this music also will be played by Mr. Monteux, for the first time here. He will give, likewise, for the first time in Boston, a symphonic poem by Sergei Prokofieff, which has been heard in other American cities. Prokofieff is virtually unknown in Boston, and should be heard here. Mr. Monteux admires the music.

Franck's "Psyche," with all the choruses, as well as all the instrumental numbers, will be heard here, for the first time in America, in its entirety. It took some persuasion to induce the publisher, sole possessor of the chorus parts, to rent them to Boston. The publisher feared that these valuable parts might be copied and the work performed over here without agreement with him. The diplomacy of the conductor and the prestige of the orchestra he represented, however, prevailed. Everything that Mr. Rabaud produced of "Psyche" will be given, with the addition of the choral parts, heretofore unknown.

Marcel Dupre is a young Frenchman, a "Prix de Rome," a pupil of Widor, and one of the greatest organists in the world. He has written a "De Profundis" for orchestra, chorus and organ. He completed this work two years ago. It was about to be performed in Paris when the musical union, including the choristers' union or branch, struck. There could be no performance. Granted success is assembling a chorus here, which seems reasonably certain, Mr. Monteux will perform this score for the first time in the world, and in that event Mr. Dupre will come over to hear this first performance of his work, and will also, in all probability, appear with the Boston Symphony as soloist. The music is simple, in Mr. Monteux's opinion very beautiful, though not ultra-modern. Mr. Dupre, not a grave and reverend seignior, but a lively young gentleman of 35, appears to be one of the healthiest and most promising talents of the rising generation in France.

Then there is an orchestral work by Honegger, one of "the six"—an ultra modern French equivalent, so to speak, for the famous "five," who were ultra-modern half a century ago in Russia. These six include Satie and Milhaud, whom some think crazy, whom others think ugly, who amused some of us prodigiously last season with the mad music of an orchestral suite interpreted by Mr. Monteux. "If you ask me for a personal estimate of these men," said Mr. Monteux, "we will say that the present leader—the ringleader, so to speak—is this strange Milhaud. But the man who is progressing sanely and strongly underneath all the excitement is probably Honegger."

Of the modern Italians Mr. Monteux will represent Malipiero by the 2nd suite, "Impressioni dal Vero," of which the first suite was played last year. Vincenzo Davico's symphonic poem, "Polyphemus," will be played for the first time here. This is also the case with Casella's "Convent sur l'Eau," and with a suite by Victor de Sabata. Mr. Toscanini and La Scala orchestra played one of Sabata's works in Boston last year.

From Spain comes an orchestral arrangement of music from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," which, performed by the Russian ballet in London and Paris, has had exceptional success. From Germany will come an orchestral work by the ultra-modern and, according to Fritz Kreisler, somewhat morbid Schrecker. Two English novelties will be Granville Bantock's "Hebridean" symphony, and the symphonic poem by Bax, "November Woods." These make the promising total of the novelties so far planned for the coming season at Symphony Hall.

POST. SEPT. 18

The Symphony Orchestra Begins [illegible] for the Most Part According to Precedent —Mme. Galli-Curci Returns

At the usual hours, in the usual place, under the usual circumstances, the Symphony Orchestra will resume the Symphony Concerts next Friday afternoon at 2.30, next Saturday evening at 8, in Symphony Hall. The new series is the forty-first; there have been few changes through the summer in the personnel of the band; Mr. Monteux continues as conductor for the final year of his present term; every seat open to subscribers has been taken for the matinées; not too many still await late comers for the evening concerts. Again as usual, no "assisting artist" intrudes at these beginnings; the first programme traverses "standard pieces," each more or less familar, German, French, Russian. Once more they suggest Mr. Monteux's habitual breadth of choice—and also his habitual disregard of cramping precedent. For years past, some symphony of Beethoven has been invariable item at this first pair of concerts—"homage" to the composer, as the French say, testimony to the high purpose of all concerned. As it happens—for the one departure from rule and custom—the conductor has preferred a symphony of Mendelssohn. Presumably it suits better the scheme of his programme; accords better with an orchestra and an audience at beginnings. Consequently the listed pieces are:

Symphony in A major, "Italian"	Mendelssohn
Tone-Picture, "The Water-King's Palace under the River," from the Opera "Sadko"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Nocturnes, "Clouds"; "Fetes"	Debussy
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan"	Strauss

BOSTON SYMPHONY.—The soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season in Brooklyn will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. The Orchestra is to be congratulated upon obtaining this attractive list of artists which will not fail to interest the subscribers. The advance sale for these concerts is comparable with Boston being greater than it has ever been at this time of the year. In Boston the Friday Concerts are entirely sold out and only four hundred seats left for the Saturday Concerts.

BROOKLYN LIFE. SEPT. [illegible]

New Players for Symphony

Georges Fourel, the French viola player, has been engaged as leader of the viola section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has recently arrived from France. There are only three other changes in the personnel of the orchestra from last season. F. William Krafft, who left in 1912, has returned, and also Hans Werner, viola player, who has been absent for two seasons. Edouard LeBleu, a new member, has come from New Orleans to fill the vacancy left by the death of Mr. Herman Burkhart last summer.

Judging by his reputation in the Old World, the Symphony Orchestra possesses a valuable virtuoso in Mr. Fourel. Born at Grenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining in 1913 the first prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the Opera he became viola soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux. Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross. After the demobolization he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and, as well, of the Krettly quartet. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

TRAV. Oct. 1.

LATE COMERS MUST WAIT AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

In order that the music may not be unduly interrupted at the Boston Symphony Concerts during the season which will open Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, it has been decided that the inner doors of the hall will not be opened to admit late comers while a symphony is being played.

A possible exception may be made when a symphony heads the program and inclement weather or other cause make it difficult for the patrons of the concerts to arrive on time. This exception, however, will only apply to the interval after the first movement.

Pierre Monteux will open this, his third season as conductor, with the following program: Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

GLOBE. Oct. [illegible]

SYMPHONY HALL
Opening Concerts This Friday Aft. at 2:30 and Saturday Eve. at 8
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor
A Few Seats Available for Sat.

HERALD. Oct. [illegible]

JOURNAL EP 25 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

99

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returns from summer in Europe energetic with new plans for the full season of concerts in Boston, New York, Providence and through New England, and one or two tours in other parts of the country, though the monthly trips to Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington have been abandoned this year.

The programmes which M. Monteux has in mind for the winter, will have works of the newer composers of France, Italy, England and Germany which he has brought back with him, though Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn and Schubert are to be by no means displaced.

From Italy he brings tone-poems by Tomassini, de Sabata and Davico, says the Boston Transcript. Tommassini, vaguely remembered by a string quartet played years ago by "The Kneisels," more recently noted as adapter from Scarlatti of the Russians' ballet. "Youth," a large-voiced tone-poem, played in Boston last winter by Mr. Toscanini, will recall de Sabata. For other Italians, he purposes to add the second set of Malipiero's "Nature-Pictures" to the first that he made known last year; he still has in hand Casella's tone-picturings, "The Convent by the Water;" while he has reason to expect a new piece from Respighi of the Roman Fountains, twice heard and applauded a year ago.

The Parisians have rewarded less generously the conductor's search for new matter. Ravel has handed him his tone-poem, "The Waltz," music of Vienna, dancing to forget; Rabaud has made ready for the concert-hall sundry dances in his light opera of the Orient, "Marouf;" and Roussel, of the fanciful ballet-music, "The Spider's Feast," will send a piece to Boston as soon as it is played in Paris. Again, too, Mr. Monteux has been spying out work of the debated and, as some say, the detested "Six"—young innovators all. Last spring, there was example of them in a Suite by Milhaud. Before next spring those who attend these concerts will hear from them Honegger's "Summer Pastoral." Another rising talent has also caught the conductor's ear—the organist, Marcel Dupre, who is composer as well, of a setting of the hymn, "De Profundis," for orchestra, organ and chorus. If performance is possible with the forces at command, the public or the Symphony concerts will hear it. Through Paris also from Spain, somes a composer whom only songs have yet heralded in America as a maker of highly colored, warmly imagined music—da Falla. In England, in France, in his own country, his music has already won him individual place. Mr. Monteux's choice from it fell upon three dances in the Spanish ballet, though the Russians set it on the stage, of "The Three-Cornered Hat." Possibly do Falla will be the most interesting discovery of the winter.

The largest piece in prospect from an Englishman is Bantock's symphony, "The Hebrides," held over from last winter and warmly praised when it was revived last spring in London. It is sea-music, with Bantock's usual vigor of imagination and hand; it is music of misty, bleak and also sun-touched islands; it takes body and color from folk-piece and folk-tale. From Bax, also—the maker of music to Irish legends and mysteries—Mr. Monteux expects a new piece, to be shared with Mr. Stock, since the two first disclosed the composer to American ears. As for the Americans, Mr. Monteux as yet is only scrutinizing their manuscripts; but he is already resolved to revive Mr. Carpenter's gay-humored suite, "Adventures in a Perambulator," and, for contrast, Mr. Converse's sober symphony. From the other end of the world, but again by way of Paris, the Russians have also come at call and the boldest of them, so far as the Western world knows—Stravinsky, with a tone-poem from his opera-ballet, [illegible] Nightingale," and Propofiev with a [illegible]acteristic music. As yet "The Night[illegible]e," as opera, ballet or tone-poem [illegible] known in America. Andersen's fairy [illegible] of the wondrous bird, the envious [illegible]ese court and an Emperor snatched [illegible] death by song, suggested the music. Among the new Germans Mr. Monteux has also pried—to find only the dubious Schrecker of the opera house.

Back to Mozart and Haydn and also to Handel and Bach will Mr. Monteux further go. He is even minded to delve among the moribund moderns and resurrect Raff's symphony, "The Forest." Among moderns more surely alive, he is disposed to "Zarathustra" or "Don Quixote" from Strauss's larger tone-poems and to "Don Juan" as well, while he purposes to restore Franck's "Psyche" to the form in which the composer wrote it—that is with the choral as well as the orchestral numbers. Hitherto, the music has been heard in Boston only as "symphonic" and obviously detailed "fragments." The conductor, like the rest of us, that feel our own time, know the progress of music in it and warm to its rising youth, craves his novel pieces. At the same time his catholic mind, his sense of obligation, to a manifold public, his regard for the old with the new, the familiar with the strange, holds time and even the course of the Symphony concerts.

SUN

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Behind the musical achievement which the name of the Boston Symphony orchestra has come to represent, there lies a long record of the application of musical genius, the constancy of high purpose, and the expenditure of wealth. The aim was an ensemble as close to the ideals of perfection in performance as humanly possible. Only gradually, through tireless years of upbuilding effort by one after another of the world's greatest conductors, has the goal been won. During the last two years the orchestra has profited signally by the illustrous powers of its present conductor, Pierre Monteux. His splendid record as conductor of concerts, opera and ballet in the largest cities of Europe and America has been confirmed and enhanced by his success at this post of honor; indeed, never have the Boston Symphony concerts been more evidently enjoyed and generally praied than under his direction.

Never in the musical history of Hartford has such an imposing array of artists been marshalled under one management and presented under such pleasing auspices as the coming Sedgwick Concert Course. The artists are of undisputed magnitude and Parsons's theater as a concert hall possesses advantages in acoustices and comfort unequalled by any other auditorium in Hartford, but the capacity of Parsons's theater is limited and as the bare announcement of these concerts is sufficient to insure sold out houses the management urges music lovers to take immediate advantage of purchasing seats en bloc for the three artists. The purchase of Boston Symphony seats must be made separate. All applications should be sent to F. A. Sedgwick at Sedgwick and Casey's Asylum street.

HARTFORD COURANT SEPT.18

ROM
SEP 2- 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

PROPOSED ENDOWMENT FUND FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A campaign to raise a permanent endowment fund of $2,000,000 for the Boston Symphony is soon to be launched, according to an announcement by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Orchestra Association. The plan has been in contemplation for some time, but has been deferred owing to other fund drives that have occupied the attention of the public. The date for the inauguration of the campaign will be announced after a conference between the board of trustees and a committee of business men. Bostonians will subscribe liberally to the project of placing the orchestra on a sound financial basis, in the opinion of Judge Cabot.

The decision to take this step as soon as possible was the result of the large deficit of last season, when an appeal was made for voluntary contributions to relieve the orchestra from debt. At that time it was rumored that the existence of the Boston Symphony was threatened by reason of its financial difficulties. These reports, according to Judge Cabot, were utterly without foundation, but actuated the guarantors with a desire to avoid the uncertainties of former years by establishing a permanent endowment fund. The backers of the orchestra have this year pledged a sufficient amount to relieve the organization from embarrassment.

The project of providing a permanent endowment for the Boston Symphony was first mentioned in February, 1920, shortly after the death of Major Henry Lee Higginson, who had been the chief backer of the organization during the first 37 years of its existence. Major Higginson, who had resigned from active participation in the management of the orchestra after the resignation of Dr. Muck, had been expected to provide for an endowment after his death. His will, however, left nothing to the Boston Symphony expect his musical library.

In the winter of 1920, when the musicians made demands for increased salaries, the guarantors suggested the advisability of insuring the future of the organization by raising an endowment fund by public subscription. The deficit for that year was $100,000, and according to Judge Cabot, the present guarantors have paid for larger sums for the maintenance of the orchestra than was ever given by Major Higginson. The plan for instituting the fund drive was deferred after the guarantors had settled the deficit.

Symphony Orchestra's "Novelties" for Coming son—Sousa Today—Sunday Concerts—Worcester Festival—The Boston Society of Singers

Soloists to appear at Symphony Hall, Sophie Braslau in centre. Upper inserts, left to right—Schumann-Heink and Clement; lower—Kathryn Messle and Samaroff. (C) Kubey-Rembrandt.

When the winter season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a season of over 100 concerts in 24 weeks, comes to an end, Mr. Monteux shuts up shop and sails for London or Paris. It is not a vacation. One wonders whether there is a vacation in heaven or earth for the conductor of a world-famous orchestra, who is inevitably and perforce the target of every composer in the world with a new score. Mr. Monteux conducted one symphony concert in Paris, at which he made known the composition of Charles Tomlinson Griffes, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Kahn," but that was an incident. Out of an avalanche of new music has come the list of "novelties" which will be added this season to the reportory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Post is the first paper to publish this list in detail. That it is as interesting as previous lists of new works arranged by Mr. Monteux in previous seasons is the best of news for audiences which have come to rely on Mr. Monteux, as on no previous conductor of the Boston Orchestra, for programmes which neglect no prominent composer or school of composition.

A Russian work certain to be of interest, provided the publishers finish in time their printing of it—it is already engraved and in readiness to be put on paper—is the symphonic poem, "Le Chant du Rossignol" which Strawinsky arranged from the music of his ballet-opera, "Le Rossignol," mounted some years ago in Paris. The original work is strange medley of Strawinsky's several styles. His talent has developed so rapidly and surprisingly that no man may know what kind of music Strawinsky will be writing ten years from any given date. Not that he completely alters his musical speech, but he goes with breath-taking rapidity from one discovery to another, as anyone will realize who has examined, for example, the three works, "The Bird of Fire," "Petrouchka," and "Sacre de Printemps." The first act of "The Nightingale," if memory serves, precedes the composition of the ballet, "The Bird of Fire." It is in fact Debussyish, with many a darkling ninth. A considerable period elapsed between this first act and the composition of the rest of the opera.

Try it on the piano and see if you can understand a note. A very strange new music, much influenced, one imagines, by the music of the Chinese, an association which doubtless came irressistibly to Strawinsky's mind with the thought of the emperor and his courtiers in Hans Christian Andersen's story.

What will this new symphonic poem, which is of a period and a piece prove to be? Will it be a synthesis of all the ground covered by Strawinsky or will it, too, puzzle the hearer by the gaps and incongruities of manner? One is justified in hoping from this score one of Strawinsky's most matured and significant artistic expressions. It has been performed as a ballet by Diaghileff and his troupe in Paris.

In the same place there has been given, by the same organization, Ravel's ballet, "Le Valse," and this music also will be played by Mr. Monteux, for the first time here. He will give, likewise, for the first time in Boston, a symphonic poem by Sergei Prokofieff, which has been heard in other American cities. Prokofieff is virtually unknown in Boston, and should be heard here. Mr. Monteux admires the music.

Franck's "Psyche," with all the choruses, as well as all the instrumental numbers, will be heard here, for the first time in America, in its entirety. It took some persuasion to induce the publisher, sole possessor of the chorus parts, to rent them to Boston. The publisher feared that these valuable parts might be copied and the work performed over here without agreement with him. The diplomacy of the conductor and the prestige of the orchestra he represented, however, prevailed. Everything that Mr. Rabaud produced of "Psyche" will be given, with the addition of the choral parts, heretofore unknown.

Marcel Dupre is a young Frenchman, a "Prix de Rome," a pupil of Widor, and one of the greatest organists in the world. He has written a "De Profundis" for orchestra, chorus and organ. He completed this work two years ago. It was about to be performed in Paris when the musical union, including the choristers' union or branch, struck. There could be no performance. Granted success is assembling a chorus here, which seems reasonably certain, Mr. Monteux will perform this score for the first time in the world, and in that event Mr. Dupre will come over to hear this first performance of his work, and will also, in all probability, appear with the Boston Symphony as soloist. The music is simple, in Mr. Monteux's opinion very beautiful, though not ultra-modern. Mr. Dupre, not a grave and reverend seignior, but a lively young gentleman of 35, appears to be one of the healthiest and most promising talents of the rising generation in France.

Then there is an orchestral work by Honegger, one of "the six"—an ultra modern French equivalent, so to speak, for the famous "five," who were ultra-modern half a century ago in Russia. These six include Satie and Milhaud, whom some think crazy, whom others think ugly, who amused some of us prodigiously last season with the mad music of an orchestral suite interpreted by Mr. Monteux. "If you ask me for a personal estimate of these men," said Mr. Monteux, "we will say that the present leader—the ringleader, so to speak—is this strange Milhaud. But the man who is progressing sanely and strongly underneath all the excitement is probably Honegger."

Of the modern Italians Mr. Monteux will represent Malipiero by the 2nd suite, "Impressioni dal Vero," of which the first suite was played last year. Vincenzo Davico's symphonic poem, "Polyphemus," will be played for the first time here. This is also the case with Casella's "Couvent sur l'Eau," and with a suite by Victor de Sabata. Mr. Toscanini and La Scala orchestra played one of Sabata's works in Boston last year.

From Spain comes an orchestral arrangement of music from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," which, performed by the Russian ballet in London and Paris, has had exceptional success. From Germany will come an orchestral work by the ultra-modern and, according to Fritz Kreisler, somewhat morbid Schrecker. Two English novelties will be Granville Bantock's "Hebridean" symphony, and the symphonic poem by Bax, "November Woods." These make the promising total of the novelties so far planned for the coming season at Symphony Hall.

POST. SEPT. 18.

The Symphony Orchestra Begins Anew, for the Most Part According to Precedent —Mme. Galli-Curci Returns

At the usual hours, in the usual place, under the usual circumstances, the Symphony Orchestra will resume the Symphony Concerts next Friday afternoon at 2.30, next Saturday evening at 8, in Symphony Hall. The new series is the forty-first; there have been few changes through the summer in the personnel of the band; Mr. Monteux continues as conductor for the final year of his present term; every seat open to subscribers has been taken for the matinées; not too many still await late comers for the evening concerts. Again as usual, no "assisting artist" intrudes at these beginnings; the first programme traverses "standard pieces," each more or less familar, German, French, Russian. Once more they suggest Mr. Monteux's habitual breadth of choice—and also his habitual disregard of cramping precedent. For years past, some symphony of Beethoven has been invariable item at this first pair of concerts—"hommage" to the composer, as the French say, testimony to the high purpose of all concerned. As it happens—for the one departure from rule and custom—the conductor has preferred a symphony of Mendelssohn. Presumably it suits better the scheme of his programme; accords better with an orchestra and an audience at beginnings. Consequently the listed pieces are:

Symphony in A major, "Italian"	Mendelssohn
Tone-Picture, "The Water-King's Palace under the River," from the Opera "Sadko"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Nocturnes, "Clouds"; "Fêtes"	Debussy
Tone-Poem, "Don Juan"	Strauss

BOSTON SYMPHONY.—The soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra the coming season in Brooklyn will be Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Olga Samaroff, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, and Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. The Orchestra is to be congratulated upon obtaining this attractive list of artists which will not fail to interest the subscribers. The advance sale for these concerts is comparable with Boston being greater than it has ever been at this time of the year. In Boston the Friday Concerts are entirely sold out and only four hundred seats left for the Saturday Concerts.

B[illegible] LIFE. S[illegible]

New Players for Symphony

Georges Fourel, the French viola player, has been engaged as leader of the viola section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and has recently arrived from France. There are only three other changes in the personnel of the orchestra from last season. F. William Krafft, who left in 1912, has returned, and also Hans Werner, viola player, who has been absent for two seasons. Edouard LeBleu, a new member, has come from New Orleans to fill the vacancy left by the death of Mr. Herman Burkhart last summer.

Judging by his reputation in the Old World, the Symphony Orchestra possesses a valuable virtuoso in Mr. Fourel. Born at Grenoble, Isere, in 1892, he studied in Paris with Touche and Hayot, obtaining in 1913 the first prize at the National Academy. After an engagement with the Opera he became viola soloist of the famous Concerts Lamoureux. Undertaking his military service at the end of 1913, he served in a regiment of infantry until 1918, was wounded twice and received the war cross. After the demobilization he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and, as well, of the Krettly quartet. Last winter he won new laurels as soloist with the noted symphony orchestra under Ganne at Monte Carlo.

TRAV. Oct. 1.

LATE COMERS MUST WAIT AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

In order that the music may not be unduly interrupted at the Boston Symphony Concerts during the season which will open Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, it has been decided that the inner doors of the hall will not be opened to admit late comers while a symphony is being played.

A possible exception may be made when a symphony heads the program and inclement weather or other cause make it difficult for the patrons of the concerts to arrive on time. This exception, however, will only apply to the interval after the first movement.

Pierre Monteux will open this, his third season as conductor, with the following program: Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

GLOBE. Oct.

SYMPHONY HALL
Opening Concerts This Friday Aft. at 2:30 and Saturday Eve. at 8
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor
A Few Seats Available for Sat.

HERALD Oct

[9]

TIGHT BINDING

SPECIAL CONCERTS FOR B. U. STUDENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Present Five Programs

Arrangements have been made whereby members of B. U., in combination with other organizations, will be able to hear five special concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. The opportunity should prove particularly desirable, as the regular series of concerts are practically sold out by subscription from year to year.

These five concerts also, for which Mr. Monteux is preparing programs which will afford a representative selection of symphonic music, old and new, will provide a chance to hear the orchestra at its best at popular prices.

There will be a soloist at each concert. Two pianists will play concertos. They are Alfred Mirovitch, Russian virtuoso, and John Powell.

Estelle Liebling, soprano and Richard Burgin, the concert master of the Orchestra, are others who will appear together with Jean Bedetti, the French violincellist.

The concerts will take place at 8.15 in Symphony Hall, on Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10. Season tickets are now on sale at the University Book Store, 688 Boylston street; Students' Supply Shop, 525 Boylston street; Secretarial Shop, 27 Garrison street, and Law Supply Shop, 11 Ashburton place.

B.U. NEWS Oct. 4

SEPT 3

Polite Persuasion for the Tardy at the Symphony Concerts—Compulsion Next, If Need Be—Mme. Samaroff Retires and Miss Destinn Comes

A WISE management persuades rather than compels the public of the theatre or the concert-hall into new practices, departing from long-established routine. For forty years it has been the custom at the Symphony Concerts to admit late-comers at any pause in the music of the day, be it no longer than the brief halt betwen movements of a symphony. Human nature being human nature, this privilege of the tardy has been abused. Of late, indeed, the abuse has grown into a nuisance to the prompt, the attentive and those so feeble-minded—as some say—to be engrossed and stirred by music and orchestra. The belated, whether from choice, necessity or mere carelessness, have almost flaunted along the aisles, bestowing greetings here and there after the singular—and comic—fashion of American concert-halls, in some instances plainly pleased to be so "on view." Occasionally, they have filled three, four, five minutes with such diversions. These interruptions annoy audience, orchestra and conductor and from many quarters has come reasonable complaint.

Warily, however, the management will proceed in the new series of concerts to abate this nuisance. From next Friday afternoon and next Saturday evening, the tardy are to be reminded that they transgress good manners in the concert-hall and must pay the penalty. If the symphony of the day falls in the middle or at the end of the concert, they will not be admitted while it is in progress—and symphonies usually fill at least half an hour. If the symphony begins the programme, as under Mr. Monteux it generally does, they may be admitted in the pause after the first movement, at the discretion of the management and under the circumstances—like delaying weather—of the day. They may not, however, enter the auditorium during any other pause in the symphony. By so much, the wilfully belated are to be persuaded to mend their ways. If they prove deaf to this polite persuasion, ruder compulsion may strip them altogether of a privilege that carelessness has often turned into discourtesy.

Items and Announcements

Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, who is expecting a child, has withdrawn altogether from the concert-hall for the current season and disappears accordingly from the "assisting artists" of the Symphony Concerts. Not she, as announced, but Mr. Nyiregyhazi will play next week at the [illegible] concerts.

TRANS. Oct. 5

Mr. Monteux's Second Programme — Mr. McCormack's Impending Pieces — Miss Gerhardt to Return—The Fiftieth Year of the Apollo Club

FOR the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, Mr. Monteux announces Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony for the first time since he and the orchestra became mutually responsive instruments; the Prelude to Humperdinck's opera "Hansel and Gretel," as memorial to the composer lately dead; the second and less familiar of Liszt's Concertos for piano; and a set of dances from Mr. Rabaud's light opera upon a tale in the Arabian Nights, "Marouf." It is familiar at the Metropolitan, but not a measure of it has yet been heard in Boston. In the concerto, young Mr. Nyireghazi will play the solo-part.

Oct. 6.

T WAIT
CONCERTS
may not be
Boston Sym-season which and Satur-decided that will not be ners while a ay be made the program
other cause atrons of the
ne. This exnly apply to movement.
pen this, his with the fol-ssohn's "Italy-Korsakoff's
bussy's Noc Fetes," and Juan."

Oct. 5.

Aft. at
YMPHONY
ST X, ...ter
ilab Sat.

Oct. 5.

FIRST SYMPHONY SEASON STARTS

By E. F. HARKINS

Boston's most celebrated musical organization, the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday began its 41st season with fewer changes in the personnel than have been noted for many years, and with every evidence of a well-nigh complete restoration of its ante-bellum brilliancy.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteaux, the conductor, received a hearty welcome. Nothing less was his due. As an interpreter of modern symphonic music he has few peers; and three of his selections for this first program were of the modern order. These were "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, often referred to as the original Russian tone poem; two of the Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the first of the Richard Strauss tone poems, "Don Juan."

These three numbers were admirably chosen; also admirably played. They gave variety, color, piquancy to the program. An audience which had been lulled into something like a cat-nap by the mechanical suavity of Mendelssohn's so-called Italian symphony—the first number on the program—bestirred itself to applaud conductor and orchestra vigorously.

On the whole, it was an auspicious start for the new season, excepting only that the Mendelssohn number seemed tepid, forced, futile and no more Italian than music you can hear in "Sally" or "The Rose Waltz." The first program was the ideal length—an hour and a half.

The new viola soloist, G. Fourel, made a favorable impression in solo passages in the Debussy number.

Seats for the Friday matinees are all gone for the season and there are fewer Saturday night seats left than there have been for a long time. Financially it will be the Symphony's biggest season.

ADVTSR. Oct. 8

SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT OF SEASON

Mr Monteux' Program I Interesting as Usual

Yesterday's Symphony concert, the first of the season, showed the orchestra "back to normalcy." A year ago many of its partisans were loyally pretending that it was itself again, when to less partial hearers, such as the New York reviewers, it was obviously nothing of the sort. By the end of last season, however, even those none too kindly judges were giving the orchestra genuine, though not undiluted, praise. This year, if it goes on as it began yesterday, outside judges as well as Boston critics may get back much of their former enthusiasm for its work.

Since the present rehabilitated orchestra is due more to Mr Monteux' patient zeal than to any other single factor, it was peculiarly gratifying to notice yesterday that he got about ten times as much applause when he first came on the stage as he received at the beginning of last season.

He had chosen, as he almost always does, an interesting program, representing several styles of music. It began with the pleasantly faded Victorianism of Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," now coming into vogue again after surviving the scorn of those who used to resent its being badly overpraised. The quality of tone, precision in attack and subtle euphony the orchestra is now capable of were manifest from the opening bars.

There is nothing exciting about Mendelssohn's music, but the rest of the program was stirring enough to satisfy anybody, except a futurist. Rimsky Korsakoff's "Sadko," a "tone picture" not drawn from his opera with the same title, but an independent early work, is to his best things about what "Tannhauser" is to "Tristan," less original, less perfect, yet the fruit of a vigorous imagination expressing itself by somewhat conventional means.

Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" are among his best work. His craftsmanship is more subtle, more restrained, more classical than that of Rimsky Korsakoff or Strauss in "Don Juan," which followed yesterday. Debussy has a musical imagination which reminds one of a 20th century disillusion—Mozart. There is no joy, and little sentiment in his work.

"Don Juan" is full of rather coarse grained vitality, not yet exhausted on intricate technique. The performance yesterday caught the spirit of the piece. It was dramatic, as that of the Debussy pieces was lyric.

Next week the soloist will be a new pianist, Nyireghyazi, in Liszt's A major concerto. The other numbers are the "Eroica" Symphony, some dances from Rabaud's "Marouf" and the prelude to Humperdinck's popular opera, "Hansel und Gretel."

THE NEW YEAR BEGUN NONE TOO WELL

Admirable Music, Orchestra, Conductor—Yet a Routine Afternoon of Familiar Virtue Somewhat Inert—Mendelssohn's Tedious Pages—Strauss, Debussy and Rimsky According to Formula—Audience and Programme-Book

POSSIBLY it was the choice of a symphony by Mendelssohn for first item of the programme; possibly it was the persistence of a summer that began last March and bids fair to continue into next January; possibly it was merely the mood of the audience and, maybe, of the blameworthy reviewer; yet somehow the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon seemed to lack animation. It marked the beginning of a new orchestral year; but at the end of no piece was there applause enough to call the orchestra to its feet. True, Mr. Monteux was warmly received when he first came to his place as conductor; but at the close of that tedious symphony by Mendelssohn, only spasmodic clapping barely recalled him a second time. Nor were the plaudits too hearty after the pieces by Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy and Strauss that filled the remainder of the afternoon. Students of audiences at the Symphony Concerts noted, moreover, two clear signs of detached and only semi-interested hearers. One was much furtive hair-dressing among the ladies; the other was diligent perusal of the archæological records of the programme-book, relieved this time by an amusing summary from Mr. Walkley of recent plays about Don Juan. Mental wool-gathering has long been an accessory to the hearing of music; but reading as complementary pastime thereto is a custom more or less peculiar to our Symphony Concerts. The sixty-odd pages of our programme-books has advantages—and disadvantages. As those know who stray occasionally outside their own palings, there is a new and better fashion with them. Mr. Lawrence Gilman weekly exemplifies it in his notes for the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Philharmonic Society of New York.

The truth seems to be—for a reviewer may set down no more than impressions and fortify them with observed fact as best he may—that the concert came and went in rather routine fashion. Mr. Monteux took pains; the orchestra took pains; the audience in degree was as dutiful; but between all three nowhere went the kindling spark that is life to the concert-hall. Rimsky's "Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes of "Clouds" and "Fêtes," Strauss's "Don Juan," are all "standard pieces" and deservedly. One and all, they are the familiar music of the last quarter in the nineteenth century that audiences in the first quarter of the twentieth hear gladly, rejoicing in their pleasure in a universally established merit. Even the "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn—why "Italian" only the imps of musical nomenclature can possibly know—still flows agreeably into many ears. Yet to take no more than a passive satisfaction in the music of the hour, as most seemed to do yesterday, is not to know and feel it alive, vivid, glowing. Certainly, the fault lay not with Mr. Monteux. He was both precise and supple with Mendelssohn's formal periods well filled; he shaded them "nicely" as that perfect gentleman of Berlin and London might have said had he heard them. The conductor overlooked neither rhythm, nor color, nor delineative suggestion in Rimsky's sea-piece. He was studious finesse itself with Debussy's "Clouds"; the rhythmic, the tonal glint of the companion-nocturne, "Fêtes," did not evade him. If somehow he missed fire with those first ardent projecting measures of Strauss's tone-poem, he laid on and spared not in the final passages when Don Juan thundering in the horns wreaks himself upon all his world.

No; the fault was not with the conductor. No more seemingly is it chargeable to the orchestra. Some ears heard it do none of the feats that it is the cliché of reviewing to call "brilliant"; yet throughout the afternoon it played responsively and well. It was precise and it was also pliant. Well-balanced were the several choirs; euphonious the blended or the answering instruments. Color often warmed the tone; as often rhythm animated it. Suavely went the singing voices of strings and wood-winds through those marshmallows of music, the middle movements of Mendelssohn's symphony. The horns in Strauss's tone-poem proclaimed Don Juan nigh to the composer's passion. Not a technical flaw marred the iteration of Debussy's measures of somnolent clouds nor the fleck upon them in the music of straying light or breeze. Depth of tone served Rimsky's sea-picture at beginning and end of "Sadko"; Strauss's sensuous periods were tumultuous but not turbid. The orchestra is, doubtless, the gainer by the return of two or three expert violinists to the string-choir, by the new first viola, Mr. Fourel, but yesterday was not a day to discover individual virtue. From beginning to end of the concert the band remained the admirable instrument that it had become in the concerts of last spring—the heir, the continuator of high tradition—as excellent an instrument in itself as American concert-halls now contain. Yet nowhere did it excel itself after the manner of March and April and at no time did it bear composer and audience on its own mounting wings. The spark that fires only smouldered. Let the chance of the day bear the blame. It is hard to be spirited in a spiritless air.

Yet the composers remain. Three of them are dead—one for nearly seventy-five years—while the fourth is as far away as his summer house in Bavaria or his conductor's desk in Vienna. Mendelssohn, Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy, Strauss, high-placed men all in the records of music! They can afford the blame of an inert afternoon. Upon them be it. Besides, is it not an axiom of reviewing that any[illegible] may be written of a composer and [illegible] peep of protest come in [illegible] with, whereas to speak ill of conductor, orchestra, singer, virtuoso—Heaven save the mark and the letters! By all means, then, be it said that the Mendelssohn of this "Italian Symphony" is a faded, a tedious, a suavely mechanical Mendelssohn beyond bearing as "happy prologue to the swelling act" of a series of Symphony Concerts. Of course, there is a Mendelssohn who survives and deserves to survive the years—the Mendelssohn of the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," of the overtures of the sea and Scottish islands, of occasional pages in the "Scotch Symphony," of other pages here and there, the Mendelssohn who had fancy, if not imagination, who could vision if he could not dramatize, who could be apt in invention, sensitive of means, felicitous in procedure.

No such Mendelssohn wrote the Italian Symphony. With neat nothings, neatly fitted into polite formal pattern, he fills a first movement; with sweet nothings, prettily garnished, he empties himself into two more, and Victorian damsels lay hand to heart as their flutterings answer his. As happy chance will have it, an Italian dance stirs him in the final movement; but his Saltarello is a pastime of Amelia Sedley's drawing-room beside, say, the like dance that leaps and stamps on the pavements of Rome out of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." For Italy in symphonic music from a distance, most of us go to Strauss, to Charpentier, to Elgar even, perchance to occasional measures of Brahms and Goldmark. For Italy in symphonic music near at hand, there is the whole waxing brood of "young Italians" and Toscanini to play them! Mendelssohn sat down in a ruffled shirt in the "piano nobile" of a Roman house, A. D. 1831, made a symphony of scholarly suavities and sweetmeats—and someone labelled it "Italian." This time no Scottish airs, no Scottish rhythms, no breath of Highland landscape or seascape enlivened such a music. Polish as Mr. Monteux might, the "Italian Symphony" is faded beyond repair. No fragrance of old lavender rises from those perfect platitudes.

But those saving moderns—Rimsky! Strauss!! Debussy!!! True and true again. Yet are they not in this "Sadko," this "Don Juan," these "Clouds" and "Fêtes" somewhat conventionalized moderns? It is not necessary to feel "spinal thrills" from the "poly-harmony" of Milhaud or Casella, to follow Stravinsky into his farthest tremors and blows, to perceive that the moderns (as we used to call them) of the last quarter of the nineteenth century proceeded also according to formula. In surge of the sea begins and ends the tonal tale of "Sadko," but that sea has also surged and with similar rhythmic motion and depth of tone through the Finale of "Scheherazade," through the opera of "Tsar Soltan." Rhythmic revels, highly colored harmonically and instrumentally, tinged on occasion with folk-song, are familiar exercise for Rimsky. If music-making were a trade—as in disillusioned moments it sometimes seems—they would be called one of the Russian's "specialties."

In turn, the idiom of Debussy as he employs it in the rhythms and progressions, the harmony and timbres of "Clouds" still falls upon the ear in piercing beauty. The mind warms to another beauty in his economy and exactness of means. Upon the imagination march his changeless clouds yet stirring to dissolution. By like means in the luminous fantasia of "Fêtes," processional of atoms, he also works his familiar spells. Yet has not time and fashion a little thinned them unless they be the lasting magic of the Faun and Mélisande, of the earlier piano-pieces?

As for Strauss in "Don Juan," was he so master in his twenties of sensuous splendors of tone, of the characterizing, the projecting power of music? Had his imagination such intensifying ardors? Could he so stretch, sustain and fill by sheer mental faculty so broad and brave a tonal canvas? Of course, he was, he had, he could. "Til Eulenspiegel," "Don Quixote," one or another later tone-poem have each proved it. Formulas all, dear formulas of the concert-room to nearly every one to whom once they were new and strange and thrilling, but not quite the formulas made molten music that pour Beethoven or Wagner across the years or that by sheer loveliness of vesture make Mozart imperishable. And there's an end of it. Already there are readers whispering: "He had a grouch." The precious vernacular again!

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. Oct. 8

Beethoven, Liszt, Humperdinck and Rabaud on Mr. Monteux's Programme—John McCormack Twice Over — Jewish Music in Unusual Circumstance

DEPARTING FROM "the tradition" Mr. Monteux gave Beethoven no place in the first pair of Symphony Concerts. To the second pair, for Friday afternoon and Saturday next, he returns with the "Eroica Symphony" in biennial repetition, but unheard since conductor and orchestra gained their present power. Three contrasting pieces fill the remainder of the programme—the Prelude to Humperdinck's opera, "Hänsel and Gretel," folk-tale glorified into sonorous, sportive or sentimental sound; the second, in A major, of Liszt's Concertos for piano and orchestra; and a set of dances, new to Boston from Mr. Rabaud's opera of the Arabian Nights, "Marouf, Cobbler of Cairo." Humperdinck's Prelude is timely honor to a composer recently dead, and the dances, amusing in themselves, a pleasant compliment from Mr. Monteux to his predecessor. In the Concerto, Mr. Nyiregyhazi, youthful, expert and individual pianist, will play the solo-part. He made no little stir in New York a year ago, but Boston has not hitherto heard him.

TRANS. Oct. 8.

[10]

First Concert of Symphony

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the present season was held yesterday afternoon. Concerts as given by the now well organized and directed organization are an exhilaration and an artistic uplift from the routine things of life. Yesterday's program and its rendition gave proof that not only are the concerts such as the above but will continue to be as each one succeeds another.

The first number was the Mendelssohn Symphony in A major. This is in four movements. The first with its hunting song type theme and its merry running setting of the same is a joy to the listener. The second movement with a religious theme is charming and the other two movements, three and four, make a complete whole which is one of the worthy works of the composer.

The second half of the program was made up of three modern selections, each with an individual interest. Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone-poem, "Sadko," founded on a tale of Russia savoring of Arabian Nights, was imaginative to an excellent degree and combined in its weavings novelties of composition which were at once modern but conservative.

The Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's Tone-poem from Don Juan, completed the program.

HUNGARIAN TO PLAY FOR SYMPHONY

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the Hungarian pianist of 19, whose concerts in New York last year singled him out as one of the most important newcomers of the season, will make his Boston debut when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second pair of symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 14 and 15.

He will play Liszt's pianoforte concerto in A major. Pierre Monteux will conduct the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which has not been heard at these concerts for two years; also the Prelude to the Opera "Hansel and Graetel" by Humperdinck, the German composer, who died a short while ago, and a series of dances selected from the opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo" by Henri Rabaud, the former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

TRAV. Oct. 8

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Orchestra Opens 41st Season—Pierre Monteux Conductor

PERFORMANCE IS BRILLIANT ONE

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Italian symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko"; Debussy, Nocturnes-Nuages and Fetes; Strauss, "Don Juan."

A brilliant audience, anticipating a brilliant concert, in which the hearers were not disappointed, welcomed heartily Mr. Monteux. It was a pleasure to see Mr. Krafft, after an absence of nine years, sitting again among the first violins. Mr. Werner, who had been away for two years, was again among the violas. Mr. Fourel now heads that section. As Mr. Holy is suffering from erysipelas, Mme. Delcourt played the music for the first harp.

The program, well varied, was made up of compositions that are more or less familiar. Debussy is no longer regarded as Antichrist in the musical world. Contrast the applause that followed the excellent performance yesterday with the stupefaction incited in Chickering Hall when this beautiful music was heard there in 1904. Today some of the more radical regard him with a patronizing air, saying of him what Capt. Bluffe said of Hannibal in Congreve's comedy: "A very pretty fellow in those days, it must be granted." The "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss was on the program, Strauss, whom, the Springfield Republican, alluding to his approaching visit, hailed as "the waltz-king." Alas, poor Johann!

Mr. Edward James Dent of the London Nation, hearing music by Strauss last month, was moved to say:

"Richard Strauss is so out of date in these days as to have become a popular composer." He also said that if modern musicians prefer "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel" to "Salome" and "Elektra," it means as a rule "nothing more than that they have become bored with music of a definitely serious character." It is true that "Death and Transfiguration" is now more old-fashioned than the G Minor Symphony of Mozart. The anguish of the dying man, who does not make the graceful and gracious apology of Charles II on his deathbed, no longer moves us. His recollections seem sentimental and vapid, while the trombone passages once considered as terrific, awe-inspiring, are not so significant as the single horn of Charon in Gluck's "Alceste." "Don Juan," on the other hand, holds its own by its defiant spirit, expressing the arrogance of the Don on his triumphal way—by its dramatic translation into music of the words put by Lenau into his mouth:

"Exhausted is the fuel;
And on the hearth the cold is fiercely

TIGHT BINDING

SPECIAL CONCERTS FOR B. U. STUDENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Present Five Programs

Arrangements have been made whereby members of B. U., in combination with other organizations, will be able to hear five special concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. The opportunity should prove particularly desirable, as the regular series of concerts are practically sold out by subscription from year to year.

These five concerts also, for which Mr. Monteux is preparing programs which will afford a representative selection of symphonic music, old and new, will provide a chance to hear the orchestra at its best at popular prices.

There will be a soloist at each concert. Two pianists will play concertos. They are Alfred Mirovitch, Russian virtuoso, and John Powell

Estelle Liebling, soprano and Richard Burgin, the concert master of the Orchestra, are others who will appear, together with Jean Bedetti, the French violincellist.

The concerts will take place at 8.15 in Symphony Hall, on Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10. Season tickets are now on sale at the University Book Store, 688 Boylston street; Students' Supply Shop, 525 Boylston street; Secretarial Shop, 27 Garrison street, and Law Supply Shop, 11 Ashburton place.

B.U. N. — Oct. 4.

SEPT 3

Polite Persuasion for the Tardy at the Symphony Concerts—Compulsion Next, If Need Be—Mme. Samaroff Retires and Miss Destinn Comes

A WISE management persuades rather than compels the public of the theatre or the concert-hall into new practices, departing from long-established routine. For forty years it has been the custom at the Symphony Concerts to admit late-comers at any pause in the music of the day, be it no longer than the brief halt betwen movements of a symphony. Human nature being human nature, this privilege of the tardy has been abused. Of late, indeed, the abuse has risen into a nuisance to the prompt, the attentive and those so feeble-minded—as some say—to be engrossed and stirred by music and orchestra. The belated, whether from choice, necessity or mere carelessness, have almost flaunted along the aisles, bestowing greetings here and there after the singular—and comic—fashion of American concert-halls, in some instances plainly pleased to be so "on view." Occasionally, they have filled three, four, five minutes with such diversions. These interruptions annoy audience, orchestra and conductor and from many quarters has come reasonable complaint.

Warily, however, the management will proceed in the new series of concerts to abate this nuisance. From next Friday afternoon and next Saturday evening, the tardy are to be reminded that they transgress good manners in the concert-hall and must pay the penalty. If the symphony of the day falls in the middle or at the end of the concert, they will not be admitted while it is in progress—and symphonies usually fill at least half an hour. If the symphony begins the programme, as under Mr. Monteux it generally does, they may be admitted in the pause after the first movement, at the discretion of the management and under the circumstances—like delaying weather—of the day. They may not, however, enter the auditorium during any other pause in the symphony. By so much, the wilfully belated are to be persuaded to mend their ways. If they prove deaf to this polite persuasion, ruder compulsion may strip them altogether of a privilege that carelessness has often turned into discourtesy.

Items and Announcements

Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, who is expecting a child, has withdrawn altogether from the concert-hall for the current season, and disappears accordingly from the "assisting artists" of the Symphony Orchestra. Not she, as announced, but Mr. Nyiregyhazi will play next week at the second pair of concerts.

TRANS. Oct. 5.

Mr. Monteux's Second Programme — Mr. McCormack's Impending Pieces — Miss Gerhardt to Return—The Fiftieth Year of the Apollo Club

FOR the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, Mr. Monteux announces Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony for the first time since he and the orchestra became mutually responsive instruments; the Prelude to Humperdinck's opera, "Hansel and Gretel," as memorial piece to the composer lately dead; the second and less familiar of Liszt's Concertos for piano; and a set of dances from Mr. Rabaud's light opera upon a tale in the Arabian Nights, "Marouf." It is familia piece at the Metropolitan, but not a measure of it has yet been heard in Boston. I the Concerto, young Mr. Nyireghazi wi play the solo-part.

TRANS. Oct. 6.

T WAIT
CONCERTS
may not be
Boston Sym-
season which n and Satur-decided that ll not be ners while a ay be made he program
other cause
atrons of the
This ex-
nly apply to movement.
en this, his
with the fol-ssohn's "Italy-Korsakoff's
ussy's Noc-
"Fetes," and

Oct. 5.

Aft. at
YMONY
ST
X
Sat.

Oct. 5.

41ST SYMPHONY SEASON STARTS

By E. F. HARKINS

PIERRE MONTEUX

Boston's most celebrated musical organization, the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday began its 41st season with fewer changes in the personnel than have been noted for many years, and with every evidence of a well-nigh complete restoration of its ante-bellum brilliancy.

Pierre Monteux, the conductor, received a hearty welcome. Nothing less was his due. As an interpreter of modern symphonic music he has few peers; and three of his selections for this first program were of the modern order. These were "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, often referred to as the original Russian tone poem; two of the Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the first of the Richard Strauss tone poems, "Don Juan."

These three numbers were admirably chosen; also admirably played. They gave variety, color, piquancy to the program. An audience which had been lulled into something like a cat-nap by the mechanical suavity of Mendelssohn's so-called Italian symphony—the first number on the program—bestirred itself to applaud conductor and orchestra vigorously.

On the whole, it was an auspicious start for the new season, excepting only that the Mendelssohn number seemed tepid, forced, futile and no more Italian than music you can hear in "Sally" or "The Rose Waltz." The first program was the ideal length—an hour and a half.

The new viola soloist, G. Fourel, made a favorable impression in solo passages in the Debussy number.

Seats for the Friday matinees are all gone for the season and there are fewer Saturday night seats left than there have been for a long time. Financially it will be the Symphony's biggest season.

ADVTSR. Oct. 8.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST CONCERT OF SEASOI

Mr Monteux' Program I Interesting as Usual

Yesterday's Symphony concert, th first of the season, showed the orchestra "back to normalcy." A year ag many of its partisans were loyally pretending that it was itself again, whe to less partial hearers, such as the New York reviewers, it was obviously nothing of the sort. By the end of last season, however, even those none too kindly judges were giving the orchestra genuine, though not undiluted, praise. This year, if it goes on as it began yesterday, outside judges as well as Bosto critics may get back much of thei former enthusiasm for its work.

Since the present rehabilitated orchestra is due more to Mr Monteux' patien zeal than to any other single factor, i was peculiarly gratifying to notice yesterday that he got about ten times a much applause when he first came o the stage as he received at the beginning of last season.

He had chosen, as he almost alway does, an interesting program, representing several styles of music. It began with the pleasantly faded Victorianism of Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," now coming into vogue again after surviving the scorn of those who used to resent its being badly overpraised. The quality of tone, precision in attack and subtle euphony the orchestra is now capable of were manifest from the opening bars.

There is nothing exciting about Mendelssohn's music, but the rest of the program was stirring enough to satisfy anybody, except a futurist. Rimsky Korsakoff's "Sadko," a "tone picture" not drawn from his opera with the same title, but an independent early work, is to his best things about what "Tannhauser" is to "Tristan," less original, less perfect, yet the fruit of a vigorous imagination expressing itself by somewhat conventional means.

Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" are among his best work. His craftsmanship is more subtle, more restrained, more classical than that of Rimsky Korsakoff or Strauss in "Don Juan," which followed yesterday. Debussy has a musical imagination which reminds one of a 20th century disillusion—Mozart. There is no joy, and little sentiment in his work.

"Don Juan" is full of rather coarse grained vitality, not yet exhausted on intricate technique. The performance yesterday caught the spirit of the piece. It was dramatic, as that of the Debussy pieces was lyric.

Next week the soloist will be a new pianist, Nyireghyazi, in Liszt's A major concerto. The other numbers are the "Eroica" Symphony, some dances from Rabaud's "Marouf" and the prelude to Humperdinck's popular opera, "Hansel und Gretel."

GLOBE - Oct. 8

THE NEW YEAR BEGUN NONE TOO WELL

Admirable Music, Orchestra, Conductor—Yet a Routine Afternoon of Familiar Virtue Somewhat Inert—Mendelssohn's Tedious Pages—Strauss, Debussy and Rimsky According to Formula—Audience and Programme-Book

POSSIBLY it was the choice of a symphony by Mendelssohn for first item of the programme; possibly it was the persistence of a summer that began last March and bids fair to continue into next January; possibly it was merely the mood of the audience and, maybe, of the blameworthy reviewer; yet somehow the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon seemed to lack animation. It marked the beginning of a new orchestral year; but at the end of no piece was there applause enough to call the orchestra to its feet. True, Mr. Monteux was warmly received when he first came to his place as conductor; but at the close of that tedious symphony by Mendelssohn, only spasmodic clapping barely recalled him a second time. Nor were the plaudits too hearty after the pieces by Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy and Strauss that filled the remainder of the afternoon. Students of audiences at the Symphony Concerts noted, moreover, two clear signs of detached and only semi-interested hearers. One was much furtive hair-dressing among the ladies; the other was diligent perusal of the achæological records of the programme-book, relieved this time by an amusing summary from Mr. Walkley of recent plays about Don Juan. Mental wool-gathering has long been an accessory to the hearing of music; but reading as complementary pastime thereto is a custom more or less peculiar to our Symphony Concerts. The sixty-odd pages of our programme-books has advantages—and disadvantages. As those know who stray occasionally outside their own palings, there is a new and better fashion with them. Mr. Lawrence Gilman weekly exemplifies it in his notes for the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Philharmonic Society of New York.

The truth seems to be—for a reviewer may set down no more than impressions and fortify them with observed fact as best he may—that the concert came and went in rather routine fashion. Mr. Monteux took pains; the orchestra took pains; the audience in degree was as dutiful; but between all three nowhere went the kindling spark that is life to the concert-hall. Rimsky's "Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes of "Clouds" and "Fêtes," Strauss's "Don Juan," are all "standard pieces" and deservedly. One and all, they are the familiar music of the last quarter in the nineteenth century that audiences in the first quarter of the twentieth hear gladly, rejoicing in their pleasure in a universally established merit. Even the "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn—why "Italian" only the imps of musical nomenclature can possibly know—still flows agreeably into many ears. Yet to take no more than a passive satisfaction in the music of the hour, as most seemed to do yesterday, is not to know and feel it alive, vivid, glowing. Certainly, the fault lay not with Mr. Monteux. He was both precise and supple with Mendelssohn's formal periods well filled; he shaded them "nicely" as that perfect gentleman of Berlin and London might have said had he heard them. The conductor overlooked neither rhythm, nor color, nor delineative suggestion in Rimsky's sea-piece. He was studious finesse itself with Debussy's "Clouds"; the rhythmic, the tonal glint of the companion-nocturne, "Fêtes," did not evade him. If somehow he missed fire with those first ardent projecting measures of Strauss's tone-poem, he laid on and spared not in the final passages when Don Juan thundering in the horns wreaks himself upon all his world.

No; the fault was not with the conductor. No more seemingly is it chargeable to the orchestra. Some ears heard it do none of the feats that it is the cliché of reviewing to call "brilliant"; yet throughout the afternoon it played responsively and well. It was precise and it was also pliant. Well-balanced were the several choirs; euphonious the blended or the answering instruments. Color often warmed the tone; as often rhythm animated it. Suavely went the singing voices of strings and wood-winds through those marshmallows of music, the middle movements of Mendelssohn's symphony. The horns in Strauss's tone-poem proclaimed Don Juan nigh to the composer's passion. Not a technical flaw marred the iteration of Debussy's measures of somnolent clouds nor the fleck upon them in the music of straying light or breeze. Depth of tone served Rimsky's sea-picture at beginning and end of "Sadko"; Strauss's sensuous periods were tumultuous but not turbid. The orchestra is, doubtless, the gainer by the return of two or three expert violinists to the string-choir, by the new first viola, Mr. Fourel, but yesterday was not a day to discover individual virtue. From beginning to end of the concert the band remained the admirable instrument that it had become in the concerts of last spring—the heir, the continuator of high tradition—as excellent an instrument in itself as American concert-halls now contain. Yet nowhere did it excel itself after the manner of March and April and at no time did it bear composer and audience on its own mounting wings. The spark that fires only smouldered. Let the chance of the day bear the blame. It is hard to be spirited in a spiritless air.

Yet the composers remain. Three of them are dead—one for nearly seventy-five years—while the fourth is as far away as his summer house in Bavaria or his conductor's desk in Vienna. Mendelssohn, Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy, Strauss, high-placed men all in the records of music! They can afford the blame of an inert afternoon. Upon them be it. Besides, is it not an axiom of reviewing that anything may be written of a composer and not a peep of protest come in aftermath, whereas to speak ill of conductor, orchestra, singer, virtuoso—Heaven save the mark and the letters! By all means, then, be it said that the Mendelssohn of this "Italian Symphony" is a faded, a tedious, a suavely mechanical Mendelssohn beyond bearing as "happy prologue to the swelling act" of a series of Symphony Concerts. Of course, there is a Mendelssohn who survives and deserves to survive the years—the Mendelssohn of the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," of the overtures of the sea and Scottish islands, of occasional pages in the "Scotch Symphony," of other pages here and there, the Mendelssohn who had fancy, if not imagination, who could vision if he could not dramatize, who could be apt in invention, sensitive of means, felicitous in procedure.

No such Mendelssohn wrote the Italian Symphony. With neat nothings, neatly fitted into polite formal pattern, he fills a first movement; with sweet nothings, prettily garnished, he empties himself into two more, and Victorian damsels lay hand to heart as their flutterings answer his. As happy chance will have it, an Italian dance stirs him in the final movement; but his Saltarello is a pastime of Amelia Sedley's drawing-room beside, say, the like dance that leaps and stamps on the pavements of Rome out of Berlioz's 'Benvenuto Cellini." For Italy in symphonic music from a distance, most of us go to Strauss, to Charpentier, to Elgar even, perchance to occasional measures of Brahms and Goldmark. For Italy in symphonic music near at hand, there is the whole waxing brood of "young Italians" and Toscanini to play them! Mendelssohn sat down in a ruffled shirt in the "piano nobile" of a Roman house, A. D. 1831, made a symphony of scholarly suavities and sweetmeats—and someone labelled it "Italian." This time no Scottish airs, no Scottish rhythms, no breath of Highland landscape or seascape enlivened such a music. Polish as Mr. Monteux might, the "Italian Symphony" is faded beyond repair. No fragrance of old lavender rises from those perfect platitudes.

But those saving moderns—Rimsky! Strauss!! Debussy!!! True and true again. Yet are they not in this "Sadko," this "Don Juan," these "Clouds" and "Fêtes" somewhat conventionalized moderns? It is not necessary to feel "spinal thrills" from the "poly-harmony" of Milhaud or Casella, to follow Stravinsky into his farthest tremors and blows, to perceive that the moderns (as we used to call them) of the last quarter of the nineteenth century proceeded also according to formula. In surge of the sea begins and ends the tonal tale of "Sadko," but that sea has also surged and with similar rhythmic motion and depth of tone through the Finale of "Scheherazade," through the opera of "Tsar Soltan." Rhythmic revels, highly colored harmonically and instrumentally, tinged on occasion with folk-song, are familiar exercise for Rimsky. If music-making were a trade—as in disillusioned moments it sometimes seems—they would be called one of the Russian's "specialties.'

In turn, the idiom of Debussy as he employs it in the rhythms and progressions, the harmony and timbres of "Clouds" still falls upon the ear in piercing beauty. The mind warms to another beauty in his economy and exactness of means. Upon the imagination march his changeless clouds yet stirring to dissolution. By like means in the luminous fantasia of "Fêtes," processional of atoms, he also works his familiar spells. Yet has not time and fashion a little thinned them unless they be the lasting magic of the Faun and Mélisande, of the earlier piano-pieces?

As for Strauss in "Don Juan," was he so master in his twenties of sensuous splendors of tone, of the characterizing, the projecting power of music? Had his imagination such intensifying ardors? Could he so stretch, sustain and fill by sheer mental faculty so broad and brave a tonal canvas? Of course, he was, he had, he could. "Til Eulenspiegel," "Don Quixote," one or another later tone-poem have each proved it. Formulas all, dear formulas of the concert-room to nearly every one to whom once they were new and strange and thrilling, but not quite the formulas made molten music that pour Beethoven or Wagner across the years or that by sheer loveliness of vesture make Mozart imperishable. And there's an end of it. Already there are readers whispering: "He had a grouch." The precious vernacular again!

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. Oct. 8

Beethoven, Liszt, Humperdinck ar Rabaud on Mr. Monteux's Programme-John McCormack Twice Over — Jewis Music in Unusual Circumstance

DEPARTING FROM "the tradition Mr. Monteux gave Beethoven r place in the first pair of Symphon Concerts. To the second pair, for Frida afternoon and Saturday next, he returr with the "Eroica Symphony" in biennia repetition, but unheard since conductor ar orchestra gained their present power Three contrasting pieces fill the remaind of the programme—the Prelude to Humperdinck's opera, "Hänsel and Gretel folk-tale glorified into sonorous, sporti or sentimental sound; the second, in major, of Liszt's Concertos for piano ar orchestra; and a set of dances, new Boston from Mr. Rabaud's opera of tl Arabian Nights, "Marouf, Cobbler Cairo." Humperdinck's Prelude is time honor to a composer recently dead, ar the dances, amusing in themselves, a pleasant compliment from Mr. Montei to his predecessor. In the Concerto, M Nyiregyhazi, youthful, expert and ind vidual pianist, will play the solo-part. I made no little stir in New York a year ag but Boston has not hitherto heard him.

TRANS. Oct. 8.
[10]

First Concert of Symphony

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the present season was held yesterday afternoon. Concerts as given by the now well organized and directed organization are an exhilaration and an artistic uplift from the routine things of life. Yesterday's program and its rendition gave proof that not only are the concerts such as the above but will continue to be as each one succeeds another.

The first number was the Mendelssohn Symphony in A major. This is in four movements. The first with its hunting song type theme and its merry running setting of the same is a joy to the listener. The second movement with a religious theme is charming and the other two movements, three and four, make a complete whole which is one of the worthy works of the composer.

The second half of the program was made up of three modern selections, each with an individual interest. Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone-poem, "Sadko," founded on a tale of Russia savoring of Arabian Nights, was imaginative to an excellent degree and combined in its weavings novelties of composition which were at once modern but conservative.

The Debussy Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's Tone-poem from Don Juan, completed the program.

HUNGARIAN TO PLAY FOR SYMPHONY

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the Hungarian pianist of 19, whose concerts in New York last year singled him out as one of the most important newcomers of the season, will make his Boston debut when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second pair of symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 14 and 15.

He will play Liszt's pianoforte concerto in A major. Pierre Monteux will conduct the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which has not been heard at these concerts for two years; also the Prelude to the Opera "Hansel and Graetel" by Humperdinck, the German composer, who died a short while ago, and a series of dances selected from the opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo" by Henri Rabaud, the former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra.

TRAV Oc

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Orchestra Opens 41st Season—Pierre Monteux Conductor

PERFORMANCE IS BRILLIANT ONE

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Italian symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko"; Debussy, Nocturnes-Nuages, and Fetes; Strauss, "Don Juan."

A brilliant audience, anticipating a brilliant concert, in which the hearers were not disappointed, welcomed heartily Mr. Monteux. It was a pleasure to see Mr. Krafft, after an absence of nine years, sitting again among the first violins. Mr. Werner, who had been away for two years, was again among the violas. Mr. Fourel now heads that section. As Mr. Holy is suffering from erysipelas, Mme. Delcourt played the music for the first harp.

The program, well varied, was made up of compositions that are more or less familiar. Debussy is no longer regarded as Antichrist in the musical world. Contrast the applause that followed the excellent performance yesterday with the stupefaction incited in Chickering Hall when this beautiful music was heard there in 1904. Today some of the more radical regard him with a patronizing air, saying of him what Capt. Bluffe said of Hannibal in Congreve's comedy: "A very pretty fellow in those days, it must be granted." The "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss was on the program, Strauss, whom, the Springfield Republican, alluding to his approaching visit, hailed as "the waltz-king." Alas, poor Johann!

Mr. Edward James Dent of the London Nation, hearing music by Strauss last month, was moved to say:

"Richard Strauss is so out of date in these days as to have become a popular composer." He also said that if modern musicians prefer "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel" to "Salome" and "Elektra," it means as a rule "nothing more than that they have become bored with music of a definitely serious character." It is true that "Death and Transfiguration" is now more old-fashioned than the G Minor Symphony of Mozart. The anguish of the dying man who does not make the graceful and gracious apology of Charles II on his deathbed, no longer moves us. His recollections seem sentimental and vapid, while the trombone passages once considered as terrific, awe-inspiring, are not so significant as the single horn of Charon in Gluck's "Alceste." "Don Juan," on the other hand, holds its own by its defiant spirit, expressing the arrogance of the Don on his triumphal way—by its dramatic translation into music of the words put by Lenau into his mouth:

"Exhausted is the fuel;
And on the hearth the cold is fiercely
cruel."

The superb horn phrase should have accompanied the entrance of Lovelace into the ballroom; one of the most powerful scenes in Richardson's long-winded romance.

"Sadko" is amusing, though as a musical seascape it is not comparable with the sea music in "Scheherazade." The tone picture is interesting chiefly by its instrumentation and the exciting monotony of oriental repetition, for in eastern music, "exciting" and "monotonous" are not warring terms. It gains in the concert hall if only for this reason: that the hearer is not distracted by the ballet, for which the music was not written.

Another pleasant feature of the concert was the fact that Mr. Monteux did not find it necessary to begin the season with a symphony by Beethoven. There is time enough for this composer later, nor would there be a perturbation of nature if only one or two symphonies by him were played in the course of a season. They would then be appreciated all the more. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony still has agreeable pages, written with a clarity, a neatness, an elegance that are not displeasing. This music is eminently "genteel." Take the finale in saltarello form for example, suggested by a Roman carnival. Do we not see "Miss T—— a delicate young Englishwoman" pelting the composer with confetti? We see his blue coat as white as a miller's. And then we see him in his lodgings brushing this blue coat with extreme care and hanging it on a stretcher before he goes to bed. We are wrong; Mendelssohn was too "genteel" to do such a common thing as to go to bed; he undoubtedly "retired."

It has often been thought necessary in reviewing the first concert of a season to apologize for the performance: "the men have long been absent; they are not yet in the swing; no doubt soon, etc., etc." There was yesterday no thought of apology. There was nothing but praise. The orchestra was never in a better condition; it never played more intelligently, more brilliantly, and with a fined sense of euphony and color. This we owe to Mr. Monteux, and the players share in his glory.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Beethoven, "Eroica" symphony; Humperdinck, prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"; Liszt, Concerto in A Major, No. 2 (Mr. Nyiregyhazi, pianist); Rabaud, Dances from "Marouf" (first time in Boston).

HERALD-Oct. 8.

Established 1881
FROM REVIEW
OCT - 8 1921
NEW YORK CITY

FAMOUS VIOLA PLAYER IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted French Musician Will Become a Member of the Organization

(Special to The New York Review.)

Boston, Sept. 30.—Georges Fourel, well known in France as a master of the viola, has joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will make his initial appearance in this country next week at the opening concert. He is twenty-nine years old. He served in the French army throughout the war, was wounded twice and received the War Cross. After demobilization he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and also of the Kretly Quartet, which has made known much new music. Last winter he played at Monte Carlo.

SYMPHONY IN ITS 41ST SEASON

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Chalk up forty-one seasons for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The forty-first year started yesterday afternoon, and it is a great pleasure to state that the orchestra is back where it used to be, and that means incomparably the greatest band in the world.

During the past two or three years I have had to say some harsh things about the Boston Symphony. To gloss over faults and weaknesses is not true friendliness, and the war and the strike certainly played hob with the once proud orchestra.

But Manager Brennan has had time to rebuild his band, weeding out incompetents who may have slipped in during the confusion of the past two or three years and replacing them with faultless players. At present it is a superb ensemble. The voice of the orchestra is both exquisite in tone and magnificent in power. We have our old orchestra back.

And Pierre Monteux has grown in statue tremendously in the three seasons he has been associated with the Boston orchestra. Three years ago he couldn't have played a Strauss tone poem as he did yesterday, or painted the tone picture of Debussy as he did with the "Nocturnes." [illegible] he leaves Boston and goes [illegible] to Europe they will discover [illegible] great conductor in

---

The program opened with Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony in A major. When Victoria was first crowned they thought that Mendelssohn was the greatest of all composers. Why, they compared Mozart and Beethoven with him entirely to his advantage. Time treats a composer as it does a gold filled watch. For a few years the watch looks like gold, but in the end it turns out to be brass. Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony today is rather stupid, utterly without genius.

It has taken me a good many years to appreciate Debussy, but I certainly do enjoy him now. Debussy is a genius who will not turn brass. But you must settle yourself back and listen to his music with a different attitude from that with which you listen to Beethoven or Brahms. Nothing will come out and strike you in the face with its grandeur or glory. He percolates into your in'ards.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff music to "Sadko" was a delight to hear, and it was performed with the thorough understanding which Monteux displays for modern Russian music.

As far as the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan" is concerned it was well worth while. Time flies and this tone poem, which was revolutionary in its day is now thirty-one years old. Strauss himself has started half a dozen revolutions since then.

HUNGARIAN IS SOLOIST FOR SYMPHONY

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the Hungarian pianist of nineteen, whose concerts in New York last year singled him out as one of the most important newcomers of the season, will make his Boston debut when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second pair of Symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 14 and 15. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's pianoforte concerto in A major. Pierre Monteux will conduct the masterly "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which has not been heard at these concerts for two years; also the prelude to the Opera "Hansel and Graetel," by Humperdinck, the German composer, who died a short while ago, and a series of dances, selected from the Opera "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," by Henri Rabaud, the former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. This opera has had conspicuous success as produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

ADVTSR. Oct. 8.

SYMPHONY OPENS 41ST MUSIC YEAR

Orchestra More Brilliant Than Ever; Mr. Monteux' Triumph

BY OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was the most brilliant opening we remember in 20 years of symphony seasons. Neither since the war nor for years before it, at this stage of the season, had the band shown such technical precision, such glow, transparency, and varied tone color, and there was a programme! One which displayed to the utmost effectiveness the capacities of the players, and the authority and virtuosity of the conductor.

PLEASURE IN MENDELSSOHN

At a first glance at the programme Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony roused apprehension. Time is past in which this symphony, ordinarily, would create enthusiasm. It is conventional. It is over long. There are many measures, especially in the first movement, of padding. Lo and behold! Mr. Monteux played this music with such a grace, with such an intuitive feeling for the exactly right pace, for the precise nuance, that one ambled along with the genial Felix Mendelssohn not merely tolerating, but taking absolute pleasure in his platitudes.

Mendelssohn's music is not easy, but very hard indeed to play and to interpret as it was interpreted yesterday. This was, in fact, the accomplishment of a great musician.

Then came music for the gourmandizers of tone color and pictorial and exotic effects: the early symphony poem of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko," and two of Debussy's Nocturnes for orchestra, which are certainly among the most exquisite fragments of music ever called into existence. It was long the custom, particularly on the part of critics of German musical tendencies, to pooh-pooh the music of the young Russians of the '60's as poorly made, thinly invented and with insufficient counterpoint. "Sadko" is youthful music, is thin in places, is now and again of an experimental character. What of it? It is music of audacious imagination, music of that huge curling monster, the sea. It is music in which a young composer with a color sense most gorgeous and exotic seizes boldly on the palette of instrumental colors prepared for him by one Hector Berlioz and paints pictures never before known to the tonal art. Mr. Monteux could not have done a composer a greater service than he did here. He recreated the composer's conception. He made it seem amost more perfectly executed than is the case.

Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" has overshadowed somewhat the Nocturnes for orchestra. The day may came when these pieces will be ranked even superior to the earlier famous work. So much happens in a single measure. There is the feeling, far deeper than any medium but music could express, of fresh pagan wonder and joy in nature. There are no conventions, no rules, simply the artist's reverent transcribing, with the most exact truth and the most subtle feeling of the things that he saw in his dream.

Then, too, the orchestration. There is nothing earthy in it.

Debussy's orchestra is here a thing of transparency and fire, a part of the skies. One does not point to this and that original effect. Every effect is original. Every moment is a moment of perfect beauty. Every second a miracle. For these two Nocturnes alone the world would be forced to rank Debussy an immortal.

Finally came the "Don Juan" of Strauss, also a youthful work, also audacious, but this time with a pride, a force, a molten flame of temperament which carries everything before it. Strauss' lover is not merely sensual. He is heroic, knightly. But his heart is cold, because, at heart, he knows the transiency of every passion he evokes, he knows that living he is dead. The sword thrust which kills this Don Juan is an aftermath, a formal acknowledgment, as we might say, of the death of the spirit which had occurred long ago. Here, again, Mr. Monteux triumphed, not because he tossed the thing off the end of his baton as if it were the merest bagatelle to perform, and relit Straussian fires and swept everybody away with the heat and the headlong splendor of this music, but because of the fitnesse of suggestion, the lack of melodrama of the concluding measures. Say what one will, Strauss is a psychologist. Is he really a composer? There are strong arguments to the contrary. His melodies are frequently commonplace, his method at times brutal, in bad taste, and yet he is compelling, he is superb. Call him what you like, this is true: He is an artist, and a temperament.

POST-Oct. 8.

NYIREGYHAZI AT THE SYMPHONY

For the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has compiled a program including the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven, which has not been heard at these concerts for two years; the prelude to "Haensel and Gretel" by Humperdinck, who died last month, and the dances from "Marouf," by Rabaud. The first soloist of the season, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the Hungarian pianist of 19 years, will make his debut in Boston. He will play Liszt's concerto in A major.

HERALD-Oct. 9.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

For the second ,ra etaoi shr cmfwn

For the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux has compiled a program of considerable interest, including the "Eroica" symphony, by Beethoven; the prelude to "Hansel and Graetel," by Humperdinck, the German composer, who died recently, and a series of dances selected from the opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," by Henri Rabaud, former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. The first soloist of the season will appear, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, a young Hungarian pianist, new to Boston. Mr. Nyiregyhazi will play with the orchestra Liszt's concerto in A major.

ADVTSR. Oct. 9.

Prospects Of the New Season

The managerial announcements published in the newspapers during the past few weeks enable an experienced and skeptical reader to forecast some of the good and much of the less good that the new musical season will offer Boston audiences.

The Symphony season, to speak of first things first, has opened with prospects far brighter than they were a year ago. Then Mr Monteux' problem was to drill a reorganized orchestra into such shape that it might confirm a great if waning reputation. He and the players did better work last year than any unprejudiced listener expected from them.

This year, with few changes in personnel, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a fair chance of regaining its supremacy over rival bands in other American cities. By the end of last season, it was equaling their work after surmounting difficulties greater than any one among its rivals has yet had to face. The exceptionally large sale of season tickets this year is encouraging evidence that this city, despite what its detractors at home and abroad say, will support any first rate musical undertaking cordially.

Mr Monteux, who is the best program maker the Symphony ever had, promises a number of interesting novelties. We shall probably hear unfamiliar numbers by De Falla, Ravel, Rabaud, Stravinsky, Marcel Dupre, Davico, de Sabata, Casella, Prokoviev and others. D'Indy will conduct a pair of concerts. It is to be wished that Richard Strauss and Casella, who are to appear in other American cities as guest conductors, might act in that capacity here.

The list of soloists includes two exceptional violinist, new to Boston, Vecsey and Kochanski. The veteran pianist, Siloti, and the great Russian soprano, Nina Koshetz, are among other newcomers.

Notable New Soloists

One regrets the absence of Elena Gerhardt, Julia Culp and Hulda Lashanska from the list. Marie Du Carp is a pianist whose claim to be heard with the Symphony is quite as good as that of either of the women pianists selected. But on the whole it is an attractive list.

GLOBE Oct. 9

NYIREGYHAZI AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

For the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 14 and 15, Pierre Monteux has compiled a programme of considerable interest. The first number will be the masterly "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven, which has not been heard at these concerts for two years. He will also conduct the prelude to the opera, "Hansel and Graetel" by Humperdinck, the German composer, who died a short while ago, and a series of dances selected from the opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo" by Henri Rabaud, the former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. This opera has had conspicuous success as produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The first soloist of the season will appear at this pair of concerts—Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the highly talented Hungarian pianist of 19, who will, on this occasion, make his debut in Boston. Reports from his concerts in New York indicate a phenomenal technique and brilliancy and likewise an unusual artistic grasp of the music in hand. Mr. Nyiregyhazi is the talented pupil of his older compatriot, Ernst Dohnanyi, who will also be heard as soloist later in the season. Mr. Nyiregyhazi will play with the orchestra Liszt's famous concerto in A major.

POST-Oct. 9

The Symphony Orchestra Regains Zest and Its Evening Concert Runs Accordingly—Strauss and Debussy Side by Side—The Tenor in New and Old Powers Finely and Fully Exercised—Rare Ancient Pieces and His Present Maturity

EVENING, above afternoon, is the time for concerts. After dark, as the way of artists and the way of audiences go, nervous tension runs higher, the mood is keener to give or to take pleasure. Concerts in the afternoon, established though they be in the music-making of America, are at bottom a concession to the feminine, the suburban public; while concerts in the evening presume that men also have ears for "the concord"—or the discord—"of sweet sounds"; that the "urban area," as "city-planners" sometimes say with a hint of condescension, may also contain interested eager folk. Wise and wary are the Muses, protectresses of the arts. Not yet has the "suburban home" quite engulfed them. So it was, perhaps, that the concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening went with more zest than did the concert of Friday afternoon. Each began a new series; at each the same conductor, the same band were busy with the same pieces. The audiences, however, were different. To many hearers the weekly concert of Friday is obviously a thing of custom; to as many more the weekly concert of Saturday is occasion for lively sensation and warm enjoyment. Hence, in measure, a differing mood, evident when not only Mr. Monteux but also the standing orchestra were heartily greeted; continuing until the final item of the programme, Strauss's tone-poem "Don Juan," was applauded as though there were neither motor nor train to heed.

Orchestra and conductor shared this animation; music and performance gained by it. The clear, shining tone of the violins, the rich tone of the violoncellos, were not only fact to the ear but impulse to pleasure. The beauty that the wind-choir achieved in many a measure hid the skill and pains accomplishing it. The mellowness of the brass was final complement to the pervading euphony or, if the composer so willed, to the pervading ardor. The new plasticity of the band matched a new plasticity in the conductor. It neared the blending of force and finesse, the union of beauty of tone and of manifold expressive power that were its ancient glories. On Friday it played with assiduous care; on Saturday with kindling zeal. On the one day, it took thought; on the other it ran free and full. From the stage to the auditorium and back again went the spirit that warms a concert.

Alike Mr. Monteux and the chosen composers profited by this quickening air. Faded and frayed are many measures in Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony." Some of them always were, many have since become, the commonplaces of music. Conductor and orchestra hid them under bright surface and graceful movement. They snatched from time two saving graces—charm in the middle divisions, sprightliness in the finale. Again, Mr. Monteux's lively instinct for pictorial music made Rimsky's 'Sadko" the scene that it is upon the theatre of the imagination. Not necessarily must a Russian ballet mime and dance it or Russian artist set in green waters and dresses of sea-shell and sea-plant. The miracle of Debussy, which is evanescent vision made precise musical image, renewed itself in the Nocturne of "Clouds"; while in the succeeding "Fetes," it was good to hear the conductor spare not in sonorities. More than mist and moonbeam is Debussy, though some who play him used not to have him so. Light, not haze, is the glamor of "Fêtes." And the sheer sensuous magnificence, the propulsive power of "Don Juan," as though it were written in a single blaze of creation, once more flamed out of the music. An overladen piece is the tone-poem. Strauss crowds into it more stuff of the imagination than music will bear. He lacks Debussy's sense of selection. He multiplies his musical means until the swirl of them more smothers than stimulates the ear. He misses Debussy's choice precision. Yet what characterizing power, what delineative force, what sumptuous means and march! To either composer his own glories and, most of all, to us listeners, a responsive mood to both.

TRANS. Oct. 10

Dances from Mr. Rabaud's Opera, "Marouf," at Symphony Hall Tomorrow—A Novel Piece by Casella at Hand—Mr Goodrich as Organist—Mr. Zimbalist's Programme

DURING the season of Mr. Rabaud's leadership of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, as conductor of French operas at the Metropolitan, was from time to time engaged in directing performances of his colleague's "Marouf, Cobbler of Cairo," and on at least one occasion the composer himself was in the audience. Now, as graceful tribute to his predecessor, and because the music is intrinsically attractive, he has placed a set of dances, a sort of incidental ballet from this same "Marouf," upon the programme of the Symphony Concerts this week. The score of these dances is no more than a copious excerpt lifted bodily from the opera, and certain cuts are necessary to give the music sufficient continuity when it is heard outside the theatre. The scene that it accompanies is one of Oriental pomp and festivity, embellished with comic incident. Marouf, a poor cobbler, too frequently beaten by his virago of a wife, has fled by ship to Arabia, been wrecked and rescued, and now, posing as a man of wealth, he is about to marry the daughter of the Sultan. The music opens with trills in the wood-wind, two trumpets proclaim a decisive theme of which much use is made later on, and when in the opera the Sheik-al-Islam has read the marriage contract, there begins a ballet destined for the entertainment of the assembled guests. The first dance, in the key of D minor, is in brisk three-quarter rhythm; the wood-wind, punctuated by the celesta, bears a theme of Eastern character over a recurring sixteenth note figure in the strings. The second dance in F-sharp minor, is more restrained; the melody is first heard in a piccolo and then taken up by a clarinet; later, following a reappearance of the opening passage, the initial dance is repeated. Appropriate music now marks the entrance, upon a balcony, of the Princess, with veiled face, and surrounded by her maids of honor. The dancers, Marouf, all the dignitaries of the court salute her. In this episode there are peculiar touches in the orchestration—among them arpeggios and harmonics for the violas against trills in the flutes, cymbals and celesta. While Marouf distributes gifts and gold to the guests, and to the crowd without the wall—the humbler ones scrambling in the dust for his largesse—there comes a final dance, beginning wildly and increasing in frenzy to the end. As an essay in exotic coloring from a modern composer all this music is strangely diatonic, gaining effect not so much through unusual chord and interval as by rhythmic life and ingenious, often fascinating instrumentation.

Programmes in Prospect

Two novel pieces stand upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week: a suite for orchestra by Casella drawn from his music to a "choreographicic comedy" by title "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," or "The Convent by the Water"; and an arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Chorde in B minor (No. 2) for organ alone. Casella, already known here by his Rhapsody, "Italia," and his version for orchestra of Balakierev's piano-piece, "Islamey," is one of the younger Italin composers, individual and innovating like most of them, but more susceptible than some of his fellows to Parisian influences. The suite dates from 1912; comprises A Children's 'Round,' 'a Nocturne, a Final Dance, a Barcarolle, a Saraband, a movement "of Old Dadies"; and a Festival March; and was originally played by Mr. Monteux at hi concerts in Paris. Fragments of the suite have already been heard in the United States, as at Mr. Damrosch's concerts in New York last winter. Now in Boston and for the first times in America the whole music will come to performance. Mr. Wallace Goodrich, the notable organist who plays too seldom in public, made the arrangement of Franck's Chorale and will himself undulate the solo part. The symphony, at the beginning of the programme, is the third of Brahm's, in major.

At the first of the concerts of the Syhphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week in Sanders Theatre, Mr. Nyiregyhazi, the pianist, will be the "assisting artist" in the following programme:

Symphony in A major, "Italian"	Mendelssohn
Tone-Picture, "Sadko Under the Seas."	Rimsky-Korsakov
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major	Liszt
Dances from the Opera, "Marouf"	Rabaud

TRANS. Oct. 15

The superb horn phrase should have accompanied the entrance of Lovelace into the ballroom, one of the most powerful scenes in Richardson's long-winded romance.

"Sadko" is amusing, though as a musical seascape it is not comparable with the sea music in "Scheherazade." The tone picture is interesting chiefly by its instrumentation and the exciting monotony of oriental repetition, for in eastern music, "exciting" and "monotonous" are not warring terms. It gains in the concert hall if only for this reason: that the hearer is not distracted by the ballet, for which the music was not written.

Another pleasant feature of the concert was the fact that Mr. Monteux did not find it necessary to begin the season with a symphony by Beethoven. There is time enough for this composer later, nor would there be a perturbation of nature if only one or two symphonies by him were played in the course of a season. They would then be appreciated all the more. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony still has agreeable pages, written with a clarity, a neatness, an elegance that are not displeasing. This music is eminently "genteel." Take the finale in saltarello form for example, suggested by a Roman carnival. Do we not see "Miss T—— a delicate young Englishwoman" pelting the composer with confetti? We see his blue coat as white as a miller's. And then we see him in his lodgings brushing this blue coat with extreme care and hanging it on a stretcher before he goes to bed. We are wrong; Mendelssohn was too "genteel" to do such a common thing as to go to bed; he undoubtedly "retired."

It has often been thought necessary in reviewing the first concert of a season to apologize for the performance: "the men have long been absent; they are not yet in the swing; no doubt soon, etc., etc." There was yesterday no thought of apology. There was nothing but praise. The orchestra was never in a better condition; it never played more intelligently, more brilliantly, and with a fined sense of euphony and color. This we owe to Mr. Monteux, and the players share in his glory.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Beethoven, "Eroica" symphony; Humperdinck, prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"; Liszt, Concerto in A Major, No. 2 (Mr. Nyiregyhazi, pianist); Rabaud, Dances from "Marouf" (first time in Boston).

HERALD-Oct. 8.

Established 1881
FROM

NEW YORK CITY

FAMOUS VIOLA PLAYER IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted French Musician Will Become a Member of the Organization

(Special to The New York Review.)

Boston, Sept. 30.—Georges Fourel, well known in France as a master of the viola, has joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will make his initial appearance in this country next week at the opening concert. He is twenty-nine years old. He served in the French army throughout the war, was wounded twice and received the War Cross. After demobilization he became a member of the Concerts Touche in Paris and also of the Kretly Quartet, which has made known much new music. Last winter he played at Monte Carlo.

SYMPHONY IN ITS 41ST SEASON

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Chalk up forty-one seasons for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The forty-first year started yesterday afternoon, and it is a great pleasure to state that the orchestra is back where it used to be, and that means incomparably the greatest band in the world.

During the past two or three years I have had to say some harsh things about the Boston Symphony. To gloss over faults and weaknesses is not true friendliness, and the war and the strike certainly played hob with the once proud orchestra.

But Manager Brennan has had time to rebuild his band, weeding out incompetents who may have slipped in during the confusion of the past two or three years and replacing them with faultless players. At present it is a superb ensemble. The voice of the orchestra is both exquisite in tone and magnificent in power. We have our old orchestra back.

And Pierre Monteux has grown in statue tremendously in the three seasons he has been associated with the Boston orchestra. Three years ago he couldn't have played a Strauss tone poem as he did yesterday, or painted the tone picture of Debussy as he did with the "Nocturnes." When he leaves Boston and goes back to Europe they will discover they have one great conductor in

The program opened with Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony in A major. When Victoria was first crowned they thought that Mendelssohn was the greatest of all composers. Why, they compared Mozart and Beethoven with him entirely to his advantage. Time treats a composer as it does a gold filled watch. For a few years the watch looks like gold, but in the end it turns out to be brass. Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony today is rather stupid, utterly without genius.

It has taken me a good many years to appreciate Debussy, but I certainly do enjoy him now. Debussy is a genius who will not turn brass. But you must settle yourself back and listen to his music with a different attitude from that with which you listen to Beethoven or Brahms. Nothing will come out and strike you in the face with its grandeur or glory. He percolates into your in'ards.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff music to "Sadko" was a delight to hear, and it was performed with the thorough understanding which Monteux displays for modern Russian music.

As far as the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan" is concerned it was well worth while. Time flies and this tone poem, which was revolutionary in its day is now thirty-one years old. Strauss himself has started half a dozen revolutions since then.

HUNGARIAN IS SOLOIST FOR SYMPHONY

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the Hungarian pianist of nineteen, whose concerts in New York last year singled him out as one of the most important newcomers of the season, will make his Boston debut when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second pair of Symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 14 and 15. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's pianoforte concerto in A major. Pierre Monteux will conduct the masterly "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven, which has not been heard at these concerts for two years; also the prelude to the Opera "Hansel and Graetel," by Humperdinck, the German composer, who died a short while ago, and a series of dances, selected from the Opera "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," by Henri Rabaud, the former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. This opera has had conspicuous success as produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

ADVTSR. Oct. 9.

SYMPHONY OPENS 41ST MUSIC YEAR

Orchestra More Brilliant Than Ever; Mr. Monteux' Triumph

BY OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was the most brilliant opening we remember in 20 years of symphony seasons. Neither since the war nor for years before it, at this stage of the season, had the band shown such technical precision, such glow, transparency, and varied tone color, and there was a programme! One which displayed to the utmost effectiveness the capacities of the players, and the authority and virtuosity of the conductor.

PLEASURE IN MENDELSSOHN

At a first glance at the programme Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony roused apprehension. Time is past in which this symphony, ordinarily, would create enthusiasm. It is conventional. It is over long. There are many measures, especially in the first movement, of padding. Lo and behold! Mr. Monteux played this music with such a grace, with such an intuitive feeling for the exactly right pace, for the precise nuance, that one ambled along with the genial Felix Mendelssohn not merely tolerating, but taking absolute pleasure in his platitudes.

Mendelssohn's music is not easy, but very hard indeed to play and to interpret as it was interpreted yesterday. This was, in fact, the accomplishment of a great musician.

Then came music for the gourmandizers of tone color and pictorial and exotic effects: the early symphony poem of Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko," and two of Debussy's Nocturnes for orchestra, which are certainly among the most exquisite fragments of music ever called into existence. It was long the custom, particularly on the part of critics of German musical tendencies, to pooh-pooh the music of the young Russians of the '60's as poorly made, thinly invented and with insufficient counterpoint. "Sadko" is youthful music, is thin in places, is now and again of an experimental character. What of it? It is music of audacious imagination, music of that huge curling monster, the sea. It is music in which a young composer with a color sense most gorgeous and exotic seizes boldly on the palette of instrumental colors prepared for him by one Hector Berlioz and paints pictures never before known to the tonal art. Mr. Monteux could not have done a composer a greater service than he did here. He recreated the composer's conception. He made it seem amost more perfectly executed than is the case.

Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" has overshadowed somewhat the Nocturnes for orchestra. The day may came when these pieces will be ranked even superior to the earlier famous work. So much happens in a single measure. There is the feeling, far deeper than any medium but music could express, of fresh pagan wonder and joy in nature. There are no conventions, no rules, simply the artist's reverent transcribing, with the most exact truth and the most subtle feeling of the things that he saw in his dream.

Then, too, the orchestration. There is nothing earthy in it.

Debussy's orchestra is here a thing of transparency and fire, a part of the skies. One does not point to this and that original effect. Every effect is original. Every moment is a moment of perfect beauty. Every second a miracle. For these two Nocturnes alone the world would be forced to rank Debussy an immortal.

Finally came the "Don Juan" of Strauss, also a youthful work, also audacious, but this time with a pride, a force, a molten flame of temperament which carries everything before it. Strauss' lover is not merely sensual. He is heroic, knightly. But his heart is cold, because, at heart, he knows the transiency of every passion he evokes, he knows that living he is dead. The sword thrust which kills this Don Juan is an aftermath, a formal acknowledgment, as we might say, of the death of the spirit which had occurred long ago. Here, again, Mr. Monteux triumphed, not because he tossed the thing off the end of his baton as if it were the merest bagatelle to perform, and relit Straussian fires and swept everybody away with the heat and the headlong splendor of this music, but because of the fitnesse of suggestion, the lack of melodrama of the concluding measures. Say what one will, Strauss is a psychologist. Is he really a composer? There are strong arguments to the contrary. His melodies are frequently commonplace, his method at times brutal, in bad taste, and yet he is compelling, he is superb. Call him what you like, this is true: He is an artist, and a temperament.

POST-

NYIREGYHAZI AT THE SYMPHONY

For the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has compiled a program including the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven, which has not been heard at these concerts for two years; the prelude to "Haensel and Gretel" by Humperdinck, who died last month, and the dances from "Marouf," by Rabaud. The first soloist of the season, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the Hungarian pianist of 19 years, will make his debut in Boston. He will play Liszt's concerto in A major.

HERALD-Oct. 9.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

For the second ,ra etaoi shr cmfwn

For the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux has compiled a program of considerable interest, including the "Eroica" symphony, by Beethoven; the prelude to "Hansel and Graetel," by Humperdinck, the German composer, who died recently, and a series of dances selected from the opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo," by Henri Rabaud, former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. The first soloist of the season will appear, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, a young Hungarian pianist, new to Boston. Mr. Nyiregyhazi will play with the orchestra Liszt's concerto in A major.

ADVTSR. Oct. 9.

Prospects Of the New Season The managerial announcements published in the newspapers during the past few weeks enable an experienced and skeptical reader to forecast some of the good and much of the less good that the new musical season will offer Boston audiences.

The Symphony season, to speak of first things first, has opened with prospects far brighter than they were a year ago. Then Mr Monteux' problem was to drill a reorganized orchestra into such shape that it might confirm a great :f waning reputation. He and the players did better work last year than any unprejudiced listener expected from them.

This year, with few changes in personnel, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a fair chance of regaining its supremacy over rival bands in other American cities. By the end of last season, it was equaling their work after surmounting difficulties greater than any one among its rivals has yet had to face. The exceptionally large sale of season tickets this year is encouraging evidence that this city, despite what its detractors at home and abroad say, will support any first rate musical undertaking cordially.

Mr Monteux, who is the best program maker the Symphony ever had, promises a number of interesting novelties. We shall probably hear unfamiliar numbers by De Falla, Ravel, Rabaud, Stravinsky, Marcel Dupre, Davico, de Sabata, Casella, Prokoviev and others. D'Indy will conduct a pair of concerts. It is to be wished that Richard Strauss and Casella, who are to appear in other American cities as guest conductors, might act in that capacity here.

The list of soloists includes two exceptional violinist, new to Boston, Vecsey and Kochanski. The veteran pianist, Siloti, and the great Russian soprano, Nina Koshetz, are among other new comers.

Notable New Soloists

One regrets the absence of Elena Gerhardt, Julia Culp and Hulda Lashanska from the list. Marie Du Carp is a pianist whose claim to be heard with the Symphony is quite as good as that of either of the women pianists selected. But on the whole it is an attractive list.

GLOBE Oct. 9

NYIREGYHAZI AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

For the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 14 and 15, Pierre Monteux has compiled a programme of considerable interest. The first number will be the masterly "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven, which has not been heard at these concerts for two years. He will also conduct the prelude to the opera, "Hansel and Graetel" by Humperdinck, the German composer, who died a short while ago, and a series of dances selected from the opera, "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo" by Henri Rabaud, the former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. This opera has had conspicuous success as produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The first soloist of the season will appear at this pair of concerts—Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the highly talented Hungarian pianist of 19, who will, on this occasion, make his debut in Boston. Reports from his concerts in New York indicate a phenomenal technique and brilliancy and likewise an unusual artistic grasp of the music in hand. Mr. Nyiregyhazi is the talented pupil of his older compatriot, Ernst Dohnanyi, who will also be heard as soloist later in the season. Mr. Nyiregyhazi will play with the orchestra Liszt's famous concerto in A major.

POST - Oct. 9.

The Symphony Orchestra Regains Zest and Its Evening Concert Runs Accordingly—Strauss and Debussy Side by Side—The Tenor in New and Old Powers Finely and Fully Exercised—Rare Ancient Pieces and His Present Maturity

EVENING, above afternoon, is the time for concerts. After dark, as the way of artists and the way of audiences go, nervous tension runs higher, the mood is keener to give or to take pleasure. Concerts in the afternoon, established though they be in the music-making of America, are at bottom a concession to the feminine, the suburban public; while concerts in the evening presume that men also have ears for "the concord"—or the discord—"of sweet sounds"; that the "urban area," as "city-planners" sometimes say with a hint of condescension, may also contain interested eager folk. Wise and wary are the Muses, protectresses of the arts. Not yet has the "suburban home" quite engulfed them. So it was, perhaps, that the concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening went with more zest than did the concert of Friday afternoon. Each began a new series; at each the same conductor, the same band were busy with the same pieces. The audiences, however, were different. To many hearers the weekly concert of Friday is obviously a thing of custom; to as many more the weekly concert of Saturday is occasion for lively sensation and warm enjoyment. Hence, in measure, a differing mood, evident when not only Mr. Monteux but also the standing orchestra were heartily greeted; continuing until the final item of the programme, Strauss's tone-poem "Don Juan," was applauded as though there were neither motor nor train to heed.

Orchestra and conductor shared this animation; music and performance gained by it. The clear, shining tone of the violins, the rich tone of the violoncellos, were not only fact to the ear but impulse to pleasure. The beauty that the wind-choir achieved in many a measure hid the skill and pains accomplishing it. The mellowness of the brass was final complement to the pervading euphony or, if the composer so willed, to the pervading ardor. The new plasticity of the band matched a new plasticity in the conductor. It neared the blending of force and finesse, the union of beauty of tone and of manifold expressive power that were its ancient glories. On Friday it played with assiduous care; on Saturday with kindling zeal. On the one day, it took thought; on the other it ran free and full. From the stage to the auditorium and back again went the spirit that warms a concert.

Alike Mr. Monteux and the chosen composers profited by this quickening air. Faded and frayed are many measures in Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony." Some of them always were, many have since become, the commonplaces of music. Conductor and orchestra hid them under bright surface and graceful movement. They snatched from time two saving graces—charm in the middle divisions, sprightliness in the finale. Again, Mr. Monteux's lively instinct for pictorial music made Rimsky's 'Sadko" the scene that it is upon the theatre of the imagination. Not necessarily must a Russian ballet mime and dance it or Russian artist set in green waters and dresses of sea-shell and sea-plant. The miracle of Debussy, which is evanescent vision made precise musical image, renewed itself in the Nocturne of "Clouds"; while in the succeeding "Fetes," it was good to hear the conductor spare not in sonorities. More than mist and moonbeam is Debussy, though some who play him used not to have him so. Light, not haze, is the glamor of "Fêtes." And the sheer sensuous magnificence, the propulsive power of "Don Juan," as though it were written in a single blaze of creation, once more flamed out of the music. An overladen piece is the tone-poem. Strauss crowds into it more stuff of the imagination than music will bear. He lacks Debussy's sense of selection. He multiplies his musical means until the swirl of them more smothers than stimulates the ear. He misses Debussy's choice precision. Yet what characterizing power, what delineative force, what sumptuous means and march! To either composer his own glories and, most of all, to us listeners, a responsive mood to both.

TRANS. Oct. 10

Dances from Mr. Rabaud's Opera, "Marouf," at Symphony Hall Tomorrow—A Novel Piece by Casella at Hand—Mr Goodrich as Organist — Mr. Zimbalist's Programme

DURING the season of Mr. Rabaud's leadership of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, as conductor of French operas at the Metropolitan, was from time to time engaged in directing performances of his colleague's "Marouf, Cobbler of Cairo," and on at least one occasion the composer himself was in the audience. Now, as graceful tribute to his predecessor, and because the music is intrinsically attractive, he has placed a set of dances, a sort of incidental ballet from this same "Marouf," upon the programme of the Symphony Concerts this week. The score of these dances is no more than a copious excerpt lifted bodily from the opera, and certain cuts are necessary to give the music sufficient continuity when it is heard outside the theatre. The scene that it accompanies is one of Oriental pomp and festivity, embellished with comic incident Marouf, a poor cobbler, too frequently beaten by his virago of a wife, has fled by ship to Arabia, been wrecked and rescued, and now, posing as a man of wealth, he is about to marry the daughter of the Sultan The music opens with trills in the wood-wind, two trumpets proclaim a decisive theme of which much use is made later on, and when in the opera the Sheik-al-Islam has read the marriage contract, there begins a ballet designed for the entertainment of the assembled guests. The first dance, in the key of D minor, is in brisk three-quarter rhythm; the wood-wind, punctuated by the celesta, bears a theme of Eastern character over a recurring sixteenth note figure in the strings. The second dance in F-sharp minor, is more restrained; the melody is first heard in a piccolo and then taken up by a clarinet; later, following a reappearance of the opening passage, the initial dance is repeated. Appropriate music now marks the entrance, upon a balcony, of the Princess, with veiled face, and surrounded by her maids of honor. The dancers, Marouf, all the dignitaries of the court salute her. In this episode there are peculiar touches in the orchestration—among them arpeggios and harmonics for the violas against trills in the flutes, cymbals and celesta. While Marouf distributes gifts and gold to the guests, and to the crowd without the wall—the humbler ones scrambling in the dust for his largesse—there comes a final dance, beginning wildly and increasing in frenzy to the end. As an essay in exotic coloring from a modern composer all this music is strangely diatonic, gaining effect not so much through unusual chord and interval as by rhythmic life and ingenious, often fascinating instrumentation.

Programmes in Prospect

Two novel pieces stand upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week: a suite for orchestra by Casella drawn from his music to a "choreographicic comedy" by title "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," or "The Convent by the Water"; and an arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Chorde in B minor (No. 2) for organ alone. Casella, already known here by his Rhapsody, "Italia," and his version for orchestra of Balakierev's piano-piece, "Islamey," is one of the younger Italin composers, individual and innovating like most of them, but more susceptible than some of his fellows to Parisian influences. The suite dates from 1912; comprises A Children's "Round,' 'a Nocturne, a Final Dance, a Barcarolle, a Saraband, a movement "of Old Dadies"; and a Festival March; and was originally played by Mr. Monteux at hi concerts in Paris. Fragments of the suite have already been heard in the United States, as at Mr. Damrosch's concerts in New York last winter. Now in Boston and for the first times in America the whole music will come to performance. Mr. Wallace Goodrich, the notable organist who plays too seldom in public, made the arrangement of Franck's Chorale and will himself undulate the solo part. The symphony, at the beginning of the programme, is the third of Brahm's, in F major.

At the first of the concerts of the Syhphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week in Sanders Theatre, Mr. Nyiregyhazi, the pianist, will be the "assisting artist" in the following programme:

Symphony in A major, "Italian" . . . Mendelssohn
Tone-Picture, "Sadko Under the Seas," Rimsky-Korsakow
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major . . . . Liszt
Dances from the Opera, "Marouf" . . . . Rabaud

TRANS. Oct. 1

TIGHT BINDING

ung Pianist Symphony Star

There is an especial interest in the Symphony concerts tomorrow and Saturday, as they will bring the first soloist of the season, a pianist hitherto unheard in Boston.

Erwin Nyiregyhazi

Erwin Nyiregyhazi (pronounced 'Near-reg-hazy') is a youth of nineteen and a native of Hungary, the land of Liszt. He is the star pupil of Erno Dohnanyi, the composer, conductor and pianist, who also is to be heard as a Symphony soloist later in the season. Nyiregyhazi's debut in New York last spring established him as the most important new pianist of the season. His first success was repeated at his recital in the same city last week.

ADVT-Oct 13

ASTOUNDS SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

Nyiregyhazi a Master of Piano at 18 Years

BY OLIN DOWNES

Genius is wisdom and youth. This is said by Edgar Lee Masters, and it was proved again at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. On that occasion the 18-year-old Hungarian pianist, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, made his Boston debut. He played Liszt's A major concerto like a poet and a whirlwind. He was very much of a surprise, for this concerto is not child's play, and those who looked for the first time on a young man, mostly arms and legs, with fingers so long that they made his sleeves seem too short and gave the effect of two fans when he spread his hands over the keyboard—those who looked on this shook their heads, and wondered where in the world he was going to get the tone to compete with Liszt's extremely brilliant and frequently heavy and noisy orchestration.

AN ARTIST OF HIGH CLASS

Mr. Nyiregyhazi (pronounced as spelled!) had not only physical resources to play the concerto, but he had something rarer: as beautiful a singing tone, as noble and poetic a concept of the passages which demanded such treatment as any pianist the writer ever heard. There are players who observe subtle shades of color but who lack breadth. Players who take pride in their "breadth" and "musicianship", as they are pleased to call the results of much routine, often seem to forget that music is a thing of beauty as well as structure. Mr. Nyiregyhazi combined in his performance all the many qualities of head, hand and heart essential to the performance of a work which remains today extremely original, but for certain reasons difficult to make clear to an audience.

His rhythm, however capricious the rhythmic changes might seem, was never at fault. The orchestra tested it, and Mr. Monteux exulted in it. His understanding of the structure of the rhapsodic virtuoso piece was so sympathetic and so clear that it had an unprecedented unity of effect. His technic is unnecessary to discuss. He has an apparently unlimited supply of it. The crowning fact was an interpretation all poetry, imagination, fire-youth.

His Triumph Complete

The story goes that Mr. Nyiregyhazi, who is not only today a phenomenal performer, but also a composer, was in dire want, like so many of his countrymen in this post-war period, when arrangements were made for his tour. But he had already an enviable reputation in his vicinity in Europa. He still carries himself with a stiffness and a self-concious dignity which were amusing until people forgot their amusement in the sheer thrill and glamour of his playing.

Perhaps Mr. Nyireghazi was fortunate in choosing the one concerto he plays better than any others, perhaps the occasion of the moment inspired him. It is not easy to believe that at his age he can be so complete an artist as he appeared yesterday. If he is anything like it, all virtuosi before the public will [illegible] to look [illegible] their [illegible]. Mr. Nyireghazi is a musician as well as a man to excite an audience; his art is not only tempermental, it is reflective. Above all he has the white heat of sincerity and conviction and faith, which heaven grant he may not soon lose. His triumph yesterday was complete. The audience continued to applaud and recall him for minutes after he had finished.

"Hansel and Gretel"

The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; the prelude to Humperdink's "Hansel and Gretel," and dances from Henri Rabaud's opera, "Marouf," performed two winters ago in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House. Humperdinck has recently passed away, but the music of "Hansel and Gretel" will live a long time after him. It will live in spite of the swollen, Wagnerian orchestration, in spite of a certain homeliness and a quality almost bourgeois. For it is music woven of fairy tales, for happy, apple-cheeked children. It was handsome of Mr. Monteux, and it was a delightful musical feature of his programme—this memorial to an artist departed.

Beethoven's Third

The performance of Beethoven's symphony was conscientious and musicianly, and the music of the symphony itself, as ever, made a profound impression. What is greater? Very little, even in Beethoven. Very little, in spite of a small percentage of variations which could be dispensed with in the finale. The step Beethoven took between his second and his third, or "Eroica" symphony, is surely one of the most impressive in music. That other works came between does not wholly explain the transition. A symphony is a symphony. To excel one symphony you must write another, and from the second to the third symphony in the art of Beethoven is from the boy to the man, from the force and glow of youth to the spirituality of a [illegible] age.

Mr. Rabaud's dances are faithful reproductions with masterly instrumentation and the most expert technique, of oriental sounds. It is music for a ballet scene in the opera. The music needs the ballet. Well made, brilliant as it is, it becomes thin and rather tiresome before the end, lacking the color and the evolutions of the dancers.

POST, Oct. 15

YOUNG STAR AS SYMPHONY HERO

By E. F. HARKINS

An 18-year-old Hungarian, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, is the bright, paramount star of this week's Symphony concerts. Few soloists so young as he have been privileged to appear with Boston's famous orchestra, and few soloists of any age, in the last years, have appeared with such brilliant success.

ERWIN NYIREGYHAZI

This tall, slim, pale, dignified youth is an extraordinary pianist and fitly enough he made his Boston debut yesterday in a performance of a concerto by Hungary's immortal pianist and composer, Franz Liszt—the concerto in A major, No. 2. One of Liszt's happiest, most brilliant and most characteristic compositions, the performance yesterday was positively Lisztian in mood and execution. Orchestra and soloist were both on their mettle, but the ovation at the end went to the slim boy with the wan and diffident smile. It was a tribute he will never forget.

The orchestra itself, and its popular leader, Mr. Monteux, enjoyed the first ovation of the afternoon following the fine performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. The interpretation was sympathetic, polished even, but it missed some of the thrills Beethoven wrote into this monumental work.

The prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"—music altogether worthy of one of the most delightful fairy tales—was played in memory of the composer, Engelbert Humperdinck, who died a few weeks ago. The music recalled the triumphs here of Schumann-Heink and Weingartner in a performance probably unequalled in this country. Dance music from "Marouf," an Oriental opera written by Henri Rabaud, former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, was heard here for the first time. It was piquant, but the nautch girls would have made it much more interesting. The same program will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-Oct 15.

3D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, which has not been played here by the Boston Symphony for some time, will be heard at the third pair of symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 21 and 22. Pierre Monteux will also give his first performance at these concerts an arrangement for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich, the noted Boston musician, of Cesar Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor, in which Mr. Goodrich will play the organ part. A notable new work which will on this occasion have its first appearance in Boston is a suite from "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" ("The Convent on the Water") by Alfredo Casella, the highly talented member of the young and daring school of symphonic composers in Italy. Casella, who is shortly to visit America, has dedicated this score to Pierre Monteux. The movements follow: (a) Ronde d'Enfant; (b) Nocturne; Danse Finale; (c) Barcarolle; Sarabande; (d) Pas des Vieilles Dames; (e) Marche de Fete.

HUNGARIAN PIANIST AT SYMPHONY

Nyiregyhazi Makes Fine Impression by His Playing of Liszt's No. 2 Concerto

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the Hungarian pianist, made his Boston debut yesterday at the Symphony concert. This extraordinary man has long been famed in Europe for his prodigious technique. He selected the Liszt concerto in A major, No. 2, for the piano and orchestra, a work of great difficulty, composed by a master pianist who piled up problems with the greatest glee.

Nyiregyhazi is a fantastic-looking person, but there has been no mistake about his skill. His long arms have enormous power. He goes crashing and smashing through a concerto in a way to astound one. His brilliancy is enormous. If he lacks anything it couldn't be discerned at a first hearing.

For the rest the program was light and agreeable. Beethoven's third symphony, Humperdinck's prelude to "Hansel und Gretel" and finally Rabaud's dances from "Marouf," an opera performed at the Metropolitan some seasons ago. Rabaud was our Boston conductor for a season just after Muck went out. The music is agreeable but not remarkable in any way.

AMER Oct 15

SYMPHONY GIVES SECOND CONCERT

Program Under Monteux Contains Beethoven's "Eroica"

PERFORMANCE IS MOVING ONE

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, "Eroica" symphony; Humperdinck, Prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"; Liszt, Piano Concerto No. 2, A major (Mr. Nyiregyhazi, pianist); Rabaud, dances from "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo."

The performance of the symphony was an intensely moving one. Not by reason of any superficiality or superfluity of emotion, extravagance in the interpretation for the purpose of putting the conductor above the composer, or any surprising reading of the text. No. The performance was a revelation of the inherent nobility of the music. Never before in Symphony Hall was this nobility so apparent.

We have all heard many performances of this symphony; we all have been tempted at times to complain of its length, of "over-development" in the first movement; to find the Funeral March long spun out; the Scherzo incongruous; the Finale a singular ending for a heroic work. Yesterday the symphony did not encourage cavillers or even questioners. No one asked why it bore the title "Heroic."

It is interesting to note the differance in the expression of heroism between this symphony and Strauss's "Heldenleben." To be sure Beethoven had Bonaparte at first in mind, while in "Heldenleben," the hero is—Richard Strauss, defying his enemies, rejoicing vaingloriously in his immortality as a composer. It is not necessary to accept the theories of Bethoven's commentators. The excellent Neitzel finds that in the second theme of the first movement, "the hero having for the first time exerted his force, turns about to look at the path he has trod." Wagner sees Man, not merely a triumphant soldier, the hero. Schindler believes the symphony to be the celebration of the French revolution. And so on, and so on. It is enough that the structure and the spirit of the symphony are heroic, that there is the grand gesture, that even in the mighty lamentation there is no whine of pessimism, no luxury of woe.

Humperdinck is dead and all his works, with the exception of "Haensel and Gretel," will follow him. The prelude to this opera brought up pleasant memories of the Boston Opera House. While the music was playing one thought of Mmes. Mattfelt and Alten, of Mmes. Swartz and Fisher as the children. One remembered the delightful scenes, the witch's flight in the air, and forgot the swollen, bombastic pages, so out-of-keeping in a simple tale. For Humperdinck, as Goldsmith said Dr. Johnson would, too often made little fishes talk like whales.

Mr. Nyiregyhazi played here for the first time. He is in his 19th year. The ringmaster used to say of the dashing equestrienne in the circus: "She rides well for one so young." This compliment is often paid a young pianist, but with this addition. "When he is older, he will play with greater thoughtfulness," or his performance is said to be not yet "mature." Youth is not an atrocious crime. Better the dash and the enthusiasm of the young, than the apathy of middle age, or the coolness of academic reserve. Mr. Nyireghyazi played Liszts' Second Concerto, and Liszt once remarked that youth is the time for a virtuoso display. The concerto is above all a virtuoso piece and it should be played as such. First of all brilliance is demanded in the performance. Yesterday the performance was appropriately brilliant and audacious. If there was at times circus pomp, it was in the music itself. The concerto is not one that calls for under statement, a sounding of emotional depths, or a display of intellectuality in analysis and dissection. We have heard certain "intellectual" pianists in the course of the last 40 years; they were indescribably boresome; to be heard only once, and that by accident. Mr. Nyireghyazi, whose modesty was almost painful, who came upon the stage and left it as a well-mannered lad, speaking a piece at a school exhibition, was recalled many times, and deservedly.

Rabaud's ballet music, played here for the first time, evidently needs the stage-setting, the costumes, and the dancing girls. As concert music, it is rather monotonous, chiefly interesting by occasional inventions in orchestration. No doubt in the opera it makes its effect as a part of the whole scene. Perhaps it is melodically oriental, but it does not bring the east before one as Felicien David does in "The Desert" or Carl Goldmark in his Prelude to "The Queen of Sheba," and in other pages of that gorgeously sensuous opera, not to mention music by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Balakireff.

The concert will be repeated tonight, the program of the concerts next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony, No 3, F major; Franck-Goodrich, Organ Chorale No. 2 arranged for orchestra and organ; (first time at these concerts); Casella, Excerpts from "The Convent on the Water" (first time in Boston).

HERALD-Oct. 15

NYIREGHYAZI PLAYS WITH THE SYMPHONY

Young Hungarian Pianist a Mature Artist

Dance Music From Rabaud's Opera, "Marouf," a Novelty Here

The feature of yesterday's Symphony concert was the first appearance in Boston of Erwin Nyireghyazi, who gave a remarkably fine performance of Liszt's Piano Concerto in A major. Nyireghyazi is a Hungarian boy of 19, a pupil of Dohnanyi, much praised in New York last season. He is no mere wonder-child, but a master of the technique of his instrument, a mature, highly imaginative artist with a touch of creative genius in him.

Yesterday he was obviously painfully ill at ease before an audience, till he began to play and was able to forget that he was overheard. He was recalled five times, an unusual number for an artist unknown here. But he plainly cared more for the music, whose somewhat boisterous romanticism he seemed to love, than for the applause. He is a pianist for whom it seems safe to predict an unusually brilliant future.

The other novelty was the first performance here of some dance music from Rabaud's very successful opera "Marouf." Mr Monteux, who conducted the performances at the Metropolitan, gave a brilliant reading of his predecessor's work, which the audience thoroughly enjoyed. It is highly colored, highly spiced oriental material, treated with great skill and delicacy by a composer of no mean imaginative power.

The Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel" was given a sonorous, impressive performance in memory of Humperdinck, who has just died at his German home. It is a curious blend of Wagner and German folk song, not quite dainty enough to make ideal music for a fairy tale opera.

The "Eroica" Symphony, the only classic on the program, dwarfed all the other numbers, as the better work of Beethoven and Wagner invariably does. The performance, though lacking here and there in absolute precision of ensemble, conveyed the spirit of the work. The weakest point in Mr Monteux's conception of the music is the Funeral March, part of which he made dreamy in rhythm, instead of majestic. The scherzo at his hand was more effective than usual.

Next week Brahms' Third Symphony, a new Suite by Casella, and Mr Goodrich's arrangement for orchestra and organ of Franck's B minor Chorale comprise the program.

GLOBE-Oct. 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NYIREGYHAZI; ALSO LISZT AND BEETHOVEN

A Youthful Pianist, Yet Singularly Mature in a Concerto Both Glittering and Melancholy—Rabaud for Boredom and Humperdinck for Pleasure—The "Eroica Symphony" to Crown the Whole and Mr. Monteux Memorable

THE audience, after its manner, left Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon prattling about Mr. Nyiregyhazi. It had listened to him rapturously through Liszt's Concerto in A major; it had recalled him time after time, which is not its usual way with little-known pianists; but now, with comical mistrust of its own pleasure, it was asking all and sundry presumed to have expert knowledge of piano-playing: "What do you think of the boy?" Of course in the American vernacular of admiration, every one at once becomes a "boy," just as every play, concert or opera was, is and ever shall be a "show." In fact, moreover, the programme-book recorded Mr. Nyiregyhazi as born in 1903 and therefore in his nineteenth year. Yet in another sort of fact, he is not at all a "boy"; probably never was in qualities of the concert-room. There he looks any age below the middle thirties; suggests one who was born, as it were, mature; is certainly so in many an attribute of a pianist. He plays, for example, no heed to his audience, except as courtesy bids him acknowledge its plaudits. "At the piano," as the programmes say, he gives, furthermore, no hint of personal display, discloses not a trace of manner. Rather he is all for the music in hand, for the ends he would accomplish in it, for the means by which he would bring them to pass.

These means seemed yesterday the means of maturity. Liszt's Concerto in A major exacts much technically in the solo-part. Few are the feats of virtuosity that the composer (who was also pianist) has not set in the music after it squares away—Allegro Deciso—into the long Finale of mingled contrivance, juggling and rhapsody. Mr. Nyiregyhazi neither toiled over them nor flaunted them. He knew how with them as by the second nature in the pianist born; he also perceived them either as embroidery upon the changeful fabric of the Concerto or as jets of the rhapsodic spirit, pervading it. He did not polish them over-much as tonal jewelry; he did not make the barely perceptible pauses for proclamation that over-emphasize them. So played they fell into place alike in the music and in the pianist's armory. Mr. Nyiregyhazi plies, moreover, the weapons of the technician who is also musician. The line of the Concerto is fitful as becomes so rhapsodic a piece; yet he—and Mr. Monteux with him—kept it clear and flowing. The rhythm shifts again and again—further task fulfilled by pianist and conductor with an elasticity that seemed (as Liszt would have it) rather impulse than prescription.

Now and then, too, Mr. Nyiregyhazi—and Mr. Monteux with him—modified pace or rhythm at the prompting of his own instinct, and the listener caught in him flashes of heightening warming imagination. He answers as well to melody—to that haunting wailing melody, surely born of twilight on Hungarian plain, that however disguised, however transformed, returns to subdue rhapsody into melancholy. Mr. Nyiregyhazi understood its place in the Concerto; by pace and rhythm gave it character and illusion; in the quality of his tone let imagination play over it. On the surface, the music often glitters with the garniture of rhapsody; below—and sometimes above—recurs this persisting melancholy. Therein is the spirit and the truth of a poem in tones, virtuoso-piece though the despiteful may call it. Mr. Nyiregyhazi caught and conveyed this voice, this quality. Now all these seem the works of a pianist more mature than youthful in imagination and reflection; a pianist poised and measuring in all that he undertakes, yet warm to his music with responsive and communicating ardor. By these tokens Mr. Nyiregyhazi is no "boy." Rather, to return once more to the vernacular, he is "a wise youth."

The middle pieces of the concert—not in order of the programme but in quality and degree came and went—one with interest, the other with boredom. The bore was the dance-music from Mr. Rabaud's light opera of "Marouf, Cobbler of Cairo," in mild vogue through seven years in Paris, heard also passingly at the Metropolitan in New York. It re-tells Scheherazade's tale of the high-humored cobbler wedded to a nagging wife, of his flight with seamen, of his feigning in another place to be a rich merchant awaiting a treasure-laden caravan. So did the Sultan's daughter become his bride; so did he keep becoming state; so at last did the kindly powers of genie or the like aid and consummate his deception. A tale of pungent flavors with morals of gods and men, wives and husbands, worthy to be pondered to this day, set, besides, to music in which Mr. Rabaud is conscientiously light, thoughtfully oriental; regardful of new means and old, appropriate to such ends; sedulous in refinements of workmanship—the Arabian Nights as it were in the dry light of dryer tones, Scheherazade not exactly at ease in a dutiful composer's study. In his days at the Metropolitan, Mr. Monteux prepared "Marouf" for the stage, often conducted in it. Familiarly, the setting, the action, accompanying these dances and in measure lending character to them, rose before his eyes. In his memory ran other necessary backgrounds.

Listeners yesterday were in different case. Few, probably had heard and seen "Marouf," fewer still, so pleasured, recalled these dances in the theatre; for the opera is hardly one that memory treasures. For once the programme-book was no better in descriptive imagination than the rest of us. The outcome was, say, fifteen minutes of boredom, relieved only by Mr. Rabaud's ingenuities of workmanship take thought to follow the bes

TIGHT BINDING

Young Pianist Symphony Star

There is an especial interest in the Symphony concerts tomorrow and Saturday, as they will bring as the first soloist of the season, a pianist hitherto unheard in Boston.

Erwin Nyiregyhazi

Erwin Nyiregyhazi (pronounced 'Near-rej-hazy') is a youth of nineteen and a native of Hungary, the land of Liszt. He is the star pupil of Erno Dohnanyi, the composer, conductor and pianist, who also is to be heard as a Symphony soloist later in the season. Nyiregyhazi's debut in New York last spring established him as the most important new pianist of the season. His first success was repeated at his recital in the same city last week.

ADV[illegible] 15

ASTOUNDS SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

Nyiregyhazi a Master of Piano at 18 Years

BY OLIN DOWNES

Genius is wisdom and youth. This is said by Edgar Lee Masters, and it was proved again at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. On that occasion the 18-year-old Hungarian pianist, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, made his Boston debut. He played Liszt's A major concerto like a poet and a whirlwind. He was very much of a surprise, for this concerto is not child's play, and those who looked for the first time on a young man, mostly arms and legs, with fingers so long that they made his sleeves seem too short and gave the effect of two fans when he spread his hands over the keyboard—those who looked on this shook their heads, and wondered where in the world he was going to get the tone to compete with Liszt's extremely brilliant and frequently heavy and noisy orchestration.

AN ARTIST OF HIGH CLASS

Mr. Nyiregyhazi (pronounced as spelled!) had not only physical resources to play the concerto, but he had something rarer: as beautiful a singing tone, as noble and poetic a concept of the passages which demanded such treatment as any pianist the writer ever heard. There are players who observe subtle shades of color but who lack breadth. Players who take pride in their "breadth" and "musicianship", as they are pleased to call the results of much routine, often seem to forget that music is a thing of beauty as well as structure. Mr. Nyiregyhazi combined in his performance all the many qualities of head, hand and heart essential to the performance of a work which remains today extremely original, but for certain reasons difficult to make clear to an audience.

His rhythm, however capricious the rhythmic changes might seem, was never at fault. The orchestra rested on it, and Mr. Monteux exulted in it. His understanding of the structure of this rhapsodic virtuoso piece was so sympathetic and so clear that it had an unprecedented unity of effect. His technic is unnecessary to discuss. He has an apparently unlimited supply of it. The crowning fact was an interpretation all poetry, imagination, fire, youth.

His Triumph Complete

The story goes that Mr. Nyiregyhazi, who is not only today a phenomenal performer, but also a composer, was in dire want, like so many of his countrymen in this post-war period, when arrangements were made for his tour. But he had already an enviable reputation in his vicinity in Europe. He still carries himself with a stiffness and a self-concious dignity which were amusing until people forgot their amusement in the sheer thrill and glamour of his playing.

Perhaps Mr. Nyireghazi was fortunate in choosing the one concerto he plays better than any others, perhaps the tension of the moment inspired him. It is not easy to believe that at his age he can be so complete an artist as he appeared yesterday. If he is anything like that, all virtuosi before the public will have to look to their laurels. Mr. Nyireghazi is a musician as well as a man to excite an audience; his art is not only tempermental, it is reflective. Above all he has the white heat of sincerity and conviction and faith, which heaven grant he may not soon lose. His triumph yesterday was complete. The audience continued to applaud and recall him for minutes after he had finished.

"Hansel and Gretel"

The orchestral numbers were Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; the prelude to Humperdink's "Hansel and Gretel," and dances from Henri Rabaud's opera, "Marouf," performed two winters ago in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House. Humperdinck has recently passed away, but the music of "Hansel and Gretel" will live a long time after him. It will live in spite of the swollen, Wagnerian orchestration, in spite of a certain homeliness and a quality almost bourgeois. For it is music woven of fairy tales, for happy, apple-cheeked children. It was handsome of Mr. Monteux, and it was a delightful musical feature of his programme—this memorial to an artist departed.

Beethoven's Third

The performance of Beethoven's symphony was conscientious and musicianly, and the music of the symphony itself, as ever, made a profound impression. What is greater? Very little, even in Beethoven. Very little, in spite of a small percentage of variations which could be dispensed with in the finale. The step Beethoven took between his second and his third, or "Eroica" symphony, is surely one of the most impressive in music. That other works came between does not wholly explain the transition. A symphony is a symphony. To excel one symphony you must write another, and from the second to the third symphony in the art of Beethoven is from the boy to the man, from the force and glow of youth to the spirituality of a [illegible] age.

Mr. Rabaud's dances are faithful reproductions with masterly instrumentation and the most expert technique, of oriental sounds. It is music for a ballet scene in the opera. The music needs the ballet. Well made, brilliant as it is, it becomes thin and rather tiresome before the end, lacking the color and the evolutions of the dancers.

POST. Oct. 15.

YOUNG STAR AS SYMPHONY HERO

By E. F. HARKINS

An 18-year-old Hungarian, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, is the bright, paramount star of this week's Symphony concerts. Few soloists so young as he have been privileged to appear with Boston's famous orchestra, and few soloists of any age, in the last years, have appeared with such brilliant success.

ERWIN NYIREGYHAZI

This tall, slim, pale, dignified youth is an extraordinary pianist and fitly enough he made his Boston debut yesterday in a performance of a concerto by Hungary's immortal pianist and composer, Franz Liszt—the concerto in A major, No. 2. One of Liszt's happiest, most brilliant and most characteristic compositions, the performance yesterday was positively Lisztian in mood and execution. Orchestra and soloist were both on their mettle, but the ovation at the end went to the slim boy with the wan and diffident smile. It was a tribute he will never forget.

The orchestra itself, and its popular leader, Mr. Monteux, enjoyed the first ovation of the afternoon following the fine performance of Beethoven's "Heroic" symphony. The interpretation was sympathetic, polished even, but it missed some of the thrills Beethoven wrote into this monumental work.

The prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"—music altogether worthy of one of the most delightful fairy tales—was played in memory of the composer, Engelbert Humperdinck, who died a few weeks ago. The music recalled the triumphs here of Schumann-Heink and Weingartner in a performance probably unequalled in this country. Dance music from "Marouf," an Oriental opera written by Henri Rabaud, former conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, was heard here for the first time. It was piquant, but the nautch girls would have made it much more interesting. The same program will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR - Oct 15.

[12]

3D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, which has not been played here by the Boston Symphony for some time, will be heard at the third pair of symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 21 and 22. Pierre Monteux will also give his first performance at these concerts an arrangement for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich, the noted Boston musician, of Cesar Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor, in which Mr. Goodrich will play the organ part. A notable new work which will on this occasion have its first appearance in Boston is a suite from "Le Couvent sur l'Eau" ("The Convent on the Water") by Alfredo Casella, the highly talented member of the young and daring school of symphonic composers in Italy. Casella, who is shortly to visit America, has dedicated this score to Pierre Monteux. The movements follow: (a) Ronde d'Enfant; (b) Nocturne; Danse Finale; (c) Barcarolle; Sarabande; (d) Pas des Vieilles Dames; (e) Marche de Fete.

HUNGARIAN PIANIST AT SYMPHONY

Nyiregyhazi Makes Fine Impression by His Playing of Liszt's No. 2 Concerto

Erwin Nyiregyhazi, the Hungarian pianist, made his Boston debut yesterday at the Symphony concert. This extraordinary man has long been famed in Europe for his prodigious technique. He selected the Liszt concerto in A major, No. 2, for the piano and orchestra, a work of great difficulty, composed by a master pianist who piled up problems with the greatest glee.

Nyiregyhazi is a fantastic-looking person, but there has been no mistake about his skill. His long arms have enormous power. He goes crashing and smashing through a concerto in a way to astound one. His brilliancy is enormous. If he lacks anything it couldn't be discerned at a first hearing.

For the rest the program was light and agreeable. Beethoven's third symphony, Humperdinck's prelude to "Hansel und Gretel" and finally Rabaud's dances from "Marouf," an opera performed at the Metropolitan some seasons ago. Rabaud was our Boston conductor for a season just after Muck went out. The music is agreeable but not remarkable in any way.

AMER. Oct. 15

SYMPHONY GIVES SECOND CONCERT

Program Under Monteux Contains Beethoven's "Eroica"

PERFORMANCE IS MOVING ONE

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, "Eroica" symphony; Humperdinck, Prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"; Liszt, Piano Concerto No. 2, A major (Mr. Nyiregyhazi, pianist); Rabaud, dances from "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo."

The performance of the symphony was an intensely moving one. Not by reason of any superficiality or superfluity of emotion, extravagance in the interpretation for the purpose of putting the conductor above the composer, or any surprising reading of the text. No. The performance was a revelation of the inherent nobility of the music. Never before in Symphony Hall was this nobility so apparent.

We have all heard many performances of this symphony; we all have been tempted at times to complain of its length, of "over-development" in the first movement; to find the Funeral March long spun out; the Scherzo incongruous; the Finale a singular ending for a heroic work. Yesterday the symphony did not encourage cavillers or even questioners. No one asked why it bore the title "Heroic."

It is interesting to note the differance in the expression of heroism between this symphony and Strauss's "Heldenleben." To be sure Beethoven had Bonaparte at first in mind, while in "Heldenleben," the hero is—Richard Strauss, defying his enemies, rejoicing vaingloriously in his immortality as a composer. It is not necessary to accept the theories of Bethoven's commentators. The excellent Neitzel finds that in the second theme of the first movement, "the hero having for the first time exerted his force, turns about to look at the path he has trod." Wagner sees Man, not merely a triumphant soldier, the hero. Schindler believes the symphony to be the celebration of the French revolution. And so on, and so on. It is enough that the structure and the spirit of the symphony are heroic, that there is the grand gesture, that even in the mighty lamentation there is no whine of pessimism, no luxury of woe.

Humperdinck is dead and all his works, with the exception of "Haensel and Gretel," will follow him. The prelude to this opera brought up pleasant memories of the Boston Opera House. While the music was playing one thought of Mmes. Mattfelt and Alten, of Mmes. Swartz and Fisher as the children. One remembered the delightful scenes, the witch's flight in the air, and forgot the swollen, bombastic pages, so out-of-keeping in a simple tale. For Humperdinck, as Goldsmith said Dr. Johnson would, too often made little fishes talk like whales.

Mr. Nyiregyhazi played here for the first time. He is in his 19th year. The ringmaster used to say of the dashing equestrienne in the circus: "She rides well for one so young." This compliment is often paid a young pianist, but with this addition. "When he is older, he will play with greater thoughtfulness," or his performance is said to be not yet "mature." Youth is not an atrocious crime. Better the dash and the enthusiasm of the young, than the apathy of middle age, or the coolness of academic reserve. Mr. Nyireghyazi played Liszts' Second Concerto, and Liszt once remarked that youth is the time for a virtuoso display. The concerto is above all a virtuoso piece and it should be played as such. First of all brilliance is demanded in the performance. Yesterday the performance was appropriately brilliant and audacious. If there was at times circus pomp, it was in the music itself. The concerto is not one that calls for under statement, a sounding of emotional depths, or a display of intellectuality in analysis and dissection. We have heard certain "intellectual" pianists in the course of the last 40 years; they were indescribably boresome; to be heard only once, and that by accident. Mr. Nyireghyazi, whose modesty was almost painful, who came upon the stage and left it as a well-mannered lad, speaking a piece at a school exhibition, was recalled many times, and deservedly.

Rabaud's ballet music, played here for the first time, evidently needs the stage-setting, the costumes, and the dancing girls. As concert music, it is rather monotonous, chiefly interesting by occasional inventions in orchestration. No doubt in the opera it makes its effect as a part of the whole scene. Perhaps it is melodically oriental, but it does not bring the east before one as Felicien David does in "The Desert" or Carl Goldmark in his Prelude to "The Queen of Sheba," and in other pages of that gorgeously sensuous opera, not to mention music by Rimsky-Korsakoff and Balakireff.

The concert will be repeated tonight, the program of the concerts next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony, No 3, F major; Franck-Goodrich, Organ Chorale No. 2 arranged for orchestra and organ; (first time at these concerts); Casella, Excerpts from "The Convent on the Water" (first time in Boston).

HERALD - Oct. 15

NYIREGHYAZI PLAYS WITH THE SYMPHONY

Young Hungarian Pianist a Mature Artist

Dance Music From Rabaud's Opera, "Marouf," a Novelty Here

The feature of yesterday's Symphony concert was the first appearance in Boston of Erwin Nyireghyazi, who gave a remarkably fine performance of Liszt's Piano Concerto in A major. Nyireghyazi is a Hungarian boy of 19, a pupil of Dohnanyi, much praised in New York last season. He is no mere wonder-child, but a master of the technique of his instrument, a mature, highly imaginative artist with a touch of creative genius in him.

Yesterday he was obviously painfully ill at ease before an audience, till he began to play and was able to forget that he was overheard. He was recalled five times, an unusual number for an artist unknown here. But he plainly cared more for the music, whose somewhat boisterous romanticism he seemed to love, than for the applause. He is a pianist for whom it seems safe to predict an unusually brilliant future.

The other novelty was the first performance here of some dance music from Rabaud's very successful opera "Marouf." Mr Monteux, who conducted the performances at the Metropolitan, gave a brilliant reading of his predecessor's work, which the audience thoroughly enjoyed. It is highly colored, highly spiced oriental material, treated with great skill and delicacy by a composer of no mean imaginative power.

The Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel" was given a sonorous, impressive performance in memory of Humperdinck, who has just died at his German home. It is a curious blend of Wagner and German folk song, not quite dainty enough to make ideal music for a fairy tale opera.

The "Eroica" Symphony, the only classic on the program, dwarfed all the other numbers, as the better work of Beethoven and Wagner invariably does. The performance, though lacking here and there in absolute precision of ensemble, conveyed the spirit of the work. The weakest point in Mr Monteux's conception of the music is the Funeral March, part of which he made dreamy in rhythm, instead of majestic. The scherzo at his hand was more effective than usual.

Next week Brahms' Third Symphony, a new Suite by Casella, and Mr Goodrich's arrangement for orchestra and organ of Franck's B minor Chorale comprise the program.

GLOBE - Oct. 15

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NYIREGYHAZI; ALSO LISZT AND BEETHOVEN

A Youthful Pianist, Yet Singularly Mature in a Concerto Both Glittering and Melancholy—Rabaud for Boredom and Humperdinck for Pleasure—The "Eroica Symphony" to Crown the Whole and Mr. Monteux Memorable

THE audience, after its manner, left Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon prattling about Mr. Nyiregyhazi. It had listened to him rapturously through Liszt's Concerto in A major; it had recalled him time after time, which is not its usual way with little-known pianists; but now, with comical mistrust of its own pleasure, it was asking all and sundry presumed to have expert knowledge of piano-playing: "What do you think of the boy?" Of course in the American vernacular of admiration, every one at once becomes a "boy," just as every play, concert or opera was, is and ever shall be a "show." In fact, moreover, the programme-book recorded Mr. Nyiregyhazi as born in 1903 and therefore in his nineteenth year. Yet in another sort of fact, he is not at all a "boy"; probably never was in qualities of the concert-room. There he looks any age below the middle thirties; suggests one who was born, as it were, mature; is certainly so in many an attribute of a pianist. He plays, for example, no heed to his audience, except as courtesy bids him acknowledge its plaudits. "At the piano," as the programmes say, he gives, furthermore, no hint of personal display, discloses not a trace of manner. Rather he is all for the music in hand, for the ends he would accomplish in it, for the means by which he would bring them to pass.

These means seemed yesterday the means of maturity. Liszt's Concerto in A major exacts much technically in the solo-part. Few are the feats of virtuosity that the composer (who was also pianist) has not set in the music after it squares away—Allegro Deciso—into the long Finale of mingled contrivance, juggling and rhapsody. Mr. Nyiregyhazi neither toiled over them nor flaunted them. He knew how with them as by the second nature in the pianist born; he also perceived them either as embroidery upon the changeful fabric of the Concerto or as jets of the rhapsodic spirit, pervading it. He did not polish them over-much as tonal jewelry; he did not make the barely perceptible pauses for proclamation that over-emphasize them. So played they fell into place alike in the music and in the pianist's armory. Mr. Nyiregyhazi plies, moreover, the weapons of the technician who is also musician. The line of the Concerto is fitful as becomes so rhapsodic a piece; yet he—and Mr. Monteux with him—kept it clear and flowing. The rhythm shifts again and again—further task fulfilled by pianist and conductor with an elasticity that seemed (as Liszt would have it) rather impulse than prescription.

Now and then, too, Mr. Nyiregyhazi—and Mr. Monteux with him—modified pace or rhythm at the prompting of his own instinct, and the listener caught in him flashes of heightening warming imagination. He answers as well to melody—to that haunting wailing melody, surely born of twilight on Hungarian plain, that however disguised, however transformed, returns to subdue rhapsody into melancholy. Mr. Nyiregyhazi understood its place in the Concerto; by pace and rhythm gave it character and illusion; in the quality of his tone let imagination play over it. On the surface, the music often glitters with the garniture of rhapsody; below—and sometimes above—recurs this persisting melancholy. Therein is the spirit and the truth of a poem in tones, virtuoso-piece though the despiteful may call it. Mr. Nyiregyhazi caught and conveyed this voice, this quality. Now all these seem the works of a pianist more mature than youthful in imagination and reflection; a pianist poised and measuring in all that he undertakes, yet warm to his music with responsive and communicating ardor. By these tokens Mr. Nyiregyhazi is no "boy." Rather, to return once more to the vernacular, he is "a wise youth."

The middle pieces of the concert—not in order of the programme but in quality and degree came and went—one with interest, the other with boredom. The bore was the dance-music from Mr. Rabaud's light opera of "Mârouf, Cobbler of Cairo," in mild vogue through seven years in Paris, heard also passingly at the Metropolitan in New York. It re-tells Scheherazade's tale of the high-humored cobbler wedded to a nagging wife, of his flight with seamen, of his feigning in another place to be a rich merchant awaiting a treasure-laden caravan. So did the Sultan's daughter become his bride; so did he keep becoming state; so at last did the kindly powers of genie or the like aid and consummate his deception. A tale of pungent flavors with morals of gods and men, wives and husbands, worthy to be pondered to this day, set, besides, to music in which Mr. Rabaud is conscientiously light, thoughtfully oriental; regardful of new means and old, appropriate to such ends; sedulous in refinements of workmanship—the Arabian Nights as it were in the dry light of dryer tones, Scheherazade not exactly at ease in a dutiful composer's study. In his days at the Metropolitan, Mr. Monteux prepared "Mârouf" for the stage, often conducted in it. Familiarly, the setting, the action, accompanying these dances and in measure lending character to them, rose before his eyes. In his memory ran other necessary backgrounds.

Listeners yesterday were in different case. Few, probably had heard and seen "Mârouf," fewer still, so pleasured, recalled these dances in the theatre; for the opera is hardly one that memory treasures. For once the programme-book was no better in descriptive imagination than the rest of us. The outcome was, say fifteen minutes of boredom, relieved only by Mr. Rabaud's ingenuities of workmanship take thought, to follow the bes to write music of Oriental tang and Hardly by well-chosen intervals and harmonies, hardly by sophisticated with timbres comes flavor of the public place where sat Marouf as one enthroned, was entertained and gave largess. Onward ped those three relentless oboes; patiently quirked those pertinacious bassoons; here, there, everywhere trill answered trill. Nowhere came progress, hardly anywhere climax. What were they doing on the stage since here obviously was music minded to action, animated and diversified by it? The question was as vain as the little boy's in "Pelleas" when he tried to peer into Mélisande's chamber. And at length it was half-past four.

In contrast, through Humperdinck's Prelude to "Hänsel and Gretel," it was hard to hear the music "as such" across the hazes of memory. Here was operatic piece—piece written primarily for the theatre—that warmed too many recollections: Gretel with the inevitable hole in her stocking; Hänsel in instinctive boyish assumption of masculine superiority; the rumbling father; the wood fairy-haunted; the witch of the ginger-bread house and the hot oven—she was too amusing to be burned—even the gincracks of a folk-tale heaven, German fashion. Upon a day Boston had not declined into an operaless town and, less inert and self-complacent knew the pleasures of the singing stage. Yet Humperdinck's preluding is by no means panoramic. The hearer might not know a motiv or a suggestion in it and yet be interested, pleased. Good to hear are these clear, homely, running melodies. The tang of the green earth and the folk lively upon it is in them. Good as well are the clean-cut, honest rhythms, the broad, four-square periods. Good the simple sentiment because it is sincere when it flowers in these melodies and good by like virtue the humor when it steps to these rhythms. Not to be derided is the Wagnerian idiom in which, as music, all this flows. Behold it escaped from gods and heroes, fled from the temple of the grail, Isolde's garden and Tristan's castle-court, singing the song and telling the tale of fairy-book for young and old. And stooping, spectacled, timid stammering, old Englebert Humperdinck—Herr Professor in a remote university town of Germany if ever there was one—did this miracle of heart and mind. It went the world around for continuing delight. A fortnight ago he died. Mr. Monteux did well so to honor his memory. The conductor, broad of mind and warm of heart, is of those Frenchmen who see music whole.

Possibly out of this largeness and ardor the conductor rose to the heights and sounded the depths that he gained with Beethovens "Eroica Symphony." Mr. Monteux is unobtrusive; in the concert-hall he is no figure to arrest the eye and stir to amiable speculation. There are no anecdotes about him to bandy from tongue to tongue. He does not cheapen, American-wise, into a "personality." Rather he does his work; often permeates that work with his own spirit, and lets both speak for him. And, if some hearers would only believe it, more "personality" in play upon music, if not upon audiences, dwells therein than emanates from more applauded names. What essential to the playing and the hearing of the "Eroica Symphony" was missing from the performance of yesterday?

Mr. Monteux so paced and accented the music, so shaped it and kept it in flow that the expanding, mounting line of every movement stood clear; that each motiv and melody, the very progessions even and ornament, kept character; that each detail fell into place; that the whole symphony rose and cumulated in an audible majesty of design and march. Composers of our day have reason when they seek to make music more plastic than such design permits, to give it new freedoms and intensities. They deserve every encouragement in such brave and candid pioneering. Yet by the same token, Beethoven's symphonies of maturity must be so played that the hearer shall perceive this architectural majesty, know this designing and sustaining might. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra achieved both. So also they gained the manifold intensities of the music. For it is this fire of spirit, however exercised, that scale the heights and holds them, so keeping Beethoven's masterpieces perpetual. It heats his melody, unfolds and maintains it; welds his figures, animates his ornament; makes pattern molten; gives to form the march of a living thing. His rhythms beat to it; his inflections cut with it; by it his mood, his passion upsprings in the music, quickens it with the very breath of creation; has preserved and, maybe, will preserve it.

This intensity, wherever and however manifested, this noble exuberance wherever and however it played, permeated the "Eroica Symphony" at Mr. Monteux's hands and at the hands of an orchestra that was both responsive and fully accomplishing instrument. The fervors of the beginning, the lament of the slow movement, both desolate and transfiguring, the vigor of life in the Scherzo, the ardor joyously fulfilled of the Finale—not one missed that intensity which in Beethoven becomes "a noble rage," an elevation, human and super-human at once. So did the "Eroica Symphony" renew itself, as not for many a day and so did Mr. Monteux give proof of a "personality' 'that can release not only the substance but the spirit of Beethoven. To use the word in such circumstance is rather to debase both conductor and composer.

H. T. PARKER

TRAN. Oct. 15.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Novel Music by Casella from Mr. Monteux—Mr. Goodrich as Organist in Public—Mme. Matzenauer and Mme. Homer in Song—Mr. Clement After Many Years—A New Violinist

TWO novel pieces stand upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week: a Suite for orchestra by Casella drawn from his music to a "choreographic comedy" by title "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," or "The Convent by the Water"; and an arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Choral in B minor (No. 2) for organ alone. Casella, already known here by his Rhapsody, "Italia," and his version for orchestra of Balakirev's piano-piece, "Islamey," is one of the younger Italian composers, individual and innovating like most of them, but more susceptible than some of his fellows to Parisian influences. The suite dates from 1912; comprises A Children's Round, a Nocturne, a Final Dance, a Barcarolle, a Saraband, a movement "of Old Ladies" and a Festival March. It was originally played by Mr. Monteux at his concerts in Paris. Fragments of the suite have already been heard in the United States, as at Mr. Damrosch's concerts in New York last winter. Now in Boston and for the first times in America the whole music will come to performance. Mr. Wallace Goodrich, the notable organist who plays too seldom in public, made the arrangement of Franck's Choral and will himself undertake the solo part. The symphony, at the beginning of the programme, is the third of Brahms, in F major.

At the first of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week in Sanders Theatre, Mr. Nyiregyhazi, the pianist, will be the "assisting artist" in the following programme:

Symphony in A major, "Italian" . . . Mendelssohn
Tone-Picture, "Sadko Under the Seas," Rimsky-Korsakov
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major . . . . Liszt
Dances from the Opera, "Marouf" . . . . . . Rabaud

TRANS. Oct. 15.

Second Concert by Symphony

Yesterday afternoon the second concert of the season was given in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting.

The program opened with Beethoven's E-flat "Eroica" symphony. This triumphant work of the great composer is always a joy. Its first movement "Allegro con brio," with its delightful themes and elaborate developments thereof, form striking contrasts which make for sheer beauty. The second movement is in the form of a funeral march, but one with tonal qualities and ideas both majestic and military. The third, "Allegro Vivace," has a gay running theme with fleeting hunting song melodies for the horns. The last is a joy in that it contains not alone the theme of which Beethoven was so fond that he used it not alone in this symphony but in the finals of his Prometheus ballet, "Variations for pianoforte," and in a little country dance, but also a fugal development of length which is clear and interesting.

It is the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux's apt guidance which makes a composition like the above the perfect work that it is.

Between Pumperdinck's prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," which is always refreshing, and the first Boston performance of Henri Rabaud's dances from "Marouf the Cobbler of Cairo," the soloist of the afternoon played Lizst's A major concerto, which is one movement. He was Erwin Nyiregyhazi, pianist, who made his American debut last year in New York.

Mr. Nyiregyhazi plays with understanding and true musical feeling. His touch is at once delicate and firm, but his phrasing was not quite so clear, due perhaps to poor pedalling.

TRAV. Oct. 15.

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The third program of the Boston Symphony concert, Mr. Monteux conductor, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be headed by Brahms's Third Symphony in F major, which has not been played at these concerts for four seasons. There will also be heard, in its first performance at these concerts, an arrangement for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich of Franck's Chorale for Organ No. 2, B minor, Mr. Goodrich, organist. There will also be the first performance in Boston of a suite from Casella's Ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water"). Mr. Casella, who will visit America this year, is prominent among the members of the modern Franco-Italian school. This score is dedicated to Mr. Monteux. The numbers are as follows: a. Ronde d'Enfant; b. Nocturne, Danse Finale; c. Barcarolle, Sarabande; d. Pas des Vieilles Dames; e. Marche de Fete.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, in Cambridge will take place in the Sanders Theatre next Thursday at 8 P. M. Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko"; Liszt, Piano concerto in A major (Mr. Nyiregyhaziff, pianist) Rabaud, dances from "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo."

[13] HERALD. Oct. 16.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will include Brahm's third symphony in F major, Cesar Franck's second chorale for organ, with orchestral accompaniment, and a suite from Alfredo Casella's ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'eau."

ADVTSR. Oct. 16.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, third program. Third Symphony, Brahms; Chorale in B minor, No. 2, Franck-Goodrich; suite from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," Casella. (First time in Boston.) Soloist, Wallace Goodrich.

GLOBE - Oct. 16

Now Arrives Casella, New, Brave, Bold

Debated and Defiant Italian Composer, on Visit to America, Whose Music Has Place in the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

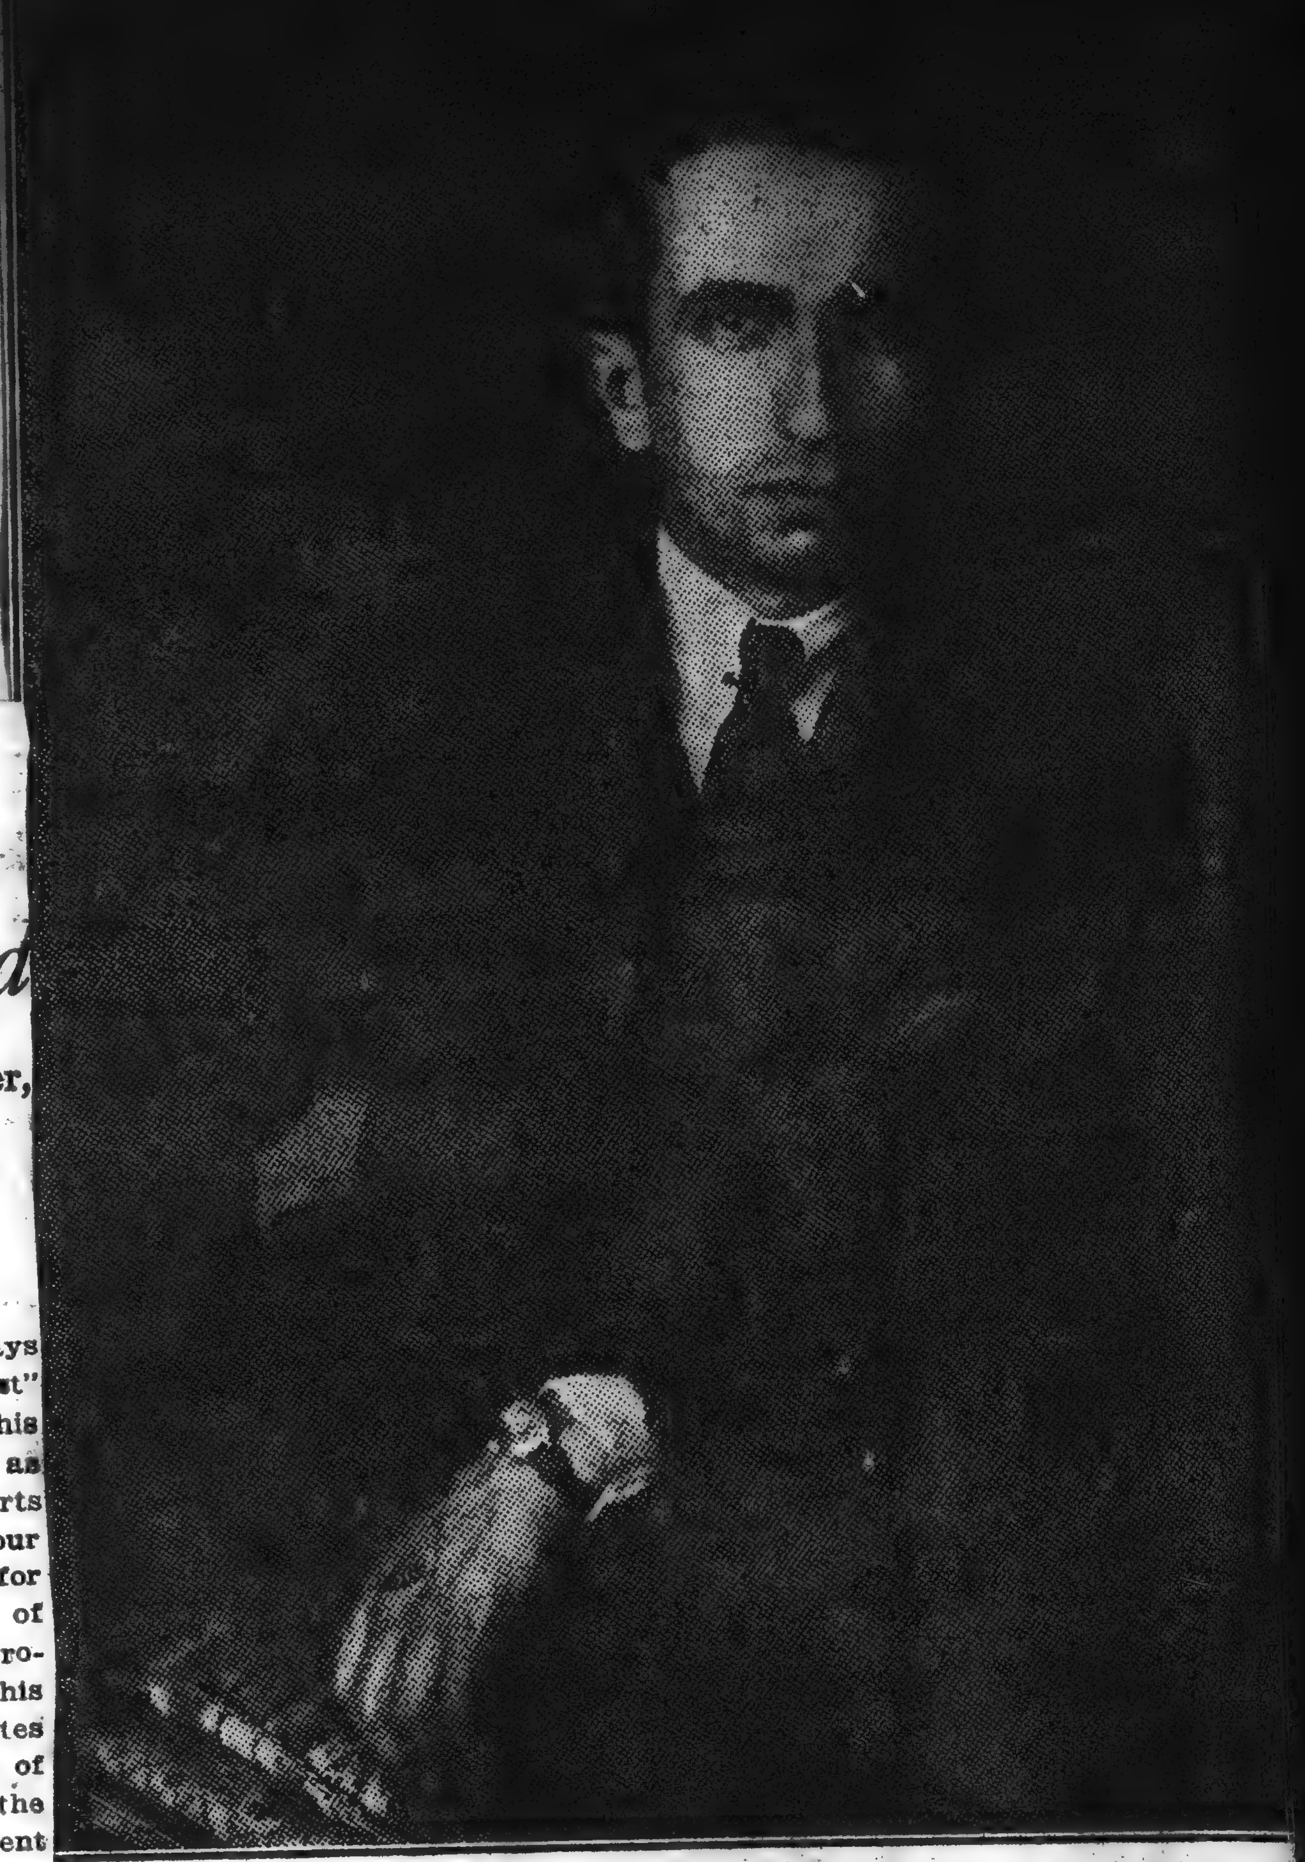
WITHIN the past few days Alfredo Casella, "futurist" composer, has come to this country to be heard as pianist in various concerts and to appear as guest-conductor with our orchestras. Tomorrow and Saturday for the first time, save in the lesser part of transcriber, his name appears on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. This combination of circumstances stimulates fresh interest in him and in the school of which he is a conspicuous exponent—the Neo-Italian symphonists, whose recent flowering constitutes the most striking development in contemporary music. The first composer of Italy to make a reputation outside the opera-house was the estimable Sgambati. Following him Enrico Bossi and the abler Siningaglia emerged from the melodramatic bog which produced Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Puccini and their fellows. Then, coincident with the reform in opera itself, as introduced by Zandonai and Montemezzi, came the present swarm of doughty champions of "absolute music." Not that these men have altogether eschewed dramatic composition. Rather, without exception, unless it be Pizzetti, they have done their most significant work in another field while Pizzetti's reputedly remarkable stage pieces have so far made less of a stir in the world than his Sonata for violin and piano.

Slowly but surely the music of these young Italians is passing to America—and more specifically to Boston. At the Symphony Concerts Mr. Rabaud set the fashion with Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence"; Mr Jacchia at the "Pops" gave us Casella's Rhapsody, "Italia"; last season Mr. Monteux disclosed to us Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and more of Malipiero, Mr. Toscanini brought with him scores by Pizzetti and de Sabata and the Boston Musical Association gave us our first hearing of Davico. Again Mme. Gauthier, in her recent exhibit of ultra-modern song, added another to the list—Mario Castelnuovo Now Casella comes once more to notice with the music to be heard tomorrow—a Suite drawn from his Choreographic Comedy, "Le Couvent sur l'Eau."

Ways and Works

Besides "Italia" and the brilliant transcription of Balakirev's "Islamy," played last season at a pair of Symphony Concerts, two other compositions of Casella have already been heard here—Mme. Gauthier, in the recital already mentioned, sang a strangely impressive song, "The Ox," and Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison a year ago played the "Pupazzetti," five satirical pieces for piano-duet. These "easy pieces," as the composer dubs them, date from 1916, and in spite of their unpretentious nature they are quite characteristic of his more individual manner—that is, they are uncompromisingly dissonant and relentlessly polyharmonic. With Casella, as with all the "advanced" composers of the day, polyharmony or, as it is sometimes called polytony—the simultaneous employment of two or more tonalities—is almost an inner necessity. The homotonic polyphony of old can hardly go farther; polytony is inevitably the next step, though the ears of many of us are as yet ill attuned to it. Of greater consequence than these "Pupazzetti" are the "Pagine di Guerra" ("Pages of War"), four musical "films" also written for piano-duet but later arranged for orchestra. Their titles explain their purpose, while their effect is appropriately graphic. In order they are: "Defile of Heavy German Artillery," "Before the Ruins of Rheims Cathedral," "Charge of Cossack Cavalry" and "Wooden Crosses in Alsace." A fifth, "Crossing of Italian Cruisers," was added for the orchestral version, once heard in America from Mr. Damrosch.

For piano solo Casella has written much, but on this side of the water at least, the pianists—always a cautious breed—have yet to notice him. There are the usual early imitative and derivative pieces such as all composers write; there are some from a period of transition and several from maturer years. A set of Nine Pieces, written in 1914, are in the nature of polyharmonic experiments, a later Sonatina is one of the frequent manifestations of Casella's rich vein of irony; while a Poem for piano, "A Notte Alta" ("To the High Night"), since transcribed for piano and orchestra and to be thus heard in his forthcoming concerts in this country, is considered by the composer the worthiest of all his creations.



(By Courtesy of The Musical Quarterly)

Alfredo Casella

pleted an amusing set of "Eleven Infantile Pieces" for the piano, technically simple and apparently ingenuous, yet at th same time embodying all sorts of revolutionary ideas. Amusing in a very different way is the famous séries "A la manièr de . . . ." These parodies on the style of Wagner, Fauré (Casella's teacher) Brahms, Debussy, Strauss and Franc transcend mere mimicry. With uncann exactness they reveal the idiocyncracies—even the foibles—of the originals. Fauré is treated more recorously than the rest in a "[illegible] sans Paroles" that has dignity and beauty. Wagner is caricatured in an "Einleitung des [illegible] Aufzuges," marked with the familiar "Langsam und Schmachtend," saturated with the chromatics o "Tristan" and "Parsifal"; Brahms in a Intermezzo that apes his heavy-foote piano style, with its omnipresent sixths Debussy's turn comes in an "Entr'act pour un Dramé en Préparation"—an excellent joke in itself—replete with his mos obvious mannerisms; while an Aria in th style of C. Franck recalls that master' oleaginous progressions, his obsession b a single rhythmic figure. But it is in th three pages of a pseudo-Straussian "Symphonia Molestica" that Casella's wit i keenest; a capital touch is the part for "third hand," and the passage marke "Mit grossem Schwung und Begeisterung," if becomingly orchestrated, would almos deceive the initiated as to its authenticity Yet through it appears the mocking fac of Casella.

For the present only such intrepid adventurers as Mme. Gauthier are likely to essay Casella's more significant songs; for these require a bold spirit, an infallible sense of pitch and a sublime indifference to the listener's squeamishness. Like the early piano pieces, the first songs are innocuous enough, though by no means without beauty. The "Night in May," for voice and orchestra, written in 1913—and hence in the composer's thirty-first year—marks the first definite establishment of his own harmonic procedure. Two years later in "Adieu à la Vie," a setting of four poems by Tagore in André Gide's translation, he shows the utmost disregard for everything except his own ideals, his own conception of the truth. The piano is asked to yield sounds and timbres heretofore unperceived, and against the sometimes excruciating harmonies the singer must maintain a truly terrifying independence. Yet the open-minded will find in these songs lofty and uncompromising beauty, an inescapable realism, a profound melancholy and solemnity, while the ever-present philistine will regard them as wilfully ugly, consciously distorted and—most damning epithet of all—cerebral. Thus does history repeat itself.

The Suite of To-Morrow

As an orchestral composer Casella began his career with a Symphony in B minor, written in 1905 and published by Mathot of Paris. The score bears this dedication "A mon cher Maitre et ami, Xavier Leroux." Saving a delight in sonority and a lavish employment of arresting instrumental combinations, this early symphony is singularly unyouthful. It is compact, restrained, disdainful of mere lusciousness and sentimental appeal. Moreover the predominating influence, so far as such idioms are distinguishable nowadays, seems to have been neither Italian nor German, but French. As Casella entered the Conservatory in Paris at thirteen and thereafter was constantly associated with French musicians, such flavor is in no way surprising. In the Second Symphony Mr. Guido Gatti, arch-champion of the new Italians, finds traces of Wagner and Strauss, coupled with a tendency to "break forth into impassioned Mediterranean accents." In a subsequent Suite in C major and, needless to say, in the rhapsody "Italia," Casella is at once more himself and truer to his musical inheritance. As the latter piece is under consideration for performance at a later Symphony Concert a word or two regarding it will not be amiss. The music is based on snatches of folk-song and by turns it is savage, gloomy, passionate and gently lyrical. A note prefaced score best explains the content:

> In this Rhapsody the compo wished to evoke in music (but with suggestion of programme!) the lif Sicily and Naples; the former is closed—tragic, superstitious, fever under a flaming and terrible sun in the inferno of sulphur mines, w the latter bursts forth—turbulent, less, wildly alive with joy, in the m of the enchantment of the Bay of Nap

Casella's sole work for the stage still unperformed there, is his ballet Couvent sur l'Eau." Written in 19 this music, according to Mr. Gatti, i a transformation of the composer's nique. But that by no means implies Casella the radical, the manipulat Schönbergian dissonance, is here i flower. Rather, much of the score familiar methods of harmony and but oftener than not in a spirit of lesque. Again to quote Mr. Gatti:

> Its music was written to a gra plot in a seventeenth century am by the poet Vandoyer. In it ap tenuous, powdered, languid fi against a scenic background of canals and marble, moon-lit pa Its dances are whimsical, vertiginous. . . . The comedy is one in which choreography predominates; yet here and there sound accents of calm sorrow and sustained joy, one and the other felt by seventeenth century hearts and voices by masked and powdered figures . . . and his genius has been able to hold the balance between the languid tenderness and the airy scepticism with which seventeenth century Venice was impregnated. The theme of the Barcarola and that of the Sarabanda—which somewhat recalls that of the Suite—deploy themselves with genuine vocal breadth and sway in a dream-like atmosphere; there is a breath of sensuality which seems to be given forth by the summer night, over the black sweeping waters of the lagoon. Consuelo's vocalized melody, flowing along on the popular rhythm of the gondola song, overflows its bounds of orchestral comment like one of those great carnivorous flowers of tranquil aspect which exhale the sharpest perfume of moral passion. In the quartet of the little old ladies, on the other hand, there is screeching chatter, and it is as though a convention of leaping witches with red gums and toothless mouths were blindly opening the latter in obedience to the impulse of vertigo. This effect is obtained by instrumental timbres in the higher octave, with flute and harp pizzicatos (sic), with xylophone, celesta and bells; and it is an effect whose grotesqueness is almost death-like, one which makes the listener recall certain unforgettable groups of Goya.

The Suite from this ballet, as it will be heard tomorrow runs in five parts; Marche de fête; Ronde d'enfants; Barcarolle; Sarabande; Pas des Vieilles Dames and Nocturne. In the March, in the Rondo on a childish tune and in the old ladies' dance (Allegretto molto moderato e ridiculo), the composer is frankly playful; but the Barcarolle with its haunting, wordless soprano solo and the Tristan-like melody of the Nocturne are deliberately and affectingly sensuous. Purposely diatonic as much of this music is, there are many harmonic and rhythmic effects that forecast Casella's later and more characteristic manner. It is interesting to note that this Suite is dedicated to Mr. Monteux and that it received performance on April 23, 1914, under th composer's direction at one of the Co not to write music of Oriental tang and illusion. Hardly by well-chosen intervals and harmonies, hardly by sophisticated play with timbres comes flavor of the public place where sat Marouf as one enthroned, was entertained and gave largess. Onward piped those three relentless oboes; patiently quirked those pertinacious bassoons; here, there, everywhere trill answered trill. Nowhere came progress, hardly anywhere the climax. What were they doing on the stage since here obviously was music mated to action, animated and diversified by it? The question was as vain as the little boy's in "Pelleas" when he tried to peer into Mélisande's chamber. And at length it was half-past four.

In contrast, through Humperdinck's Prelude to "Hänsel and Gretel," it was hard to hear the music "as such" across the hazes of memory. Here was operatic piece—piece written primarily for the theatre—that warmed too many recollections: Gretel with the inevitable hole in her stocking; Hänsel in instinctive boyish assumption of masculine superiority; the rumbling father; the wood fairy-haunted the witch of the ginger-bread house and the hot oven—she was too amusing to be burned—even the gincracks of a folk-tale heaven, German fashion. Upon a day Boston had not declined into an operaless town and, less inert and self-complacent knew the pleasures of the singing stage. Yet Humperdinck's preluding is by no means panoramic. The hearer might not know a motiv or a suggestion in it and yet be interested, pleased. Good to hear are these clear, homely, running melodies. The tang of the green earth and the folk lively upon it is in them. Good as well are the clean-cut, honest rhythms, the broad, four-square periods. Good the simple sentiment because it is sincere when it flowers in these melodies and good by like virtue the humor when it steps to these rhythms. Not to be derided is the Wagnerian idiom in which "as music" all this flows. Behold ! escaped from gods and heroes, fled from the temple of the grail, Isolde's garden and Tristan's castle-court, singing the song and telling the tale of fairy-book for young and old. And stooping, spectacled, timid stammering, old Englbert Humperdinck—Herr Professor in a remote university town of Germany if ever there was one—did this miracle of heart and mind. It went the world around for continuing delight. A fortnight ago he died. Mr. Monteux did well so to honor his memory. The conductor, broad of mind and warm of heart, is of those Frenchmen who see music whole.

Possibly out of this largeness and ardor the conductor rose to the heights and sounded the depths that he gained with Beethovens "Eroica Symphony." Mr. Monteux is unobtrusive; in the concert-hall he is no figure to arrest the eye and stir to amiable speculation. There are no anecdotes about him to handy from tongue to tongue. He does not cheapen, American-wise, into a "personality." Rather he does his work; often permeates that work with his own spirit, and lets both speak for him. And, if some hearers would only believe it, more "personality" in play upon music, if not upon audiences, dwells therein than emanates from more applauded names. What essential to the playing and the hearing of the "Eroica Symphony" was missing from the performance of yesterday?

Mr. Monteux so paced and accented the music, so shaped it and kept it in flow that the expanding, mounting line of every movement stood clear; that each motiv and melody, the very progessions even and ornament, kept character; that each detail fell into place; that the whole symphony rose and cumulated in an audible majesty of design and march. Composers of our day have reason when they seek to make music more plastic than such design permits, to give it new freedoms and intensities. They deserve every encouragement in such brave and candid pioneering. Yet by the same token, Beethoven's symphonies of maturity must be so played that the hearer shall perceive this architectural majesty, know this designing and sustaining might. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra achieved both. So also they gained the manifold intensities of the music. For it is this fire of spirit, however exercised, that scale the heights and holds them, so keeping Beethoven's masterpieces perpetual. It heats his melody, unfolds and maintains it; welds his figures, animates his ornament; makes pattern molten; gives to form the march of a living thing. His rhythms beat to it; his inflections cut with it; by it his mood, his passion upsprings in the music, quickens it with the very breath of creation; has preserved and, maybe, will preserve it.

This intensity, wherever and however manifested, this noble exuberance wherever and however it played, permeated the "Eroica Symphony" at Mr. Monteux's hands and at the hands of an orchestra that was both responsive and fully accomplishing instrument. The fervors of the beginning, the lament of the slow movement, both desolate and transfiguring, the vigor of life in the Scherzo, the ardor joyously fulfilled of the Finale—not one missed that intensity which in Beethoven becomes "a noble rage," an elevation, human and super-human at once. So did the "Eroica Symphony" renew itself, as not for many a day and so did Mr. Monteux give proof of a "personality' 'that can release not only the substance but the spirit of Beethoven. To use the word in such circumstance is rather to debase both conductor and composer.

H. T. Parker

TRAN. Oct. 15.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Novel Music by Casella from Mr. Monteux—Mr. Goodrich as Organist in Public—Mme. Matzenauer and Mme. Homer in Song—Mr. Clement After Many Years—A New Violinist

TWO novel pieces stand upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week: a Suite for orchestra by Casella drawn from his music to a "choreographic comedy" by title "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," or "The Convent by the Water"; and an arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Choral in B minor (No. 2) for organ alone. Casella, already known here by his Rhapsody, "Italia," and his version for orchestra of Balakirev's piano-piece, "Islamey," is one of the younger Italian composers, individual and innovating like most of them, but more susceptible than some of his fellows to Parisian influences. The suite dates from 1912; comprises A Children's Round, a Nocturne, a Final Dance, a Barcarolle, a Saraband, a movement "of Old Ladies" and a Festival March. It was originally played by Mr. Monteux at his concerts in Paris. Fragments of the suite have already been heard in the United States, as at Mr. Damrosch's concerts in New York last winter. Now in Boston and for the first times in America the whole music will come to performance. Mr. Wallace Goodrich, the notable organist who plays too seldom in public, made the arrangement of Franck's Choral and will himself undertake the solo part. The symphony, at the beginning of the programme, is the third of Brahms, in F major.

At the first of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week in Sanders Theatre, Mr. Nyiregyhazi, the pianist, will be the "assisting artist" in the following programme:

Symphony in A major, "Italian"...Mendelssohn
Tone-Picture, "Sadko Under the Seas," Rimsky-Korsakov
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major.........................Liszt
Dances from the Opera, "Marouf"......Rabaud

TRAN. Oct. 15

Second Concert by Symphony

Yesterday afternoon the second concert of the season was given in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting.

The program opened with Beethoven's E-flat "Eroica" symphony. This triumphant work of the great composer is always a joy. Its first movement "Allegro con brio," with its delightful themes and elaborate developments thereof, form striking contrasts which make for sheer beauty. The second movement is in the form of a funeral march, but one with tonal qualities and ideas both majestic and military. The third, "Allegro Vivace," has a gay running theme with fleeting hunting song melodies for the horns. The last is a joy in that it contains not alone the theme of which Beethoven was so fond that he used it not alone in this symphony but in the finals of his Prometheus ballet, "Variations for pianoforte," and in a little country dance, but also a fugal development of length which is clear and interesting.

It is the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux's apt guidance which makes a composition like the above the perfect work that it is.

Between Pumperdinck's prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," which is always refreshing, and the first Boston performance of Henri Rabaud's dances from "Marouf the Cobbler of Cairo," the soloist of the afternoon played Lizst's A major concerto, which is one movement. He was Erwin Nyiregyhazi, pianist, who made his American debut last year in New York.

Mr. Nyiregyhazi plays with understanding and true musical feeling. His touch is at once delicate and firm, but his phrasing was not quite so clear, due perhaps to poor pedalling.

TRAN. Oct. 15

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The third program of the Boston Symphony concert, Mr. Monteux conductor, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be headed by Brahms's Third Symphony in F major, which has not been played at these concerts for four seasons. There will also be heard, in its first performance at these concerts, an arrangement for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich of Franck's Chorale for Organ No. 2, B minor, Mr. Goodrich, organist. There will also be the first performance in Boston of a suite from Casella's Ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water"). Mr. Casella, who will visit America this year, is prominent among the members of the modern Franco-Italian school. This score is dedicated to Mr. Monteux. The numbers are as follows: a. Ronde d'Enfant; b. Nocturne, Danse Finale; c. Barcarolle, Sarabande; d. Pas des Vieilles Dames; e. Marche de Fete.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, in Cambridge will take place in the Sanders Theatre next Thursday at 8 P. M. Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko"; Liszt, Piano concerto in A major (Mr. Nyiregyhaziff, pianist) Rabaud, dances from "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo."

[13]

HERALD. Oct. 16.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will include Brahm's third symphony in F major, Cesar Franck's second chorale for organ, with orchestral accompaniment, and a suite from Alfredo Casella's ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'eau."

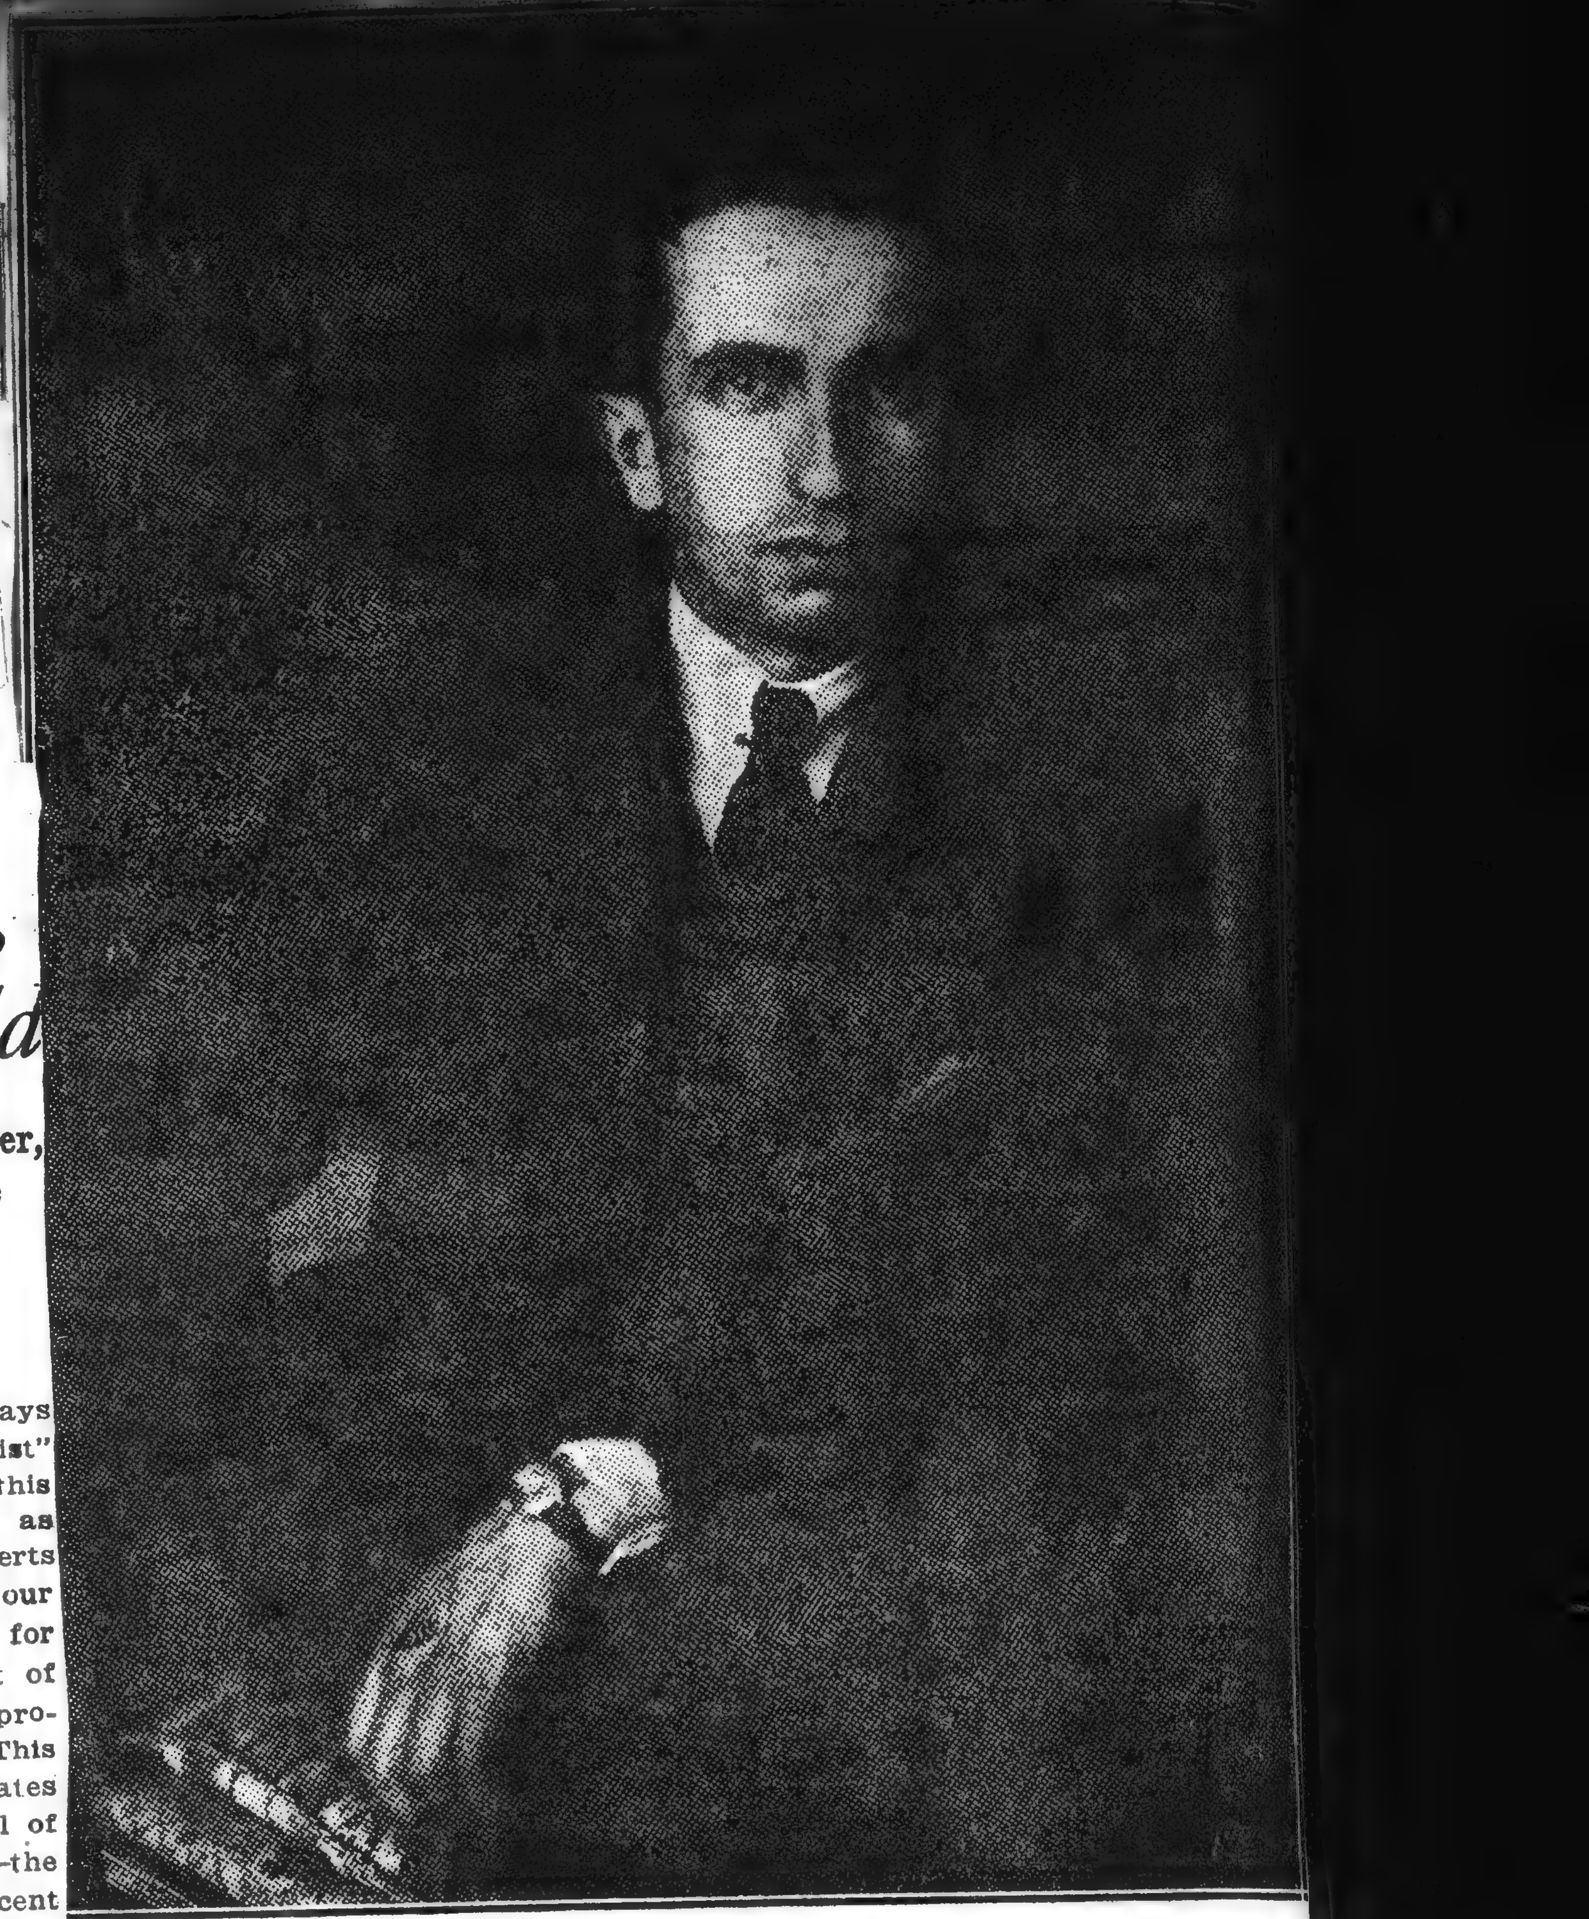
ADVTSR. Oct. 16

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, third program. Third Symphony, Brahms; Chorale in B minor, No. 2, Franck-Goodrich; suite from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," Casella. (First time in Boston.) Soloist, Wallace Goodrich.

GLOBE - Oct. 16

Now Arrives Casella, New, Brave, Bold

Debated and Defiant Italian Composer, on Visit to America, Whose Music Has Place in the Symphony Concert Tomorrow



(By Courtesy of The Musical Quarterly)

Alfredo Casella

WITHIN the past few days Alfredo Casella, "futurist" composer, has come to this country to be heard as pianist in various concerts and to appear as guest-conductor with our orchestras. Tomorrow and Saturday for the first time, save in the lesser part of transcriber, his name appears on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. This combination of circumstances stimulates fresh interest in him and in the school of which he is a conspicuous exponent—the Neo-Italian symphonists, whose recent flowering constitutes the most striking development in contemporary music. The first composer of Italy to make a reputation outside the opera-house was the estimable Sgambati. Following him Enrico Bossi and the abler Siningaglia emerged from the melodramatic bog which produced Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Puccini and their fellows. Then, coincident with the reform in opera itself, as introduced by Zandonai and Montemezzi, came the present swarm of doughty champions of "absolute music." Not that these men have altogether eschewed dramatic composition. Rather, without exception, unless it be Pizzetti, they have done their most significant work in another field while Pizzetti's reputedly remarkable stage pieces have so far made less of a stir in the world than his Sonata for violin and piano.

Slowly but surely the music of these young Italians is passing to America—and more specifically to Boston. At the Symphony Concerts Mr. Rabaud set the fashion with Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence"; Mr Jacchia at the "Pops" gave us Casella's Rhapsody, "Italia"; last season Mr. Monteux disclosed to us Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and more of Malipiero, Mr. Toscanini brought with him scores by Pizzetti and de Sabata and the Boston Musical Association gave us our first hearing of Davico. Again Mme. Gauthier, in her recent exhibit of ultra-modern song, added another to the list—Mario Castelnuovo. Now Casella comes once more to notice with the music to be heard tomorrow—a Suite drawn from his Choreographic Comedy, "Le Couvent sur l'Eau."

Ways and Works

Besides "Italia" and the brilliant transcription of Balakirev's "Islamy," played last season at a pair of Symphony Concerts, two other compositions of Casella have already been heard here—Mme. Gauthier, in the recital already mentioned, sang a strangely impressive song, "The Ox," and Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison a year ago played the "Pupazzetti," five satirical pieces for piano-duet. These "easy pieces," as the composer dubs them, date from 1916, and in spite of their unpretentious nature they are quite characteristic of his more individual manner—that is, they are uncompromisingly dissonant and relentlessly polyharmonic. With Casella, as with all the "advanced" composers of the day, polyharmony or, as it is sometimes called polytony—the simultaneous employment of two or more tonalities—is almost an inner necessity. The homotonic polyphony of old can hardly go farther; polytony is inevitably the next step, though the ears of many of us are as yet ill attuned to it. Of greater consequence than these "Pupazzetti" are the "Pagine di Guerra" ("Pages of War"), four musical "films" also written for piano-duet but later arranged for orchestra. Their titles explain their purpose, while their effect is appropriately graphic. In order they are: "Defile of Heavy German Artillery," "Before the Ruins of Rheims Cathedral," "Charge of Cossack Cavalry" and "Wooden Crosses in Alsace." A fifth, "Crossing of Italian Cruisers," was added for the orchestral version, once heard in America from Mr. Damrosch.

For piano solo Casella has written much, but on this side of the water at least, the pianists—always a cautious breed—have yet to notice him. There are the usual early imitative and derivative pieces such as all composers write; there are some from a period of transition and several from maturer years. A set of Nine Pieces, written in 1914, are in the nature of polyharmonic experiments, a later Sonatina is one of the frequent manifestations of Casella's rich vein of irony; while a Poem for piano, "A Notte Alta" ("To the High Night"), since transcribed for piano and orchestra and to be thus heard in his forthcoming concerts in this country, is considered by the composer the worthiest of all his creations. A year ago he completed an amusing set of "Eleven Infantile Pieces" for the piano, technically simple and apparently ingenuous, yet at the same time embodying all sorts of revolutionary ideas. Amusing in a very different way is the famous séries "A la manière de . . . ." These parodies on the style of Wagner, Fauré (Casella's teacher) Brahms, Debussy, Strauss and Franck transcend mere mimicry. With uncanny exactness they reveal the idiocyncracies—even the foibles—of the originals. Fauré is treated more recorously than the rest in a "Roman sans Paroles" that has dignity and beauty. Wagner is caricatured in an "Einleitung des 3. Aufzuges," marked with the familiar "Langsam und Schmachtend," saturated with the chromatics of "Tristan" and "Parsifal"; Brahms in an Intermezzo that apes his heavy-footed piano style, with its omnipresent sixths; Debussy's turn comes in an "Entr'acte pour un Dramé en Préparation"—an excellent joke in itself—replete with his most obvious mannerisms; while an Aria in the style of C. Franck recalls that master's oleaginous progressions, his obsession by a single rhythmic figure. But it is in the three pages of a pseudo-Straussian "Symphonia Molestica" that Casella's wit is keenest; a capital touch is the part for a "third hand," and the passage marked "Mit grossem Schwung und Begeisterung," if becomingly orchestrated, would almost deceive the initiated as to its authenticity. Yet through it appears the mocking face of Casella.

For the present only such intrepid adventurers as Mme. Gauthier are likely to essay Casella's more significant songs; for these require a bold spirit, an infallible sense of pitch and a sublime indifference to the listener's squeamishness. Like the early piano pieces, the first songs are innocuous enough, though by no means without beauty. The "Night in May," for voice and orchestra, written in 1913—and hence in the composer's thirty-first year—marks the first definite establishment of his own harmonic procedure. Two years later in "Adieu à la Vie," a setting of four poems by Tagore in André Gide's translation, he shows the utmost disregard for everything except his own ideals, his own conception of the truth. The piano is asked to yield sounds and timbres heretofore unperceived, and against the sometimes excruciating harmonies the singer must maintain a truly terrifying independence. Yet the open-minded will find in these songs lofty and uncompromising beauty, an inescapable realism, a profound melancholy and solemnity, while the ever-present philistine will regard them as wilfully ugly, consciously distorted and—most damning epithet of all—cerebral. Thus does history repeat itself.

The Suite of To-Morrow

As an orchestral composer Casella began his career with a Symphony in B minor, written in 1905 and published by Mathot of Paris. The score bears this dedication "A mon cher Maitre et ami, Xavier Leroux." Saving a delight in sonority and a lavish employment of arresting instrumental combinations, this early symphony is singularly unyouthful. It is compact, restrained, disdainful of mere lusciousness and sentimental appeal. Moreover the predominating influence, so far as such idioms are distinguishable nowadays, seems to have been neither Italian nor German, but French. As Casella entered the Conservatory in Paris at thirteen and thereafter was constantly associated with French musicians, such flavor is in no way surprising. In the Second Symphony Mr. Guido Gatti, arch-champion of the new Italians, finds traces of Wagner and Strauss, coupled with a tendency to "break forth into impassioned Mediterranean accents." In a subsequent Suite in C major and, needless to say, in the rhapsody "Italia," Casella is at once more himself and truer to his musical inheritance. As the latter piece is under consideration for performance at a later Symphony Concert a word or two regarding it will not be amiss. The music is based on snatches of folk-song and by turns it is savage, gloomy, passionate and gently lyrical. A note prefaced to score best explains the content:

> In this Rhapsody the compo wished to evoke in music (but with suggestion of programme!) the life Sicily and Naples; the former is closed—tragic, superstitious, fever under a flaming and terrible sun, in the inferno of sulphur mines, wh the latter bursts forth—turbulent, re less, wildly alive with joy, in the mi of the enchantment of the Bay of Nap

Casella's sole work for the stage, still unperformed there, is his ballet Couvent sur l'Eau." Written in 19 this music, according to Mr. Gatti, ini a transformation of the composer's nique. But that by no means implies Casella the radical, the manipulato Schönbergian dissonance, is here in flower. Rather, much of the score fo familiar methods of harmony and me but oftener than not in a spirit of lesque. Again to quote Mr. Gatti:

> Its music was written to a grace plot in a seventeenth century amb by the poet Vandoyer. In it app tenuous, powdered, languid figu against a scenic background of pa canals and marble, moon-lit palac Its dances are whimsical, vertiginous. . . . The comedy is one in which choreography predominates; yet here and there sound accents of calm sorrow and sustained joy, one and the other felt by seventeenth century hearts and voiced by masked and powdered figures . . . and his genius has been able to hold the balance between the languid tenderness and the airy scepticism with which seventeenth century Venice was impregnated. The theme of the Barcarola and that of the Sarabanda—which somewhat recalls that of the Suite—deploy themselves with genuine vocal breadth and sway in a dream-like atmosphere; there is a breath of sensuality which seems to be given forth by the summer night, over the black sweeping waters of the lagoon. Conselo's vocalized melody, flowing along on the popular rhythm of the gondola song, overflows its bounds of orchestral comment like one of those great carnivorous flowers of tranquil aspect which exhale the sharpest perfume of moral passion. In the quartet of the little old ladies, on the other hand, there's screeching chatter, and it is as though a convention of leaping witches with red gums and toothless mouths were blindly opening the latter in obedience to the impulse of vertigo. This effect is obtained by instrumental timbres in the higher octave, with flute and harp pizzicatos (sic), with xylophone, celesta and bells; and it is an effect whose grotesqueness is almost death-like, one which makes the listener recall certain unforgettable groups of Goya.

The Suite from this ballet, as it will be heard tomorrow runs in five parts; Marche de fête, Ronde d'enfants; Barcarolle; Sarabande; Pas des Vieilles Dames and Nocturne. In the March, in the Rondo on a childish tune and in the old ladies' dance (Allegretto molto moderato e ridiculo), the composer is frankly playful; but the Barcarolle with its haunting, wordless soprano solo and the Tristan-like melody of the Nocturne are deliberately and affectingly sensuous. Purposely diatonic as much of this music is, there are many harmonic and rhythmic effects that forecast Casella's later and more characteristic manner. It is interesting to note that this Suite is dedicated to Mr. Monteux and that it received first performance on April 23, 1914, under the composer's direction, at one of the Con-not to write music of Oriental tang and illusion. Hardly by well-chosen intervals and harmonies, hardly by sophisticated play with timbres comes flavor of the public place where sat Mârouf as one enthroned, was entertained and gave largess. Onward piped those three relentless oboes; patiently quirked those pertinacious bassoons; here, there, everywhere trill answered trill. Nowhere came progress, hardly anywhere climax. What were they doing on the stage since here obviously was music mated to action, animated and diversified by it? The question was as vain as the little boy's in "Péleas" when he tried to peer into Mélisande's chamber. And at length it was half-past four.

In contrast, through Humperdinck's Prelude to "Hänsel and Gretel," it was hard to hear the music "as such" across the hazes of memory. Here was operatic piece—piece written primarily for the theatre—that warmed too many recollections: Gretel with the inevitable hole in her stocking; Hänsel in instinctive boyish assumption of masculine superiority; the rumbling father; the wood fairy-haunted the witch of the ginger-bread house and the hot oven—she was too amusing to be burned—even the gincracks of a folk-tale heaven, German fashion. Upon a day Boston had not declined into an operaless town and, less inert and self-complacent knew the pleasures of the singing stage. Yet Humperdinck's preluding is by no means panoramic. The hearer might not know a motiv or a suggestion in it and yet be interested, pleased. Good to hear are these clear, homely, running melodies. The tang of the green earth and the folk lively upon it is in them. Good as well are the clean-cut, honest rhythms, the broad, four-square periods. Good the simple sentiment because it is sincere when it flowers in these melodies and good by like virtue the humor when it steps to these rhythms. Not to be derided is the Wagnerian idiom in which a music" all this flows. Behold it escaped from gods and heroes, fled from the temple of the grail, Isolde's garden and Tristan's castle-court, singing the song and telling the tale of fairy-book for young and old. And stooping, spectacled, timid, stammering, old Engelbert Humperdinck Herr Professor in a remote university town of Germany if ever there was one did this miracle of heart and mind, went the world around for continuing delight. A fortnight ago he died. Mr. Monteux did well so to honor his memory. The conductor, broad of mind and warm of heart, is of those Frenchmen who see music whole.

Possibly out of this largeness and ardor the conductor rose to the heights and sounded the depths that he gained with Beethovens "Eroica Symphony." Mr. Monteux is unobtrusive; in the concert-hall he is no figure to arrest the eye and stir to amiable speculation. There are no anecdotes about him to bandy from tongue to tongue. He does not cheapen, American-wise, into a "personality." Rather he does his work; often permeates that work with his own spirit, and lets both speak for him. And, if some hearers would only believe it, more "personality" in play upon music, if not upon audiences, dwells therein than emanates from more applauded names. What essential to the playing and the hearing of the "Eroica Symphony" was missing from the performance of yesterday?

Mr. Monteux so paced and accented the music, so shaped it and kept it in flow that the expanding, mounting line of every movement stood clear; that each motiv and melody, the very progessions even and ornament, kept character; that each detail fell into place; that the whole symphony rose and cumulated in an audible majesty of design and march. Composers of our day have reason when they seek to make music more plastic than such design permits, to give it new freedoms and intensities. They deserve every encouragement in such brave and candid pioneering. Yet by the same token, Beethoven's symphonies of maturity must be so played that the hearer shall perceive this architectural majesty, know this designing and sustaining might. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra achieved both. So also they gained the manifold intensities of the music. For it is this fire of spirit, however exercised, that scale the heights and holds them, so keeping Beethoven's masterpieces perpetual. It heats his melody, unfolds and maintains it; welds his figures, animates his ornament; makes pattern molten; gives to form the march of a living thing. His rhythms beat to it; his inflections cut with it; by it his mood, his passion upsprings in the music, quickens it with the very breath of creation; has preserved and, maybe, will preserve it.

This intensity, wherever and however manifested, this noble exuberance wherever and however it played, permeated the "Eroica Symphony" at Mr. Monteux's hands and at the hands of an orchestra that was both responsive and fully accomplishing instrument. The fervors of the beginning, the lament of the slow movement, both desolate and transfiguring, the vigor of life in the Scherzo, the ardor joyously fulfilled of the Finale—not one missed that intensity which in Beethoven becomes "a noble rage," an elevation, human and super-human at once. So did the "Eroica Symphony" renew itself, as not for many a day and so did Mr. Monteux give proof of a "personality' 'that can release not only the substance but the spirit of Beethoven. To use the word in such circumstance is rather to debase both conductor and composer.

H. T. Parker

TRAN. Oct. 15

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Novel Music by Casella from Mr. Monteux—Mr. Goodrich as Organist in Public—Mme. Matzenauer and Mme. Homer in Song—Mr. Clement After Many Years—A New Violinist

TWO novel pieces stand upon Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week: a Suite for orchestra by Casella drawn from his music to a "choreographic comedy" by title "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," or "The Convent by the Water"; and an arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Choral in B minor (No. 2) for organ alone. Casella, already known here by his Rhapsody, "Italia," and his version for orchestra of Balakirev's piano-piece, "Islamey," is one of the younger Italian composers, individual and innovating like most of them, but more susceptible than some of his fellows to Parisian influences. The suite dates from 1912; comprises A Children's Round, a Nocturne, a Final Dance, a Barcarolle, a Saraband, a movement "of Old Ladies" and a Festival March. It was originally played by Mr. Monteux at his concerts in Paris. Fragments of the suite have already been heard in the United States, as at Mr. Damrosch's concerts in New York last winter. Now in Boston and for the first times in America the whole music will come to performance. Mr. Wallace Goodrich, the notable organist who plays too seldom in public, made the arrangement of Franck's Choral and will himself undertake the solo part. The symphony, at the beginning of the programme, is the third of Brahms, in F major.

At the first of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening of next week in Sanders Theatre, Mr. Nyiregyhazi, the pianist, will be the "assisting artist" in the following programme:

Symphony in A major, "Italian" . . . Mendelssohn
Tone-Picture, "Sadko Under the Seas," Rimsky-Korsakov
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major . . . Liszt
Dances from the Opera, "Marouf" . . . Rabaud

Second Concert by Symphony

Yesterday afternoon the second concert of the season was given in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting.

The program opened with Beethoven's E-flat "Eroica" symphony. This triumphant work of the great composer is always a joy. Its first movement "Allegro con brio," with its delightful themes and elaborate developments thereof, form striking contrasts which make for sheer beauty. The second movement is in the form of a funeral march, but one with tonal qualities and ideas both majestic and military. The third, "Allegro Vivace," has a gay running theme with fleeting hunting song melodies for the horns. The last is a joy in that it contains not alone the theme of which Beethoven was so fond that he used it not alone in this symphony but in the finals of his Prometheus ballet, "Variations for pianoforte," and in a little country dance, but also a fugal development of length which is clear and interesting.

It is the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Monteux's apt guidance which makes a composition like the above the perfect work that it is.

Between Pumperdinck's prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," which is always refreshing, and the first Boston performance of Henri Rabaud's dances from "Marouf the Cobbler of Cairo," the soloist of the afternoon played Lizst's A major concerto, which is one movement. He was Erwin Nyiregyhazi, pianist, who made his American debut last year in New York.

Mr. Nyiregyhazi plays with understanding and true musical feeling. His touch is at once delicate and firm, but his phrasing was not quite so clear, due perhaps to poor pedalling.

NEXT SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The third program of the Boston Symphony concert, Mr. Monteux conductor, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be headed by Brahms's Third Symphony in F major, which has not been played at these concerts for four seasons. There will also be heard, in its first performance at these concerts, an arrangement for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich of Franck's Chorale for Organ No. 2, B minor, Mr. Goodrich, organist. There will also be the first performance in Boston of a suite from Casella's Ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water"). Mr. Casella, who will visit America this year, is prominent among the members of the modern Franco-Italian school. This score is dedicated to Mr. Monteux. The numbers are as follows: a. Ronde d'Enfant; b. Nocturne. Danse Finale; c. Barcarolle. Sarabande; d. Pas des Vieilles Dames; e. Marche de Fete.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The first concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, in Cambridge will take place in the Sanders Theatre next Thursday at 8 P. M. Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko"; Liszt, Piano concerto in A major (Mr. Nyiregyhaziff, pianist); Rabaud, dances from "Marouf, the Cobbler of Cairo."

[43] HERALD. Oct. 16.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program of the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will include Brahm's third symphony in F major, Cesar Franck's second chorale for organ, with orchestral accompaniment, and a suite from Alfredo Casella's ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'eau."

ADVER. Oct. 15

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, third program. Third Symphony, Brahms; Chorale in B minor, No. 2, Franck-Goodrich; suite from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," Casella. (First time in Boston.) Soloist, Wallace Goodrich.

GLOBE – Oct. 16

Now Arrives Casella, New, Brave, Bold

Debated and Defiant Italian Composer, on Visit to America, Whose Music Has Place in the Symphony Concert Tomorrow

(By Courtesy of The Musical Quarterly)

Alfredo Casella

WITHIN the past few days Alfredo Casella, "futurist" composer, has come to this country to be heard as pianist in various concerts and to appear as guest-conductor with our orchestras. Tomorrow and Saturday for the first time, save in the lesser part of transcriber, his name appears on the programmes of the Symphony Concerts. This combination of circumstances stimulates fresh interest in him and in the school of which he is a conspicuous exponent—the Neo-Italian symphonists, whose recent flowering constitutes the most striking development in contemporary music. The first composer of Italy to make a reputation outside the opera-house was the estimable Sgambati. Following him Enrico Bossi and the abler Siningaglia emerged from the melodramatic bog which produced Mascagni, Leoncavallo, Puccini and their fellows. Then, coincident with the reform in opera itself, as introduced by Zandonai and Montemezzi, came the present swarm of doughty champions of "absolute music." Not that these men have altogether eschewed dramatic composition. Rather, without exception, unless it be Pizzetti, they have done their most significant work in another field while Pizzetti's reputedly remarkable stage pieces have so far made less of a stir in the world than his Sonata for violin and piano.

Slowly but surely the music of these young Italians is passing to America—and more specifically to Boston. At the Symphony Concerts Mr. Rabaud set the fashion with Malipiero's "Pauses of Silence", Mr Jacchia at the "Pops" gave us Casella's Rhapsody, "Italia"; last season Mr. Monteux disclosed to us Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" and more of Malipiero, Mr. Toscanini brought with him scores by Pizzetti and de Sabata and the Boston Musical Association gave us our first hearing of Davico. Again Mme. Gauthier, in her recent exhibit of ultra-modern song, added another to the list—Mario Castelnuovo. Now Casella comes once more to notice with the music to be heard tomorrow—a Suite drawn from his Choreographic Comedy, "Le Couvent sur l'Eau."

Ways and Works

Besides "Italia" and the brilliant transcription of Balakirev's "Islamy," played last season at a pair of Symphony Concerts, two other compositions of Casella have already been heard here—Mme. Gauthier, in the recital already mentioned, sang a strangely impressive song, "The Ox," and Mr. Maier and Mr. Pattison a year ago played the "Pupazzetti," five satirical pieces for piano-duet. These "easy pieces," as the composer dubs them, date from 1916, and in spite of their unpretentious nature they are quite characteristic of his more individual manner—that is, they are uncompromisingly dissonant and relentlessly polyharmonic. With Casella, as with all the "advanced" composers of the day, polyharmony or, as it is sometimes called polytony—the simultaneous employment of two or more tonalities—is almost an inner necessity. The homotonic polyphony of old can hardly go farther; polytony is inevitably the next step, though the ears of many of us are as yet ill attuned to it. Of greater consequence than these "Pupazzetti" are the "Pagine di Guerra" ("Pages of War"), four musical "films" also written for piano-duet but later arranged for orchestra. Their titles explain their purpose, while their effect is appropriately graphic. In order they are: "Defile of Heavy German Artillery," "Before the Ruins of Rheims Cathedral," "Charge of Cossack Cavalry" and "Wooden Crosses in Alsace." A fifth, "Crossing of Italian Cruisers," was added for the orchestral version, once heard in America from Mr. Damrosch.

For piano solo Casella has written much, but on this side of the water at least, the pianists—always a cautious breed—have yet to notice him. There are the usual early imitative and derivative pieces such as all composers write; there are some from a period of transition and several from maturer years. A set of Nine Pieces, written in 1914, are in the nature of polyharmonic experiments, a later Sonatina is one of the frequent manifestations of Casella's rich vein of irony; while a Poem for piano, "A Notte Alta" ("To the High Night"), since transcribed for piano and orchestra and to be thus heard in his forthcoming concerts in this country, is considered by the composer the worthiest of all his creations. A year ago he completed an amusing set of "Eleven Infantile Pieces" for the piano, technically simple and apparently ingenuous, yet at th same time embodying all sorts of revolutionary ideas. Amusing in a very different way is the famous series "A la manièr de . . . ." These parodies on the style of Wagner, Fauré (Casella's teacher) Brahms, Debussy, Strauss and Franc transcend mere mimicry. With uncann exactness they reveal the idiocyncracies—even the foibles—of the originals. Fauré is treated more recorously than the rest in a "Roman sans Paroles" that has dignity and beauty. Wagner is caricatured in an "Einleitung des 3. Aufzuges," marked with the familiar "Langsam und Schmachtend, saturated with the chromatics o "Tristan" and "Parsifal"; Brahms in a Intermezzo that apes his heavy-foote piano style, with its omnipresent sixths Debussy's turn comes in an "Entr'act pour un Dramé en Préparation"—an excellent joke in itself—replete with his mos obvious mannerisms; while an Aria in th style of C. Franck recalls that master oleaginous progressions, his obsession b a single rhythmic figure. But it is in th three pages of a pseudo-Straussian "Symphonia Molestica" that Casella's wit i keenest; a capital touch is the part for "third hand," and the passage marke "Mit grossem Schwung und Begeisterung," if becomingly orchestrated, would almos deceive the initiated as to its authenticity Yet through it appears the mocking fac of Casella.

For the present only such intrepid adventurers as Mme. Gauthier are likely to essay Casella's more significant songs; for these require a bold spirit, an infallible sense of pitch and a sublime indifference to the listener's squeamishness. Like the early piano pieces, the first songs are innocuous enough, though by no means without beauty. The "Night in May," for voice and orchestra, written in 1913—and hence in the composer's thirty-first year—marks the first definite establishment of his own harmonic procedure. Two years later in "Adieu à la Vie," a setting of four poems by Tagore in André Gide's translation, he shows the utmost disregard for everything except his own ideals, his own conception of the truth. The piano is asked to yield sounds and timbres heretofore unperceived, and against the sometimes excruciating harmonies the singer must maintain a truly terrifying independence. Yet the open-minded will find in these songs lofty and uncompromising beauty, an inescapable realism, a profound melancholy and solemnity, while the ever-present philistine will regard them as wilfully ugly, consciously distorted and—most damning epithet of all—cerebral. Thus does history repeat itself.

The Suite of To-Morrow

As an orchestral composer Casella began his career with a Symphony in B minor, written in 1905 and published by Mathot of Paris. The score bears this dedication "A mon cher Maître et ami, Xavier Leroux." Saving a delight in sonority and a lavish employment of arresting instrumental combinations, this early symphony is singularly unyouthful. It is compact, restrained, disdainful of mere lusciousness and sentimental appeal. Moreover the predominating influence, so far as such idioms are distinguishable nowadays, seems to have been neither Italian nor German, but French. As Casella entered the Conservatory in Paris at thirteen and thereafter was constantly associated with French musicians, such flavor is in no way surprising. In the Second Symphony Mr. Guido Gatti, archchampion of the new Italians, finds traces of Wagner and Strauss, coupled with a tendency to "break forth into impassioned Mediterranean accents.' In a subsequent Suite in C major and, needless to say, in the rhapsody "Italia," Casella is at once more himself and truer to his musical inheritance. As the latter piece is under consideration for performance at a later Symphony Concert a word or two regarding it will not be amiss. The music is based on snatches of folk-song and by turns it is savage, gloomy, passionate and gently lyrical. A note prefaced to score best explains the content:

> In this Rhapsody the compos wished to evoke in music (but with suggestion of programme') the life Sicily and Naples; the former is d closed—tragic, superstitious, fevers under a flaming and terrible sun, in the inferno of sulphur mines, wh the latter bursts forth—turbulent, re less, wildly alive with joy, in the mi of the enchantment of the Bay of Napl

Casella's sole work for the stage, still unperformed there, is his ballet Couvent sur l'Eau." Written in 191 this music, according to Mr. Gatti, init a transformation of the composer's nique. But that by no means implies Casella the radical, the manipulato Schönbergian dissonance, is here in flower. Rather, much of the score fo familiar methods of harmony and me but oftener than not in a spirit of lesque. Again to quote Mr. Gatti:

> Its music was written to a grace plot in a seventeenth century ambie by the poet Vandoyer. In it appe tenuous, powdered, languid figu against a scenic background of pa canals and marble, moon-lit palac Its dances are whimsical, vertiginous. . . . The comedy is one in which choreography predominates; yet here and there sound accents of calm sorrow and sustained joy, one and the other felt by seventeenth century hearts and voiced by masked and powdered figures . . . and his genius has been able to hold the balance between the languid tenderness and the airy scepticism with which seventeenth century Venice was impregnated. The theme of the Bacarola and that of the Sarabanda—which somewhat recalls that of the Suite—deploy themselves with genuine vocal breadth and sway in a dream-like atmosphere; there is a breath of sensuality which seems to be given forth by the summer night, over the black sweeping waters of the lagoon. Consuelo's vocalized melody, flowing along in the popular rhythm of the gondola song, overflows its bounds of orchestral ornament like one of those great carnivorous flowers of tranquil aspect which exhale the sharpest perfume of moral passion. In the quartet of the little old ladies, on the other hand, there's screeching chatter, and it is as though a convention of hapless mouths were blindly opening the latter in obedience to the impulse of vertigo. This effect is obtained by instrumental timbres in the higher octave, with flute and harp pizzicatos (sic), with xylophone, celesta and bells; and it is an effect whose grotesqueness is almost death-like, one which makes the listener recall certain unforgettable groups of Goya.

The Suite from this ballet, as it will be heard to-morrow runs in five parts: Marche de fête Ronde d'enfants; Barcarolle; Sarabande; Pas des Vieilles Dames and Nocturne. In the March, in the Rondo on a childish tune and in the old ladies' dance (Allegretto molto moderato e ridiculo), the composer is frankly playful; but the Barcarolle with its haunting, wordless soprano solo and the Tristan-like melody of the Nocturne are deliberately and affectingly sensuous. Purposely diatonic as much of this music is, there are many harmonic and rhythmic effects that forecast Casella's later and more characteristic manner. It is interesting to note that this Suite is dedicated to Mr. Monteux and that it received first performance under the composer's direction, at one of the Con-

TIGHT BINDING

Sonata for and pieces for piano and flute and string quartet constitute Casella's in chamber-music. A warm ad of Mahler, he has transcribed for piano the latter's Seventh Symphony an editor he has made revisions of Preludes, Waltzes and Nocturnes of in, of the pieces for clavicembalo and of Frescobaldi, and brought out es a "Critical and Technical" edition Beethoven's Sonatas. Of a part with labors is the composition of cadenzas for the D-minor Concerto of Mozart. latest enthusiasm is said to be for rican rag-time and in his Five Pieces String Quartet are a "Valse Ridicule" a "Fox-Trott." Strangest exercise he has composed a set of five pieces the pianola in which, unhampered by limitations of the human hands, he oits the utmost resources and maxi- sonority of the pianoforte. An ex- pianist, he has been heard both as and in chamber-music through the and breadth of Europe, and he has ted much attention to reawakening est in the harpsichord and other al- forgotten instruments. To complete tale of his activities, he has directed permanent or guest-conductor, many of leading orchestras of France, Hol- Italy and Austria.

r, Too

many another musician since the of Berlioz, Casella writes in words as with notes. He has contributed to the "Societa Italiana di Musica na," an organ of propaganda, while culent magazine of his own, "Ars absorbs much of his time and en- At least one example of his writing en translated into English, an appre- of Rossini which appeared a few ago in The Chesterian and later its way to one of the programme of the Symphony Orchestra. A por- f it is worth requoting here:

few months ago I was present at rtain concert, no mater in what or country, where a performance delightful symphony of Mozart given. My pleasure was great, but would seem that my face betrayed sign of it, for in the middle of the gio, my neighbor, an amiable and thy man, whose millions allow him which my poverty entirely pre- es me from, to have one's music posed by others and merely affixing signature thereto, my neighbor, y, cautiously remarked to me, w you must suffer listening to such ic, and how I admire your self- rol!"

lthough I have long ago given up problem of determining the limit human stupidity, I turned a some- t bewildered face on my compan- and rejoined as quietly as possible: dear colleague, what if I told you I adore Rossini?"

er, in the course of the same article, admitting that Rossini had not the d humanity" of Beethoven, Casella sagaciously. "But then a small gen- so often more amusing than a great Without wishing to be irreverent or xical, I will take the liberty of point- t that Boccacio is less forbidding Dante, Scarlatti less austere than and Tintoretto certainly more agree- o look at than Michael Angelo."

ic?

return by way of conclusion to Ca- more important work—composition— be said for the benefit of those who in contrasts and comparisons that less of a romanticist than Pizzetti Respighi, less subtle than Malipiero, a lyricist than Castelnuovo. On the hand he is the most virile, the most ctual and the most cosmopolitan er of the group. Incidentally, he was rst of them to compel recognition d. Perhaps more than any of his enions, he has been accused of eclec- , that horror of small and parochial By their independence of the mu- traditions of their own country and eager assimilation of the music of schools these neo-Italians have d that dread reproach. Indeed, Ca- and Malipiero are condemned as vio- un-Italian because, forsooth, they not confined themselves to the ways rdi and Puccini. But it must be re- bered that nearly all composers who made their mark have, in varying e, availed themselves of the musical ulas of nations other than their own.

BRILLIANT OPENING OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Orchestra with Mr. Monteux Leading, Approaches its Pre-War Standard—Mr. Nyiregyhazi the Soloist

On Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its forty-first year, gave a brilliant opening to the Cambridge series of concerts at Sanders Theatre. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakow, "Sadko"; Liszt, Concerto in A major; Rabaud, Dances from "Marouf". Mr. Erwin Nyiregyhazi was the soloist.

How fresh the Mendelssohn symphony sounded! Perhaps the harmonic scheme appears rather evident to some. The work was composed eighty-eight years ago. Many question the title of "Italian" symphony because the first three movements do not suggest Italy in any way. Mendelssohn was not writing a tone-poem. What exquisite light passages for strings it contains, and what a wealth of thematic material so skillfully developed!

"Sadko", composed by Rimsky Korsakow in 1867, has been called the first Russian symphonic poem. It was the germ from which the opera of the same name sprang in 1896. Korsakow re-orchestrated the tone-poem in 1891, the new version of which is always played. How it recalled the unforgettable Diaghileff Ballet Russe, and the gorgeous Bakst settings and costumes! Korsakow is always remarkably effective with the orchestra, no matter if at times he sounds banal on the pianoforte. The combination of the barbaric splendor of Russian folk-music and oriental sensuousness never fails to charm; his orchestration will forever serve as a perfect model. It is a pity then to think that he is only known to us through "Scheherazade", "Capricco Espagnol", and "Le Coq d'Or", when there are some fifteen other operas and ballets totally unknown outside of Petrograd, Moscow, and Paris.

Soloist's Rendering Superb

Few people in the audience Thursday night had ever heard of Mr. Nyiregyhazi before. Few will ever forget him. They did not know he was a Hungarian of only eighteen years of age. His playing of Liszt's pyrotechnic concerto was superb, and he surpassed both previous performances in Boston. His technique was flawless; his control of tone in the more sentimental passages was in excellent taste. Fortunately "Sadko" had sufficiently aroused a decidedly frigid audience to give him the warm applause he merited.

The dances from "Marouf" by Rabaud suffer in concert presentation. Their oriental monotony becomes occidental monotony, and the contrast they make to the rest of this charming opera cannot be realized. True there are some extremely clever orchestral effects, but the ballet and settings are felt to be lacking. The highly contrapuntal climax does not "sound" through with the clarity of the rest of the opera. "Marouf" has been performed in its entirety in New York, and at the Opera Comique in Paris.

[illegible] in Paris before [illegible] made, light music, [illegible] resource of the modern orchestra [illegible]. The tunes and rhythms [illegible] simple without being vulgar. The harmonies are daring without being ugly.

Although the music loses much of its effect without the ballet it was written to accompany, it obviously pleased the audience. Mr Monteux was at his best, which is very good, indeed, in this piece. Mrs Littlefield sang the interesting measures for soprano, which are without words, intelligently and beautifully.

Mr Goodrich was deservedly applauded for his remarkably effective transcription for orchestra and organ of Franck's Second Chorale for organ, in which he played the organ part. He has arranged the music so that the orchestra supplements without duplicating the organ. The orchestra can do much, especially in percussion and strings, that is beyond the resources of the organ. When the wood wind is directly compared with the corresponding organ stops the orchestra far surpasses the organ. Mr Goodrich has not made the organ enter into futile competition with the orchestra. He has used it chiefly for its characteristic diapason quality, and let the orchestra do the rest.

The symphony was Brahms' Third, which was given a workaday performance, often not a little heavy-footed. It is hard to avoid making Brahms' orchestration sound clumsy, since it often is so in fact.

GLOBE. Oct. 22.

באסטאן סימפאני גרייט זיך פאר אינטערעסאנטען סעזאן אין קארנעגי האל

די באסטאן סימפאני גרייט זיך פאר א סע-
זאן פון פינף קאנצערטען אין קארנעגי האל.
אין די פאלגענדע פינף דאנערשטאג-אווענדען
און שבת־נאכמיטאגס: נאוועמבער 3טער און
5טער, דעצעמבער 1טער און 3טער, יאנואר
5טער און 7טער, פעברואר 2טער און 4טער,
און מארטש 16טער און 18טער. יעדע פאר קאנ-צערטען וועלען צוזאמענגעשטעלט ווערען פון
אנדערע פראגראמען.

די באסטאן סימפאני האט געעפענט איהר
סעזאן אין באסטאן דעם 7טען, און די אוים-
נאהמע וואס דער ארקעסטער האט געקראגען,
האט נים געקאנט זיין ווארימער און שטורמי-
שער. די קוואליטי פון דער פארשטעלונג און
פון דעם אנסאמבל אין איהר איצטיגער פארם,
איז שטארק געלויבט געווארען.

פיער מאנטאו, דער בארימטער איריש־
פראנצויזישער דיריגענט, געוועזענער דיריגענט
אין מעטראפאליטען און דעם צווייטען סעזאן
מיט דעם ארקעסטער, איז געווען צו באזוך אין
יוראפ מיט'ן ציעל צו זוכען נייע ווערק, און ער
האט געבראכט איניגע ניקסיגע נאוועלטיעס.
און מר. מאנטאו איז בעוואוסט צו האבען א
הויז פאר גוטע ווערק.

ער וועט זיך אבער אבגעבען אין פרוים-ברענגען די אלטע פונקט ווי די נייע אויף א
אופן, אז דער ארקעסטער זאל באקומען דעם
גלאנץ וואס ער האט אימער געהאט אלס די
פיינסטע ארקעסטער־געזעלשאפט אין לאנד.

די סובסקריפשאנס אין באסטאן אזוי גוט
ווי אין ניו יארק זיינען שוין באלד ווי פאר-קויפט, און דער פינאנציעלער ערפאלג אזוי גוט
ווי דער ארטיסטישער, איז שוין געזיכערט.

JEW. DAY-WAHEIT Oct 16

NEW WORK GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Casella's Ballet Introduced—Goodrich at the Organ

[illegible] as well as the organ to do it justice. He endeavored to keep in the organ part music appropriate to that instrument and none other, and to give to the orchestral instruments such passages as seemed to imperatively demand their colors and sonorities. The performance was eloquent, not only on the part of Mr. Goodrich, the organ, but also the orchestra. Let us add that it is probably a streak of inborn conservatism which makes us prefer this work, with all its orchestral possibilities, as Franck wrote it, for the organ alone.

The feature of the concert, after all, was the performance of Brahms' symphony. Mr. Monteux, a modern when he discourses the music of a Casella or Strawinsky or Ravel, frequently astonishes one by his exceptional knowledge of every tradition of the classic school—and after all, the Brahms of this romantic symphony remains a classicist. To an underlying feeling for proportion and coherence, which could hardly be excelled, was added an interpretation of the rarest beauty and eloquence. This alone would have made the concert an occasion to remember.

POST. Oct. 22.

Boston Talent with Symphony

Boston talent was well represented at the third program of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of the Franck Organ Chorale in B minor was the second number and Laura Littlefield sang part of the Casella Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent Sur L'Eau."

Mr. Goodrich has been contemplating the present arrangement for the Franck Chorale for some time past. He accomplished his purpose in the latter part of the summer of 1920. He has given to each portion of the work what its character suggested or demanded in his mind. He has done this nobly and as given by the orchestra with him at the organ yesterday it was a splendid number.

The first number on the program yesterday was Brahms F Major Symphony. A majestic work, indeed, and one which keeps its proud strength within dignified bounds. In it there are delightful passages which recur again and again during the ensuing elaboration. The work is in four movements and as given by the orchestra under Mr. Monteux's leadership yesterday it proved exceedingly worthy.

The Casella number is a bright thing in its idea and construction. Glowing passages written for ballet music purpose, it is here whimsical, here calmly sorrowful and here filled with a certain sustained joy.

The melodies are well written, their style being flowing and clear. In the Barcarolle Mrs. Littlefield's voice made a delightful effect against the orchestral background. In the "Old Ladies' Dance" one was reminded of witches cavorting about in toothless ecstacy but with none the less striking and wild effects in the music.

TRAV. Oct. 22.

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, October 29th, Pierre Monteaux will present the following program: The Suite in D major, No. 4, By Bach; Schubert's incidental music to the play, "Rosamunde," Berlioz's Overture "The Roman Carnival," and Theophile Ysaye's First Symphony in F major. This work by the distinguished brother of the violinist will on this occasion have its first performance in Boston.

AMER. Oct. 22.

THIRD CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

In spite of the fact that a symphony by Brahms headed the program at yesterday afternoon's concert, the orchestral excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'eau" made the most memorable feature of the performance, perhaps because of the inherent charm of the music and possibly because dainty bits like these of Casella's afford a better vehicle for Mr. Monteux's genius.

Casella delights by his very freshness and youth, by his nerve and agility and unexpectedness. If the Saraband was to celebrate a dance characterized by the prudes as "pestiferous," certainly they would have regarded Casella's Ronde D'Enfants as exertmely provocative. The "Pas des Vieilles Dames," with its gently accentuated minuet steps, echoed a mild humor in every note.

Yet the solemn beauty of Franck's organ chorale would alone have made yesterday's performance significant. Franck strikes a responsive chord in nearly everyone. The sonorous quality of tone, the fervor and the emotional power of the climaxes need no exposition nor any praise. Mr. Goodrich's playing is too well known and appreciated to need comment.

The Brahms symphony afforded considerable contrast to the Beethoven "Eroica," performed last [illegible]

[illegible] the first and last movements, to the same title. Many people have found it strongly suggestive of Wagner of Tristan in the plaintiveness and the exultagency of the second movement, and of Tannhauser in the first.

In this symphony, as in many of Brahms' works, he gives the really impressive and the really significant things to the wind instruments, and always they make a solid background for his theme.

The program in entirety was as follows: Symphony No. 3, in F Major, Brahms; Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich (Mr. Goodrich at the organ), Franck; Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," Casella.

ADVTSR. Oct 22.

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include the First Symphony in A major by Theophile Ysaye, the highly talented brother of the Belgian violinist, which will have its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Another number of interest will be the Suite of Bach in D major, No. 4, which, because its authenticity was for a long while not established, has never before been heard at these concerts. The remainder of the program will consist of ballet numbers and the second entr'acte from the incidental music which Schubert wrote to the play "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival."

HERALD - Oct. 23.

Fourth Symphony Programme

The programme for the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Oct. 28, and Saturday evening, October 29, will include the First Symphony in A major by Theophile Ysaye, the highly talented brother of the Belgian violinist, which is to have its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Another number of interest will be the Suite of Bach in D major, No. 4. The remainder of the programme will consist of ballet numbers and the second entr-acte from the incidental music which Schubert wrote to the play "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival."

POST - Oct. 23.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, fourth program; Symphony in A, Theophile Ysaye (first time here); Suite in D major, Bach (first time at these concerts); incidental music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; "Roman Carnival" Overture, Berlioz. There is no soloist.

GLOBE - Oct 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is undertaking as large a travelling schedule as possible this year, which will include the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Baltimore, Washington and Richmond, and as far north as Montreal, besides the 48 regular concerts in Boston.

Pierre Monteux spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a symphony concert in which he introduced the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla-Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe in quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest of which will probably figure on his programmes here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and tomorrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fourel, who has come frm Europe to head the viola section. He is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartet, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartet was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the '80s.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence include Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America, shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of 15, this artist was praised by Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer. His teacher was Josef Joachim.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, first came to this country in 1912 and gave concerts, besides his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other pianist, Raymond Havens, is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Havens is a native of Providence, and his early training also took place in this city. He has given concerts in New York, other cities of the East, and in Europe.

The latest announcement of musical events in Providence is that of the Boston Symphony concerts. These are to be on Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24 and Feb. 28 and April 11, in Infantry Hall. These concerts are included in the 41st annual season of this organization which opened in Boston on Oct. 7.

PROV. JOURN. O

Post - Standard

R. 18, 1921.

OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM

erre Monteaux Gives Brilliant Reading of Cesar Franck Symphony—Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Themes Played With Splendid Spirit.

fore an audience of 1,200 persons, esenting the strictly musical folk he community, the Boston Sym- ny orchestra, under the baton of re Monteaux, gave a concert of an edingly high character at the state ory last night. Mr. Monteaux and fine company of players won the eciation of every person in the with the result that there was nuine ovation for players and con- tor. In Mr. Monteaux the Boston phony organization has a polished, ified and musical conductor who fests great intelligence, and at same time is as modest as he is icianly.

Franck symphony in D minor een played here before. To it Mr. eaux gives a reading that is bril- in itself, and his conception is sustained by a group of more than 100 players of exceptional skill. There was marked beauty of tone, color and warmth of delivery. The work commanded far more admiration than on a previous occasion when it was played here by a smaller orchestra from the west. In fact the beauty of the composition, especially the first movement, never has been so revealed in Syracuse. It was a rare combination of volume, beautiful tonal effects and thrilling climax.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice on Spanish themes was a delight. It is most familiar, but never tiresome. It was played with splendid spirit and the work of the concert master, R. Burgin, was notable for beauty and finish. "The Creatures of Prometheus," by Beethoven, was most interesting and gave an opportunity for the violoncello, flute, clarinet and harp to be used to the best possible advantage.

The concert was brought to a stirring close with the Wagner overture to "Tannhauser," which never fails to bring enjoyment to a critical audience when given with the dash and finish which characterized its reading last night.

It was good to have heard the Boston symphony again after a long absence, and Syracuse was fortunate to be included in a short tour outside of the New England states and New York city.

There was a large reception at the Clark music store in the afternoon for the two harpists of the orchestra, Madame Lucille Delcourt and Alfred Holy, the distinguished player in ensemble, soloist and teacher.

---

tury as it was known to Venice. There is certainly the flavor of the archaic, also of what is decorative and extravagant. There are passages of very poetic color. This music must be effective on the stage, and without the stage spectacle it makes a vivid impressions. It is virtuoso stuff, and further than that one is not willing to go after a single hearing.

Mr. Goodrich's Contribution

Mr. Goodrich has orchestrated Franck's chorale in a musicianly and respectful manner, knowing and lov- [illegible] reserved for some

TIGHT BINDING

11

Monteux in the Casino de Paris last of them before the war early Sonata for violoncello and piano, pieces for piano and flute and recent string quartet constitute Casella's efforts in chamber-music. A warm admirer of Mahler, he has transcribed for the piano the latter's Seventh Symphony. As an editor he has made revisions of the Preludes, Waltzes and Nocturnes of Chopin, of the pieces for clavicembalo and organ of Frescobaldi, and brought out besides a "Critical and Technical" edition of Beethoven's Sonatas. Of a part with these labors is the composition of cadenzas for the D-minor Concerto of Mozart. His latest enthusiasm is said to be for American rag-time and in his Five Pieces for String Quartet are a "Valse Ridicule" and a "Fox-Trott." Strangest exercise of all, he has composed a set of five pieces for the pianola in which, unhampered by the limitations of the human hands, he exploits the utmost resources and maximum sonority of the pianoforte. An excellent pianist, he has been heard both as soloist and in chamber-music through the length and breadth of Europe, and he has devoted much attention to reawakening interest in the harpsichord and other almost forgotten instruments. To complete the tale of his activities, he has directed as permanent or guest-conductor, many of the leading orchestras of France, Holland, Italy and Austria.

Writer, Too

Like many another musician since the time of Berlioz, Casella writes in words as well as with notes. He has contributed largely to the "Società Italiana di Musica Moderna," an organ of propaganda, while a truculent magazine of his own, "Ars Nova," absorbs much of his time and energy. At least one example of his writing has been translated into English, an appreciation of Rossini which appeared a few months ago in The Chesterian and later found its way to one of the programme books of the Symphony Orchestra. A portion of it is worth requoting here:

A few months ago I was present at a certain concert, no mater in what town or country, where a performance of a delightful symphony of Mozart was given. My pleasure was great, but it would seem that my face betrayed no sign of it, for in the middle of the Adagio, my neighbor, an amiable and wealthy man, whose millions allow him that which my poverty entirely precludes me from, to have one's music composed by others and merely affixing one's signature thereto, my neighbor, I say, cautiously remarked to me, "How you must suffer listening to such music, and how I admire your self-control!"

Although I have long ago given up the problem of determining the limit of human stupidity, I turned a somewhat bewildered face on my companion and rejoined as quietly as possible: "My dear colleague, what if I told you that I adore Rossini?"

Later, in the course of the same article, after admitting that Rossini had not the humanity" of Beethoven, Casella sagaciously. "But then a small genius is so often more amusing than a great one. Without wishing to be irreverent or paradoxical, I will take the liberty of pointing out that Boccacio is less forbidding than Dante, Scarlatti less austere than Bach and Tintoretto certainly more agreeable to look at than Michael Angelo."

Eclectic?

To return by way of conclusion to Casella's more important work—composition—it may be said for the benefit of those who delight in contrasts and comparisons that he is less of a romanticist than Pizzetti and Respighi, less subtle than Malipiero, less of a lyricist than Castelnuovo. On the other hand he is the most virile, the most intellectual and the most cosmopolitan member of the group. Incidentally, he was the first of them to compel recognition abroad. Perhaps more than any of his companions, he has been accused of eclecticism, that horror of small and parochial minds. By their independence of the musical traditions of their own country and their eager assimilation of the music of other schools these neo-Italians have earned that dread reproach. Indeed, Casella and Malipiero are condemned as violently un-Italian because, forsooth, they have not confined themselves to the ways of Verdi and Puccini. But it must be remembered that nearly all composers who have made their mark have, in varying degree, availed themselves of the musical formulas of nations other than their own.

(Quarterly)

n a subsequent edless to say, in sella is at once his musical in-nce is under ence at a later
or two regard-the music is k-song and by passionate and prefaced to tent:
the compose (but with n the life of former is dis
s, feverish rible sun, or mines, while ulent, reck-n the midst
ity of Naples the stage, as his ballet, in 1911-Gatti, initia
poser's tec implies th manipulator of here in ful score follow and melody, spirit of bur-Gatti:
a graceful
ry ambient it appear d figures
d of parks
ilt palaces

BRILLIANT OPENING OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Orchestra with Mr. Monteux Leading, Approaches its Pre-War Standard—Mr. Nyiregyhazi the Soloist

On Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its forty-first year, gave a brilliant opening to the Cambridge series of concerts at Sanders Theatre. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakow, "Sadko"; Liszt, Concerto in A major; Rabaud, Dances from "Marouf". Mr. Erwin Nyiregyhazi was the soloist.

How fresh the Mendelssohn symphony sounded! Perhaps the harmonic scheme appears rather evident to some. The work was composed eighty-eight years ago. Many question the title of "Italian" symphony because the first three movements do not suggest Italy in any way. Mendelssohn was not writing a tone-poem. What exquisite light passages for strings it contains, and what a wealth of thematic material so skillfully developed!

"Sadko", composed by Rimsky Korsakow in 1867, has been called the first Russian symphonic poem. It was the germ from which the opera of the same name sprang in 1896. Korsakow re-orchestrated the tone-poem in 1891, the new version of which is always played. How it recalled the unforgettable Diaghileff Ballet Russe, and the gorgeous Bakst settings and costumes! Korsakow is always remarkably effective with the orchestra, no matter if at times he sounds banal on the pianoforte. The combination of the barbaric splendor of Russian folk-music and oriental sensuousness never fails to charm; his orchestration will forever serve as a perfect model. It is a pity then to think that he is only known to us through "Scheherazade", "Capricco Espagnol", and "Le Coq d'Or", when there are some fifteen other operas and ballets totally unknown outside of Petrograd, Moscow, and Paris.

Soloist's Rendering Superb

Few people in the audience Thursday night had ever heard of Mr. Nyiregyhazi before. Few will ever forget him. They did not know he was a Hungarian of only eighteen years of age. His playing of Liszt's pyrotechnic concerto was superb, and he surpassed both previous performances in Boston. His technique was flawless; his control of tone in the more sentimental passages was in excellent taste. Fortunately "Sadko" had sufficiently aroused a decidedly frigid audience to give him the warm applause he merited.

The dances from "Marouf" by Rabaud suffer in concert presentation. Their oriental monotony becomes occidental monotony, and the contrast they make to the rest of this charming opera cannot be realized. True there are some extremely clever orchestral effects, but the ballet and settings are felt to be lacking. The highly contrapuntal climax does not "sound" through with the clarity of the rest of the opera. "Marouf" has been performed in its entirety in New York, and at the Opera Comique in Paris.

---

cated to Mr. Monteux, who conducted the first performance in Paris before the war. It is deftly made, light music, employing every resource of the modern orchestra skilfully. The tunes and rhythms are simple without being vulgar. The harmonies are daring without being ugly.

Although the music loses much of its effect without the ballet it was written to accompany, it obviously pleased the audience. Mr Monteux was at his best, which is very good, indeed, in this piece. Mrs Littlefield sang the interesting measures for soprano, which are without words, intelligently and beautifully.

Mr Goodrich was deservedly applauded for his remarkably effective transcription for orchestra and organ of Franck's Second Chorale for organ, in which he played the organ part. He has arranged the music so that the orchestra supplements without duplicating the organ. The orchestra can do much, especially in percussion and strings, that is beyond the resources of the organ. When the wood wind is directly compared with the corresponding organ stops the orchestra far surpasses the organ. Mr Goodrich has not made the organ enter into futile competition with the orchestra. He has used it chiefly for its characteristic diapason quality, and let the orchestra do the rest.

The symphony was Brahms' Third, which was given a workaday performance, often not a little heavy-footed. It is hard to avoid making Brahms' orchestration sound clumsy, since it often is so in fact.

GLOBE. Oct. 22.

באסטאן סימפאני גרייט זיך פאר אינטערעסאנטע סעזאן אין קארנעגיע האל

די באסטאן סימפאני גרייט זיך פאר א סע־זאן פון וויכטיגע קאנצערטען אין קארנעגי האל, אין די פאלגענדע פינף דאנערשטאג־אווענדען און שבת־נאכמיטאגס: נאוועמבער 3טער און 5טער, דעצעמבער 1טער און 3טער, יאנואר 5טער און 7טער, פעברואר 2טער און 4טער, און מארטש 16טער און 18טער. יעדע פאר קאנ־צערטען וועלען צוזאמענגעשטעלט ווערען פון אנדערע פראגראמען.

די באסטאן סימפאני האט געעפענט איהר סעזאן אין באסטאן דעם 7טען, און די אויפ־נאהמע וואס דער ארקעסטער האט געקראגען, האט ניט געקאנט זיין ווארימער און שטורמי־שער. די קוואליטי פון דער פארשטעלונג און פון דעם אנסאמבל אין איהר איצטיגער פארם, איז שטארק געלויבט געווארען.

פיער מאנטאו, דער באריהמטער אידיש־פראנצויזישער דירינגענט, געוועזענער דירינגענט אין מעטראפאליטען און דעם צווייטען סעזאן מיט דעם ארקעסטער, איז געווען צו באזוך אין יוראפ מיט'ן ציעל צו זוכען נייע ווערק, און ער האט געבראכט אייניגע וויכטיגע נאוועלטיעס. און מר. מאנטאו איז באוואוסט צו האבען א הוש פאר גוטע ווערק.

ער וועט זיך אבער אפגעבען אין ארויס־ברענגען די אלטע פונקט ווי די נייע אויף א אופן, אז דער ארקעסטער זאל באקומען דעם גלאנץ וואס ער האט אימער געהאט אלס די פיינסטע ארקעסטער־געזעלשאפט אין לאנד.

די סובסקריפשאנס אין באסטאן אזוי גוט ווי אין ניו יארק זיינען שוין כמעט ווי פאר־קויפט, און דער פינאנציעלער ערפאלג אזוי גוט ווי דער ארטיסטישער, איז שוין געזיכערט.

JEW. DAY-WAHEIT. Oct. 14

NEW WORK GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Casella's Ballet Introduced—Goodrich at the Organ

---

time the resources of the orchestra as well as the organ to do it justice. He endeavored to keep in the organ part music appropriate to that instrument and none other, and to give to the orchestral instruments such passages as seemed to imperatively demand their colors and sonorities. The performance was eloquent, not only on the part of Mr. Goodrich, the organ, but also the orchestra. Let us add that it is probably a streak of inborn conservatism which makes us prefer this work, with all its orchestral possibilities, as Franck wrote it, for the organ alone.

The feature of the concert, after all, was the performance of Brahms' symphony. Mr. Monteux, a modern when he discourses the music of a Casella or Strawinsky or Ravel, frequently astonishes one by his exceptional knowledge of every tradition of the classic school—and after all, the Brahms of this romantic symphony remains a classicist. To an underlying feeling for proportion and coherence, which could hardly be excelled, was added an interpretation of the rarest beauty and eloquence. This alone would have made the concert an occasion to remember.

POST. Oct. 22.

Boston Talent with Symphony

Boston talent was well represented at the third program of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of the Franck Organ Chorale in B minor was the second number and Laura Littlefield sang part of the Casella Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent Sur L'Eau."

Mr. Goodrich has been contemplating the present arrangement for the Franck Chorale for some time past. He accomplished his purpose in the latter part of the summer of 1920. He has given to each portion of the work what its character suggested or demanded in his mind. He has done this nobly and as given by the orchestra with him at the organ yesterday it was a splendid number.

The first number on the program yesterday was Brahms F Major Symphony. A majestic work, indeed, and one which keeps its proud strength within dignified bounds. In it there are delightful passages which recur again and again during the ensuing elaboration. The work is in four movements and as given by the orchestra under Mr. Monteux's leadership yesterday it proved exceedingly worthy.

The Casella number is a bright thing in its idea and construction. Glowing passages written for ballet music purpose, it is here whimsical, here calmly sorrowful and here filled with a certain sustained joy.

The melodies are well written, their style being flowing and clear. In the Barcarolle Mrs. Littlefield's voice made a delightful effect against the orchestral background. In the "Old Ladies' Dance" one was reminded of witches cavorting about in toothless ecstacy but with none the less striking and wild effects in the music.

TRAV. Oct. 22.

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, October 29th, Pierre Monteaux will present the following program The Suite in D major, No. 4, By Bach Schubert's incidental music to the play, "Rosamunde," Berlioz's Overture "The Roman Carnival," and Theophile Ysaye's First Symphony in F major. This work by the distinguished brother of the violinist will on this occasion have its first performance in Boston.

AMER. Oct. 22.

THIRD CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

In spite of the fact that a symphony by Brahms headed the program at yesterday afternoon's concert, the orchestral excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'eau" made the most memorable feature of the performance, perhaps because of the inherent charm of the music and possibly because dainty bits like these of Casella's afford a better vehicle for Mr. Monteux's genius.

Casella delights by his very freshness and youth, by his nerve and agility and unexpectedness. If the Saraband was to celebrate a dance characterized by the prudes as "pestiferous," certainly they would have regarded Casella's Ronde D'Enfants as exertmely provocative. The "Pas des Vieilles Dames," with its gently accentuated minuet steps, echoed a mild humor in every note.

Yet the solemn beauty of Franck's organ chorale would alone have made yesterday's performance significant. Franck strikes a responsive chord in nearly everyone. The sonorous quality of tone, the fervor and the emotional power of the climaxes need no exposition nor any praise. Mr. Goodrich's playing is too well known and appreciated to need comment.

The Brahms symphony afforded considerable contrast to the Beethoven "Eroica," performed last week, although this, too, has some claims in the first and last movements, to the same title. Many people have found it strongly suggestive of Wagner of Tristan in the plaintiveness and the exultagency of the second movement, and of Tannhauser in the first.

---

In this symphony, as in many of Brahms' works, he gives the really impressive and the really significant things to the wind instruments, and always they make a solid background for his theme.

The program in entirety was as follows: Symphony No. 3, in F Major, Brahms; Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich (Mr. Goodrich at the organ), Franck; Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," Casella.

ADVTSR. Oct 22.

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include the First Symphony in A major by Theophile Ysaye, the highly talented brother of the Belgian violinist, which will have its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Another number of interest will be the Suite of Bach in D major, No. 4, which, because its authenticity was for a long while not established, has never before been heard at these concerts. The remainder of the program will consist of ballet numbers and the second entr'acte from the incidental music which Schubert wrote to the play "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival."

HERALD-Oct. 23.

Fourth Symphony Programme

The programme for the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Oct. 28, and Saturday evening, October 29, will include the First Symphony in A major by Theophile Ysaye, the highly talented brother of the Belgian violinist, which is to have its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Another number of interest will be the Suite of Bach in D major, No. 4. The remainder of the programme will consist of ballet numbers and the second entr-acte from the incidental music which Schubert wrote to the play "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival."

POST-Oct. 23.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, fourth program; Symphony in A, Theophile Ysaye (first time here); Suite in D major, Bach (first time at these concerts); incidental music from "Rosemunde," Schubert; "Roman Carnival" Overture, Berlioz. There is no soloist.

GLOBE-Oct. 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is undertaking as large a travelling schedule as possible this year, which will include the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Baltimore, Washington and Richmond, and as far north as Montreal, besides the 48 regular concerts in Boston.

Pierre Monteux spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a symphony concert in which he introduced the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla-Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe in quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest of which will probably figure on his programmes here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and tomorrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fourel, who has come frm Europe to head the viola section. He is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartet, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartet was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the '80s.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence include Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America, shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of 15, this artist was praised by Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer. His teacher was Josef Joachim.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, first came to this country in 1912 and gave concerts, besides his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other pianist, Raymond Havens, is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Havens is a native of Providence, and his early training also took place in this city. He has given concerts in New York, other cities of the East, and in Europe.

The latest announcement of musical events in Providence is that of the Boston Symphony concerts. These are to be on Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24 and Feb. 28 and April 11, in Infantry Hall. These concerts are included in the 41st annual season of this organization which opened in Boston on Oct. 7

PROV-JOUNL-Oct. 23.

Post-Standard

BER 18, 1921.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RECEIVED WITH ENTHUSIASM

Pierre Monteaux Gives Brilliant Reading of Cesar Franck Symphony—Rimsky-Korsakoff Caprice on Spanish Themes Played With Splendid Spirit.

Before an audience of 1,200 persons, representing the strictly musical folk of the community, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Pierre Monteaux, gave a concert of an exceedingly high character at the state armory last night. Mr. Monteaux and his fine company of players won the appreciation of every person in the house with the result that there was a genuine ovation for players and conductor. In Mr. Monteaux the Boston Symphony organization has a polished, dignified and musical conductor who manifests great intelligence, and at the same time is as modest as he is musicianly.

The Franck symphony in D minor has been played here before. To it Mr. Monteaux gives a reading that is brilliant in itself, and his conception is sustained by a group of more than 100 players of exceptional skill. There was marked beauty of tone, color and warmth of delivery. The work commanded far more admiration than on a previous occasion when it was played here by a smaller orchestra from the west. In fact the beauty of the composition, especially the first movement, never has been so revealed in Syracuse. It was a rare combination of volume, beautiful tonal effects and thrilling climax.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff caprice on Spanish themes was a delight. It is most familiar, but never tiresome. It was played with splendid spirit and the work of the concert master, R. Burgin, was notable for beauty and finish. "The Creatures of Prometheus," by Beethoven, was most interesting and gave an opportunity for the violoncello, flute, clarinet and harp to be used to the best possible advantage.

The concert was brought to a stirring close with the Wagner overture to "Tannhauser," which never fails to bring enjoyment to a critical audience when given with the dash and finish which characterized its reading last night.

It was good to have heard the Boston symphony again after a long absence, and Syracuse was fortunate to be included in a short tour outside of the New England states and New York city.

There was a large reception at the Clark music store in the afternoon for the two harpists of the orchestra, Madame Lucille Delcourt and Alfred Holy, the distinguished player in ensemble, soloist and teacher.

---

tury as it was known to Venice. There is certainly the flavor of the archaic, also of what is decorative and extravagant. There are passages of very poetic color. This music must be effective on the stage, and without the stage spectacle it makes a vivid impressions. It is virtuoso stuff, and further than that one is not willing to go after a single hearing.

Mr. Goodrich's Contribution

Mr. Goodrich has orchestrated Franck's chorale in a musicianly and respectful manner. Knowing and loving this work, he had craved for some

TIGHT BINDING

Monteux in the Casino de Paris-last of them before the war.
An early Sonata for violoncello and iano, pieces for piano and flute and cent string quartet constitute Casella's forts in chamber-music. A warm ad-nirer of Mahler, he has transcribed for he piano the latter's Seventh Symphony.
As an editor he has made revisions of he Preludes, Waltzes and Nocturnes of Chopin, of the pieces for clavicembalo and rgan of Frescobaldi, and brought out esides a "Critical and Technical" edition of Beethoven's Sonatas. Of a part with hese labors is the composition of cadens for the D-minor Concerto of Mozart.
latest enthusiasm is said to be for merican rag-time and in his Five Pieces String Quartet are a "Valse Ridicule" nd a "Fox-Trott." Strangest exercise all, he has composed a set of five pieces the pianola in which, unhampered by limitations of the human hands, he ploits the utmost resources and maxim sonority of the pianoforte. An ex-llent pianist, he has been heard both as oloist and in chamber-music through the ngth and breadth of Europe, and he has evoted much attention to reawakening erest in the harpsichord and other al-st forgotten instruments. To complete tale of his activities, he has directed permanent or guest-conductor, many of leading orchestras of France, Hold, Italy and Austria.

iter, Too

ike many another musician since the e of Berlioz, Casella writes in words well as with notes. He has contributed gely to the "Società Italiana di Musica derna," an organ of propaganda, while truculent magazine of his own, "Ars a," absorbs much of his time and en-
y. At least one example of his writing been translated into English, an appreion of Rossini which appeared a few nths ago in The Chesterian and later nd its way to one of the programme ks of the Symphony Orchestra. A por-of it is worth requoting here:

> A few months ago I was present at > certain concert, no mater in what > own or country, where a performance > a delightful symphony of Mozart > vas given. My pleasure was great, but > would seem that my face betrayed > o sign of it, for in the middle of the > Adagio my neighbor, an amiable and > wealthy man, whose millions allow him > hat which my poverty entirely pre-> ludes me from, to have one's music > omposed by others and merely affixing > ne's signature thereto, my neighbor, > say, cautiously remarked to me,
> "How you must suffer listening to such > music, and how I admire your self> ontrol!"
>
> Although I have long ago given up > he problem of determining the limit > f human stupidity, I turned a some> what bewildered face on my compan> on and rejoined as quietly as possible:
> "My dear colleague, what if I told you > hat I adore Rossini?"

Later, in the course of the same article, ile admitting that Rossini had not the road humanity" of Beethoven, Casella s sagaciously. "But then a small gen-is so often more amusing than a great . Without wishing to be irreverent or radoxical, I will take the liberty of point-out that Boccacio is less forbidding n Dante, Scarlatti less austere than ch, and Tintoretto certainly more agree-e to look at than Michael Angelo."

ectic?

o return by way of conclusion to Cala's more important work—composition—may be said for the benefit of those who ight in contrasts and comparisons that is less of a romanticist than Pizzetti
l Respighi, less subtle than Malipiero, s of a lyricist than Castelnuovo. On the er hand he is the most virile, the most ellectual and the most cosmopolitan mber of the group. Incidentally, he was first of them to compel recognition road. Perhaps more than any of his mpanions, he has been accused of eclec-ism, that horror of small and parochial nds. By their independence of the mu-al traditions of their own country and eir eager assimilation of the music of her schools these neo-Italians have rned that dread reproach. Indeed, Ca-lla and Malipiero are condemned as vio-ntly un-Italian because, forsooth, they ave not confined themselves to the ways Verdi and Puccini. But it must be reembered that nearly all composers who ave made their mark have, in varying egree, availed themselves of the musical rmulas of nations other than their own.
Vas not Richard Wagner, with his diverse ndebtedness to Beethoven, Weber, Bellini, pontini and Meyerbeer, to Bach and Liszt,
he greatest eclectic of them all?

WARREN STOREY SMITH

terly)

In a subsequent needless to say, in Casella is at once
ruer to his musical in-latter piece is under performance at a later
a word or two regard-amiss. The music is is of folk-song and by gloomy. nate and note prefaced to the
the content:

sody the composer
n music (but with no gramme!) the life of
; the former is dis-
perstitious, feverish, and terrible sun, or sulphur mines, while rth—turbulent, reck-filled with joy, in the midst of the Bay of Naples.

k for the stage, and re, is his ballet, "La
Written in 1911-12,
to Mr. Gatti, initiates the composer's tech-means implies that the manipulator of score, is here in full of the score follows
harmony and melody,
in a spirit of bur-
s Mr. Gatti:

tten to a graceful century ambient
In it appear languid figures,
background of parks
moon-lit palaces.

For the Symphony Concerts of next eek, Mr. Monteux's programme ranges om Bach, seldom heard of late from the chestra, to a Symphony, new to Boston, Théophile Ysaye, brother of the eminent olinist and conductor. Bach's Suite in major begins the listed pieces; then folw Schubert's incidental music to the play, Rosamond," and Berloz's Overture, "Ron Carnival"; while the younger Ysaye's mphony ends the day.

TRANS.

BRILLIANT OPENING OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Orchestra with Mr. Monteux Leading, Approaches its Pre-War Standard—Mr. Nyiregyhazi the Soloist

On Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its forty-first year, gave a brilliant opening to the Cambridge series of concerts at Sanders Theatre. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakow, "Sadko"; Liszt, Concerto in A major; Rabaud, Dances from "Marouf". Mr. Erwin Nyiregyhazi was the soloist.

How fresh the Mendelssohn symphony sounded! Perhaps the harmonic scheme appears rather evident to some. The work was composed eighty-eight years ago. Many question the title of "Italian" symphony because the first three movements do not suggest Italy in any way. Mendelssohn was not writing a tone-poem. What ex uisite light passages for strings it contains, and what a wealth of thematic material so skillfully developed!

"Sadko", composed by Rimsky Korsakow in 1867, has been called the first Russian symphonic poem. It was the germ from which the opera of the same name sprang in 1896. Korsakow re-orchestrated the tone-poem in 1891, the new version of which is always played. How it recalled the unforgettable Diaghileff Ballet Russe, and the gorgeous Bakst settings and costumes! Korsakow is always remarkably effective with the orchestra, no matter if at times he sounds banal on the pianoforte. The combination of the barbaric splendor of Russian folk-music and oriental sensuousness never fails to charm; his orchestration will forever serve as a perfect model. It is a pity then to think that he is only known to us through "Scheherazade", "Capricco Espagnol", and "Le Coq d'Or", when there are some fifteen other operas and ballets totally unknown outside of Petrograd, Moscow, and Paris.

Soloist's Rendering Superb

Few people in the audience Thursday night had ever heard of Mr. Nyiregyhazi before. Few will ever forget him. They did not know he was a Hungarian of only eighteen years of age. His playing of Liszt's pyrotechnic concerto was superb, and he surpassed both previous performances in Boston. His techni ue was flawless; his control of tone in the more sentimental passages was in excellent taste. Fortunately "Sadko" had sufficiently aroused a decidedly frigid audience to give him the warm applause he merited.

The dances from "Marouf" by Rabaud suffer in concert presentation. Their oriental monotony becomes occidental monotony, and the contrast they make to the rest of this charming opera cannot be realized. True there are some extremely clever orchestral effects, but the ballet and settings are felt to be lacking. The highly contrapuntal climax does not "sound" through with the clarity of the rest of the opera. "Marouf" has been performed in its entirety in New York, and at the Opera Comi ue in Paris.

When all is said and done, Mr. Monteux deserves no end of praise. Ever since the doubtful days of two years ago, the orchestra has steadily improved until it now approaches its old standard again. No one may conduct Beethoven and Wagner like Toscanni, nor Brahms and Strauss like Muck, but Mr. Monteux is probably the most well balanced conductor we have had in years, and he excels in the contemporary music of the Russian and French schools.

A. L. S. '22.

CRIMSON. Oct. 22

CASELLA'S BALLET

cated to Mr. Monteux, who conducted the first performance in Paris before the war. It is deftly made, light music, employing every resource of the modern orchestra skilfully. The tunes and rhythms are simple without being vulgar. The harmonies are daring without being ugly.

Although the music loses much of its effect without the ballet it was written to accompany, it obviously pleased the audience. Mr Monteux was at his best, which is very good, indeed, in this piece. Mrs Littlefield sang the interesting measures for soprano, which are without words, intelligently and beautifully. Mr Goodrich was deservedly applauded for his remarkably effective transcription for orchestra and organ of Franck's Second Chorale for organ, in which he played the organ part. He has arranged the music so that the orchestra supplements without duplicating the organ. The orchestra can do much, especially in percussion and strings, that is beyond the resources of the organ. When the wood wind is directly compared with the corresponding organ stops the orchestra far surpasses the organ. Mr Goodrich has not made the organ enter into futile competition with the orchestra. He has used it chiefly for its characteristic diapason quality, and let the orchestra do the rest.

The symphony was Brahms' Third, which was given a workaday performance, often not a little heavy-footed. It is hard to avoid making Brahms' orchestration sound clumsy, since it often is so in fact.

GLOBE. Oct. 22.

באַסטאָן סימפּאָני גרייט זיך פאר אינטערעסאַנטען סעזאָן אין קאַרנעגיע האַל

די באסטאן סימפאני גרייט זיך פאר א סעזאן פון וויכטיגע קאנצערטען אין קארנעגי האל, אין די פאלגענדע פינף דאנערשטאג-אווענדען און שבת-נאכמיטאגס: נאוועמבער 3טער און 5טער, דעצעמבער 1טער און 3טער, יאנואר 5טער און 7טער, פעברואר 2טער און 4טער, און מארטש 16טער און 18טער. יעדע פאר קאנצערטען וועלען צוזאמענגעשטעלט ווערען פון אנדערע פראגראמען.

די באסטאן סימפאני האט געעפענט איהר סעזאן אין באסטאן דעם 7טען, און די אויפנאהמע וואס דער ארקעסטער האט געקראגען, האט ניט געקאנט זיין ווארימער און שטורמישער. די קוואליטי פון דער פארשטעלונג און פון דעם אנסאמבל אין איהר איצטיגער פארם, איז שטארק געלויבט געווארען.

פיער מאנטאו, דער בארימטער אידיש-פראנצויזישער דירינענט, געוועזענער דיריגענט אין מעטראפאליטען און דעם צווייטען סעזאן מיט דעם ארקעסטער, איז געווען צו באזוך אין יוראפ מיט'ן ציעל צו זוכען נייע ווערק, און ער האט געבראכט איינינע וויכטיגע נאוועלטיעס. און מר. מאנטאו איז בעוואוסט צו האבען א הויש פאר גוטע ווערק.

ער וועט זיך אבער אפגעבען אין ארויסברענגען די אלטע פונקט ווי די נייע אויף אן אופן, אז דער ארקעסטער זאל באקומען דעם גלאנץ וואס ער האט איטער נעהאט אלס די פיינסטע ארקעסטער-געזעלשאפט אין לאנד.

די סובסקריפשאנס אין באסטאן אזוי גוט ווי אין ניו יארק זיינען שוין כמעט ווי פארקויפט, און דער פינאנציעלער ערפאלג אזוי גוט ווי דער ארטיסטישער, איז שוין געזיכערט.

JEW. DAY-WAHEIT. Oct. 1

NEW WORK GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Casella's Ballet Introduced—Goodrich at the Organ

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of the 3d Symphony of Brahms; Cesar Franck's organ chorale in B-minor as arranged for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich, who was organist on this occasion, and a new ballet suite by Alfredo Casella, dedicated to Mr. Monteux.

DECORATIVE AND POETIC

Casella's music is extremely interesting. It is hard to say whether it is

Mr. Goodrich has orchestrated Franck's chorale in a musicianly and respectful manner. Knowing and loving this work he had craved for some time the resources of the orchestra as well as the organ to do it justice. He endeavored to keep in the organ part music appropriate to that instrument and none other, and to give to the orchestral instruments such passages as seemed to imperatively demand their colors and sonorities. The performance was eloquent, not only on the part of Mr. Goodrich, the organ, but also the orchestra. Let us add that it is probably a streak of inborn conservatism which makes us prefer this work, with all its orchestral possibilities, as Franck wrote it, for the organ alone.

The feature of the concert, after all, was the performance of Brahms' symphony. Mr. Monteux, a modern when he discourses the music of a Casella or Strawinsky or Ravel, frequently astonishes one by his exceptional knowledge of every tradition of the classic school—and after all, the Brahms of this romantic symphony remains a classicist. To an underlying feeling for proportion and coherence, which could hardly be excelled, was added an interpretation of the rarest beauty and eloquence. This alone would have made the concert an occasion to remember.

POST. Oct. 22.

Boston Talent with Symphony

Boston talent was well represented at the third program of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of the Franck Organ Chorale in B minor was the second number and Laura Littlefield sang part of the Casella Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent Sur L'Eau."

Mr. Goodrich has been contemplating the present arrangement for the Franck Chorale for some time past. He accomplished his purpose in the latter part of the summer of 1920. He has given to each portion of the work what its character suggested or demanded in his mind. He has done this nobly and as given by the orchestra with him at the organ yesterday it was a splendid number.

The first number on the program yesterday was Brahms F Major Symphony. A majestic work, indeed, and one which keeps its proud strength within dignified bounds. In it there are delightful passages which recur again and again during the ensuing elaboration. The work is in four movements and as given by the orchestra under Mr. Monteux's leadership yesterday it proved exceedingly worthy.

The Casella number is a bright thing in its idea and construction. Glowing passages written for ballet music purpose, it is here whimsical, here calmly sorrowful and here filled with a certain sustained joy.

The melodies are well written, their style being flowing and clear. In the Barcarolle Mrs. Littlefield's voice made a delightful effect against the orchestral background. In the "Old Ladies' Dance" one was reminded of witches cavorting about in toothless ecstacy but with none the less striking and wild effects in the music.

TRAV. Oct. 22.

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, October 29th, Pierre Monteaux will present the following program The Suite in D major, No. 4, By Bach Schubert's incidental music to the play, "Rosamunde," Berlioz's Overture "The Roman Carnival," and Theophile Ysaye's First Symphony in F major. This work by the distinguished brother of the violinist will on this occasion have its first performance in Boston.

AMER. Oct. 22.

THIRD CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

In spite of the fact that a symphony by Brahms headed the program at yesterday afternoon's concert, the orchestral excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'eau" made the most memorable feature of the performance, perhaps because of the inherent charm of the music and possibly because dainty bits like these of Casella's afford a better vehicle for Mr. Monteux's genius.

Casella delights by his very freshness and youth, by his nerve and agility and unexpectedness. If the Saraband was to celebrate a dance characterized by the prudes as "pestiferous," certainly they would have regarded Casella's Ronde D'Enfants as exertmely provocative. The "Pas des Vieilles Dames," with its gently accentuated minuet steps, echoed a mild humor in every note.

Yet the solemn beauty of Franck's organ chorale would alone have made yesterday's performance significant. Franck strikes a responsive chord in nearly everyone. The sonorous quality of tone, the fervor and the emotional power of the climaxes need no exposition nor any praise. Mr. Goodrich's playing is too well known and appreciated to need comment.

The Brahms symphony afforded considerable contrast to the Beethoven "Eroica," performed last week, although this, too, has some claims in the first and last movements, to the same title. Many people have found it strongly suggestive of Wagner of Tristan in the plaintiveness and the exultagency of the second movement, and of Tannhauser in the first.

In this symphony, as in many of Brahms' works, he gives the really impressive and the really significant things to the wind instruments, and always they make a solid background for his theme.

The program in entirety was as follows: Symphony No. 3, in F Major, Brahms; Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich (Mr. Goodrich at the organ), Franck; Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," Casella.

ADVTSR. Oct. 22.

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include the First Symphony in A major by Theophile Ysaye, the highly talented brother of the Belgian violinist, which will have its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Another number of interest will be the Suite of Bach in D major, No. 4, which, because its authenticity was for a long while not established, has never before been heard at these concerts. The remainder of the program will consist of ballet numbers and the second entr'acte from the incidental music which Schubert wrote to the play "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival."

HERALD-Oct. 23.

Fourth Symphony Programme

The programme for the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Oct. 28, and Saturday evening, October 29, will include the First Symphony in A major by Theophile Ysaye, the highly talented brother of the Belgian violinist, which is to have its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Another number of interest will be the Suite of Bach in D major, No. 4. The remainder of the programme will consist of ballet numbers and the second entr-acte from the incidental music which Schubert wrote to the play "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival."

POST-Oct. 23.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, fourth program; Symphony in A, Theophile Ysaye (first time here); Suite in D major, Bach (first time at these concerts); incidental music from "Rosemunde," Schubert; "Roman Carnival" Overture, Berlioz. There is no soloist.

GLOBE-Oct. 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is undertaking as large a travelling schedule as possible this year, which will include the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Baltimore, Washington and Richmond, and as far north as Montreal, besides the 48 regular concerts in Boston.

Pierre Monteux spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a symphony concert in which he introduced the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla-Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe in quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest of which will probably figure on his programmes here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and tomorrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fourel, who has come frm Europe to head the viola section. He is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartet, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartet was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the '80s.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence include Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America, shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of 15, this artist was praised by Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer. His teacher was Josef Joachim.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, first came to this country in 1912 and gave concerts, besides his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other pianist, Raymond Havens, is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Havens is a native of Providence, and his early training also took place in this city. He has given concerts in New York, other cities of the East, and in Europe.

The latest announcement of musical events in Providence is that of the Boston Symphony concerts. These are to be on Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24 and Feb. 28 and April 11, in Infantry Hall. These concerts are included in the 41st annual season of this organization which opened in Boston on Oct. 7.

PROV-JOUNL. Oct. 23.

these bril-
ully sustained by a group of more theus," by Beethoven, was most interesting and gave an opportunity for the violoncello, flute, clarinet and harp to

RUSSIA CLOSER TO DEATH, SAYS U. S. FOOD HEAD

THE POST-S

Low operating cost

TIGHT BINDING

Monteux in the Casino de Paris, most of them before the war. An early Sonata for violoncello and piano, pieces for piano and flute and recent string quartet constitute Casella's efforts in chamber-music. A warm admirer of Mahler, he has transcribed for the piano the latter's Seventh Symphony. As an editor he has made revisions of the Preludes, Waltzes and Nocturnes of Chopin, of the pieces for clavicembalo and organ of Frescobaldi, and brought out besides a "Critical and Technical" edition of Beethoven's Sonatas. Of a part with these labors is the composition of cadenzas for the D-minor Concerto of Mozart. His latest enthusiasm is said to be for American rag-time and in his Five Pieces for String Quartet are a "Valse Ridicule" and a "Fox-Trott." Strangest exercise of all, he has composed a set of five pieces for the pianola in which, unhampered by the limitations of the human hands, he exploits the utmost resources and maximum sonority of the pianoforte. An excellent pianist, he has been heard both as soloist and in chamber-music through the length and breadth of Europe, and he has devoted much attention to reawakening interest in the harpsichord and other almost forgotten instruments. To complete the tale of his activities, he has directed as permanent or guest-conductor, many of the leading orchestras of France, Holland, Italy and Austria.

Writer, Too

Like many another musician since the time of Berlioz, Casella writes in words as well as with notes. He has contributed largely to the "Società Italiana di Musica Moderna," an organ of propaganda, while a truculent magazine of his own, "Ars Nova," absorbs much of his time and energy. At least one example of his writing has been translated into English, an appreciation of Rossini which appeared a few months ago in The Chesterian and later found its way to one of the programme books of the Symphony Orchestra. A portion of it is worth requoting here:

> A few months ago I was present at a certain concert, no mater in what town or country, where a performance of a delightful symphony of Mozart was given. My pleasure was great, but it would seem that my face betrayed no sign of it, for in the middle of the Adagio, my neighbor, an amiable and wealthy man, whose millions allow him that which my poverty entirely precludes me from, to have one's music composed by others and merely affixing one's signature thereto, my neighbor, I say, cautiously remarked to me, "How you must suffer listening to such music, and how I admire your self-control!"
>
> Although I have long ago given up the problem of determining the limit of human stupidity, I turned a somewhat bewildered face on my companion and rejoined as quietly as possible: "My dear colleague, what if I told you that I adore Rossini?"

Later, in the course of the same article, while admitting that Rossini had not the "grand humanity" of Beethoven, Casella says sagaciously. "But then a small genius is so often more amusing than a great one. Without wishing to be irreverent or paradoxical, I will take the liberty of pointing out that Boccacio is less forbidding than Dante, Scarlatti less austere than Bach, and Tintoretto certainly more agreeable to look at than Michael Angelo."

Eclectic?

To return by way of conclusion to Casella's more important work—composition—it may be said for the benefit of those who delight in contrasts and comparisons that he is less of a romanticist than Pizzetti and Respighi, less subtle than Malipiero, less of a lyricist than Castelnuovo. On the other hand he is the most virile, the most intellectual and the most cosmopolitan member of the group. Incidentally, he was the first of them to compel recognition abroad. Perhaps more than any of his companions, he has been accused of eclecticism, that horror of small and parochial minds. By their independence of the musical traditions of their own country and their eager assimilation of the music of other schools these neo-Italians have earned that dread reproach. Indeed, Casella and Malipiero are condemned as violently un-Italian because, forsooth, they have not confined themselves to the ways of Verdi and Puccini. But it must be remembered that nearly all composers who have made their mark have, in varying degree, availed themselves of the musical formulas of nations other than their own.

e Musical Quarterly) cents." In a subsequent and, needless to say, in talia," Casella is at once d truer to his musical in-the latter piece is under r performance at a later ert a word or two regard-be amiss. The music is hes of folk-song and by ge, gloomy, passionate and

A note prefaced to the ains the content:
Rhapsody the composer
ke in music (but with no programme!) the life of ples; the former is dissuperstitious, feverish, ng and terrible sun, or of sulphur mines, while s forth—turbulent, reckve with joy, in the midst ent of the Bay of Naples. work for the stage, and there, is his ballet, "
." Written in 1911-12, ng to Mr. Gatti, initiate of the composer's tech-y no means implies that al, the manipulator of onance, is here in full uch of the score follows
of harmony and melody.
not in a spirit of burquote Mr. Gatti:
written to a graceful
eenth century ambient ndoyer. In it appear red, languid figures,
background of parks
ble, moon-lit palaces.

Low operating cost

UR COMPANY
Telephone Warren 4220

BROTHERS

BRILLIANT OPENING OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Orchestra with Mr. Monteux Leading, Approaches its Pre-War Standard—Mr. Nyiregyhazi the Soloist

On Thursday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its forty-first year, gave a brilliant opening to the Cambridge series of concerts at Sanders Theatre. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Italian Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakow, "Sadko"; Liszt, Concerto in A major; Rabaud, Dances from "Marouf". Mr. Erwin Nyiregyhazi was the soloist.

How fresh the Mendelssohn symphony sounded! Perhaps the harmonic scheme appears rather evident to some. The work was composed eighty-eight years ago. Many question the title of "Italian" symphony because the first three movements do not suggest Italy in any way. Mendelssohn was not writing a tone-poem. What exquisite light passages for strings it contains, and what a wealth of thematic material so skillfully developed!

"Sadko", composed by Rimsky Korsakow in 1867, has been called the first Russian symphonic poem. It was the germ from which the opera of the same name sprang in 1896. Korsakow reorchestrated the tone-poem in 1891, the new version of which is always played. How it recalled the unforgettable Diaghileff Ballet Russe, and the gorgeous Bakst settings and costumes! Korsakow is always remarkably effective with the orchestra, no matter if at times he sounds banal on the pianoforte. The combination of the barbaric splendor of Russian folk-music and oriental sensuousness never fails to charm; his orchestration will forever serve as a perfect model. It is a pity then to think that he is only known to us through "Scheherazade", "Capricco Espagnol", and "Le Coq d'Or", when there are some fifteen other operas and ballets totally unknown outside of Petrograd, Moscow, and Paris.

Soloist's Rendering Superb

Few people in the audience Thursday night had ever heard of Mr. Nyiregyhazi before. Few will ever forget him. They did not know he was a Hungarian of only eighteen years of age. His playing of Liszt's pyrotechnic concerto was superb, and he surpassed both previous performances in Boston. His technique was flawless; his control of tone in the more sentimental passages was in excellent taste. Fortunately "Sadko" had sufficiently aroused a decidedly frigid audience to give him the warm applause he merited.

The dances from "Marouf" by Rabaud suffer in concert presentation. Their oriental monotony becomes occidental monotony, and the contrast they make to the rest of this charming opera cannot be realized. True there are some extremely clever orchestral effects, but the ballet and settings are felt to be lacking. The highly contrapuntal climax does not "sound" through with the clarity of the rest of the opera. "Marouf" has been performed in its entirety in New York, and at the Opera Comique in Paris.

When all is said and done, Mr. Monteux deserves no end of praise. Ever since the doubtful days of two years ago, the orchestra has steadily improved until it now approaches its old standard again. No one may conduct Beethoven and Wagner like Toscanni, nor Brahms and Strauss like Muck, but Mr. Monteux is probably the most well balanced conductor we have had in years, and he excels in the contemporary music of the Russian and French schools.

A. L. S. '22

CRIMSON Oct. 22

CASELLA'S BALLET EXCERPTS PLEASE

Symphony Plays Suite for First Time in Boston

Orchestral excerpts from Casella's ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'eau," were played for the first time in Boston at yesterday's Symphony concert. Casella, known here for his rhapsody "Italia," which Mr Jacchia has often put on the Pop programs, and by several bits of chamber music, is one of the most prominent members of the new school of composers which has lately arisen in Italy in revolt against the tradition of Italian opera, exemplified by Puccini and Mascagni.

The suite played yesterday is dedicated to Mr Monteux, who conducted the first performance in Paris before the war. It is deftly made, light music, employing every resource of the modern orchestra skilfully. The tunes and rhythms are simple without being vulgar. The harmonies are daring without being ugly.

Although the music loses much of its effect without the ballet it was written to accompany, it obviously pleased the audience. Mr Monteux was at his best, which is very good, indeed, in this piece. Mrs Littlefield sang the interesting measures for soprano, which are without words, intelligently and beautifully.

Mr Goodrich was deservedly applauded for his remarkably effective transcription for orchestra and organ of Franck's Second Chorale for organ, in which he played the organ part. He has arranged the music so that the orchestra supplements without duplicating the organ. The orchestra can do much, especially in percussion and strings, that is beyond the resources of the organ. When the wood wind is directly compared with the corresponding organ stops the orchestra far surpasses the organ. Mr Goodrich has not made the organ enter into futile competition with the orchestra. He has used it chiefly for its characteristic diapason quality, and let the orchestra do the rest.

The symphony was Brahms' Third, which was given a workaday performance, often not a little heavy-footed. It is hard to avoid making Brahms' orchestration sound clumsy, since it often is so in fact.

GLOBE. Oct. 22.

באסטאן סימפאני גרייט זיך פאר אינטערעסאנטע סעזאן אין קארנעגיע האל

די באסטאן סימפאני גרייט זיך פאר א סעזאן פון וויכטיגע קאנצערטען אין קארנעגי האל, אין די פאלגענדע פינף דאנערשטאג-אווענדען און שבת-נאכמיטאגס: נאוועמבער 3טער און 5טער, דעצעמבער 1טער און 3טער, יאנואר 5טער און 7טער, פעברואר 2טער און 4טער, און מארטש 16טער און 18טער. יעדע פאר קאנצערטען וועלען צוזאמענגעשטעלט ווערען פון אנדערע פראגראמען.

די באסטאן סימפאני האט געעפענט איהר סעזאן אין באסטאן דעם 7טען, און די אויפנאהמע וואס דער ארקעסטער האט געקראגען, האט ניט געקאנט זיין ווארימער און שטורמישער. די קוואליטי פון דער פארשטעלונג און פון דעם אנסאמבל אין איהר איצטיגער פארם, איז שטארק געלויבט געווארען.

פיער מאנטא, דער בארימטער אידיש־פראנצויזישער דיריגענט, געוועזענער דיריגענט אין מעטראפאליטען און דעם צווייטען סעזאן מיט דעם ארקעסטער, איז געוועזן צו באזוך אין יוראפ מיט'ן ציעל צו זוכען נייע ווערק, און ער האט געבראכט אייניגע וויכטיגע נאוועלטיעס. און מר. מאנטא איז באוואוסט צו האבען א הוש פאר גוטע ווערק.

ער וועט זיך אבער אפגעבען אין ארויסברענגען די אלטע פונקט ווי די נייע אויף אזא אופן, אז דער ארקעסטער זאל באקומען דעם גלאנץ וואס ער האט אימער געהאט אלס די פיינסטע ארקעסטער־געזעלשאפט אין לאנד.

די סובסקריפשאנס אין באסטאן אזוי גוט ווי אין ניו יארק זיינען שוין כמעט ווי פארקויפט, און דער פינאנציעלער ערפאלג אזוי גוט ווי דער ארטיסטישער, איז שוין געזיכערט.

JEW. DAY-WAHEIT Oct.

NEW WORK GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Casella's Ballet Introduced—Goodrich at the Organ

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, consisted of the 3d Symphony of Brahms; Cesar Franck's organ chorale in B-minor as arranged for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich, who was organist on this occasion, and a new ballet suite by Alfredo Casella, dedicated to Mr. Monteux.

DECORATIVE AND POETIC

Casella's music is extremely interesting. It is hard to say whether it is very original, because it is so well made, so brilliantly orchestrated, and so clearly the work of a man not only of intellect but of temperament. The erudition of Casella, still a young man, one of the leaders and propagandists of the ultra modern Italian composers of today, is profound. This is true of his knowledge not only of music, but of many other subjects.

He is said to have achieved in this ballet the atmosphere of the 17th century as it was known to Venice. There is certainly the flavor of the archaic, also of what is decorative and extravagant. There are passages of very poetic color. This music must be effective on the stage, and without the stage spectacle it makes a vivid impression. It is virtuoso stuff, and further than that one is not willing to go after a single hearing.

Mr. Goodrich's Contribution

Mr. Goodrich has orchestrated Franck's chorale in a musicianly and respectful manner. Knowing and loving this work, he had craved for some time the resources of the orchestra as well as the organ to do it justice. He endeavored to keep in the organ part music appropriate to that instrument and none other, and to give to the orchestral instruments such passages as seemed to imperatively demand their colors and sonorities. The performance was eloquent, not only on the part of Mr. Goodrich, the organ, but also the orchestra. Let us add that it is probably a streak of inborn conservatism which makes us prefer this work, with all its orchestral possibilities, as Franck wrote it, for the organ alone.

The feature of the concert, after all, was the performance of Brahms' symphony. Mr. Monteux, a modern when he discourses the music of a Casella or Strawinsky or Ravel, frequently astonishes one by his exceptional knowledge of every tradition of the classic school—and after all, the Brahms of this romantic symphony remains a classicist. To an underlying feeling for proportion and coherence, which could hardly be excelled, was added an interpretation of the rarest beauty and eloquence. This alone would have made the concert an occasion to remember.

POST. Oct. 22.

Boston Talent with Symphony

Boston talent was well represented at the third program of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of the Franck Organ Chorale in B minor was the second number and Laura Littlefield sang part of the Casella Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent Sur L'Eau."

Mr. Goodrich has been contemplating the present arrangement for the Franck Chorale for some time past. He accomplished his purpose in the latter part of the summer of 1920. He has given to each portion of the work what its character suggested or demanded in his mind. He has done this nobly and as given by the orchestra with him at the organ yesterday it was a splendid number.

The first number on the program yesterday was Brahms F Major Symphony. A majestic work, indeed, and one which keeps its proud strength within dignified bounds. In it there are delightful passages which recur again and again during the ensuing elaboration. The work is in four movements and as given by the orchestra under Mr. Monteux's leadership yesterday it proved exceedingly worthy.

The Casella number is a bright thing in its idea and construction. Glowing passages written for ballet music purpose, it is here whimsical, here calmly sorrowful and here filled with a certain sustained joy.

The melodies are well written, their style being flowing and clear. In the Barcarolle Mrs. Littlefield's voice made a delightful effect against the orchestral background. In the "Old Ladies' Dance" one was reminded of witches cavorting about in toothless ecstasy but with none the less striking and wild effects in the music.

TRAV. Oct 22.

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

For the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, October 28th, Pierre Monteux will present the following program: The Suite in D major, No. 4, By Bach; Schubert's incidental music to the play, "Rosamunde," Berlioz's Overture "The Roman Carnival," and Theophile Ysaye's First Symphony in F major. This work by the distinguished brother of the violinist will on this occasion have its first performance in Boston.

AMER. Oct. 22.

THIRD CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

In spite of the fact that a symphony by Brahms headed the program at yesterday afternoon's concert, the orchestral excerpts from Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'eau" made the most memorable feature of the performance, perhaps because of the inherent charm of the music and possibly because dainty bits like these of Casella's afford a better vehicle for Mr. Monteux's genius.

Casella delights by his very freshness and youth, by his nerve and agility and unexpectedness. If the Saraband was to celebrate a dance characterized by the prudes as "pestiferous," certainly they would have regarded Casella's Ronde D'Enfants as exertmely provocative. The "Pas des Vieilles Dames," with its gently accentuated minuet steps, echoed a mild humor in every note.

Yet the solemn beauty of Franck's organ chorale would alone have made yesterday's performance significant. Franck strikes a responsive chord in nearly everyone. The sonorous quality of tone, the fervor and the emotional power of the climaxes need no exposition nor any praise. Mr. Goodrich's playing is too well known and appreciated to need comment.

The Brahms symphony afforded considerable contrast to the Beethoven "Eroica," performed last week, although this, too, has some claims in the first and last movements, to the same title. Many people have found it strongly suggestive of Wagner of Tristan in the plaintiveness and the exultagency of the second movement, and of Tannhauser in the first.

In this symphony, as in many of Brahms' works, he gives the really impressive and the really significant things to the wind instruments, and always they make a solid background for his theme.

The program in entirety was as follows: Symphony No. 3, in F Major, Brahms; Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich (Mr. Goodrich at the organ), Franck; Orchestral Excerpts from "Le Couvent sur l'eau," Casella.

ADVTSR. Oct 22.

FOURTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include the First Symphony in A major by Theophile Ysaye, the highly talented brother of the Belgian violinist, which will have its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Another number of interest will be the Suite of Bach in D major, No. 4, which, because its authenticity was for a long while not established, has never before been heard at these concerts. The remainder of the program will consist of ballet numbers and the second entr'acte from the incidental music which Schubert wrote to the play "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival."

HERALD-Oct. 23.

Fourth Symphony Programme

The programme for the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Oct. 28, and Saturday evening, October 29, will include the First Symphony in A major by Theophile Ysaye, the highly talented brother of the Belgian violinist, which is to have its first performance in Boston on this occasion. Another number of interest will be the Suite of Bach in D major, No. 4. The remainder of the programme will consist of ballet numbers and the second entr-acte from the incidental music which Schubert wrote to the play "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's brilliant overture, "The Roman Carnival."

POST-Oct. 23.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra, fourth program: Symphony in A, Theophile Ysaye (first time here); Suite in D major, Bach (first time at these concerts); incidental music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; "Roman Carnival" Overture, Berlioz. There is no soloist.

GLOBE-Oct. 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is undertaking as large a travelling schedule as possible this year, which will include the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Baltimore, Washington and Richmond, and as far north as Montreal, besides the 48 regular concerts in Boston.

Pierre Monteux spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a symphony concert in which he introduced the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe in quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest of which will probably figure on his programmes here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and tomorrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fouel, who has come frm Europe to head the viola section. He is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartet, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartet was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the '80s.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence include Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America, shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of 15, this artist was praised by Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer. His teacher was Josef Joachim.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, first came to this country in 1912 and gave concerts, besides his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other pianist, Raymond Havens, is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Havens is a native of Providence, and his early training also took place in this city. He has given concerts in New York, other cities of the East, and in Europe.

The latest announcement of musical events in Providence is that of the Boston Symphony concerts. These are to be on Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24 and Feb. 28 and April 11, in Infantry Hall. These concerts are included in the 41st annual season of this organization which opened in Boston on Oct. 7.

PROV-JOUNL-Oct. 23.

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

An unusually splendid season of Boston Symphony concerts is anticipated in Infantry Hall on the following five Tuesday evenings: Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11.

The orchestra could not have had a more auspicious season's opening than the first pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 7 and 8, and subsequent concerts there. The quality of performances and the ensemble in its present state were unanimously praised. Indeed there are other signs that this, the 41st season of the orchestra, will be the most successful of them all.

The Providence concerts are a part of their travelling schedule, which is as large as can be undertaken, and includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Richmond, Washington and Baltimore, and as far north as Montreal. For the 48 regular concerts in Boston, and for concerts elsewhere, practically all the seats have been taken in advance by subscription.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor, spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a notable symphony concert in which he gave the French public a taste of American musical achievement by introducing the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla-Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe to a quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest of which will probably figure on his programs here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and to-morrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fourel, who has come from Europe to head the viola section, and is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with conspicuous success with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartette, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the talented concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartette was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the 80's.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence are such as to add considerably to the interest of the symphony concerts here. Much may be expected from the appearance of Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America, shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of fifteen, this artist displayed such remarkable skill that Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer, shared the enthusiasm of Josef Joachim, his teacher and became warmly interested in him. In his present full maturity he has come to be regarded throughout Europe as one of the most brilliant living masters of his instrument.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, as highly regarded among the pianists of Europe as is Huberman among the violinists, first came to this country in 1912 when his concerts, including appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were so fine, that they are still remembered by all who heard him. The other pianist is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Raymond Havens is a native of Providence and his early training took place in this city. The fame of this virtuoso has been extended in recent seasons by concerts in New York, other cities of the East and in Europe also. Mr. Haven's several former Helen Stanley, erstwhile prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, who has during recent seasons devoted her career entirely to the concert stage. The large and rich qualities of Mlle. Alcock's voice, together with her skill as a dramatic interpreter of song, have won her an enviable place among concert and oratorio singers. This noted contralto has formerly sung with conspicuous success in Boston and other cities as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROV. TRBNE - Oct. 23

"Special" Symphony Concerts

A New Series for a New Public

NO longer will the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Boston be confined to the established series of twenty-four Friday afternoons and twenty-four Saturday evenings, with two matinées for its Pension Fund added in good measure and matinées for school-children, here and there on its calendar, to set them in the musical way they should go. Now, for the first time within the longest memory, it will undertake five "special concerts" at home, in answer, press-agents' phrase though it is, to a genuine public demand. These concerts will take place in Symphony Hall on Monday evenings at monthly intervals, beginning on Nov. 28, continuing through Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13, and April 10. The full orchestra will share in them; Mr. Monteux will conduct at all of them; Miss Liebling for singer, Mr. Powell and Mr. Mirovitch for pianists, Mr. Burgin for violinist and Mr. Bedetti for violoncellist, will be heard in solo-pieces; while the programmes will correspond in essential respects to those of the regular concerts. Finally, the prices will range from $4 to $7.50 for the series, or from 80 cents to $1.50 a concert. Elsewhere an advertisement contains particulars for purchasers.

The demand for these "special concerts" has been so variously expressed as to seem unmistakable. The Young Women's Christian Association, the Woman's Educational Union and similar societies have asked for them and taken tickets accordingly. By many signs a plentiful public exists unwilling or unable to commit itself to twenty-four successive concerts week by week. Yet it would gladly hear the orchestra four or five times in a season. Another public, numerous among students, seeks vainly for seats on Friday afternoon, finds them all taken, but will not subscribe for places on Saturday evenings because for those free hours it prefers other diversions. On Mondays it will not be so preoccupied. Finally, there is the new public that suspects the pleasures of the Symphony Concerts, yet dreads surfeit with them. A modest five, for beginning, should tempt it. From all these quarters will come the prospective audiences for Monday evenings. So, taking a leaf from the book of the Chicago Orchestra, does the Boston Orchestra prefer desirable and fruitful work at home to wanderings elsewhere. It assigned this reason as one, last spring, for the abandonment of concerts in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The over-wise wagged knowing heads, hinted at declining prestige and revenue. Now they also are enlightened.

TRANS. Oct. 26.

There will be no Symphony Concerts next week since the orchestra then makes its first journey of the new season to New York. For the concerts at home a week later, on Nov. 11 and 12, Mr. Monteux proposes two new pieces: "A Poem of Youth," from the pen of David Stanley Smith, professor of music at Yale; and "Emotions," tone-poem by the Parisian, Hue, and one more attempt to transmute into tones French moods of war-time. "Anguish — Prayer — Tumult — Calm — Bells of Peace — Trumpets of Victory" are the subtitles set by the composer. The symphony for these concerts is the second of Sibelius in D major. At them besides, Mr. Vecsey, the violinist, returning to America for the first time since his days as prodigy, will play Chaikovsky's Concerto. It has been too long unheard at Symphony Hall.

At the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York Mr. Monteux will repeat Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" and Brahms's Symphony in F major, each lately and eloquently played at home. His miscellaneous pieces will be Rimsky-Korsakov's "Sadko"; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fêtes"; Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival"; Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan"; and fragments of Schubert's music to "Rosamond." At the concert on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 5, Mr. Goodrich will be heard in his version for organ and orchestra of Franck's Chorale in B minor.

TRANS. Oct. 27.

[15]

NEW SERIES OF SPECIAL CONCERTS IS ANNOUNCED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces a new series of five special concertts at Symphony Hall to be given on Monday evenings, Nov 28, Jan 16, Feb 13, March 13 and April 10, at prices within the reach of almost any purse. The soloists will be Estelle Liebling, soprano; John Powell and Alfred Mirovitch, pianists; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Jean Bedetti, cellist.

The programs will resemble those of the regular Symphony concerts, presumably with a preponderance of standard music over novelties. Tickets at $7.50, $5 and $4 for the series go on sale Monday, Nov 7. Mail orders will be filled in order of receipt before the public sale opens.

GLOBE Oct. 27.

Extra Symphony Concerts Billed

For the first time in its history the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give a series of popular price concerts, beginning Monday night, Nov. 28. There will be five of these concerts, scattered through the season, ending April 10. The full orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, will take part.

To make the concerts additionally attractive to music-lovers who have not yet acquired the Symphony habit, there will be a soloist at each concert. The solo list includes two pianists, John Powell and Alfred Mirowitch; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the leading 'cellist.

The demand for more Symphony concerts is coming in part from enthusiasts who missed getting tickets for the regular Symphony season, the subscription sale for which was the largest on record.

ADVTSR. Oct. 27.

4TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Compositions by Bach Schubert, Berlioz and Ysaye Given

PERFORMANCE TO BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Overture (Suite) in D Major, No. 4; Schubert Ballet Music, No. 1, Entr'acte No. 2 and Ballet Music No. 2 from "Rosamunde"; Berlioz, Overture, "Roman Carnival"; Theophile Ysaye, Symphony, F major, No. 1.

Mr. Monteux, thinking wisely that the suite of Bach would prove monotonous if constant tonality were repeated, substituted for one movement in dance rhythm, an Adagio from Bach's Concerto in F, No. 5. This Adagio, beautiful in itself, gave the needed contrast. Mr. Monteux also varied the Minuet by the change between the string and the wind choirs. The lively movements were played in a fresh and spirited manner, with nuances that were not too modern: music that showed impartially the technical prowess of the strings and wind instruments. Strange to say, this suite was played here for the first time at a Symphony concert, if not for the first time in the city.

The lovely orchestral music that Schubert wrote for "Rosamunde" followed. What a wealth of melodic beauty! What color from the use of a few instruments! What unexpected modulations, effective by their apparent simplicity! There are passages that might be called twilight-music; pages of a haunting tenderness; pages of a quiet sadness, not displeasing.

If the performance of the "Rosamunde" music was enchanting, the performance of the overture by Berlioz was of dazzling brilliance. This overture, over 75 years old, is as modern as if it had been composed last summer. There are still writers about music who insist that the music of Berlioz is empty and futile, full of sound and fury signifying nothing, sounding brass and clashing cymbals, unmelodic, "ungrammatical," though they admit that he was of a certain historical importance. He was much more than that, although the man who said that the greatest musical work of Berlioz is his "Treatise on Instrumentation" would have been justified if he had also said that Berlioz put this treatise, but not pedantically, into many of his compositions.

The symphony of Theophile Ysaye, the brother of the great violinist, was first performed at Brussels in November, 1901. The composer was then 39 years old, so that certain unpleasant features of this symphony cannot be attributed to youthful enthusiasm or inexperience. The symphony is planned on a large scale, so large that cuts were made for the performance yesterday, which was the first in Boston. To add to the vigor, or the strenuousness of the music, four tubas besides a brass tuba are employed. The introduction, one of unusual length, elaborate, gives promise of important pages to follow. Who was the Athenian gentleman who built so stately and ornate a porch that when he came to his dwelling he had money only for a humble house? This introduction and the middle section of the Scherzo are the most noteworthy portions of the symphony. The latter has a poetic idea, poetically expressed, but even here one notes the composer's unwillingness to be concise, his inability to stop when he has said what he had worth saying. The chief thematic material of the symphony is not distinguished, not salient, and the development is diffuse, suffering from instrumentation that is often muddy. Climax after climax is boisterous and bombastic. Mr. Monteux, as is his habit, had taken great pains in rehearsal, and the composer, if he were living, could not take exception to the interpretation or the actual performance.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away on its first trip next week. The program for Nov. 11, 12 will be as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 2, D-major; Smith, A Poem of Youth, op. 47 (first performance); Tschaikowsky, Violin Concerto; Hue, "Emotions" (1918)—first time in Boston. Ferenc Vecsey will be the violinist.

HERALD - Oct. 29.

SYMPHONY VIRTUOSI DISPLAYED

Solo Players' Skill Is Shown in Familiar Works

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony season, thus far, has been a very brilliant one. The performances of yesterday were the most brilliant of the season. The programme was of unusually entertaining character, if one excepts the noisy and poor symphony of Theophile Ysaye which ended the programme. It was preceded by an unfamiliar suite of Bach, the 4th suite, in D major, which Bach wrote while he was chapelmaster of Prince Leopold of Anhalt Cothen—not the suite which has the misnamed "Air for the G-string"; the incidental music of Schubert's "Rosamunde," and the "Carnival Romain" overture of Berlioz.

FROM BACH TO BERLIOZ

In these performances solo players of the orchestra as well as the band as a whole distinguished themselves. The separate tonal strands of the fine square-toed music of old Bach were as beautifully moulded and differentiated, the one from the other, as the simple and really divine scraps of melody which Schubert gives his wind instruments. The whole span of orchestral development was symbolized in the gradual transition from the formality and the high, rather thin but fascinating character of Bach's instrumentation, as opposed to the romantic beauty of Schubert and, at last, the flaming volcano of an orchestra which Berlioz employs in his exciting overture.

This overture is thrice familiar, nevertheless Mr. Monteux gave by his pace and his coloring a new warm languor to the introduction in which Mr. Speyer so beautifully played his English horn solo, and a new nervousness, a new flare to the intoxicating final.

Humor in Bach

Bach's suite opens with a pompous introduction which might equally have been the work of Handel, then with rather routine rapid movement, and this section ends over a long pedal point in which the composer, momentarily forgetting lengths of periods and the like, weaves together fresh thoughts which strike him as he goes along, over his resounding bass.

The humor of the Bourrees and of the "Rejouissance" is perfectly delightful. It is in the adagio that the music becomes more than wonderful tone weaving, more than the splendid job of a master workman for a Prince's holiday. Therein is the reflectiveness, the poetry, the restrained passion which Bach, also, knew.

A Miracle in Music

But if all the other music were forgotten the thrice familar music of Schubert would remain. This music is simply a miracle. With a few chords, an instrument here and another there, the shy, fat-backed, bespectacled little Schubert takes us away to another realm. In that realm is ineffable beauty, the distant echo of tears, and wondrous compassion and consolation for the suffering Schubert knew so well.

Mr. Monteux's reading was the most poetic we have ever heard. He would have been at a loss, however, to put his conceptions into effect had he had at his disposal less skilled musicians. If only to hear the solo playing of Messrs. Laurent, Longy, Laus, and Sand, the music would have been worth while. These and other leaders of the different sections of the orchestra ennobled whatever they touched. Yesterday each of them seemed in the vein, fairly excelling himself, in the service of the transcendent genius of the humble, poverty-ridden Franz Peter Schubert.

Ysaye's Symphony

The Ysaye symphony is unoriginal, over-orchestrated, with traces of Franck, Wagner, and other composers. One looks for the original phrase or mood, the passage of harmony or of instrumental color which shall reveal a talent. The nearest approach to this comes in the middle part of the Scherzo, a mood of light melancholy, a transformation, if memory did not play us a trick, of a motive heard earlier in the score. Elsewhere the composer attempts this and that, makes over-much of inherently poor material, prolonging inexcusably his symphony, especially at the very end, as if he were one of the most depraved of our politicians, shouting, "The Eagle, the Eagle," at the top of his voice, while the crowd dispersed with yells and jeers.

POST-Oct. 27

NOVELTIES BY BACH AND YSAYE AT THE SYMPHONY

Unfamiliar pieces by Bach and Theophile Ysaye, and familiar classics by Schubert and Berlioz, were contained in yesterday's Symphony program. There was no soloist. Bach's Suite in D major has never been played at these concerts because its authenticity was for a long time in doubt. Yet much of the music in it could scarcely have been written by a composer of lesser genius. It has the tremendous vitality which distinguishes Bach's work from that of 18th century routiniers.

Mr Monteux kept approximately the original orchestration, including the high notes for trumpets, which are both difficult to play and shrill. Other conductors use revised scores of Bach which are often incongruous in style. It was, perhaps, musically wisest to let the composer speak for himself in the idiom of his own day, instead of trying to guess what he would have done with the resources of a modern orchestra. The performance, like the orchestration, was faithful to the composer's style. It was warmly applauded.

The beautiful excerpts from Schubert's "Rosamunde" were a reproach to such composers as Theophile Ysaye, whose Symphony in F major ended the concert. All M Ysaye's harmonic and contrapuntal ingenuities could not atone for the painful lack in his work of genuine melody and genuine rhythm. Schubert's music is simple where his is complex and involved. But it is too often forgotten nowadays that intricacy is the easiest refuge from banality. One doubts whether a simple piece by M Ysaye, or by many a better known modern composer would prove to be more than trivial.

The performance of Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" was among the most brilliant yet given by the present orchestra. "Rosamunde," too, was exceptionally well played. The first half of the concert was a triumph for Mr Monteux and his men. If the Ysaye symphony seemed dull and confused, the fault was chiefly with the composer, who, whatever his merits, lacked the indefinable something called genius.

There are no Symphony concerts next week. The program for Nov 11 and 12 includes new pieces by Hue and David Stanley Smith, and Sibelius' Second Symphony. The soloist is Ferenc Vecsey, who will play the Tschaikowsky violin concerto.

GLOBE - Oct. 2

VECSEY SOLOIST FOR FIFTH SYMPHONY

Great Hungarian Violinist to Play at Concerts on Nov. 11 and 12

To most Bostonians the Boston Symphony Orchestra is just a name, because the concerts are sold out for the entire season long in advance, and at high prices, and the chances to hear it are nil. Therefore the news that a series of five special concerts at popular prices are to be given on Monday nights this Winter should be welcomed with delight. There will be five soloists with these concerts, all artists of importance—Mirovitch, the pianist; John Powell, pianist; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, the concert master and violinist, and Jean Bedetti, the cellist.

The concerts are being arranged with the co-operation of several of the big organizations like the Y. M. C. A. and capacity houses are assured. The first concert takes place Monday evening, November 28.

FIFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, November 11, and Saturday evening, November 12, following the first regular Southern trip of the orchestra which will occupy the coming week. At this pair of concerts, Feren Vecsey, the great Hungarian violinist, who has just arrived in this country from Europe, where his fame is of the very highest, will appear as soloist, playing with the orchestra Tschaiowsky's perennially popular concerto in D major.

Pierre Monteux will also conduct the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major, "A Poem of Youth," by David Stanley Smith, which will have its first performance on this occasion, and, in observance of Armistice Day, Georges Hue's symphonic poem "Emotion." The following sub-titles are written over the music by the composer: Anguish, Prayer, Tumult, Subsidence, Bells of Peace, Trumpets of Victory.

AMER. Oct. 2

...At... ...hony

...week's Sym... program for the most part was heartily enjoyed by the large audience attending yesterday's matinee concert, the enjoyment springing largely from the classic numbers chosen by Mr. Monteux. These were the Bach suite in D major, Schubert's "Rosamunde" suite and the "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz. In place of the gavotte in the Bach suite the orchestra played the adagio from the same composer's concerto No. 5

As a final number came the Theophile Ysaye symphony, a work brought to this country by Charles Martin Loeffler, the Boston composer, who formerly played in the Symphony Orchestra. Theophile Ysaye, brother of Eugene, the violinist and conductor, wrote this unconventional work nearly 20 years ago, at the start of a career that ended prematurely. Like most works written in the new manner, it interested rather than captured those who attended this first hearing in Boston.

The same program will be repeated tonight.

AM. SR. Oct 29

ESTABLISHED 18.. SEP 18 1921

From

COURANT

Hartford, Conn.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Behind the musical achievement which the name of the Boston Symphony orchestra has come to represent, there lies a long record of the application of musical genius, the constancy of high purpose, and the expenditure of wealth. The aim was ... ensemble as close to the ideals of perfection in performance as humanly possible. Only gradually, through ...eless years of upbuilding effort by one after another of the world's greatest conductors, has the goal been won. During the last two years the orchestra has profited signally by the illustrious powers of its present conductor, Pierre Monteux. His splendid record as conductor of concerts, opera and ballet in the largest cities of Europe and America has been confirmed and enhanced by his success at this post of honor; indeed, never have the Boston Symphony concerts been more evidently enjoyed and generally praised than under his direction.

Never in the musical history of Hartford has such an imposing array of artists been marshalled under one management and presented under such pleasing auspices as the coming Sedgwick Concert Course. The artists are of undisputed magnitude and Parsons's theater as a concert hall possesses advantages in acoustics and comfort unequalled by any other auditorium in Hartford, but the capacity of Parsons's theater is limited and as the bare announcement of these concerts is sufficient to insure sold out houses the management urges music lovers to take immediate advantage of purchasing seats en bloc for the three artists. The purchase of Boston Symphony seats must be made separate. All applications should be sent to F. A. Sedgwick at Sedgwick and Casey's Asylum street.

ROM Journal

OCT 2 1921

Atlanta, Ga

A campaign is soon to be begun in Boston to raise a $2,000,000 endowment fund for the Boston Symphony orchestra. This step is to be taken because of the large deficit last year.

---

rom OCT 5 1921

OURNAL COURIER,

New Haven, Conn.

Muck Orchestra For Propaganda?

Boston, Oct. 4.—Testimony was heard in federal court today that James J. Bosdan, proprietor of a local news agency, tried to sell stolen government documents purporting to contain "inside information" gathered by the department of justice in various important cases. Bosdan is charged with the larceny of the papers, possessing them, and attempting to dispose of them for personal gain.

Harry H. Guterman testified that Bosdan told him he had records of the case of Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who was deported for pro-German sympathies during the war. In this connection, Guterman added, Bosdan told him of an alleged interview at Potsdam between the German emperor and the late Henry L. Higginson, of this city, which Bosdan said resulted in establishment of the orchestra for the spread of German propaganda.

From OCT 5 1921

Commercial Appeal

Memphis, Tenn.

SAYS COL. HIGGINSON WAS KAISER'S ALLY

Used Boston Symphony For Propaganda, Lawyer Told.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Testimony was heard in federal court today that James J. Bosdan, proprietor of a local news agency, tried to sell stolen government documents purporting to contain "inside information" gathered by the Department of Justice in various important cases. Bosdan is charged with the larceny of the papers, possessing them and attempting to dispose of them for personal gain.

Copies of official reports of inquiries into the unexplained murder of William K. Dean at East Jaffrey, N. H., in 1918, alleged to have been found in Bosdan's home, were introduced into the evidence, and witnesses were called to tell of alleged attempts by Bosdan to sell them.

Harry H. Guterman, a lawyer employed by the town of Jaffrey in connection with the Dean murder, told of his investigation. He said he was called on the telephone by a man who said he was James J. Bosdan and that he had complete records of the inquiries.

Guterman testified that Bosdan also told him he had records of the case of Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was deported for pro-German sympathies during the war. In this connection, Guterman added, Bosdan told him of an alleged interview at Potsdam between the German emperor and the late Henry Lee Higginson of this city, which Bosdan said resulted in establishment of the orchestra for the spread of German propaganda.

FROM OCT -6 1921 Y

Cornell Alumni NEWS

Ithaca, N. Y.

UNIVERSITY CONCERTS

The University concerts given annually by the Department of Music start this year on December 1 with the appearance of Florence Easton, soprano. The next number is the Boston Symphony Orchestra of one hundred members, conducted by Pierre Monteux, on December 15, which will be followed by a recital by Josef Hofmann, pianist, on February 27. The last number in the series is a joint concert by Marguerite D'Alvarez, contralto, and Pablo Casals, violoncellist, on March 17.

Established 1881

FROM OCT -8 1921 K

EVE. POST

NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Society will give five concerts this season in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, beginning November 4.

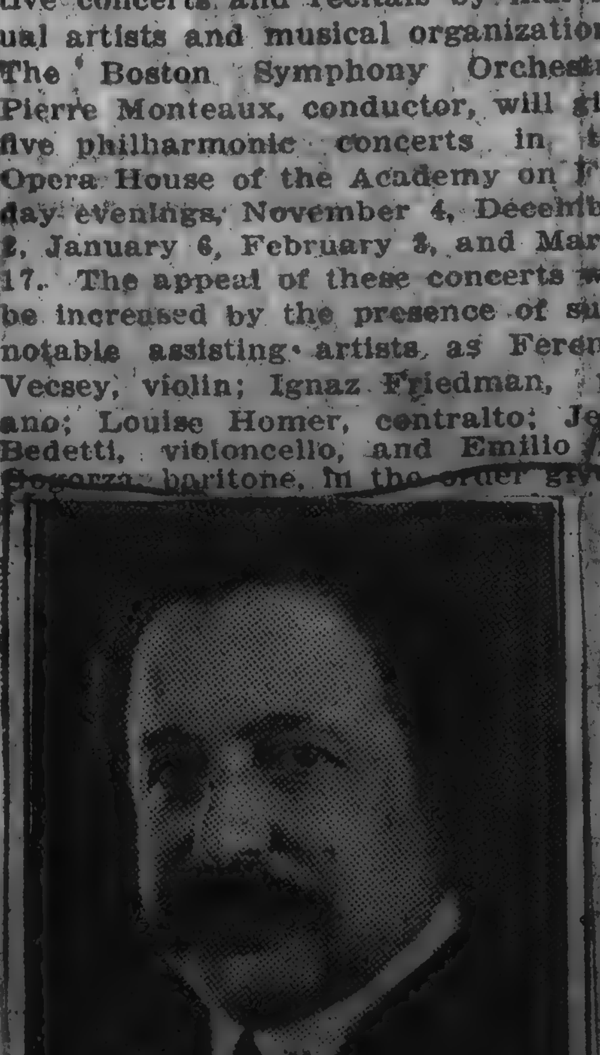
OCT -9 1921 D

EAGLE

...yn, New York

THE INSTITUTE'S PLANS

The musical program of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences opens with the joint recital on Thursday evening, October 27, by the Hungarian artists, Erno Dohnanyi, pianist and composer, and Emil Telmanyi, violinist. As in previous years the backbone of the Institute's program will be found in orchestral music, although there are many attractive concerts and recitals by individual artists and musical organizations. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteaux, conductor, will give five philharmonic concerts in the Opera House of the Academy on Friday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 3, and March 17. The appeal of these concerts will be increased by the presence of such notable assisting artists as Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Ignaz Friedman, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, violoncello, and Emilio De Gogorza, baritone. In the order given



PIERRE MONTEUX
CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Evening Globe

New York

OCT 12 1921

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin its New York series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 3 and 5, opened its forty-first season in Symphony Hall, Boston, last week. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes," and "Don Juan" by Strauss. During the stay in Europe of the conductor, Pierre Monteux, he was in quest of new works in various countries, and has made selections of compositions by the following: From France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger (noted member of the Parisian "Six"), and Marcel Duprez; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malpiero, Casella and de Sabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokofieff; from Germany, Schrecker; and from Spain, De Falla.

SUN

...ss New York City

OCT 15 1921 D

Symphonies and Such.

Pierre Monteux began his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when he conducted the brilliant opening pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 7 and 8. The programme was as follows: Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Strauss's "Don Juan."

The usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, to begin on November 3 and 5, are a part of a travelling schedule which is as large as the orchestra can undertake. It will include concerts in a number of Eastern cities as far South as Washington, Baltimore and Richmond, and as far north as Montreal.

New scores to be heard will be selected from the following composers: From France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger (the noted member of the Parisian "Six") and Mercel Dupres; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella and De Sabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff; from Germany, Shrecker, and from Spain, De Falla.

ESTABLISHED 1881 OCT 15 1921 K

From

EVENING JOURNAL,

New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, this season again under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, will give its usual five Thursday evening and the same number of Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, beginning November 3 and 5. Mr. Monteux has brought back a number of new scores from Europe with him, many of which should prove of great interest.

From OCT 16 1921

TIMES,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

Boston Symphony Plans a Notable Season Here

An unusually fine season of Boston Symphony concerts is anticipated in the Academy of Music here under the management of C. D. Atkins. They are to take place on five Friday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 3, and March 17. The soloists will be Ferenc Vecsey, violinist; Louise Homer, American contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, the Spanish-American baritone; Ignaz Friedman, pianist, and Jean Bedetti, violoncellist.

Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor, devoted a part of his sojourn in Europe last summer to a quest of new works in various countries. The finest of these are by France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger, Dupres, Bantock and Bax, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella, De Sabata, Stravinsky and Prokovieff, Schrecker and De Falla.

WORLD,

New York City

OCT 16 1921

The Burgin Quartette is being organized by the distinguished leaders of the string sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as was the Kneisel Quartette in seasons past. Richard Burkin, the concertmaster, who came to the orchestra last year and who will be first violin of the quartette, has in the course of his career organized two quartetos successively when concertmaster of orchestras in Eastern Europe.

TIMES OCT 16 1921

New York City

Orchestra Notes.

The Philharmonic's eightieth year opens Oct. 27 and 28 at Carnegie Hall. Among the season's novelties will be works of Mason, Hadley, Skilton, Whithorn, Enesco, Ravel, Schoenberg, and a first hearing by Philharmonic audiences of Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles."

Richard Strauss's first concert here with an orchestra of 100 men at Carnegie Hall on Oct. 31 will be followed by similar appearances on three Tuesday nights, Nov. 15 and 29 and Dec. 13, at the Metropolitan.

The Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteaux will pay its first visit of the season here on Nov. 3 and 5 at Carnegie Hall and Nov. 4 at the Brooklyn Academy.

TIMES OCT 16 1921

New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's soloists for five Friday evening concerts at the Brooklyn Academy include, on Nov. 4, Ferenc Vecsey; Dec. 2, Ignaz Friedman; Jan. 6, Louise Homer; Feb. 3, Jean Benedetti, and March 17, Emilio de Gogorza.

For the New York Symphony's six Saturday matinees in Brooklyn the assisting artists are: On Nov. 5, Hulda Lashanska; Dec. 3, Paul Kochanski; Jan. 7, Percy Grainger; Jan. 21, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison; Feb. 11, Erika Morini, and March 11, Marguerite d'Alvarez.

Brooklyn will have its first performance in some years of Handel's "The Messiah" on Dec. 12, by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society. Walter Henry Hall of Columbia has begun rehearsals on Monday evenings at Memorial Hall in the Y. W. C. A., Schermerhorn Street and Flatbush Avenue.

Recitals in the Brooklyn Institute series are announced by Rachmaninoff, Kreisler, Gabrilowitsch, Kochanski, Dohnanyi, Telmanyi, Alfredo Oswald, Hulda Lashanska, Arthur Whiting, the Letz Quartet and the Musurgia Club.

TIMES 1921

New York City

Boston's New Quartet.

Boston expects much good music from the Burgin Quartet, newly formed by the leaders of the string sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as once was the famous Kneisel Quartet.

Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, who came to the orchestra last year and who will be first violin of the quartet, has in the course of his career organized two other quartets when playing with orchestras in Eastern Europe.

Georges Fourel, who arrived lately to lead the viola section, is a first-prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory. He has appeared with the first orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts in Paris.

WORLD,

New York City

OC...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its New York series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, on November 3 and 5.

The new scores to be heard here will be selected from the following composers: from France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger (the noted member of the Parisian "Six") and Marcel Dupres; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casello and de Sabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff; from Germany, Schrecker, and from Spain, de Falla.

In a symphony concert which he conducted in Paris last summer, Mr. Monteux introduced to the French public the tone poem of the late American composer, Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Vaughn Williams's "London Symphony." The first of these works was particularly well received.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons.

From Herald

New York City

OCT 16 1921 K

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 3 and 5.

The new scores to be heard this season in the series will be selected from France: Rousell, Ravel, Babaud, Honneger (the noted member of the Parisian "Six"), Marcel Dupres; from England: Bantock, Bax; from Italy: Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella, de Sabata; from Russia: Stravinsky, Prokovieff; from Germany: Schrecker; from Spain: de Falla.

AMERICAN OCT 16 1921

New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra could have procured the services of Arturo Toscanini several years ago. That it did not avail itself of the opportunity seems almost beyond belief to those who do not understand the inner workings of musical politics in the Hub.

Several months ago the announcement was made in this column that the great Italian maestro would be back in America next year, and in all probability as conductor of the Boston orchestra, now still under the guidance of Pierre Monteaux. That prognostication may be reiterated at this time.

Officially we are told that this season there has been "an unprecedented demand for seats, practically all having been taken in advance by subscription for the forty-eight concerts in Boston and for concerts elsewhere."

A peculiar sentence, it must be admitted, especially as regards the four final words. The implication, of course, is that the demand for seats also has been great in other cities besides Boston. But the clumsy vagueness of the assertion makes the reader dubious.

As a matter of fact the subscription for the Boston Symphony's concerts outside of Boston has fallen off considerably in the last few years, not least in New York. And it is this, more than anything else, that has made the present directors of the famous organization come to their senses.

Whether the New York subscription for the visiting organization's coming season shows improvement over last year's the writer cannot say. If the board of directors could make a definite announcement, however, that Arturo Toscanini had been chosen as Monsieur Monteaux' successor it would probably have an immediate effect on their subscription here. For the custom still obtains that those who are subscribers now will have first choice of seats in the future.

EVE. POST OCT 20 1921

NEW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony Gossip

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its third season of home concerts under Pierre Monteux on October 7. It will be heard in New York in the usual five pairs (ten different programmes) in Carnegie Hall and will also be heard in other cities as far South as Washington, Baltimore, and Richmond, and as far North as Montreal. While in Paris last summer M. Monteux conducted "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by the American Charles T. Griffes, which was well received.

The new scores to be heard will be selected from the following composers: From France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger (the noted member of the Parisian "Six"), and Marcel Dupres; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella, and De Sabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff; from Germany, Schrecker, and from Spain, De Falla.

Much is expected from the Burgin Quartet, which is being newly organized by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra and the distinguished leader of the string sections. In the same way the Kneisel Quartet was organized in the past. Mr. Burgin has had a thorough and notable experience in chamber music during the earlier part of his career in Eastern Europe.

Morning Telegraph

New York OCT 23 1921

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 3, and Saturday afternoon, November 5. The season will also include four other Thursday and Saturday concerts on the following dates: December 1 and 3, January 5 and 7, February 2 and 4 and March 16 and 18. This marks the forty-first season of the orchestra.

Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has arranged the following programs for the opening concerts in New York: For Thursday evening, November 3, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes; Strauss's "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinee, November 5, Brahms's Third Symphony in F major; Franck's Second Organ Chorale in B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part; Schubert's Incidental Music to "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Morning Telegraph

New York OCT 23 1921

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which opens its thirty-sixth season in New York in Carnegie Hall on November 3, under direction of Pierre Monteux, will give a series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts.

The orchestra retains substantially its personnel of former seasons, but few changes having occurred. Of these the only newcomer of the leaders of the various sections is George Fourel, who will lead the viola section. Several new compositions are planned by Director Monteux during the New York season.

...phrase or
...armony or of
...h shall reveal a
...proach to this
... of the Scherzo,
...choly, a rtans-
...id not play us
...rd earlier in the
...nposer attempts
over-much of
, prolonging in-
...y, especially at were one of the
...oliticians, shout-Eagle," at the
the crowd dis-
...ers.

.29

CH AND SYMPHONY

...ach and Theo-
...r classics by
...e contained in
...ogram. There
...ite in D major
these concerts
...as for a long
of the music
been written
...enius. It has which distin-
...m that of 18th

...proximately the including the which are both
...ill. Other con-
...ores of Bach
...ruous in style.
...ly wisest to let himself in the
...stead of trying
...ave done with
...ern orchestra.
... orchestration,
...poser's style.

...om Schubert's
...roach to such
Ysaye, whose
...nded the con-
...onic and connot atone for
...rk of genuine
...m. Schubert's
...is is complex
too often for-
...tricacy is the
...anality. One
...e piece by M
...er known mod-
...ve to be more

...erlioz' "Roman
...he most brilliant
...esent orchestra.
...as exceptionally half of the con-
Mr Monteux and Ysaye symphony
...sed, the fault was
...nposer, who, what-
...ked the indefinable
...ius.
...hony concerts next for Nov 11 and 12
by Hue and David
Sibelius' Second
...oist is Ferenc Vec-
the Tschaikowsky

Oct. 24

SOLOIST IFTH HONY

an Violinist to certs on Nov. nd 12

...nians the Boston
...ra is just a name,
...ts are sold out for long in advance,
...s, and the chances
Therefore the news
...ve special concerts
...re to be given on
...s Winter should be
...elight. There will
...ith these concerts,
...portance—Mirovitch,
Powell, pianist; Es-
...prano; Richard Bur-
...aster and violinist,
the cellist.
...re being arranged
...ation of several of
...tions like the Y. M.
...ity houses are asconcert takes place
November 28.

PHONY

...gram of the Boston
...ts will be given at
...on Friday afternoon
...d Saturday evening,
...lowing the first reg-
...ip of the orchestra,
...y the coming week.
concerts, Ferenc
Hungarian violin-
...st arrived in this
...rope, where his fame
...hest, will appear as with the orchestra
...erennially popular
...jor.
will also conduct
...ony of Sibelius in
...of Youth," by David
...e noted American will have its
on this occasion
of Armistice Day.
...phonic poem "Emo-
...ing sub-titles are
...music by the com-
Prayer, Tumult,
Peace, Trumpets

..29

Ysaye Novelty At Symphony

This week's Symphony program for the most part was heartily enjoyed by the large audience attending yesterday's matinee concert, the enjoyment springing largely from the classic numbers chosen by Mr. Monteux. These were the Bach suite in D major, Schubert's "Rosamunde" suite and the "Roman Carnival" overture by Berlioz. In place of the gavotte in the Bach suite the orchestra played the adagio from the same composer's concerto No. 5.

As a final number came the Theophile Ysaye symphony, a work brought to this country by Charles Martin Loeffler, the Boston composer, who formerly played in the Symphony Orchestra. Theophile Ysaye, brother of Eugene, the violinist and conductor, wrote this unconventional work nearly 20 years ago, at the start of a career that ended prematurely. Like most works written in the new manner, it interested rather than captured those who attended this first hearing in Boston.

The same program will be repeated tonight.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Behind the musical achievement which the name of the Boston Symphony orchestra has come to represent, there lies a long record of the application of musical genius, the constancy of high purpose, and the expenditure of wealth. The aim was an ensemble as close to the ideals of perfection in performance as humanly possible. Only gradually, through tireless years of upbuilding effort by one after another of the world's greatest conductors, has the goal been won. During the last two years the orchestra has profited signally by the illustrous powers of its present conductor, Pierre Monteux. His splendid record as conductor of concerts, opera and ballet in the largest cities of Europe and America has been confirmed and enhanced by his success at this post of honor; indeed, never have the Boston Symphony concerts been more evidently enjoyed and generally praied than under his direction.

Never in the musical history of Hartford has such an imposing array of artists been marshalled under one management and presented under such pleasing auspices as the coming Sedgwick Concert Course. The artists are of undisputed magnitude and Parsons's theater as a concert hall possesses advantages in acoustices and comfort unequalled by any other auditorium in Hartford, but the capacity of Parsons's theater is limited and as the bare announcement of these concerts is sufficient to insure sold out houses the management urges music lovers to take immediate advantage of purchasing seats en bloc for the three artists. The purchase of Boston Symphony seats must be made separate. All applications should be sent to F. . Sedgwick at Sedgwick and Casey's Asylum street.

ROM

A campaign is soon to be begun in Boston to raise a $2,000.000 endowment fund for the Boston Symphony orchestra. This step is to be taken because of the large deficit last year.

---

rom OCT 5 1921
OURNAL COURIER,
New Haven, Conn.

Muck Orchestra For Propaganda?

Boston, Oct. 4.—Testimony was heard in federal court today that James J. Bosdan, proprietor of a local news agency, tried to sell stolen government documents purporting to contain "inside information" gathered by the department of justice in various important cases. Bosdan is charged with the larceny of the papers, possessing them, and attempting to dispose of them for personal gain.

Harry H. Guterman testified that Bosdan told him he had records of the case of Dr. Karl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who was deported for pro-German sympathies during the war. In this connection, Guterman added, Bosdan told him of an alleged interview at Potsdam between the German emperor and the late Henry L. Higginson, of this city, which Bosdan said resulted in establishment of the orchestra for the spread of German propaganda.

From OCT 5 1921
Commercial Appeal
Memphis, Tenn.

SAYS COL. HIGGINSON WAS KAISER'S ALLY

Used Boston Symphony For Propaganda, Lawyer Told.

BOSTON, Oct. 4.—Testimony was heard in federal court today that James J. Bosdan, proprietor of a local news agency, tried to sell stolen government documents purporting to contain "inside information" gathered by the Department of Justice in various important cases. Bosdan is charged with the larceny of the papers, possessing them and attempting to dispose of them for personal gain.

Copies of official reports of inquiries into the unexplained murder of William K. Dean at East Jaffrey, N. H., in 1918, alleged to have been found in Bosdan's home, were introduced into the evidence, and witnesses were called to tell of alleged attempts by Bosdan to sell them.

Harry H. Guterman, a lawyer employed by the town of Jaffrey in connection with the Dean murder, told of his investigation. He said he was called on the telephone by a man who said he was James J. Bosdan and that he had complete records of the inquiries.

Guterman testified that Bosdan also told him he had records of the case of Dr. Carl Muck, former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was deported for pro-German sympathies during the war. In this connection, Guterman added, Bosdan told him of an alleged interview at Potsdam between the German emperor and the late Henry Lee Higginson of this city, which Bosdan said resulted in establishment of the orchestra for the spread of German propaganda.

FROM OCT -6 1921

UNIVERSITY CONCERTS

The University concerts given annually by the Department of Music start this year on December 1 with the appearance of Florence Easton, soprano. The next number is the Boston Symphony Orchestra of one hundred members, conducted by Pierre Monteux, on December 15, which will be followed by a recital by Josef Hofmann, pianist, on February 27. The last number in the series is a joint concert by Marguerite D'Alvarez, contralto, and Pablo Casals, violoncellist, on March 17.

Established 1881
FROM OCT -8 1921 K
EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Society will give five concerts this season in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, beginning November 4.

OCT -9 1921
yn, New York

THE INSTITUTE'S PLANS

The musical program of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences opens with the joint recital on Thursday evening, October 27, by the Hungarian artists, Erno Dohnanyi, pianist and composer, and Emil Telmanyi, violinist. As in previous years the backbone of the Institute's program will be found in orchestral music, although there are many attractive concerts and recitals by individual artists and musical organizations. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteaux, conductor, will give five philharmonic concerts in the Opera House of the Academy on Friday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 3, and March 17. The appeal of these concerts will be increased by the presence of such notable assisting artists as Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Ignaz Friedman, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Bedetti, violoncello, and Emilio D Gogorza, baritone, in the order give

PIERRE MONTEUX
CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY

Evening Globe
New York
OCT 12 1921 K

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin its New York series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 3 and 5, opened its forty-first season in Symphony Hall, Boston, last week. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and "Don Juan" by Strauss. During the stay in Europe of the conductor, Pierre Monteux, he was in quest of new works in various countries, and has made selections of compositions by the following: From France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger (noted member of the Parisian "Six"), and Marcel Duprez; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malpiero, Casella and de Sabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokofieff; from Germany, Schrecker; and from Spain, De Falla.

SUN
ss New York City
OCT 15 1921

Symphonies and Such.

Pierre Monteux began his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when he conducted the brilliant opening pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 7 and 8. The programme was as follows: Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Strauss's "Don Juan."

The usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, to begin on November 3 and 5, are a part of a travelling schedule which is as large as the orchestra can undertake. It will include concerts in a number of Eastern cities as far South as Washington, Baltimore and Richmond, and as far north as Montreal.

New scores to be heard will be selected from the following composers: From France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger (the noted member of the Parisian "Six") and Mercel Dupres; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella and De Sabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff; from Germany, Shrecker, and from Spain, De Falla.

ESTABLISHED 1881 OCT 15 1921 K
From
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, this season again under the conductorship of Pierre Monteux, will give its usual five Thursday evening and the same number of Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, beginning November 3 and 5. Mr. Monteux has brought back a number of new scores from Europe with him, many of which should prove of great interest.

From
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

Boston Symphony Plans a Notable Season Here

An unusually fine season of Boston Symphony concerts is anticipated in the Academy of Music here under the management of C. D. Atkins. They are to take place on five Friday evenings, November 4, December 2, January 6, February 3, and March 17. The soloists will be Ferenc Vecsey, violinist; Louise Homer, American contralto; Emilio de Gogorza, the Spanish-American baritone; Ignaz Friedman, pianist, and Jean Bedetti, violoncellist.

Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor, devoted a part of his sojourn in Europe last summer to a quest of new works in various countries. The finest of these are by France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger, Dupres, Bantock and Bax, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella, De Sabata, Stravinsky and Prokovieff, Schrecker and De Falla.

WORLD,
New York City

The Burgin Quartette is being organized by the distinguished leaders of the string sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as was the Kneisel Quartette in seasons past. Richard Burkin, the concertmaster, who came to the orchestra last year and who will be first violin of the quartette, has in the course of his career organized two quartetos successively when concertmaster of orchestras in Eastern Europe.

TIMES OCT 16 1921
New York City

Orchestra Notes.

The Philharmonic's eightieth year opens Oct. 27 and 28 at Carnegie Hall. Among the season's novelties will be works of Mason, Hadley, Skilton, Whithorn, Enesco, Ravel, Schoenberg, and a first hearing by Philharmonic audiences of Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles."

Richard Strauss's first concert here with an orchestra of 100 men at Carnegie Hall on Oct. 31 will be followed by similar appearances on three Tuesday nights, Nov. 15 and 29 and Dec. 13, at the Metropolitan.

The Boston Symphony under Pierre Monteaux will pay its first visit of the season here on Nov. 3 and 5 at Carnegie Hall and Nov. 4 at the Brooklyn Academy.

TIMES
New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's soloists for five Friday evening concerts at the Brooklyn Academy include, on Nov. 4, Ferenc Vecsey; Dec. 2, Ignaz Friedman; Jan. 6, Louise Homer; Feb. 3, Jean Benedetti, and March 17, Emilio de Gogorza.

For the New York Symphony's six Saturday matinees in Brooklyn the assisting artists are: On Nov. 5, Hulda Lashanska; Dec. 3, Paul Kochanski; Jan. 7, Percy Grainger; Jan. 21, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison; Feb. 11, Erika Morini, and March 11, Marguerite d'Alvarez.

Brooklyn will have its first performance in some years of Handel's "The Messiah" on Dec. 12, by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society. Walter Henry Hall of Columbia has begun rehearsals on Monday evenings at Memorial Hall in the Y. W. C. A., Schermerhorn Street and Flatbush Avenue.

Recitals in the Brooklyn Institute series are announced by Rachmaninoff, Kreisler, Gabrilowitsch, Kochanski, Dohnanyi, Telmanyi, Alfredo Oswald, Hulda Lashanska, Arthur Whiting, the Letz Quartet and the Musurgia Club.

TIMES
New York City

Boston's New Quartet.

Boston expects much good music from the Burgin Quartet, newly formed by the leaders of the string sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as once was the famous Kneisel Quartet.

Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, who came to the orchestra last year and who will be first violin of the quartet, has in the course of his career organized two other quartets when playing with orchestras in Eastern Europe.

Georges Fourel, who arrived lately to lead the viola section, is a first-prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory. He has appeared with the first orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts in Paris.

WORLD,
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its New York series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 3 and 5.

The new scores to be heard here will be selected from the following composers: from France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger (the noted member of the Parisian "Six") and Marcel Dupres; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casello and de Sabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff; from Germany, Schrecker, and from Spain, de Falla.

In a symphony concert which he conducted in Paris last summer, Mr. Monteux introduced to the French public the tone poem of the late American composer, Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Vaughn Williams's "London Symphony." The first of these works was particularly well received.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons.

From Herald
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall on November 3 and 5.

The new scores to be heard this season in the series will be selected from France: Rousell, Ravel, Babaud, Honneger (the noted member of the Parisian "Six"), Marcel Duprea; from England: Bantock, Bax; from Italy: Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella, de Sabata; from Russia: Stravinsky, Prokovieff; from Germany: Schrecker; from Spain; de Falla.

AMERICAN OCT 16 1921
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra could have procured the services of Arturo Toscanini several years ago. That it did not avail itself of the opportunity seems almost beyond belief to those who do not understand the inner workings of musical politics in the Hub.

Several months ago the announcement was made in this column that the great Italian maestro would be back in America next year, and in all probability as conductor of the Boston orchestra, now still under the guidance of Pierre Monteaux. That prognostication may be reiterated at this time.

Officially we are told that this season there has been "an unprecedented demand for seats, practically all having been taken in advance by subscription for the forty-eight concerts in Boston and for concerts elsewhere."

A peculiar sentence, it must be admitted, especially as regards the four final words. The implication, of course, is that the demand for seats also has been great in other cities besides Boston. But the clumsy vagueness of the assertion makes the reader dubious.

As a matter of fact the subscription for the Boston Symphony's concerts outside of Boston has fallen off considerably in the last few years, not least in New York. And it is this, more than anything else, that has made the present directors of the famous organization come to their senses.

Whether the New York subscription for the visiting organization's coming season shows improvement over last year's the writer cannot say. If the board of directors could make a definite announcement, however, that Arturo Toscanini had been chosen as Monsieur Monteaux' successor it would probably have an immediate effect on their subscription here. For the custom still obtains that those who are subscribers now will have first choice of seats in the future.

EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony Gossip

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its third season of home concerts under Pierre Monteux on October 7. It will be heard in New York in the usual five pairs (ten different programmes) in Carnegie Hall and will also be heard in other cities as far South as Washington, Baltimore, and Richmond, and as far North as Montreal. While in Paris last summer M. Monteux conducted "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by the American Charles T. Griffes, which was well received.

The new scores to be heard will be selected from the following composers: From France, Roussel, Ravel, Rabaud, Honneger (the noted member of the Parisian "Six"), and Marcel Dupres; from England, Bantock and Bax; from Italy, Davico, Tomassini, Malipiero, Casella, and De Sabata; from Russia, Stravinsky and Prokovieff; from Germany, Schrecker, and from Spain, De Falla.

Much is expected from the Burgin Quartet, which is being newly organized by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra and the distinguished leader of the string sections. In the same way the Kneisel Quartet was organized in the past. Mr. Burgin has had a thorough and notable experience in chamber music during the earlier part of nis career in Eastern Europe.

Morning Telegraph
New York

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 3, and Saturday afternoon, November 5. The season will also include four other Thursday and Saturday concerts on the following dates: December 1 and 3, January 5 and 7, February 2 and 4 and March 16 and 18. This marks the forty-first season of the orchestra.

Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has arranged the following programs for the opening concerts in New York: For Thursday evening, November 3, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes; Strauss's "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinee, November 5, Brahms's Third Symphony in F major; Franck's Second Organ Chorale in B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part; Schubert's Incidental Music to "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Morning Telegraph
New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its thirty-sixth season in New York in Carnegie Hall on November 3, under direction of Pierre Monteux, will give a series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts.

The orchestra retains substantially its personnel of former seasons, but four changes having occurred. Of these the only newcomer of the leaders of the various sections is George Fourel, who will lead the viola section. Several new compositions are promised by Director Monteux during the New York season.

TIMES, OCT

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

Boston Symphony Society With Vecsey Here on Friday

For the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn, which will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 4, Pierre Monteux has arranged an excellent program. It will begin with the splendid Third Symphony of Brahm in F major, and end with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." The soloist will be Ferenc Vecsey, the Hungarian violinist. He will be heard in Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto.

This artist, who has long been considered in Europe as one of the finest, is enroute on the George Washington, which is expected to dock in New York Thursday. Born in Budapest in 1893, his precocity was nothing less than startling, and led to a year's study at the Royal Conservatory of his native city under Prof. Hubay.

When he was ten years old, his parents took him to Berlin, to play for the famous master, Josef Joachim. The venerable musician listened as he played Bach and at once became absorbed in his new pupil. The boy grew into a man, and tours in subsequent seasons, notably in 1913, won him the highest acclaim in the capitals of Europe. By virtue of European report of the present qualities of his playing his return is curiously awaited.

---

rom OCT 23 1921 L

World

New York City

rday, Nov. 5.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, e Monteux, conductor, will play rnegie Hall in the afternoon. The ramme comprises Brahms's Third mphony in F Major, Franck's Second Organ Chorale in B Minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part, Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

World OCT 23 1921 L

New York City

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open at Carnegie Hall in the evening. Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has arranged his opening programme as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko;" Debussy's Nocturnes, Nuages, and Fetes, and Strauss's "Don

---

TRIBUNE

NEW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 3, and Saturday afternoon, November 5. The season will also include four other Thursday and Saturday concerts on the following dates: December 1 and 3, January 5 and 7, February 2 and 4 and March 16 and 18.

This the forty-first season of the orchestra began in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 7 and 8. There is only one new face in the personnel of 102 musicians—Georges Fourel, who came from Europe to lead the viola section. A prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory, he has appeared with the principal orchestras of France.

FROM OCT 23 1921 R

Standard Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

For the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn, which will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 4, Pierre Monteux, now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has compiled a brilliant programme. It will begin with the splendid Third Symphony of Brahms, in F major, and end with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," generally looked upon as one of that composer's finest works. The soloist will be Ferenc Vecsey, the great Hungarian violinist, now on his way to this country. In this, his first appearance with orchestra in America, which will also be his first concert in Brooklyn, he will be heard in Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto. This artist, who has long been considered in Europe as one of the finest of them all, is now on the high seas on the George Washington, which is expected to dock in New York next Thursday.

[17]

EAGLE OCT 23 1921

Brooklyn, New York

For the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn, which will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 4, Pierre Monteux, now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has compiled a brilliant program. It will begin with the splendid Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, and end with Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan," generally looked upon as one of that composer's finest works. The soloist will be Ferenc Vecsey, the great Hungarian violinist now on his way to this country. In this, his first appearance with the orchestra in America which will also be his first concert in Brooklyn, he will be heard in Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto.

From Post Oct. 23

Washington, D.C.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene announces the second series in the Philharmonic Course, six concerts at the National theater at 4:30 o'clock: Thursday, November 17, Pavlowa and her Ballet Russe, with full symphony orchestra; Thursday, December 8, Mme. Galli-Curci; Thursday, January 12, Franz Von Vescey, the Hungarian violinist; Tuesday, January 24, Sophie Braslau, contralto; Tuesday, January 31, Boston Symphony orchestra; Friday, February 10, Mme. Matzenauer, contralto. Mme. Galli-Curci, Mme. Matzenauer and the Boston Symphony orchestra will make this their only local appearances in this course. The sale of season tickets opens tomorrow morning at Mrs. Greene's Concert bureau in Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets.

83

OCT 23 1921 R

TRIBUNE

Providence

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An unusually splendid season of Boston Symphony concerts is anticipated in Infantry Hall on the following five Tuesday evenings: Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11.

The orchestra could not have had a more auspicious season's opening than the first pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 7 and 8, and subsequent concerts there. The quality of performances and the ensemble in its present state were unanimously praised. Indeed there are other signs that this, the 41st season of the orchestra, will be the most successful of them all.

The Providence concerts are a part of their travelling schedule, which is as large as can be undertaken, and includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Richmond, Washington and Baltimore, and as far north as Montreal. For the 48 regular concerts in Boston, and for concerts elsewhere, practically all the seats have been taken in advance by subscription.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor, spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a notable symphony concert in which he gave the French public a taste of American musical achievement by introducing the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla-Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe to a quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest of which will probably figure on his programs here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and to-morrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fourel, who has come from Europe to head the viola section, and is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with conspicuous success with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartette, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the talented concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartette was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the 80's.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence are such as to add considerably to the interest of the symphony concerts here. Much may be expected from the appearance of Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America, shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of fifteen, this artist displayed such remarkable skill that Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer, shared the enthusiasm of Josef Joachim, his teacher and became warmly interested in him. In his present full maturity he has come to be regarded throughout Europe as one of the most brilliant living masters of his instrument.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, as highly regarded among the pianists of Europe as is Huberman among the violinists, first came to this country in 1913 when his concerts, including appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were so fine, that they are still remembered by all who heard him. The other pianist is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Raymond Havens is a native of Providence and his early training took place in this city. The fame of this virtuoso has been extended in recent seasons by concerts in New York, other cities of the East and in Europe also. Mr. Havens appearances with the orchestra elsewhere have in each case been notable occasions.

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There will be two singers. The first is Helen Stanley, erstwhile prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, who has during recent seasons devoted her career entirely to the concert stage. The large and rich qualities of Mlle. Alcock's voice, together with her skill as a dramatic interpreter of song, have won her an enviable place among concert and oratorio singers. This noted contralto has formerly sung with conspicuous success in Boston and other cities as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From Oct. 24-1921

TIMES,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

NYREGHAZI PLAYS.

With the confidence born of his recent successes with the Boston Symphony, Erwin Nyregyhazi showed increased vigor at his second piano recital in Carnegie oall yesterday afternoon. His treatment of some of the compositions of his countryman Liszt possessed particular ardor. Pieces by Chopin, Schubert, Grieg and Tschaikovsky were also in his program.

FROM

COMMERCIAL

New York

Boston Symphony Announces N. Y. Season

The 36th season of Boston symphony concerts in New York will open in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 3, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 5. The season will include four Thursday and Saturday concerts on Dec. 1 and 3, Jan. 5 and 7, Feb. 2 and 4, and March 16 and 18.

There is only one new face in the personal of 102 musicians; Georges Fourel, who came from Europe to lead the viola section. A prize virtucco of the Paris Conservatory, he has appeared with the principal orchestras of France, and notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux Concerts. Three distinguished former members who have returned to the ranks are W. Krafft, violin; H. Werner, viola; and K. Keller, base.

Pierre Monteux has arranged the following programs for the New York concerts. For Thursday evening, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko;" Debussy's Nocturnes: Nuages, and Fetes; Strauss' "Don Juan."

For the Saturday matinee, Brahms' Third Symphony in F major; Franck's Second Organ Chorals in B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part; Schubert's Incidental Music to "Rosamunde;" and Berlioz' Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Evening Globe

New York

EVENTS IN MUSIC

TO-DAY.

Aeolian Hall—3 P. M., piano recital by Norma Drury; 8:15 P. M., concert of the Letz Quartette.

Carnegie Hall—8:15 P. M., song recital by Luella Meluis, soprano.

Town Hall—3 P. M., piano recital by Juliette Arnold; 8:15 P. M., song recital by Estelle Liebling, soprano.

TO-MORROW.

Carnegie Hall—8:15 P. M., piano recital by Elly Ney.

Town Hall—8:15 P. M., song recital by Redferne Hollinshead, tenor.

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 3, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 5. The season will also include four other Thursday and Saturday concerts on the following dates: Dec. 1 and 3, Jan. 5 and 7, Feb. 2 and 4, and March 16 and 18.

This, the forty-first, season of the orchestra began in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 7 and 8. There is only one new face among the 102 musicians: Georges Fourel, who has come from Europe to lead the viola section. A prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory, he has appeared with the principal orchestras of France, and notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux Concerts. Three distinguished former members who have returned to the ranks, are W. Krafft, violin; H. Werner, viola, and K. Keller, bass.

Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has arranged the following programmes for the opening concerts in New York. For Thursday evening, Nov. 3, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's nocturnes: "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; Richard Strauss's "Don Juan."

For the Saturday matinee, Nov. 5: Brahms's Third Symphony, César Franck's Second Organ Chorale in B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallach Goodrich, who will play the organ part; Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde"; Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carhival."

TELEGRAM OCT 27 1921 L

New York City

The following programmes have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the opening of its thirty-sixth season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 3, and Saturday afternoon, November 5. For the Thursday evening concert, Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinee the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, Cesar Franck's organ chorale No. 2 in B minor (arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich), excerpts from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival."

EVE. POST

NEW YORK CITY

OCT 29 1921 K

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon M. Monteux will conduct the season's first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The Thursday programme includes Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko"; Debussy's Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fêtes," and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinée, the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, César Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor (arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, the noted New England composer, who will play the organ part), numbers from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde"—the first and second ballets and the second entr'acte—and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

On Tuesday evening, also in Carnegie Hall, the Philadelphia Orchestra will introduce to New Yorkers Alfred Casella (see above), whose "A Notte Alta" will be the novelty in a programme including also Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and three excerpts from Berlioz's "Faust."

From OCT 29

EVENING MAIL

New York City

THE Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conducting, plays Thursday night the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Sadko," Debussey's "Nuages and Fetes," Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven' "Eroica" Symphony.

---

m SUN

ress New York City

OCT 29 1921 D

cital, Alma Simpson.

SATURDAY.

Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Aeolian Hall, afternoon, piano recital, Harold Bauer; Town Hall, afternoon, piano recital, Marie Hertenstein; Carnegie Hall, evening, violin recital, John Corigliano.

---

ldress New York City

SUN OCT 29 1921 D

te

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Symphony Society, New York; Town Hall, afternoon, violin recital, Bronislaw Huberman; Aeolian Hall, afternoon, piano recital, Phyllida Ashley; Carnegie Hall, evening, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Town Hall, evening, violin recital Ruth Ray; Aeolian Hall, evening, song recital, Frieda Klink.

---

n SUN

ress New York City

OCT 29 1921 D

of August, 1921, at Capri.

The following programmes have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the opening of its thirty-sixth season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Nov. 3, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 5, at 2:30. For the Thursday evening concert Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica;" Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko;" Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinee the third symphony of Brahms, in F major; Cesar Franck's organ chorale No. 2 in B minor (arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, the noted New England composer, who will play the organ part); numbers from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

From OCT 30 1921

TIMES,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music, which will take place Friday evening, November 4, will be an event of twofold interest. Ferenc Vecsey, the Hungarian violinist, will appear for the first time in Brooklyn with an orchestra, as soloist at this concert. He will play Tschaikowsky's popular concert in D major.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen for this occasion the third symphony of Brahms in F major, and the brilliant tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Don Juan."

---

m HERALD

ress New York City OCT 30

te

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, will open its thirty-sixth season in New York with a pair of concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programmes: Thursday, Beethoven, "Eroica" Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko"; Debussy, nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; Strauss, "Don Juan." Saturday, Brahms, Third Symphony; Franck, Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part; numbers from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," the first and second ballets and the second entr'acte; Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival." The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons except four changes. Of these, the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections is Georges Fourel, who has come from Paris to lead the viola section. A first prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory, he has appeared with the first orchestras of France and as viola soloist at the Lamoreux concerts. Much is expected from the new Burgin Quartet, which is being organized by the distinguished leaders of the string sections of the orchestra, as was the Kneisel Quartet in seasons past. Richard Burgin, the concert master, who came to the orchestra last year and will be first violin of the quartet, has in the course of his career formed two quartet organizations successively when concert master of orchestras in Europe. Messrs. Bedetti and Kaffman, cello and second violin, will complete the new quartet.

OCT 30 1921

From

TIMES.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Symphony Society, New York; Town Hall, afternoon, violin recital, Bronislaw Huberman; Aeolian Hall, afternoon, piano recital, Phyllida Ashley; Carnegie Hall, evening, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Town Hall, evening, violin recital, Ruth Ray; Aeolian Hall, evening, song recital, Frieda Klink.

EAGLE

Brooklyn, New York

IN BROOKLYN

The opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music, which will take place next Friday evening, Nov. 4, will be an event of two-fold interest, in that Ferenc Vecsey, the Hungarian violinist, who will be heard in an introductory recital in New York next Tuesday, will appear for the first time in Brooklyn and for the first time in America with an orchestra as soloist at this concert. He will play Tschaikowsky's perennially popular concert in D major.

Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen for this occasion the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, and the brilliant tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Don Juan."

TIMES, OCT

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

Boston Symphony Society With Vecsey Here on Friday

For the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn, which will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 4 Pierre Monteux has arranged an excellent program. It will begin with the splendid Third Symphony of Brahm in F major, and end with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." The soloist will be Ferenc Vecsey, the Hungarian violinist. He will be heard in Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto.

This artist, who has long been considered in Europe as one of the finest, is enroute on the George Washington, which is expected to dock in New York Thursday. Born in Budapest in 1893, his precocity was nothing less than startling, and led to a year's study at the Royal Conservatory of his native city under Prof. Hubay.

When he was ten years old, his parents took him to Berlin, to play for the famous master, Josef Joachim. The venerable musician listened as he played Bach and at once became absorbed in his new pupil. The boy grew into a man, and tours in subsequent seasons, notably in 1913, won him the highest acclaim in the capitals of Europe. By virtue of European report of the present qualities of his playing his return is curiously awaited.

---

rom
World
New York City

rday, Nov. 5.

e Boston Symphony Orchestra, e Monteux, conductor, will play rnegie Hall in the afternoon. The ramme comprises Brahms's Third mphony in F Major, Franck's Second Organ Chorale in B Minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part, Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

World
New York City

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open at Carnegie Hall in the evening. Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has arranged his opening programme as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko;" Debussy's Nocturnes, Nuages, and Fetes, and Strauss's "Don Juan."

TRIBUNE
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 3, and Saturday afternoon, November 5. The season will also include four other Thursday and Saturday concerts on the following dates: December 1 and 3, January 5 and 7, February 2 and 4 and March 16 and 18.

This the forty-first season of the orchestra began in Symphony Hall, Boston, on October 7 and 8. There is only one new face in the personnel of 102 musicians—Georges Fourel, who came from Europe to lead the viola section. A prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory, he has appeared with the principal orchestras of France.

FROM
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

For the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn, which will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 4, Pierre Monteux, now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has compiled a brilliant programme. It will begin with the splendid Third Symphony of Brahms, in F major, and end with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," generally looked upon as one of that composer's finest works. The soloist will be Fereno Vecsey, the great Hungarian violinist, now on his way to this country. In this, his first appearance with orchestra in America, which will also be his first concert in Brooklyn, he will be heard in Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto. This artist, who has long been considered in Europe as one of the finest of them all, is now on the high seas on the George Washington, which is expected to dock in New York next Thursday.

[17]

EAGLE OCT 23 1921
Brooklyn, New York

For the opening concert of the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn, which will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 4, Pierre Monteux, now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has compiled a brilliant program. It will begin with the splendid Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, and end with Richard Strauss's Tone Poem, "Don Juan," generally looked upon as one of that composer's finest works. The soloist will be Ferenc Vecsey, the great Hungarian violinist now on his way to this country. In this, his first appearance with the orchestra in America which will also be his first concert in Brooklyn, he will be heard in Tschaikowsky's Violin Concerto.

From Post Oct 23
Washington, D.C.

Mrs. Wilson-Greene announces the second series in the Philharmonic Course, six concerts at the National theater at 4:30 o'clock: Thursday, November 17, Pavlowa and her Ballet Russe, with full symphony orchestra; Thursday, December 8, Mme. Galli-Curci; Thursday, January 12, Franz Von Vescey, the Hungarian violinist; Tuesday, January 24, Sophie Braslau, contralto; Tuesday, January 31, Boston Symphony orchestra; Friday, February 10, Mme. Matzenauer, contralto. Mme. Galli-Curci, Mme. Matzenauer and the Boston Symphony orchestra will make this their only local appearances in this course. The sale of season tickets opens tomorrow morning at Mrs. Greene's Concert bureau in Droop's, Thirteenth and G streets.

83

---

23 1921

TRIBUNE

Providence

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An unusually splendid season of Boston Symphony concerts is anticipated in Infantry Hall on the following five Tuesday evenings: Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11.

The orchestra could not have had a more auspicious season's opening than the first pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 7 and 8, and subsequent concerts there. The quality of performances and the ensemble in its present state were unanimously praised. Indeed there are other signs that this, the 41st season of the orchestra, will be the most successful of them all.

The Providence concerts are a part of their travelling schedule, which is as large as can be undertaken, and includes the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Richmond, Washington and Baltimore, and as far north as Montreal. For the 48 regular concerts in Boston, and for concerts elsewhere, practically all the seats have been taken in advance by subscription.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor, spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a notable symphony concert in which he gave the French public a taste of American musical achievement by introducing the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla-Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe to a quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest of which will probably figure on his programs here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and to-morrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fourel, who has come from Europe to head the viola section, and is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with conspicuous success with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartette, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the talented concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartette was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the 80's.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence are such as to add considerably to the interest of the symphony concerts here. Much may be expected from the appearance of Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America, shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of fifteen, this artist displayed such remarkable skill that Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer, shared the enthusiasm of Josef Joachim, his teacher and became warmly interested in him. In his present full maturity he has come to be regarded throughout Europe as one of the most brilliant living masters of his instrument.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, as highly regarded among the pianists of Europe as is Huberman among the violinists, first came to this country in 1912 when his concerts, including appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were so fine, that they are still remembered by all who heard him. The other pianist is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Raymond Havens is a native of Providence and his early training took place in this city. The fame of this virtuoso has been extended in recent seasons by concerts in New York, other cities of the East and in Europe also. Mr. Havens'

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

appearances with the orchestra elsewhere have in each case been notable occasions.

There will be two singers. The first is Helen Stanley, erstwhile prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, who has during recent seasons devoted her career entirely to the concert stage. The large and rich qualities of Mlle. Alcock's voice, together with her skill as a dramatic interpreter of song, have won her an enviable place among concert and oratorio singers. This noted contralto has formerly sung with conspicuous success in Boston and other cities as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

From Oct.
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

NYREGHAZI PLAYS.

With the confidence born of his recent successes with the Boston Symphony, Erwin Nyregyhazi showed increased vigor at his second piano recital in Carnegie oall yesterday afternoon. His treatment of some of the compositions of his countryman Liszt possessed particular ardor. Pieces by Chopin, Schubert, Grieg and Tschaikovsky were also in his program.

FROM COMMERCIAL
New York

Boston Symphony Announces N. Y. Season

The 36th season of Boston symphony concerts in New York will open in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 3, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 5. The season will include four Thursday and Saturday concerts on Dec. 1 and 3, Jan. 5 and 7, Feb. 2 and 4, and March 16 and 18.

There is only one new face in the personal of 102 musicians; Georges Fourel, who came from Europe to lead the viola section. A prize virtucco of the Paris Conservatory, he has appeared with the principal orchestras of France, and notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux Concerts. Three distinguished former members who have returned to the ranks are W. Krafft, violin; H. Werner, viola; and K. Keller, base.

Pierre Monteux has arranged the following programs for the New York concerts. For Thursday evening, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko;" Debussy's Nocturnes: Nuages, and Fetes; Strauss' "Don Juan."

For the Saturday matinee, Brahms' Third Symphony in F major; Franck's Second Organ Chorals in B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part; Schubert's Incidental Music to "Rosamunde;" and Berlioz' Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Evening Globe
New York

EVENTS IN MUSIC

TO-DAY.

Aeolian Hall—3 P. M., piano recital by Norma Drury; 8:15 P. M., concert of the Letz Quartette.

Carnegie Hall—8:15 P. M., song recital by Luella Meluis, soprano.

Town Hall—3 P. M., piano recital by Juliette Arnold; 8:15 P. M., song recital by Estelle Liebling, soprano.

TO-MORROW.

Carnegie Hall—8:15 P. M., piano recital by Elly Ney.

Town Hall—8:15 P. M., song recital by Redferne Hollinshead, tenor.

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 3, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 5. The season will also include four other Thursday and Saturday concerts on the following dates: Dec. 1 and 3, Jan. 5 and 7, Feb. 2 and 4, and March 16 and 18.

This, the forty-first, season of the orchestra began in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 7 and 8. There is only one new face among the 102 musicians: Georges Fourel, who has come from Europe to lead the viola section. A prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory, he has appeared with the principal orchestras of France, and notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux Concerts. Three distinguished former members who have returned to the ranks, are W. Krafft, violin; H. Werner, viola, and K. Keller, bass.

Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, has arranged the following programmes for the opening concerts in New York. For Thursday evening, Nov. 3, Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's nocturnes: "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; Richard Strauss's "Don Juan."

For the Saturday matinee, Nov. 5: Brahms's Third Symphony, César Franck's Second Organ Chorale in B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallach Goodrich, who will play the organ part; Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde"; Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival."

TELEGRAM OCT 27 1921 L
New York City

The following programmes have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the opening of its thirty-sixth season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, November 3, and Saturday afternoon, November 5. For the Thursday evening concert, Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinee the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, Cesar Franck's organ chorale No. 2 in B minor (arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich), excerpts from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival."

EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

On Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon M. Monteux will conduct the season's first concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The Thursday programme includes Beethoven's Third Symphony, "Eroica"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko"; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes" and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinée, the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, César Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor (arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, the noted New England composer, who will play the organ part), numbers from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde"—the first and second ballets and the second entr'acte—and Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

On Tuesday evening, also in Carnegie Hall, the Philadelphia Orchestra will introduce to New Yorkers Alfred Casella (see above), whose "A Notte Alta" will be the novelty in a programme including also Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and three excerpts from Berlioz's "Faust."

From OCT 29
EVENING MAIL
New York City

THE Boston Symphony, Pierre Monteux conducting, plays Thursday night the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Sadko," Debussey's "Nuages and Fetes," Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven' "Eroica" Symphony.

---

m SUN

ress New York City

OCT 29 1921D

cital, Alma Simpson.

SATURDAY.

Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Aeolian Hall, afternoon, piano recital, Harold Bauer; Town Hall, afternoon, piano recital, Marie Hertenstein; Carnegie Hall, evening, violin recital, John Corigliano.

---

ldress New York City

te SUN OCT 29 1921D

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Symphony Society, New York; Town Hall, afternoon, violin recital, Bronislaw Huberman; Aeolian Hall, afternoon, piano recital, Phyllida Ashley; Carnegie Hall, evening, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Town Hall, evening, violin recital, Ruth Ray; Aeolian Hall, evening, song recital, Frieda Klink.

---

n SUN

ress New York City

OCT 29 1921D

of August, 1921, at Capri.

The following programmes have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the opening of its thirty-sixth season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Nov. 3, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 5, at 2:30 For the Thursday evening concert Beethoven's third symphony, "Eroica;" Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko;" Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinee the third symphony of Brahms, in F major; Cesar Franck's organ chorale No. 2 in B minor (arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, the noted New England composer, who will play the organ part); numbers from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

From
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music, which will take place Friday evening, November 4, will be an event of twofold interest. Ferenc Vecsey, the Hungarian violinist, will appear for the first time in Brooklyn with an orchestra, as soloist at this concert. He will play Tschaikowsky's popular concert in D major.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen for this occasion the third symphony of Brahms in F major, and the brilliant tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Don Juan."

---

m HERALD

ress New York City, OCT 30 1

te

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, will open its thirty-sixth season in New York with a pair of concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programmes: Thursday, Beethoven, "Eroica" Symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Sadko"; Debussy, nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes"; Strauss, "Don Juan." Saturday, Brahms, Third Symphony; Franck, Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part; numbers from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," the first and second ballets and the second entr'acte; Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival." The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons except four changes. Of these, the only newcomer among the leaders of the various sections is Georges Fourel, who has come from Paris to lead the viola section. A first prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory, he has appeared with the first orchestras of France and as viola soloist at the Lamoureux concerts. Much is expected from the new Burgin Quartet, which is being organized by the distinguished leaders of the string sections of the orchestra, as was the Kneisel Quartet in seasons past. Richard Burgin, the concert master, who came to the orchestra last year and will be first violin of the quartet, has in the course of his career formed two quartet organizations successively when concert master of orchestras in Europe. Messrs. Bedetti and Kaffman, cello and second violin, will complete the new quartet.

OCT 30 1921

From
TIMES.
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THURSDAY.

Carnegie Hall, afternoon, Symphony Society, New York; Town Hall, afternoon, violin recital, Bronislaw Huberman; Aeolian Hall, afternoon, piano recital, Phyllida Ashley; Carnegie Hall, evening, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Town Hall, evening, violin recital, Ruth Ray; Aeolian Hall, evening, song recital, Frieda Klink.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

IN BROOKLYN

The opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music, which will take place next Friday evening, Nov. 4, will be an event of two-fold interest, in that Ferenc Vecsey, the Hungarian violinist, who will be heard in an introductory recital in New York next Tuesday, will appear for the first time in Brooklyn and for the first time in America with an orchestra as soloist at this concert. He will play Tschaikowsky's perennially popular concert in D major.

Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen for this occasion the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, and the brilliant tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Don Juan."

TIGHT BINDING

City
1921D

at Capri.
ogrammes have been Monteux, now in his
nductor of the Boston
ra, for the opening of eason in New York,
ace in Carnegie Hall
ning, Nov. 3, at 8:15,
rnoon, Nov. 5, at 2:30
evening concert Beeymphony, "Eroica;"
tone picture, s nocturnes, "Nu-
s," and Richard
, "Don Juan." For
ee the third sym-
in F major; Cesar
rale No. 2 in B mi-rchestra and organ
h, the noted New
who will play the
rs from Schubert's
"Rosamunde," and
"The Roman Car-

---

0 1921
Y.

SYMPHONY.

he season of Boston
in the Academy of
take place Friday
4, will be an event
Ferenc Vecsey, the
t, will appear for ooklyn with an ort this concert. He vsky's popular con-

conductor of the Orchestra, has
sion the third sym-
in F major, and poem of Richard
."

City
OCT 30 1

mphony Orchestra
nductor, will open it in New York with on Thursday evening
fternoon at Carnegie
grammes: Thursday,
a" Symphony; Rimsky-
ko"; Debussy, noc-
and "Fetes"; Strauss,
urday, Brahms, Third
, Organ Chorale No.
ged for orchestra and
Goodrich, who will part; numbers from tal music to "Rosa-
nd second ballets and
te; Berlioz, overture,
ival." The personnel remains substantially
s except four changes.
newcomer among the
us sections is Georges ne from Paris to lead
first prize virtuoso
rvatory, he has ap-
first orchestras of
ola soloist at the
Much is expected
n Quartet, which is
the distinguished sections of the or-
Kneisel Quartet in
ard Burgin, the con-
me to the orchestra
be first violin of the course of his career
t organizations suc-
cert master of orches-
Messrs. Bedetti and
d second violin, will uartet.

---

30 1921
Y.

SDAY.
afternoon, Symphony
k; Town Hall, after-
l, Bronislaw Huberl, afternoon, piano re-
shley; Carnegie Hall,
Symphony Orchestra;
ng, violin recital, Ruth
l, evening, song recital,

---

30 921D
ew York

BROOKLYN

of the season of Bos-
concerts in the Acad-
which will take place
vening, Nov. 4, will be
o-fold interest in that the Hungarian violin-
e heard in an introduc-
New York next Tues-
ar for the first time in
for the first time in an orchestra as soloist
t. He will play Tschai-
ennially popular concert

nteux, now in his third
nductor of the Boston
rchestra, has chosen for the Third Symphony of
major, and the brilliant
Richard Strauss, "Don

TIMES OCT 30 192
NEW YORK CITY

rre Monteux has arranged for the ton Symphony Orchestra's first con-of the season here on Thursday ing in Carnegie Hall, a program in-uding Beethoven's Symphony No. 3,
"Eroica"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone-picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's "Two Nocturnes" entitled "Nuages" and tes," and Strauss's "Don Juan."
For next Saturday's matinee, the Bostonians have Brahms's Symphony No. 3, Franck's second organ chorale, in B minor, arranged with orchestra by Wallace Goodrich, who plays the organ part, Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" and Berlioz's overture,
"The Roman Carnival."

FROM OCT 30
Morning Telegraph
New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
er the direction of Pierre Monteux l give its first New York concert in negie Hall Thursday evening present Beethoven's Third Symphony
ocia," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pic
"Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes uages" and "Fetes," and Richard uss's tone poem, "Don Juan." The nd concert will take place in Car e Saturday afternoon when a feature ber will be Cesar Franck's "Organ orale No. 2," arranged for orchestra organ by Wallace Goodrich, who l play the organ score.

World OCT 30 1921 L
New York City

Saturday, Nov. 5.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will play at Carnegie Hall at 2.30 P. M. The programme comprises Brahms's third symphony in F major, Franck's second organ chorale in B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part, Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

AMERICAN OCT 30 1921
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall: "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven; Sadko by Rimsky-Korsakoff; Nuages and Fetes by Debussy; Don Juan by Strauss. On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Symphony No. 3 by Brahms; Incidental music to Rosamunde by Schubert; Organ Prelude by Franck; Overture "The Roman Carnival" by Berlioz.

World OCT 30 1921 L
New York City

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open at Carnegie Hall at 8.15. Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has arranged his opening programme as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko;" Debussy's Nocturnes, Nuages, and Fetes, and Strauss's "Don Juan."

From OCT 30 1921
AMERICAN
New York City

Brooklyn Ins
Long Seas

sic is to many the art of arts.
music is certainly one of the potent factors in the cultivation t refinement of the mind which highest achievement of education and Brooklynites always face opportunities to enjoy it during Winter. The musical programme
Brooklyn Institute of Arts and ces is generally considered the tay of Brooklyn's musical life.
his tradition is fully maintained fine list of concerts and recihat the institute offers for the t season.
in previous years, the backbone Brooklyn Institute's programme found in orchestral music, al-there are many attractive rts and recitals by individual and musical organizations. The n Symphony Orchestra, Pierre eux, conductor, will give five armonic concerts in the Opera of the Academy on Friday
ngs, November 4, December 2, ary 6, February 3, and March 17.
appeal of these concerts will be sed by the presence of such assisting artists as Ferenc
y, violin; Ignaz Friedman, piano;
Homer, contralto; Jean Be violoncello, and Emilio De G baritone, in the order giv

SYMPHONY TO GIVE FIVE SPECIAL CONCERTS

Orchestra Takes Steps to Meet Popular Demand

The full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will give a series of five special concerts in Symphony Hall, because of the evident popular demand for them and the unprecedented season sale of the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

The concerts will take place on these five Monday evenings: Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10. Some of the seats have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will be placed on sale at Symphony Hall Monday morning, Nov. 7.

The five soloists engaged to appear at these concerts are: Alfred Mirovitch, Russian virtuoso; John Powell, American musician; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section.

HERALD-Oct 27

SPECIAL SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Series to Be Given on Five Monday Nights

A series of five special concerts will be given in Symphony Hall by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux.

These concerts have been arranged on account of the evident popular demand for them and because the unprecedented season sale for the regular 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts has left no reserved seats still available, except a few of the higher priced ones for Saturdays.

AT POPULAR PRICES

This special series should prove particularly desirable in that popular prices will make generally accessible all the advantages of the finest symphonic music by this famous orchestra.

The five soloists engaged to appear at these concerts will add to the interest of each. Two pianists are to play concertos with the orchestra—Alfred Mirovitch, the highly talented Russian virtuoso, who was so much praised when he first came to America last spring, and John Powell, the American musician, who has toured Europe and America playing with orchestras and in concerts of his own with conspicuous success. Estelle Liebling, the soprano, has also appeared in many cities and won enthusiastic praise by the beauties of her voice and artistry. Richard Burgin, who is now serving his second season as concertmaster of the orchestra, has more than confirmed, in appearances as soloist with the orchestra and in concerts of his own here, the splendid reputation which he formerly held in Europe. Equally illustrious is Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section, who is considered one of the finest living masters of his instrument.

The concerts will take place in Symphony Hall on the following five Monday evenings—Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, Mar. 13 and Apr. 10. A number of seats for the series have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will be placed on sale at Symphony Hall next Monday morning.

POST-Oct 27

FOURTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was one of sincere worth.

It opened with the Bach Overture in D major. Bach is always refreshing; the clear, delicate manner of expression of his works are uplifting. This work as given yesterday proved, in the skilful hands of the orchestra, a thing not alone of perfection in style, but also in parts deep with feeling and imagination.

The suite is one of four which were probably written during the composer's life as chapel master to Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cothen. It is said that Bach passed some of his happiest years there, and in the contentment which must have been his he wrote with greater depth.

The Schubert incidental music to the opera "Rosamunde" was of interest, and the stirring character of Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," was well portrayed when the orchestra Mr. Monteux included threw themselves into its interpretation with all ardor possible.

Theophile Ysaye, a younger brother of the violinist, wrote a symphony in F major, whose first Boston performance was given yesterday. Its first American performance was in Cincinnati. It proved a work of genuine worth.

[illegible]

SPECIAL SERIES OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Five special concerts are to be given in Symphony Hall by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, on the following Monday evenings: Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10. As is well known, practically all seats have been taken in advance by subscription for the regular 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening symphony concerts, only a few Saturdays at the higher prices being available.

TRAV. Oct. 29

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be interested in the organization's concert schedule for this season because of the unusual attention given to New England cities. More of these than ever before in a single season are included in the list, indicating an effort to establish the orchestra more completely as a New England, as well as Boston, institution.

In addition to its regular series of 48 concerts in Boston, nine in Cambridge and five in Providence, the orchestra will play in Fall River, New Bedford, Brockton, Springfield and Lynn in Massachusetts, in Hartford and New Haven, Conn., in Burlington and Middlebury, Vt., in Portland, Me., and in Manchester, N. H.

Boston will also have the usual two pension fund concerts and three young people's concerts, with five extra concerts at popular prices which have been added to the schedule this year.

The trips out of New England will carry the orchestra to New York for 15 concerts, with single appearances in Richmond, Washington, Baltimore, Syracuse, Ithaca, Binghamton and Montreal.

The entire schedule calls for 105 concerts, 83 of which are in New England. The sale of season tickets for the Providence series will open to-morrow at Seddon's in Butler Exchange.

PROV JOURNAL Oct 30

SPECIAL SYMPHONY

In compliance with a very evident popular demand, a special series of five Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux. Since the unprecedented sale of subscription seats for the regular 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts has left no reserved seats still available except a few of the higher priced ones for Saturdays, these special concerts at popular prices should prove an opportunity for many.

They will offer, by including a representative choice of the finest symphonic music in the ideal performance which this famous orchestra can give, an introduction to many into this field of art. Many also, familiar with symphony concerts, have been unable to obtain seats for the regular series or to attend so large a number.

Two pianists will play concertos with the orchestra—Alfred Mirovich, the talented Russian virtuoso, and John Powell, the American musician, who has toured Europe and America, playing with orchestras and in concerts of his own with conspicuous success. Other soloists will be Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section.

The concerts will take place in Symphony Hall on the following five Monday evenings: Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10. A number of seats for the series have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will be placed on sale at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Nov. 7.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now on its first southern trip of the season, therefore there will be no Symphony concert here on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program for the concerts of Nov. 11, 12 is as follows:

Symphony No. 2, D major..........Sibelius
"A Poem of Youth"..........D. S. Smith
(First performance)
Concerto in D major for violin...Tschaikowsky
"Emotions," Symphonic poem..........Hue
(First time in Boston)

Ferenc Vecsey, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto, will be heard here for the first time since his appearance as an infant phenomenon under the management of Daniel Frohman in Symphony Hall in February, 1905.

Georges Hue's symphonic poem is dated 1918, and was first performed at a Lamoureux concert in Paris in the season of 1918-19. The sub-titles indicate the nature of the piece: Anguish—Prayer—Tumult—Pacification—Bells of Peace—Trumpets of Victory.

HERALD-Oct. 30

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

In compliance with popular demand, a special series of five popular price concerts will be given in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, on Monday nights, beginning November 28. The five soloists will be Alfred Mirovitch, Russian pianist; John Powell, American pianist; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section. Seats have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will go on sale November 7.

ADVTSR. Oct. 30.

Special Symphony Con

In compliance with a very evident popular demand, a special series of five Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux. Since the unprecedented sale of subscription seats for the regular 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts has left no reserved seats still available, except a few of the higher priced ones for Saturdays, these special concerts at popular prices should prove an opportunity for many.

They will offer, by including a representative choice of the finest symphonic music in the ideal performance which this famous orchestra can give, an introduction to many into this field of art. Many also, familiar with symphony concerts, have been unable to obtain seats for the regular series or to attend so large a number.

The five soloists engaged to appear at these concerts will add to the interest of each. Two pianists are to play concertos with the orchestra—Alfred Mirovitch, the highly talented Russian virtuoso, who was so much praised when he first came to America last spring, and John Powell, the American musician, who has toured Europe and America, playing with orchestras and in concerts of his own with conspicuous success. Estelle Liebling, the soprano, has also appeared in many cities and won enthusiastic praise by the beauties of her voice and artistry. Richard Burgin, who is now serving his second season as concertmaster of the orchestra, has more than confirmed, in appearance as soloist with the orchestra and in concerts of his own here, the splendid reputation which he formerly held in Europe. Equally illustrious is Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section, who is considered one of the finest living masters of his instrument.

The concerts will take place in Symphony Hall on the following five Monday evenings—November 28, January 16, February 13, March 13, and April 10. A number of seats for the series have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will be placed on sale at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, November 7.

POST - Oct. 30.

The Symphony Orchestra announces the first of the two annual concerts in aid of its Pension Fund for Sunday afternoon, Nov. 20, in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux will conduct; the orchestra will be unassisted; the programme will be divided between the Pathetic Symphony of Chaikovsky and three of the best-liked tone-poems of Strauss, viz: "Don Juan," "Til Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration."

To shorten the programme and to gain longer preparation, Mr. Monteux has withdrawn Hue's new tone-poem of the late war, "Emotions," from the Symphony Concerts of next week. Instead, they will end with Liszt's familiar "Mazeppa."

TRANS. Nov. 3.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming

For the first time in nine years the famous Boston Symphony orchestra of 101 musicians, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will pay a visit to New Haven. The concert is to be given in Woolsey hall under the auspices of the School of Music of Yale university, on Wednesday evening, November 30th.

At the time of its last visit, this orchestra celebrated in New England, America, and, in fact, the musical world at large, had reached the state of miraculous perfection in performance which made its name pre-eminent. The history of its growth since it was founded in 1881 by the late Colonel Henry L. Higginson, the noted Bostonian financier, soldier, and music patron, is too well known for detailed repetition. His administrative wisdom and the generous expenditure of wealth are to be thanked for making this achievement possible. The finest musicians Europe afforded were induced to cross the seas and join its ranks, while one after another of the greatest conductors living lent successively their individual genius to its gradual improvement.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra soon to be heard here.

Since the last visit to New Haven, the Boston Symphony orchestra has made even further artistic accomplishment. It is surely fortunate in its present conductor, Pierre Monteux, who is now in his ance, ... highly praised.

No conductor has come to the orchestra with a more distinguished career to his credit than Mr. Monteux. Early prominent as a conductor of the larger orchestras of Paris, and particularly of his own Concerts Monteux at the Casino there, he soon extended his fame by conducting concerts, opera and ballet in the larger capitals of Europe. He first came to this country in 1916 at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, conducting a performance with this organization in New Haven, and subsequently became the regular French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. In his present post his genius is considered to have found its best fruition.

N. HAVEN-TIMES NOV 5.

Extra Symphony

Much interest is already manifest in the coming extra series of Boston Symphony concerts at popular prices. The sale of season tickets for which will open Monday morning in Symphony Hall. These concerts will take place on Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10, in Symphony Hall.

TRAV. NOV. 5.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Ferenc Vecsey, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Pupil of Joachim, and protege of Brahms and Patti, he has made splendid achievements. He will play Tschaikowsky's violin concerto here. Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa," the second Symphony of Sibelius and "A Poem of Youth," by David Stanley Smith, will be the orchestral numbers.

ADVTSR. NOV. 6.

5TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ferenc Vecsey will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. His European reputation has been of the very highest, although he has not been in this country since 1905 when, as a boy prodigy, he played in New York, Boston and elsewhere. This week he will play Tschaikowsky's concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Liszt's "Mazeppa," the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major, and "A Poem of Youth" by Mr. Smith, the head of the music department of Yale University, which will be played for the first time.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place on next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Brahms, Symphony No. 3; Schubert, Incidental music to "Rosamunde"; Strauss, "Don Juan." Laura Littlefield will sing Franck's "Procession" and "Let the Bright Seraphim" from Handel's "Samson."

HERALD NOV. 6

TIGHT BINDING

City
1921D

t Capri.
ogrammes have been
Monteux, now in his
nductor of the Boston
ra, for the opening of ason in New York,
ace in Carnegie Hall
ning, Nov. 3, at 8:15,
rnoon, Nov. 5, at 2:30
evening concert Bee-mphony, "Eroica;"
tone picture, s nocturnes, "Nu-
s," and Richard
"Don Juan." For
ee the third sym-
in F major; Cesar ale No. 2 in B mi-
rchestra and organ
h, the noted New
who will play the
rs from Schubert's
"Rosamunde," and
"The Roman Car-

1921

Y.

SYMPHONY.

he season of Boston
in the Academy of
take place Friday
4, will be an event
Ferenc Vecsey, the
, will appear for ooklyn with an ort this concert. He sky's popular con-

conductor of the Orchestra, has
sion the third sym-
in F major, and poem of Richard
."

City
OCT 301

mphony Orchestra
nductor, will open it
in New York with a
on Thursday evening
ternoon at Carnegie
rammes: Thursday,
" Symphony; Rimsky-
ko"; Debussy, noc-
and "Fetes"; Strauss,
urday, Brahms, Third
Organ Chorale No.
ged for orchestra and
Goodrich, who will
part; numbers from tal music to "Rosa-
nd second ballets and
te; Berlioz, overture,
ival." The personnel
remains substantially
s except four changes.
newcomer among the s sections is Georges
e from Paris to lead
first prize virtuoso
rvatory, he has ap-
first orchestras of iola soloist at the Much is expected
n Quartet, which is
the distinguished sections of the or-
Kneisel Quartet in
ard Burgin, the con-
me to the orchestra
be first violin of the course of his career
t organizations suc-
cert master of orches-
Messrs. Bedetti and
d second violin, will quartet.

30 1921

Y.

DAY.
afternoon, Symphony
k; Town Hall, after-al, Bronislaw Huberll, afternoon, piano re-
shley; Carnegie Hall,
Symphony Orchestra;
ng, violin recital, Ruth
ll, evening, song recital,

ew York

BROOKLYN

of the season of Bos-
concerts in the Acad-
which will take place
ening, Nov. 4, will be
o-fold interest, in that
, the Hungarian violin-
e heard in an introduc-
New York next Tues-
ar for the first time in
for the first time in
an orchestra as soloist
t. He will play Tschai-
ennially popular concert

nteux, now in his third
nductor of the Boston
chestra, has chosen for the Third Symphony of
major, and the brilliant
Richard Strauss, "Don

TIMES

NEW YORK CITY

Pierre Monteux has arranged for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season here on Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, a program including Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone-picture, "Sadko"; Debussy's "Two Nocturnes" entitled "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Strauss's "Don Juan."

For next Saturday's matinee, the Bostonians have Brahms's Symphony No. 3, in F; Franck's second organ chorale, in B minor, arranged with orchestra by Wallace Goodrich, who plays the organ part; Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

FROM

Morning Telegraph
New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux will give its first New York concert in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening present Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone pic "Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." The second concert will take place in Carnegie Saturday afternoon when a feature number will be Cesar Franck's "Organ Chorale No. 2," arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ score.

World OCT 30 1921 L
New York City

Saturday, Nov. 5.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will play at Carnegie Hall at 2.30 P. M. The programme comprises Brahms's third symphony in F major, Franck's second organ chorale in B minor, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who will play the organ part, Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

AMERICAN OCT 30 1921
New York City

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall: "Eroica" Symphony by Beethoven; Sadko by Rimsky-Korsakoff; Nuages and Fetes by Debussy; Don Juan by Strauss. On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Symphony No. 3 by Brahms; Incidental music to Rosamunde by Schubert; Organ Prelude by Franck; Overture "The Roman Carnival" by Berlioz.

World OCT 30 1921 L
New York City

The thirty-sixth season of Boston Symphony concerts in New York will open at Carnegie Hall at 8.15. Pierre Monteux, who is now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has arranged his opening programme as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko;" Debussy's Nocturnes, Nuages, and Fetes, and Strauss's "Don Juan."

From
AMERICAN
New York City

Brooklyn Ins
Long Seas

Music is to many the art of arts. Good music is certainly one of the most potent factors in the cultivation of that refinement of the mind which is the highest achievement of education, and Brooklynites always face many opportunities to enjoy it during the Winter. The musical programme of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences is generally considered the mainstay of Brooklyn's musical life, and this tradition is fully maintained by the fine list of concerts and recitals that the institute offers for the current season.

As in previous years, the backbone of the Brooklyn Institute's programme will be found in orchestral music, although there are many attractive concerts and recitals by individual artists and musical organizations. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give five [illegible]armonic concerts in the Opera [illegible]e of the Academy on Friday evenings, November 4, December 2, [illegible]ary 6, February 3, and March 17. [illegible] appeal of these concerts will be [illegible]ased by the presence of such [illegible]le assisting artists as Ferenc [illegible]ey, violin; Ignaz Friedman, piano; [illegible]e Homer, contralto; Jean Be [illegible] violoncello, and Emilio De G [illegible] baritone, in the order giv

---

SYMPHONY TO GIVE FIVE SPECIAL CONCERTS

Orchestra Takes Steps to Meet Popular Demand

The full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will give a series of five special concerts in Symphony Hall, because of the evident popular demand for them and the unprecedented season sale of the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts.

The concerts will take place on these five Monday evenings: Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10. Some of the seats have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will be placed on sale at Symphony Hall Monday morning, Nov. 7.

The five soloists engaged to appear at these concerts are: Alfred Mirovitch, Russian virtuoso; John Powell, American musician; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section.

H RALD-Oct 27

SPECIAL SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Series to Be Given on Five Monday Nights

A series of five special concerts will be given in Symphony Hall by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux.

These concerts have been arranged on account of the evident popular demand for them and because the unprecedented season sale for the regular 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts has left no reserved seats still available, except a few of the higher priced ones for Saturdays.

AT POPULAR PRICES

This special series should prove particularly desirable in that popular prices will make generally accessible all the advantages of the finest symphonic music by this famous orchestra.

The five soloists engaged to appear at these concerts will add to the interest of each. Two pianists are to play concertos with the orchestra—Alfred Mirovitch, the highly talented Russian virtuoso, who was so much praised when he first came to America last spring, and John Powell, the American musician, who has toured Europe and America playing with orchestras and in concerts of his own with conspicuous success. Estelle Liebling, the soprano, has also appeared in many cities and won enthusiastic praise by the beauties of her voice and artistry. Richard Burgin, who is now serving his second season as concertmaster of the orchestra, has more than confirmed, in appearances as soloist with the orchestra and in concerts of his own here, the splendid reputation which he formerly held in Europe. Equally illustrious is Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section, who is considered one of the finest living masters of his instrument.

The concerts will take place in Symphony Hall on the following five Monday evenings—Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, Mar. 13 and Apr. 10. A number of seats for the series have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will be placed on sale at Symphony Hall next Monday morning.

POST-Oct 27

FOURTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was one of sincere worth.

It opened with the Bach Overture in D major. Bach is always refreshing; the clear, delicate manner of expression of his works are uplifting. This work as given yesterday proved, in the skilful hands of the orchestra, a thing not alone of perfection in style, but also in parts deep with feeling and imagination.

The suite is one of four which were probably written during the composer's life as chapel master to Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Cothen. It is said that Bach passed some of his happiest years there, and in the contentment which must have been his he wrote with greater depth.

The Schubert incidental music to the opera "Rosamunde" was of interest, and the stirring character of Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," was well portrayed when the orchestra Mr. Monteux included threw themselves into its interpretation with all ardor possible.

Theophile Ysaye, a younger brother of the violinist, wrote a symphony in F major, whose first Boston performance was given yesterday. Its first American performance was in Cincinnati. It proved a work of genuine worth.

TRAV. Oct. 29

SPECIAL SERIES OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Five special concerts are to be given in Symphony Hall by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, on the following Monday evenings: Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10. As is well known, practically all seats have been taken in advance by subscription for the regular 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening symphony concerts, only a few Saturdays at the higher prices being available.

TRAV. Oct. 29

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be interested in the organization's concert schedule for this season because of the unusual attention given to New England cities. More of these than ever before in a single season are included in the list, indicating an effort to establish the orchestra more completely as a New England, as well as Boston, institution.

In addition to its regular series of 48 concerts in Boston, nine in Cambridge and five in Providence, the orchestra will play in Fall River, New Bedford, Brockton, Springfield and Lynn in Massachusetts, in Hartford and New Haven, Conn., in Burlington and Middlebury, Vt., in Portland, Me., and in Manchester, N. H.

Boston will also have the usual two pension fund concerts and three young people's concerts, with five extra concerts at popular prices which have been added to the schedule this year.

The trips out of New England will carry the orchestra to New York for 15 concerts, with single appearances in Richmond, Washington, Baltimore, Syracuse, Ithaca, Binghamton and Montreal.

The entire schedule calls for 105 concerts, 83 of which are in New England. The sale of season tickets for the Providence series will open to-morrow at Seddon's in Butler Exchange.

PROV JOURNAL Oct 30

SPECIAL SYMPHONY

In compliance with a very evident popular demand, a special series of five Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux. Since the unprecedented sale of subscription seats for the regular 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts has left no reserved seats still available except a few of the higher priced ones for Saturdays, these special concerts at popular prices should prove an opportunity for many.

They will offer, by including a representative choice of the finest symphonic music in the ideal performance which this famous orchestra can give, an introduction to many into this field of art. Many also, familiar with symphony concerts, have been unable to obtain seats for the regular series or to attend so large a number.

Two pianists will play concertos with the orchestra—Alfred Mirovich, the talented Russian virtuoso, and John Powell, the American musician, who has toured Europe and America, playing with orchestras and in concerts of his own with conspicuous success. Other soloists will be Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section.

The concerts will take place in Symphony Hall on the following five Monday evenings: Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10. A number of seats for the series have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will be placed on sale at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, Nov. 7.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now on its first southern trip of the season, therefore there will be no Symphony concert here on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program for the concerts of Nov. 11, 12 is as follows:

Symphony No. 2, D major................Sibelius
"A Poem of Youth"................D. S. Smith
(First performance)
Concerto in D major for violin...Tschaikowsky
"Emotions," Symphonic poem...............Hue
(First time in Boston)

Ferenc Vecsey, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto, will be heard here for the first time since his appearance as an infant phenomenon under the management of Daniel Frohman in Symphony Hall in February, 1905.

Georges Hue's symphonic poem is dated 1918, and was first performed at a Lamoureux concert in Paris in the season of 1918-19. The sub-titles indicate the nature of the piece: Anguish—Prayer—Tumult—Pacification—Bells of Peace—Trumpets of Victory.

HERALD-Oct 30

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

In compliance with popular demand, a special series of five popular price concerts will be given in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, on Monday nights, beginning November 28. The five soloists will be Alfred Mirovitch, Russian pianist; John Powell, American pianist; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section. Seats have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will go on sale November 7.

ADVTSR. Oct. 30.

Special Symphony Concerts

In compliance with a very evident popular demand, a special series of five Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Symphony Hall by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux. Since the unprecedented sale of subscription seats for the regular 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts has left no reserved seats still available, except a few of the higher priced ones for Saturdays, these special concerts at popular prices should prove an opportunity for many.

They will offer, by including a representative choice of the finest symphonic music in the ideal performance which this famous orchestra can give, an introduction to many into this field of art. Many also, familiar with symphony concerts, have been unable to obtain seats for the regular series or to attend so large a number.

The five soloists engaged to appear at these concerts will add to the interest of each. Two pianists are to play concertos with the orchestra—Alfred Mirovitch, the highly talented Russian virtuoso, who was so much praised when he first came to America last spring, and John Powell, the American musician, who has toured Europe and America, playing with orchestras and in concerts of his own with conspicuous success. Estelle Liebling, the soprano, has also appeared in many cities and won enthusiastic praise by the beauties of her voice and artistry. Richard Burgin, who is now serving his second season as concertmaster of the orchestra, has more than confirmed, in appearance as soloist with the orchestra and in concerts of his own here, the splendid reputation which he formerly held in Europe. Equally illustrious is Jean Bedetti, the leader of the 'cello section, who is considered one of the finest living masters of his instrument.

The concerts will take place in Symphony Hall on the following five Monday evenings—November 28, January 16, February 13, March 13, and April 10. A number of seats for the series have already been engaged by several organizations. The remainder will be placed on sale at Symphony Hall on Monday morning, November 7.

POST - Oct. 30.

The Symphony Orchestra announces the first of the two annual concerts in aid of its Pension Fund for Sunday afternoon, Nov. 20, in Symphony Hall. Mr. Monteux will conduct; the orchestra will be unassisted; the programme will be divided between the Pathetic Symphony of Chaikovsky and three of the best-liked tone-poems of Strauss, viz: "Don Juan," "Til Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration." tion."

To shorten the programme and to gain longer preparation, Mr. Monteux has withdrawn Hue's new tone-poem of the late war, "Emotions," from the Symphony Concerts of next week. Instead, they will end with Liszt's familiar "Mazeppa."

TRANS. Nov. 3

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming

For the first time in nine years the famous Boston Symphony orchestra of 101 musicians, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will pay a visit to New Haven. The concert is to be given in Woolsey hall under the auspices of the School of Music of Yale university, on Wednesday evening, November 30th.

At the time of its last visit, this orchestra celebrated in New England, America, and, in fact, the musical world at large, had reached the state of miraculous perfection in performance which made its name pre-eminent. The history of its growth since it was founded in 1881 by the late Colonel Henry L. Higginson, the noted Bostonian financier, soldier, and music patron, is too well known for detailed repetition. His administrative wisdom and the generous expenditure of wealth are to be thanked for making this achievement possible. The finest musicians Europe afforded were induced to cross the seas and join its ranks, while one after another of the greatest conductors living lent successively their individual genius to its gradual improvement.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra soon to be heard here.

Since the last visit to New Haven, the Boston Symphony orchestra has made even further artistic accomplishment. It is surely fortunate in its present conductor, Pierre Monteux, who is now in his third season at this post. In Boston, New York and other cities where the orches[illegible] progra[illegible] their performance under his inspired guidance, have been generally praised.

No conductor has come to the orchestra with a more distinguished career to his credit than Mr. Monteux. Early prominent as a conductor of the larger orchestras of Paris, and particularly of his own Concerts Monteux at the Casino there, he soon extended his fame by conducting concerts, opera and ballet in the larger capitals of Europe. He first came to this country in 1916 at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, conducting a performance with this organization in New Haven, and subsequently became the regular French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. In his present post his genius is considered to have found its best fruition.

N. HAVEN-TIMES NOV. 5

Extra Symphony

Much interest is already manifest in the coming extra series of Boston Symphony concerts at popular prices. The sale of season tickets for which will open Monday morning in Symphony Hall. These concerts will take place on Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10, in Symphony Hall.

TRAV. NOV. 5

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Ferenc Vecsey, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Pupil of Joachim, and protege of Brahms and Patti, he has made splendid achievements. He will play Tschaikowsky's violin concerto here. Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Mazeppa," the second Symphony of Sibelius and "A Poem of Youth," by David Stanley Smith, will be the orchestral numbers.

ADVTSR. NOV. 6.

5TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ferenc Vecsey will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. His European reputation has been of the very highest, although he has not been in this country since 1905 when, as a boy prodigy, he played in New York, Boston and elsewhere. This week he will play Tschaikowsky's concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Liszt's "Mazeppa," the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major, and "A Poem of Youth" by Mr. Smith, the head of the music department of Yale University, which will be played for the first time.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place on next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Brahms, Symphony No. 3; Schubert, Incidental music to "Rosamunde"; Strauss, "Don Juan." Laura Littlefield will sing Franck's "Procession" and "Let the Bright Seraphim" from Handel's "Samson."

HERALD NOV 6

BURGIN WILL GIVE CHAMBER CONCERTS

Has Organized a String Quartet from Symphony Orchestra

LEFT TO RIGHT—RICHARD BURGIN, FIRST VIOLIN; F. THULLOIS, SECOND VIOLIN; G. FOUREL, VIOLA; J. BEDETTI, 'CELLO.

RICHARD BURGIN, the excellent concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, purposes to give chamber concerts this season. He has organized a string quartet of which he will be the leader. His associates are the other leaders of the string section of the orchestra: Messrs. Thillois, second violin; Fousel, viola; Bedetti, violoncello. Mr. Burgin has had much experience as a quartet player. At Christiania, where he was assistant teacher to Leopold Auer in 1916-17, he led a quartet; at Stockholm he founded the Burgin Quartet, which toured regularly, giving 12 recitals a season. His comates in Boston have already won a high reputation in Paris as quartet players. Concerning the capabilities of these players in ensemble as well as in solo work, there can be no doubt.

It is the intention of Mr. Burgin to prepare works by the "classic" and the modern composers for this season of four concerts: compositions by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms, Ravel, Bloch, Chausson and others. It is expected that a pianist of great prominence will assist the quartet.

For many years Boston was famous for the Kneisel Quartet formed by members of the orchestra. There was also the Adamowski Quartet which brought out many interesting works. After the Kneisel Quartet left Boston various quartets composed of symphony players gave concerts: The Arbos Quartet, The Boston Symphony Quartet, The Hoffmann Quartet (still existing) among them. But the Burgin Quartet is composed throughout of leaders of the string sections.

It is hardly necessary to dwell on the important part that a quartet of this nature will play in the musical life of this city; on the advantage it will be to the orchestra itself, to the reputation of the city, to the pleasure of all enjoying this branch of musical art, amateurs and students.

Surely there should be enough lovers of chamber music in Boston to put the Burgin Quartet on a firm financial foundation by their subscriptions; by their attendance at the concerts.

HERALD NOV.

Extra Symphony

The announcement by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of an additional series of five concerts at popular prices by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux is welcomed. The concerts are to be given on five Monday evenings—Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb. 13, March 13 and April 10—and the following soloists will be heard: Alfred Mirovitch and John Powell, pianists; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, violin, and Joean Bedetti, violoncello.

TRAV. NOV 12.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BALLOONS, ANTHEMS, MUSIC AND A VIOLINIST

Minor Incidents of an Amusing Afternoon—A Pass-Mark Piece from a Yale Professor — Terse and Tingling Sibelius—Contrasts of Liszt—Ferenc Vecsey, Virtuoso of Fine Fibres and Fires

EVEN at a Symphony Concert, strangest place of all, Mr. Curley continues to amuse his fellow-citizens. Two or three evenings ago (it appears) he addressed "the people"—or, as legal documents say, a fraction thereof—in Symphony Hall. In the course of the meeting sundry toy-balloons were let loose—possibly "trial balloons," symbolic balloons, to discover whether or not Mr. Curley will be gently but insistently pushed from the municipal campaign. As it was, under his lofty—or gaseous—eloquence, the balloons rose to the ceiling of the hall and there lodged firmly. An apprehensive management tried heat and the balloons budged not; tried cold and still they stuck. Like Mr. Curley, they sought an audience; as with him, sound and fury were necessary to stir them. Through the first period of the concert yesterday afternoon, they remained quiescent; but in that time resounding measures of Sibelius's Second Symphony had loosed the moorings. Hardly had Professor Smith's "Poem of Youth" began the second division of the programme when a green balloon curved hither and thither over the heads of the orchestra in that silly, serene way in which only balloons may move. A timely catch by Mr. Rettberg at the bass-drum ended these peregrinations. No sooner, however, had Mr. Vecsey, the violinist of the day, set to his Concerto, than a second and a third balloon hovered as scatter-wittedly over the orchestral background. As the runner in a football game tucks a forward pass under his arm, so did a second violinist and a violoncellist dispose of the new intruders, but not until an audience, too well-bred to titter, had smiled from one end of the hall to the other.

Bane of the bourgeoisie is Mr. Curley, of the haute, the très-haute, bourgeoisie, frequenting Symphony Hall on Friday afternoons. Truly, there is no escaping him—while three more balloons, at the least, await whatever impulse they may receive from the concert of this evening. And as though all this were not enough, an American audience once more applauded its own national anthem. Appropriately to the day, [illegible] began the concert with "The Star-Spangled Banner." A hearty round of applause, duly acknowledged by the conductor, followed. No doubt, it was tribute to his timely sense of becoming ceremony but it sounded like clapping for our national hymn. As friendly foreigners have sometimes observed with a smile, we are the best-meaning people in the world, but also when formalities are in question, the most careless. Curleyesque balloons and the national anthem applauded! Who may safely say that the Symphony Concerts lack humors?

As little yesterday did the concert lack animation, save in a single number. Open-eared to every voice, Mr. Monteux is kindly to American composers. Sometimes they have well rewarded him and hearers—Mr. Griffes with "Kubla Khan," Mr. Gilbert with "Indian Sketches." Again they have been worthy, like Mr. Converse in symphony or Mr. Hill in a tone-poem. Yet once more they have set listeners wondering at the conductor's hospitality. In such case went Professor Bingham's Passacaglia last winter; in such case yesterday stood Professor Smith's "Poem of Youth" Academic titles, said one of the youthful cynics from the University over the Charles, are beginning to be a danger-signal at the Symphony Concerts. Did not Théophile Ysaye also conduct an Academy of Music?

Not that Professor Smith's tone-poem lacks deserts. Rather it abounds in the merits of unimaginative, unindividual music-making. In sobriety of form he might set it as model to his classes at New Haven—the beginning, the end, in all the orthodoxy of the holy sonata; a "middle section" that substitutes wistful, songful measures in quasi-poetic design for the "recapitulation" of the lesson-books. The motivs whence this music unfolds are appropriate enough to the composer's purpose—a quick-moving, plain-spoken, long-breathed "subject" for opening and close; more tranquil matter, born of earlier suggestion, for the middle measures. Professor Smith develops his musical ideas painstakingly; thickly he gives them harmonic and instrumental dress, subservient to neither old nor new fashions, seeking suitability, if not saliency. At will the tone-poem is vigorous or wistful, according to his design. Directly, rather than ingeniously, it says its say and is stilled. With matter, method, manner, there is no quarreling—except that they coalesce in a studiously made, dryly considered, juiceless music, with little or no individuality or imagination. Almost any one, similarly equipped and minded, might have dutifully put it together anywhere. Professor Smith has received many similar examination-papers from his pupils. The chances are that he has given them the pass-mark of C. Yet he will be aggrieved at the reviewer who counts this "Poem of Youth" a C-music and the more, if he add, that there should be little room for C-music at the Symphony Concerts.

Compensation came first from the Second Symphony of Sibelius—revived after nearly five years, and in a performance wherewith Mr. Monteux seemed more painstaking than enkindled. By this time, in workmanship, Sibelius seems rather the forerunner than (as some have said) the disciple of the ultra-moderns. Twenty years ago, he wrote this Symphony in D major. True, it contains no horizontally moving chords, acidulous harmonies, corrosive timbres, swerving, cracking rhythms, melodies strangled at the second gasp. Yet he is already terse and concentrated; weaves thin his harmonic and instrumental web; cultivates changeful rhythms. piercing progressions; uses orchestral voices for isolated rather than merged quality; masses and sharpens tone. What are these but the very procedures of the "posturing, freakish ultra-moderns" of today?

Yet twenty years ago, individual and isolated, Sibelius was evoking one and all as a veritable and genuine self-expression. From them spring not a little of the direct voice, the intertwined coloring, the penetrating incisiveness and pungency of his more characteristic music. They become his definitive speech in the remembered Fourth Symphony; they prevail yet again in that new Fifth which Mr. Monteux will hardly deny to Boston—and this very season—when New York and Philadelphia, from Stransky and Stokowski, are already debating it. As Mephistopheles on the Brocken savored the dark vapors, the acrid scents of mountain and forest, so time and again our ears now savor Sibelius's measures.

Much that Sibelius would say in this Second Symphony seems at one with such manner of musical speech. He would have his Scherzo begin and end as flickeringly as northern sunlight comes and goes, mellowing between into brief sustained glow. The wan brightness spreads into the Finale—hear the linking oboe—gathers warmth and energy, swells larger and mellower at the close. As some would have it, Sibelius is writing his Symphony of lights and shadows, sounds and shapes, across his Finnish land. So, perhaps, with the more rugged beginning, with the square cut tonal masses shot through with pale streaks of harmonic and instrumental color, propelled with a quiet grimness of mood, haunted by an unescapable melancholy—bleak, bare periods, it would be easy to say, but for a homely warmth suffusing them. By mere tokens of form and procedure, Sibelius might be writing an "absolute" music sufficient in intrinsic interest and internal progress. Yet through it and animating it, as through the whole Symphony, goes something more—the mind that would achieve a spareness of musical frame, a terseness of musical speech, as bony and sharp as Musorgsky's; the spirit that is of this North of gray skies and empty expanse, of sunshine warm, sparse and quick to go, of winds and forests, There is Viking clang and surge in Sibelius's first Symphony. His composing eye is on romantic object. In the second, he is musing and affectionate. His land penetrates and stirs him.

With reason Mr. Monteux set the violinist of the day and his Concerto between this Symphony of Sibelius and Liszt's tone-poem, "Mazeppa." A long way in years, a longer way in matter and manner, are the gaudy pomps, the theatrical flourishes of Liszt's "apotheosis" from the relatively stripped, astringent measures of Sibelius. According to Liszt, Byron, Hugo and Mazeppa's other sponsors in romantic baptism, he also, bound to the "Ukraine steed,' traversed wastes and forests under pale, flickering lights and sombre skies. Yet in the tone-poem they seem as mere scenery in Liszt's theatre of music, beside Sibelius's etched landscapes in notes. Down to the footlights comes Mazeppa to flaunt his stress of soul. Pacing the countryside, in his own study, Sibelius muses, broods, visions, writes. Not for mating but for contrast stand the pair on the same programme. Yet Liszt, too, had his virtues. Even in his tonal theatre, it is something to have invented the motivs of Mazeppa's ride.

The violinist was Ferenc Vecsey, returned to Boston for the first time since his prodigy days of diminutive fiddle and "sailor-suit,' now at eight-and-twenty, tall, dark, spare, poised, contemplative—of what the demoiselles of Friday afternoon from parquet through upper balcony agreed was romantic aspect. His Concerto was Chaikovsky's, unheard these seven years at Symphony Concert, deserving more frequent performance. Repetitious the Finale may be, but the harmonic and rhythmic bite of it pricks the ear like hot liquor on the tongue. The plaintiveness of the slow movement suits the songful violin, tapers not into Chaikovsky's whining sentimentality. There is keen thrill in the return of the dominant melody in the first movement after the violinist has exhausted nearly every convolution of it. Thorough and exacting in this "passage-work" was Chaikovsky, pedantic almost, with not too good an ear for the instrument he heard in imagination. Mr. Vecsey took his own way with the Concerto. That is to say, his pace, his accent, his eager and artful modulation of both, were his own quite as often as they were Chaikovsky's. With the instinct of the virtuoso he played upon the music as well as played it. In such a Concerto it is the virtuoso's right so to do, when, like Mr. Vecsey, he commands technical ease and certainty; silken, lustrous, flowing tone; the spring of rhythm; the sting of climax and transition; the flash of figure and the filigree of ornament; the unfolding curve of melody, the sensitiveness to vary it, the underlying quiver to make it sing. Fine fibres and fine fires meet in Mr. Vecsey. To sort light and shade into the closely woven web of the first Allegro; to phrase the Canzonetta like Italian song; to spice the vodka of the Finale were feat enough for violinist, concert and afternoon. Chaikovsky, surely, was waving from the shades.

H. T. PARKER.

TRANS. NOV 12.

THE Suite of dances from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," first heard, repeated, loudly applauded and warmly discussed at the Symphony Concerts in 1917, reappears deservedly on Mr. Monteux's programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The music, as many will recall, teems with rhythm, flashes with harmonic and instrumental color, invokes alike musing or orgiastic mood. With reason Mr. Monteux revives it. The other pieces listed are all more or less familiar—Cherubini's semi-classic overture, "Anacreon"; a symphony of Haydn in E-flat, and "The Isle of [illegible] Dead," tone-poem by the solemn and ponderous Rakhmaninov.

SUNDAY afternoon, Nov. 20, in Symphony Hall, the first of the two annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund. The full orchestra will be heard; Mr. Monteux will conduct and Strauss and Chaikovsky will divide the programme. From the Russian comes the Pathetic Symphony; from the German, the tone-poems, "Don Juan," "Til Eulenspiegel," "Death and Transfiguration." A concert for those who would hear the orchestra only occasionally and in music to display its larger powers.

TRANS. NOV 12.

FERENC VECSEY PLEASES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ferenc Vecsey, who played Tschaikovsky's violin concerto at yesterday's Symphony concert, is by far the best new violinist heard here since Heifetz. Mr Vecsey is not quite a newcomer to Boston, since he gave recitals here in 1905 at the age of 12. But yesterday was the first chance this city has had to listen to his work as a mature artist. The audience recalled him many times, with applause such as only Kreisler and Heifetz among violinists have received at the Symphony within recent memory.

What distinguishes Vecsey's playing from the work of the many other admirable violinists who have come here from Europe in the past few seasons is the quiet certainty with which he makes every nuance as it should be made. He conquers the difficulties of a piece Auer at first deemed unplayable without apparent effort.

He never appears obsessed by his technique. He has a mastery of his instrument so absolute that he can make every note in the most exacting passages distinct, give it the precise degree of accent and time value he wishes, and fit it into its proper place in the whole composition. This sort of authority and security is found only in a very few of the greatest violinists. He does without trouble what others after painful exertion fall a little short of achieving.

The Tschaikovsky concerto does not demand profound feeling from a violinist. It is rather trivial, empty music. So Vecsey has still to prove that he is the highest sort of musician, capable of rivaling Kreisler's unequaled performance of the Beethoven concerto, for instance. His recital, Dec 2, will prove whether he is to be ranked with Heifetz, or with Kreisler.

The concert was diversified by a stirring performance of "The Star Spangled Banner" in honor of Armistice Day; and by the fact that a number of toy balloons left over from a political rally the night before were floating around the upper regions of the hall. One almost fell into the bass tuba. Others dropped gently among the audience and orchestra, causing no little amusement.

Sibelius' Second Symphony was given a sympathetic interpretation. Mr Monteux and the orchestra did full justice to the music, which has neither the exquisite refinement of Debussy nor the tremendous vigor of Strauss, who were the dominant composers when it was written. If second rate, and not profoundly original, this symphony has at least a vitality sadly lacking in "A Poem of Youth" by Prof D. S. Smith of Yale, played for the first time anywhere.

Prof Smith is a thorough musician. His music is neither banal nor obviously imitative. But his work somehow lacks the energy and fire that redeem Liszt's bombastic "Mazeppa," with which an unusually long concert ended from tedium. Prof Smith's taste is better than Liszt's, but his music isn't. All of these numbers were well played, though the ensemble in "Mazeppa" lacked absolute precision.

GLOBE-NOV. 12.

VECSEY SCORES WITH SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS

In observance of Armistice Day, the Symphony concert yesterday began with a thrilling performance of "The Star Spangled Banner," played beneath the folds of the Stars and Stripes. The superb arrangement of the American anthem used by Mr. Monteux added much impressiveness to the performance.

FERENC VECSEY

Ferenc Vecsey, a young Hungarian violinist, pupil of Hubay and Joachim, was the soloist. He chose the bristling Tschaikowsky concerto, which many attempt but only a few play completely. Technically the work is almost appalling; yet this quite dapper youth, who looked more like a social lion than a famous virtuoso, acquitted himself brilliantly. The triumphant manner in which he flourished his bow at the close of each dazzling run was not the only thing that marked him as a player with individuality. He gave full value to the lyric qualities of the concerto, no less than to the pyrotechnic passages that aroused so much discussion when the composition was new. An ovation rewarded him.

Mr. Monteux won their own ovation after the uncommonly eloquent performance of the second Sibelius symphony, the first number on the program. The work of the Finnish composer suggests something of the trials and tribulations through which his native land has passed since the Muscovite czars laid a heavy hand upon it; but notwithstanding the dark moods it 's poetic and romantic music, powerful and originally expressed. The terpretation was irreproachable.

---

"A Poem of Youth," by Professor David S. Smith of Yale, played for the first time, made but a faint impression. The youth, in this case, seemed anaemic or muddle-headed. It was what might be called a pedantic piece; caviare to the general public. The program, which will be repeated tonight, ends with one of the Liszt symphonic poems, "Mazeppa."

ADVTSR. NOV. 12

FIFTH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Eloquent Performance of Sibelius's Work—Rugged, Yet Euphonious

"A POEM OF YOUTH" BY YALE COMPOSER

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony, D major, No. 2; D. S. Smith, "A Poem of Youth" (first performance); Tschaikowsky, Violin Concerto (Ferenc Vecsey, violinist); Liszt, "Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem, No. 6.

Before the symphony, "The Star Spangled Banner" was played as was eminently fit and proper. Is it fantastical to think that the symphony itself, with its wails and groans of anguish, its sullen gloom alternating with shouts of triumph, was singularly appropriate on Armistice day? Is it not at all probable that the composer had war or rumors of war in mind when he composed this music? Mr. Paul Rosenfeld, who writes about certain modern composers as if he had summered and wintered with them and been through them with a dark lantern, finds this symphony of a "pastoral" nature, full of "home sounds, of cattle." The music reveals a "pale evanescent sunlight," and through the music sounds "the burden of a lowly tragedy." This is entertaining reading, to be sure, but to be charged with these impressions, Mr. Rosenfeld must have heard a tea-table performance of the symphony. There is almost continually the tragic note in the music, but the tragedy is hardly "lowly."

This music is extremely northern, at times bleak and wind-swept. Arresting and impressive music; and lo, suddenly, Sibelius drops into Tschaikowskian mood, and even speaks the self-torturing Russian's speech. Yet Sibelius is generally in the foreground and his speech is generally his own. It is when he would touch the heart of the public that Tschaikowsky pushes him aside. There is much of interest in the symphony besides the peculiar aesthetic and racial quality: there are qualities of the orchestration that hold the attention and excite admiration, as the long pizzicato figure for the double basses. The performance yesterday was eloquent; rugged yet euphonious, sturdy, melancholy, exultant.

Mr. Smith is now dean of Yale School of Music. He has written much; "A Poem of Youth" bears the opus number, op. 47; yet his name appeared yesterday for the first time on a Boston Symphony Orchestra program. Mr. Monteux has been very hospitable to American composers. Mr. Smith has now his turn. His purpose was to express the "good humor and bucyancy" of youth. Too many young composers here and in Europe would not be lighthearted in music lest they should be taken for frivolous or insufficiently equipped musicians. They demand a huge orchestra and set to work, as it was said that John Ford, the old dramatist, set, in doleful dumps. Mr. Smith's "Poem of Youth" is cheerful enough, while the music is sounding but the only definite impression left after it is all over is that certain figures and a certain spirit remind one of pages by Richard Strauss—as a prominent figure for violins in the first section. The middle section is the most pleasing portion of the poem, the most individual, and it is the most clearly orchestrated. Too much of the music is thick, or scrappy.

Mr. Vecsey played for the first time in Boston since he came here early in 1905, and gave three concerts as a youthful prodigy. He then showed great promise. Now he is a mature and experienced violinist. His technical proficiency is of a very high degree; his tone is full and agreeable; his phrasing is musical and effective, although he was inclined to over-work portamento in the singing of melodic figures. Undoubtedly a fine violinist, honest, not given to extravagant display. Yesterday emotional quality was not conspicuous. He will soon give a recital, and judgment concerning this all-important element should be deferred, for Tschaikowsky's concerto is not a work by which a violinist should stand or fall.

Liszt's "Mazeppa" brought a brilliant end to a concert that, lasting over two hours, was far too long.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concert next week is as follows: Cherubini, Overture, "Anacreon"; Haydn, Symphony in E flat major (B. and H. No. 1), Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead"; Ravel, "Daybreak, Pantomime, and General Dance" from "Dalphine and Chloe."

HERALD NOV

[illegible]

TIGHT BINDING

YMPHONY GLORIFIES SIBELIUS

ecsey's Virtuosity and Balloons Divide Attention

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fifth programme of the Bos- n Symphony Orchestra, Pierre onteux, conductor, was prefaced the performance of "The Star- angled Banner" at the concert of sterday afternoon in Symphony ll. Orchestra and audience stood ile this tribute was rendered the ent dead and the task they have queathed to the living.

SYMPHONY IMPRESSES

he soloist was Ferenc Vecsey, the ngarian violinist heard here as a ld prodigy in 1903. He played the chaikowsky concerto with the or- stra. The novelty of the occasion s David Stanley Smith's "Poem of uth." The programme opened with elius' 2d spmyhony and closed with zt's "Mazeppa."

nterpreting the great symphony of elius, Mr. Monteux again proved sterling musicianship and his con- ence as an artist. He is not a lover the music of this Finnish composer, he conducted as if the fate of Sibe- hung in the balance, and both work performance made a deep impres- n on the audience.

Rugged and Powerful

he symphony is rugged, powerful, the North. It has from the start certain grayness, grimness, a frown- splendor. We find in his represen- ive works a superb conviction, eadth, and originality. He strides t of his fastnesses, he strikes the te of wild Northern grandeur, he ants of gods and men at war as composer has chanted before him.

Vecsey's Virtuosity

Mr. Smith's music is honestly though ther dryly written.

Mr. Vecsey gave an amazing perform- ce of the Tschaikowsky concerto, hich lost nothing by the fact that bal- ons which had stuck to the ceiling d eluded all sharp-shooters since the rley rally of the preceding evening, re descending as he played. The ot that he played with amazing vir- osity is small by the fact of the color d authority of his stirring interpreta- n. Not in many years has this con- rto had such a rendering in Boston. every theme was announced or ta- n up by the solo instrument it had a ape, a physiognomy, as telling and memorable to the ear as a striking ure in a picture would be to the eye. w Mr. Vecsey would surprise one by unconventional treatment of some rase heretofore reverently interpreted certain way, and while one wondered would announce a new theme, bend orchestra—he could, however, thank stars for Mr. Monteux's accompani- nt—to his will, with such individual wer and youthful enthusiasm that en those antagonistic to his concep- n were forced to respond.

t last the concerto had its inherent vagery and sensuousness. A young tuoso held it in his paw, and he was for blood. He would end a headlong le passage with a flourish of the w which seemed to drive the orches- to its task with the greater vigor. made the piece his concerto as well Tschaikowsky's, and to this one rer, at least, felt no objection.

Liszt's Extravagance

This was virtuosity. There was nc virtuosity in the final orchestral formance of Liszt's extravagant ce. It has never been played by the ston Orchestra with so much fire, uch pomp and ceremony at the con- lusion.

This was a concert in which condu and men glorified their art. s ly possible to speak of their acc shments in superlatives.

[illegible] - NOV. 13

orks of composers of different alities, ages and temperaments on the programme of the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Providence next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall.

eethoven, German composer of the y 19th century, will be represented in Third Symphony known as "Eroica," work which is enhanced by its con- tion with the name of Napoleon Bon- rte. The composer originally in- bed the name of the conqueror over score, believing this General to be champion of human freedom, but r crossed it out in anger when he disillusioned by Napoleon's abuse of power, the story has it.

The martial first movement and finale, rflowing with rhythm and vitality, the ft and breathless scherzo, the impres- funeral march—these parts of the phony are regarded as among the reme achievements of music," writes critic of the composition.

"The Roman Carnival," the overture of French composer, Berlioz, will fol- the German symphony. interest will ach to "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, view of the fact that German mposer is now in this country.

---

donal and Debussy. [illegible] ley, who is the soloist for the concert, will sing an aria from the opera "Conchita" by the former, and the aria of Lia from Debussy's 'L'Enfant Prodique.' She will be accompanied, of course, by the orchestra.

Helen Stanley

Soprano Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Night.

PROV. JOURNEL-NOV. 13.

Pension Fund Programme

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall at 3:30, a programme consisting entirely of the masterpieces of Tschaikowsky and Strauss will make notable the 40th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the Pension Fund for retired members.

The Russian composer will be represented by his poignant Sixth Symphony, known as the "Pathetic." Three masterpieces of Richard Strauss, the great composer who is now paying a short visit to this country, will comprise the latter part of the programme—the symphonic poems, "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan," and "Till Eulenspiegel."

Sixth Symphony Programme

At the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, November 18, and Saturday evening, November 19, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will conduct Cherubini's Overture to the Opera, "Anacreon," Haydn's Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 1), the symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead" by Rachmaninoff, which many consider the masterpiece of the Russian composer and which was inspired by the famous painting of Arnold Boecklin, the German artist. The programme will close with a suite from Maurice Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," which, when last played here, in 1917, was so much liked that it was repeated at a later concert that season. The numbers are Daybreak—Pantomime—General Dance.

POST-NOV. 13.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will conduct Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon," Haydn's Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H. No. 1), the symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," by Rachmaninoff, inspired by the famous painting of Arnold Boecklin. The concert will close with a suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," which, when last played here, in 1917, was so much liked that it was repeated at a later concert that season. The numbers are: "Daybreak, Pantomime, General Dance.

PENSION FUND PROGRAM

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall at 3:30, a program consisting entirely of the masterpieces of Tschaikowsky and Strauss will make notable the 40th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the pension fund for retired members. Tschaikowsky will be represented by his poignant Sixth Symphony, the "Pathetic." Three masterpieces of Richard Strauss, who is now paying a short visit to this country, will comprise the latter part of the program, "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan," and "Till Eulenspiegel."

EXTRA CONCERTS

The announcement of a new departure by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—an additional series of five symphony concerts at popular prices by the full orchestra under Mr. Monteux, its noted conductor—has brought a large public response. The majority of the seats for this series have already been taken in the subscription sale, of which this week is the last. Desirable seats are still available, however, at all prices.

The concerts will be given on five Monday evenings—Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb 13, March 13, and April 10. These soloists will be heard—Alfred Mirovitch and John Powell, pianist; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, violin and Jean Bedetti, [illegible]

HERALD-NOV 13

[26]

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sixth program. Overture to "Anacreon," Cherubini; Symphony in E flat (Breitkopf and Hartel No. 1), Haydn; "The Isle of the Dead," Rachmaninoff; Suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," Ravel. There is no soloist.

Sunday, Nov 20 at 3:30—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Concert in aid of the pension fund. "Pathetic Symphony," Tschaikovsky; "Tod und Verklaerung," "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel," Strauss. There is no soloist.

GLOBE-NOV. 13.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The announcement of a new departure by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an additional series of five Symphony concerts at popular prices by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, has brought a large public response. Most of the seats for this series have already been taken in the subscription sale. The concerts are to be given on five Monday evenings beginning November 28. Alfred Mirovitch, John Powell, Estelle Liebling, Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti will be the soloists.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Next Sunday afternoon, at Symphony Hall, a program consisting entirely of masterpieces by Tschaikowsky and Strauss will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its pension fund concert. Tschaikowsky will be represented by his "Pathetic" symphony and Strauss by the symphonic poems, "Death and Transfiguration," Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel."

ADVTSR-NOV. 13

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on November 11, was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D major; D. S. Smith, "A Poem of Youth"; Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin; Liszt, "Mazeppa."

This symphony according to the program book was last performed at these concerts in 1916. It is strange that so ingratiating a work has remained so long unheard. This is appealing, imaginative, highly individual music, the expression of a strong musical personality, and an extremely interesting one as well. The form is finely wrought, the unessential has been eliminated and the long stretches of padding so often found in modern symphonies, and some "classical" ones too, are absent. The whole work is concise and compact and holds the attention from first to last. Mr. Monteux was fully in sympathy with the dramatic and picturesque character of this composition. The short exclamatory phrases of which the first and last movements are largely made up were given with power and emphasis, yet he succeeded in maintaining a certain unity throughout which must have been a difficult problem in interpretation to solve.

David Stanley Smith of the Yale School of Music was represented on the program by his "Poem of Youth," its first performance. Mr. Monteux has been encouraging to American composers, giving them opportunity to be heard equally with writers of other schools. This "Poem of Youth" is most certainly as interesting and as worthy of a hearing as many works by contemporary German, Italian and French writers which we hear during a season. Judging it purely as music, without regard for the nationality of the composer, and of course this is the way in which it should be considered, it is neither strikingly original nor especially effective. As the music is intentionally unprogrammatic and unatmospheric, it would seem that it should make its appeal through the intrinsic musical beauty of its thematic material and through the skillful treatment to which this same material is subjected. These traits were not noticeably in evidence yesterday. There was much activity among the various instruments, there were occasional bits of effective orchestration as in the beginning of the middle section, yet the thematic material was so vaguely defined that one was often puzzled to discover the connection of all these various episodes with the main idea. Let us not comment too sweepingly, however. A second hearing may correct these impressions. The work was played with commendable care and the performance was far from the perfunctory ones so often accorded American composers by conductors of foreign birth. Mr. Monteux is without doubt sincerely interested in American music and deserves great credit for his efforts in its behalf.

Ferenc Vecsey played the solo part of the Tschaikowsky concerto faultlessly. In fact his playing was the only thing which saved this piece from tediousness. As music it rarely rises above the commonplace.

Liszt's "Mazeppa" was given a stirring performance. It served to show to what heights of virtuosity Mr. Monteux has brought the orchestra. Perfection of ensemble, beauty of tone, warmth and sincerity characterized its interpretation. It is a composition which may easily be made commonplace. Mr. Monteux did not fall into this pitfall.

MNTR. NOV. 12

Luck, Novelties, Monteux

Five pairs of Symphony Concerts have already come and gone; the programme for the sixth pair is announced; one quarter of the whole series is done. As usual, Mr. Monteux has not spared new or unfamiliar pieces. Not the least of his virtues as conductor is his persistent aversion to routine, his incessant and catholic eagerness for music of his own time as yet unheard in Boston, for music of other times undeservedly overlooked, deservingly revived. Yet this autumn, he has, so far, been less fortunate than heretofore in the choice of such numbers or the scores falling under his eye, have lacked lively interest and impressive quality. Casella's Suite from his ballet of "The Venetian Convent" was good to hear—vivid music individualizing, so far as it went, a composer making some stir in the present world. On the other hand, the dances from Mr. Rabaud's opera, "Marouf" fell flat, transplanted from stage to concert-hall. Professor Smith's "Poem of Youth" proved workaday commonplace. Mr. Goodrich's arrangement of Franck's Chorale yielded only a specialized interest to organists. Théophile Ysaye's Symphony, though various musicians profess to admire it, little exhilarated the lay ear.

There is luck in a choice of unfamiliar pieces for a series of Symphony Concerts, and this autumn it has not been kind to Mr. Monteux. Per contra, he may have been overkind himself in his choosings—to his good friend, the estimable Rabaud; to the good memory that the lesser Ysaye left behind among musicians; to the rights and privileges of American composers—and assiduous friends. The musical year, however, is yet young; for the moment there is no more than occasion for regret—not grumbling—over novel pieces none too good to hear. The future, if Mr. Monteux chooses as of old, and fortune returns to bless him, may yet bring Sibelius's new Fifth Symphony; or Holst's Suite of "The Planets," set by some above even the "London Symphony," for work of the younger Englishmen; or Bloch's orchestral version of his Suite for viola; or Schönberg's "Transcendent Night," likewise arranged for orchestra; Ravel's tone-poem of "The Waltz"; more, and more characteristic, pieces of Casella. Recollection sets down these items at random. They deserve Mr. Monteux's inspection; they may yet win his choice; they can hardly fail to interest not a few of his hearers—above all those whom his zest for the music of our own time has won to new zest for the Symphony Concerts.

H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV 14.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPENED

Helen Stanley Solosit with Noted Orchestra in Splendid Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, swayed a large audience into enthusiastic approval of its work last night in its first programme of the season at Infantry Hall, Providence. The soloist, Miss Helen Stanley, contributed her share to a concert brim full of practically all the elements which appeal to the lover of music. Her popularity was immediately evident in the ovation she received after her first selection.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55, one of the best known and best liked of his compositions, was played with striking effect. It revealed with emphasis the poetic, emotional and sympathetic qualities of the orchestra's director, calling upon him for an unusual exhibition of vigor, with which he is obviously well equipped. The vastness of the work in its demand for variety and range of tone enabled the orchestra to show its equally varied attainments to advantage, and the demand was admirably met.

Mme. Stanley sang the aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," by Debussy, and the aria "Conchita," by Zandonai. Outstanding, perhaps, among her many excellent voice qualities are great clarity of tone and diction, buttressed by vocal power and volume, which were easily sufficient to meet the requirements of the orchestrations. The beauty of her voice did not outdo the charm of her personality, and both combined to win for her instant success.

An inspired interpretation was given the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture by Conductor Monteux, and it was splendidly played, arousing enthusiasm. The closing number was Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," played with a swing and power which brought the concert to a compelling climax.

PAW. TIMES - NOV. 16.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS THE SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Providence season last evening in Infantry Hall, playing the following programme: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55; Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9; Debussy, air of Lia (L'enfant Prodigue); Zandonai aria, "Conchita;" Richard Strauss, "Don Juan," tone poem. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, was the assisting artist.

Perhaps M. Monteux, a bit disheartened by the failure of any of the novelties thus far produced during the Boston season to strike fire, hesitates to tempt fate further with them. At any rate, it will be observed that the programme contained nothing that might be classed as strikingly novel, unless one except Zandonai's air, sung by Mme. Stanley. None the less it was good to hear again Beethoven's symphony, tried and true, though it has been through many seasons. There are those that will contend that it and its idiom are outmoded, that it might well be displaced by works in more modern idiom. Perhaps. But still the "Eroica" contains many fine, stirring pages, pages that may still compel and charm.

Of the orchestra itself it is a pleasure to speak. Barring M. Fourel, newly called to the head of the viola section, the personnel remains unchanged from last season. By so much does the orchestra profit. From season to season—almost from concert to concert even—one notes the steady progress of the band to finer and finer achievements. M. Monteux, through trying times, has been patient, tactful, indefatigable of purpose, till today the Boston Symphony under his direction is once more the plastic instrument, responsive to his slightest wish—sonorous, suave, delicate, as the composer bids—in short, again risen, or nearly so, to the former finish, the former glory, which of old made it the most illustrious of orchestras, and from which it inevitably descended during the troublous years of war.

Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" worked its familiar spell.

Mme. Stanley, erstwhile of the Chicago Opera Company, was heard here for the first time. She sang for the most part agreeably, if not greatly, two arias—the air of the mother from Debussy's operatic cantata, the poignancy of which she brought out admirably, and an unfamiliar aria from Zandonai's equally little known "Conchita." At times an unpleasant edge besets her upper tones and the impression remains that her musical intelligence outruns her vocal resource.

A brilliant reading of Strauss' "Don Juan" closed the programme.

A large audience heard the concert and by every token of applause and attention bespoke its thorough enjoyment.

J. H. B.

PROV NEWS. NOV. 16

ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Large Audience Enthuses Over Program Offered by Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened its Providence season of 1921-22 with the first of a series of five concerts in Infantry Hall, last evening. A very large audience gave enthusiastic greeting to the famous conductor and the 100 players who form the personnel of the orchestra. Miss Helen Stanley, formerly prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, was the soloist and the program follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Erocia," op. 55, Allegro con brio; Marcia funebre; Adagio assi; Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio; Finale: Allegro molto. Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9; Debussy, aria of Lia from 'L'Enfant Prodigue;" Zandonai, aria, "Conchita;" Strauss, "Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau) op. 20.

The large body of splendidly trained musicians which now form the Boston Symphony Orchestra are practically the same as in the past decade, save that under the superb training of Mr. Monteux they have reached a degree of musical perfection which is the envy of all orchestras throughout the country and is the Boston Symphony's alone. In this sense the program offered last evening was impressive and brilliant and not only did the orchestra play with familiar richness and power of tone with large sweep, emphasis and contrast, but it played also—at opportune moments during the concert—with keen sense of isolated voices and individualized choirs.

The Beethoven Symphony, Nov. 3, "Eroica," which opened the program, is a massive work and was magnificently played by the orchestra. As is well known it was written with a definite aim, the glorification of Napoleon Bonaparte, and in the balance of the parts and the antiphonal choirs the performance of the great work was full of grandeur and inspiration for the listener.

In the second movement of the Symphony the funeral march featured the departure from the traditional slow movement while the third movement, the Scherzo, brought forth gay and sprightly effects of instrumentation. The finale of the Symphony is not as impressive as are the preceding movements, yet it abounds in interesting musical detail which was thrillingly and vigorously brought out by Mr. Monteux.

The Symphony was followed by the somewhat unfamiliar "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz in which the orchestra brought out its sparkling melodic beauty and delightful rythm in masterly style. The soprano soloist of the evening, Helen Stanley, created a decided sensation by the unquestioned beauty of her voice, dramatic style and charming stage presence. In her Debussy Aria she sang with intense dramatic feeling and was four times recalled at its close. She scored a great vocal success also in the aria "Conchita" by Zandonai. "A Voice That Satisfies!" was the verdict of many discriminating people in the audience. The Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" by the orchestra brought the concert to a brilliant close.

TIGHT BINDING

YMPHONY GLORIFIES SIBELIUS

Vecsey's Virtuosity and Balloons Divide Attention

BY OLIN DOWNES

The fifth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was prefaced [illegible] the performance of "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the concert of yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Orchestra and audience stood while this tribute was rendered the [illegible]ent dead and the task they have bequeathed to the living.

SYMPHONY IMPRESSES

The soloist was Ferenc Vecsey, the Hungarian violinist heard here as a child prodigy in 1903. He played the Tschaikowsky concerto with the orchestra. The novelty of the occasion was David Stanley Smith's "Poem of Youth." The programme opencd with Sibelius' 2d spmyhony and closed with Liszt's "Mazeppa."

Interpreting the great symphony of Sibelius, Mr. Monteux again proved his sterling musicianship and his conscience as an artist. He is not a lover [illegible] the music of this Finnish composer, but he conducted as if the fate of Sibelius hung in the balance, and both work and performance made a deep impression on the audience.

Rugged and Powerful

The symphony is rugged, powerful, [illegible] the North. It has from the start [illegible] certain grayness, grimness, a frowning splendor. We find in his representative works a superb conviction, breadth, and originality. He strides out of his fastnesses, he strikes the note of wild Northern grandeur, he chants of gods and men at war as [illegible] composer has chanted before him.

Vecsey's Virtuosity

Mr. Smith's music is honestly though rather dryly written.

Mr. Vecsey gave an amazing performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto, which lost nothing by the fact that balloons which had stuck to the ceiling and eluded all sharp-shooters since the Curley rally of the preceding evening, were descending as he played. The fact that he played with amazing virtuosity is small by the fact of the color and authority of his stirring interpretation. Not in many years has this concerto had such a rendering in Boston. As every theme was announced or taken up by the solo instrument it had a shape, a physiognomy, as telling and [illegible] memorable to the ear as a striking figure in a picture would be to the eye. Now Mr. Vecsey would surprise one by [illegible] unconventional treatment of some phrase heretofore reverently interpreted [illegible] certain way, and while one wondered [illegible] would announce a new theme, bend the orchestra—he could, however, thank his stars for Mr. Monteux's accompaniment—to his will, with such individual power and youthful enthusiasm that even those antagonistic to his conception were forced to respond.

At last the concerto had its inherent savagery and sensuousness. A young virtuoso held it in his paw, and he was out for blood. He would end a headlong scale passage with a flourish of the bow which seemed to drive the orchestra to its task with the greater vigor. He made the piece his concerto as well as Tschaikowsky's, and to this one hearer, at least, felt no objection.

Liszt's Extravagance

This was virtuosity. There was no less virtuosity in the final orchestral performance of Liszt's extravagant piece. It has never been played by the Boston Orchestra with so much fire, so much pomp and ceremony at the conclusion.

This was a concert in which conductor and men glorified their art. It is only possible to speak of their accomplishments in superlatives.

POST-NOV. 13

Works of composers of different nationalities, ages and temperaments will be on the programme of the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Providence next Tuesday evening at 8:15 in Infantry Hall.

Beethoven, German composer of the early 19th century, will be represented in his Third Symphony known as "Eroica," that work which is enhanced by its connection with the name of Napoleon Bonaparte. The composer originally inscribed the name of the conqueror over the score, believing this General to be the champion of human freedom, but later crossed it out in anger when he was disillusioned by Napoleon's abuse of his power, the story has it.

"The martial first movement and finale, overflowing with rhythm and vitality, the swift and breathless scherzo, the impressive funeral march—these parts of the symphony are regarded as among the supreme achievements of music," writes a critic of the composition.

"The Roman Carnival," the overture of the French composer, Berlioz, will follow the German symphony. Interest will attach to "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, in view of the fact that that German composer is now in this country. Other living composers [illegible] be represented are, besides Strauss [illegible] Italian, Zan-donai and Debussy. Miss Helen Stanley, who is the soloist for the concert, will sing an aria from the opera "Conchita" by the former, and the aria of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." She will be accompanied, of course, by the orchestra.

---

Helen Stanley

Soprano Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Night.

PROV. JOURNEL-NOV. 13.

Pension Fund Programme

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall at 3:30, a programme consisting entirely of the masterpieces of Tschaikowsky and Strauss will make notable the 40th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the Pension Fund for retired members.

The Russian composer will be represented by his poignant Sixth Symphony, known as the "Pathetic." Three masterpieces of Richard Strauss, the great composer who is now paying a short visit to this country, will comprise the latter part of the programme—the symphonic poems, "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan," and "Till Eulenspiegel."

Sixth Symphony Programme

At the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, November 18, and Saturday evening, November 19, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will conduct Cherubini's Overture to the Opera, "Anacreon," Haydn's Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 1), the symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead" by Rachmaninoff, which many consider the masterpiece of the Russian composer and which was inspired by the famous painting of Arnold Bocklin, the German artist. The programme will close with a suite from Maurice Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," which, when last played here, in 1917, was so much liked that it was repeated at a later concert that season. The numbers are Daybreak—Pantomime—General Dance.

POST-NOV. 13.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will conduct Cherubini's Overture to "Anacreon," Haydn's Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H. No. 1), the symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," by Rachmaninoff, inspired by the famous painting of Arnold Boecklin. The concert will close with a suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe," which, when last played here, in 1917, was so much liked that it was repeated at a later concert that season. The numbers are: "Daybreak, Pantomime, General Dance.

PENSION FUND PROGRAM

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall at 3:30, a program consisting entirely of the masterpieces of Tschaikowsky and Strauss will make notable the 40th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the pension fund for retired members. Tschaikowsky will be represented by his poignant Sixth Symphony, the "Pathetic." Three masterpieces of Richard Strauss, who is now paying a short visit to this country, will comprise the latter part of the program, "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan," and "Till Eulenspiegel."

EXTRA CONCERTS

The announcement of a new departure by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—an additional series of five symphony concerts at popular prices by the full orchestra under Mr. Monteeux, its noted conductor—has brought a large public response. The majority of the seats for this series have already been taken in the subscription sale, of which this week is the last. Desirable seats are still available, however, at all prices.

The concerts will be given on five Monday evenings—Nov. 28, Jan. 16, Feb 13, March 13, and April 10. These soloists will be heard—Alfred Mirovitch and John Powell, pianist; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Burgin, violin and Jean Bedetti, [illegible]

HERALD-NOV 13

[26]

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sixth program. Overture to "Anacreon," Cherubini; Symphony in E flat (Breitkopf and Hartel No. 1), Haydn; "The Isle of the Dead," Rachmaninoff; Suite, "Daphnis et Chloe," Ravel. There is no soloist.

Sunday, Nov 20 at 3:30—Boston Symphony Orchestra. Concert in aid of the pension fund. "Pathetic Symphony," Tschaikovsky; "Tod und Verklaerung," "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel," Strauss. There is no soloist.

GLOBE-NOV. 13.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The announcement of a new departure by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an additional series of five Symphony concerts at popular prices by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, has brought a large public response. Most of the seats for this series have already been taken in the subscription sale. The concerts are to be given on five Monday evenings beginning November 28. Alfred Mirovitch, John Powell, Estelle Liebling, Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti will be the soloists.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Next Sunday afternoon, at Symphony Hall, a program consisting entirely of masterpieces by Tschaikowsky and Strauss will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its pension fund concert. Tschaikowsky will be represented by his "Pathetic" symphony and Strauss by the symphonic poems, "Death and Transfiguration," Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel."

ADVTSR-NOV. 13

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The fifth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on November 11, was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D major; D. S. Smith, "A Poem of Youth"; Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin; Liszt, "Mazeppa."

This symphony according to the program book was last performed at these concerts in 1916. It is strange that so ingratiating a work has remained so long unheard. This is appealing, imaginative, highly individual music, the expression of a strong musical personality, and an extremely interesting one as well. The form is finely wrought, the unessential has been eliminated and the long stretches of padding so often found in modern symphonies, and some "classical" ones too, are absent. The whole work is concise and compact and holds the attention from first to last. Mr. Monteux was fully in sympathy with the dramatic and picturesque character of this composition. The short exclamatory phrases of which the first and last movements are largely made up were given with power and emphasis, yet he succeeded in maintaining a certain unity throughout which must have been a difficult problem in interpretation to solve.

David Stanley Smith of the Yale School of Music was represented on the program by his "Poem of Youth," its first performance. Mr. Monteux has been encouraging to American composers, giving them opportunity to be heard equally with writers of other schools. This "Poem of Youth" is most certainly as interesting and as worthy of a hearing as many works by contemporary German, Italian and French writers which we hear during a season. Judging it purely as music, without regard for the nationality of the composer, and of course this is the way in which it should be considered, it is neither strikingly original nor especially effective. As the music is intentionally unprogrammatic and unatmospheric, it would seem that it should make its appeal through the intrinsic musical beauty of its thematic material and through the skillful treatment to which this same material is subjected. These traits were not noticeably in evidence yesterday. There was much activity among the various instruments, there were occasional bits of effective orchestration as in the beginning of the middle section, yet the thematic material was so vaguely defined that one was often puzzled to discover the connection of all these various episodes with the main idea. Let us not comment too sweepingly, however. A second hearing may correct these impressions. The work was played with commendable care and the performance was far from the perfunctory ones so often accorded American composers by conductors of foreign birth. Mr. Monteux is without doubt sincerely interested in American music and deserves great credit for his efforts in its behalf.

Ferenc Vecsey played the solo part of the Tschaikowsky concerto faultlessly. In fact his playing was the only thing which saved this piece from tediousness. As music it rarely rises above the commonplace.

Liszt's "Mazeppa" was given a stirring performance. It served to show to what heights of virtuosity Mr. Monteux has brought the orchestra. Perfection of ensemble, beauty of tone, warmth and sincerity characterized its interpretation. It is a composition which may easily be made commonplace. Mr. Monteux did not fall into this pitfall.

MONTR. NOV. 12

Luck, Novelties, Monteux

Five pairs of Symphony Concerts have already come and gone; the programme for the sixth pair is announced; one quarter of the whole series is done. As usual, Mr. Monteux has not spared new or unfamiliar pieces. Not the least of his virtues as conductor is his persistent aversion to routine, his incessant and catholic eagerness for music of his own time as yet unheard in Boston, for music of other times undeservedly overlooked, deservingly revived. Yet this autumn, he has, so far, been less fortunate than heretofore in the choice of such numbers or the scores falling under his eye, have lacked lively interest and impressive quality. Casella's Suite from his ballet of "The Venetian Convent" was good to hear—vivid music individualizing, so far as it went, a composer making some stir in the present world. On the other hand, the dances from Mr. Rabaud's opera, "Marouf" fell flat, transplanted from stage to concert-hall. Professor Smith's "Poem of Youth" proved workaday commonplace. Mr. Goodrich's arrangement of Franck's Chorale yielded only a specialized interest to organists. Théophile Ysaye's Symphony, though various musicians profess to admire it, little exhilarated the lay ear.

There is luck in a choice of unfamiliar pieces for a series of Symphony Concerts, and this autumn it has not been kind to Mr. Monteux. Per contra, he may have been overkind himself in his choosings—to his good friend, the estimable Rabaud; to the good memory that the lesser Ysaye left behind among musicians; to the rights and privileges of American composers—and assiduous friends. The musical year, however, is yet young; for the moment there is no more than occasion for regret—not grumbling—over novel pieces none too good to hear. The future, if Mr. Monteux chooses as of old, and fortune returns to bless him, may yet bring Sibelius's new Fifth Symphony; or Holst's Suite of "The Planets," set by some above even the "London Symphony," for work of the younger Englishmen; or Bloch's orchestral version of his Suite for viola; or Schönberg's "Transcendent Night," likewise arranged for orchestra; Ravel's tone-poem of "The Waltz"; more, and more characteristic, pieces of Casella. Recollection sets down these items at random. They deserve Mr. Monteux's inspection; they may yet win his choice; they can hardly fail to interest not a few of his hearers—above all those whom his zest for the music of our own time has won to new zest for the Symphony Concerts.

H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV 14.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS OPENED

Helen Stanley Solosit with Noted Orchestra in Splendid Programme.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Pierre Monteux, swayed a large audience into enthusiastic approval of its work last night in its first programme of the season at Infantry Hall, Providence. The soloist, Miss Helen Stanley, contributed her share to a concert brim full of practically all the elements which appeal to the lover of music. Her popularity was immediately evident in the ovation she received after her first selection.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55, one of the best known and best liked of his compositions, was played with striking effect. It revealed with emphasis the poetic, emotional and sympathetic qualities of the orchestra's director, calling upon him for an unusual exhibition of vigor, with which he is obviously well equipped. The vastness of the work in its demand for variety and range of tone enabled the orchestra to show its equally varied attainments to advantage, and the demand was admirably met.

Mme. Stanley sang the aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue," by Debussy, and the aria "Conchita," by Zandonai. Outstanding, perhaps, among her many excellent voice qualities are great clarity of tone and diction, buttressed by vocal power and volume, which were easily sufficient to meet the requirements of the orchestrations. The beauty of her voice did not outdo the charm of her personality, and both combined to win for her instant success.

An inspired interpretation was given the Berlioz "Roman Carnival" overture by Conductor Monteux, and it was splendidly played, arousing enthusiasm. The closing number was Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," played with a swing and power which brought the concert to a compelling climax.

PAW. TIMES-NOV. 16.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS THE SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Providence season last evening in Infantry Hall, playing the following programme: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55; Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9; Debussy, air of Lia (L'enfant Prodigue); Zandonai aria, "Conchita;" Richard Strauss, "Don Juan," tone poem. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, was the assisting artist.

Perhaps M. Monteux, a bit disheartened by the failure of any of the novelties thus far produced during the Boston season to strike fire, hesitates to tempt fate further with them. At any rate, it will be observed that the programme contained nothing that might be classed as strikingly novel, unless one except, Zandonai's air, sung by Mme. Stanley. None the less, it was good to hear again Beethoven's symphony, tried and true, though it has been through many seasons. There are those that will contend that it and its idiom are outmoded, that it might well be displaced by works in more modern idiom. Perhaps. But still the "Eroica" contains many fine, stirring pages, pages that may still compel and charm.

Of the orchestra itself it is a pleasure to speak. Barring M. Fourel, newly called to the head of the viola section, the personnel remains unchanged from last season. By so much does the orchestra profit. From season to season—almost from concert to concert even—one notes the steady progress of the band to finer and finer achievements. M. Monteux, through trying times, has been patient, tactful, indefatigable of purpose, till today the Boston Symphony under his direction is once more the plastic instrument, responsive to his slightest wish—sonorous, suave, delicate, as the composer bids—in short, again risen, or nearly so, to the former finish, the former glory, which of old made it the most illustrious of orchestras, and from which it inevitably descended during the troublous years of war.

Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" worked its familiar spell.

Mme. Stanley, erstwhile of the Chicago Opera Company, was heard here for the first time. She sang for the most part agreeably, if not greatly, two arias—the air of the mother from Debussy's operatic cantata, the poignancy of which she brought out admirably, and an unfamiliar aria from Zandonai's equally little known "Conchita." At times an unpleasant edge besets her upper tones and the impression remains that her musical intelligence outruns her vocal resource.

A brilliant reading of Strauss' "Don Juan" closed the programme.

A large audience heard the concert and by every token of applause and attention bespoke its thorough enjoyment.

J. H. B.

PROV. NEWS. NOV. 16

ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Large Audience Enthuses Over Program Offered by Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened its Providence season of 1921-22 with the first of a series of five concerts in Infantry Hall, last evening. A very large audience gave enthusiastic greeting to the famous conductor and the 100 players who form the personnel of the orchestra. Miss Helen Stanley, formerly prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, was the soloist and the program follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Erocia," op. 55, Allegro con brio; Marcia funebre; Adagio assi; Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio; Finale: Allegro molto. Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9; Debussy, aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue;" Zandonai, aria, "Conchita;" Strauss, "Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau) op. 20.

The large body of splendidly trained musicians which now form the Boston Symphony Orchestra are practically the same as in the past decade, save that under the superb training of Mr. Monteux they have reached a degree of musical perfection which is the envy of all orchestras throughout the country and is the Boston Symphony's alone. In this sense the program offered last evening was impressive and brilliant and not only did the orchestra play with familiar richness and power of tone with large sweep, emphasis and contrast, but it played also—at opportune moments during the concert—with keen sense of isolated voices and individualized choirs.

The Beethoven Symphony, Nov. 3, "Eroica," which opened the program, is a massive work and was magnificently played by the orchestra. As is well known it was written with a definite aim, the glorification of Napoleon Bonaparte, and in the balance of the parts and the antiphonal choirs the performance of the great work was full of grandeur and inspiration for the listener.

In the second movement of the Symphony the funeral march featured the departure from the traditional slow movement while the third movement, the Scherzo, brought forth gay and sprightly effects of instrumentation. The finale of the Symphony is not as impressive as are the preceding movements, yet it abounds in interesting musical detail which was thrillingly and vigorously brought out by Mr. Monteux.

The Symphony was followed by the somewhat unfamiliar "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz in which the orchestra brought out its sparkling melodic beauty and delightful rythm in masterly style. The soprano soloist of the evening, Helen Stanley, created a decided sensation by the unquestioned beauty of her voice, dramatic style and charming stage presence. In her Debussy Aria she sang with intense dramatic feeling and was four times recalled at its close. She scored a great vocal success also in the aria "Conchita" by Zandonai. "A Voice That Satisfies!" was the verdict of many discriminating people in the audience. The Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" by the orchestra brought the concert to a brilliant close.

[illegible] TRIBUNE NOV. 16

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURED BY ENSEMBLE WORK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 41st season in this city last evening in Infantry Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted and the assisting soloist was Helen Stanley, soprano.

Fresh, vigorous and inspired by that influence which comes of continued association together under the baton of an able and magnetic leader, the men played with the spirit and splendidly balanced ensemble which has characterized their performances here in former seasons. The organization of about 100 players is virtually the same in personnel as last year. Mr. G. Fourel, leader of the violin section, is the only newcomer.

M. Morteux provided the following programme:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," op. 55.................... Beethoven
  I. Allegro con brio.
  II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
  III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
  IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9...... Berlioz
Aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Pordigue"..Debussy
Aria, "Conchita"...................... Zandonai
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), op. 20...................... Strauss

To those who have been regular attendants at Boston Symphony concerts for the past 10 years or more, the orchestra's present state of artistic excellence is undoubtedly a source of great satisfaction. The troubles and trials which beset the orchestra a few years ago, and at one time seriously threatened its very existence, caused a reorganization in personnel. This disturbance in artistic make-up might naturally be expected to lead to less finished performances. If, for a brief period, such an effect was actually produced, there is no inkling of it in the orchestra's playing to-day. On the contrary, the new blood injected into the orchestral veins brought renewed health and vigor to the organization. M. Monteaux's splendid ability is shown in the results he has accomplished since he assumed the orchestra's leadership.

In the upbuilding of a magnificent spirit of co-operation among the men his success has been complete. His broad musicianship and great ability as interpreter are now, under the more favorable conditions, brought about by finely trained, loyal players, is seen in clearer light than ever before. The Beethoven symphony No. 3, "Eroica," is commonly supposed to be based in form and content on the composer's admiration for Napoleon Bonaparte. Whatever the source of Beethoven's inspiration, the symphony remains a monument to his genius. Its pages are filled with tremendous orchestral effects and M. Monteux made its performance one of brilliance and grandeur. The opening allegro was played with breadth and power. The funeral march is long and is the only movement of the symphony which can be said to show traces of dullness. Here, passages of great beauty and solemnity alternate with those of lesser interest.

The Scherzo, gay and sprightly, was played with fine unanimity in the strings. The finale is one of Beethoven's characteristic brilliant, sustained efforts. Thematic material is used in ingenious fashion with the color and richness of Beethoven at his best. This movement M. Monteaux brought to a vigorous and impressive close.

The Berlioz "Roman Carnival," originally intended as an overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," is a collection of descriptive musical episodes relating to the action in the opera. It is bright and sparkling music for the most part and filled with many catchy effects of rhythm.

Helen Stanley, soprano soloist, sang her Debussy aria with dramatic feeling. Her voice shows point and power, and she made an excellent impression with her audience. After the Zandonal aria, "Conchita," which was sung with abandon, Miss Stanley was recalled several times.

Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," is based on Nicholas Lenan's poem of that name. The hero is represented as a man eternally pursuing women. Failing to discover his ideal, he finally becomes a prey of despair. Strauss has built in this tone poem the massive musical effects which are chacteristic of his orchestral works. A master of the technique of polyphonic writing, he revels in kaleidescopic changes of harmony. Volume and brilliance hold sway in the progress of this work. It was played in inspiring style by M. Monteux and his men and brought an interesting concert to a close.

A. F. P.

PRV. BULLETIN NOV. 16

MUSIC of Schönberg will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next week for the first times since, years ago as they seem, his "Five Pieces for Orchestra" fell upon amused, puzzled, scandalized ears. Then and there Dr. Muck decreed exile for Schönberg. Now Mr. Monteux brings him back again—in very different guise. In his younger days Schönberg wrote a Sextet for Strings—"Verklärte Nacht," or "Transcendant Night"—once and twice played here by the Kneisel Quartet and "assisting artists." In his later days Schönberg rescored the piece for full string orchestra. New York so heard it late last winter and Boston will so hear it next Friday and Saturday. As sextet, "Transcendent Night" was everywhere applauded as music of beauty, power and passion, deepening the poetic background whence it sprang, assuring the composer a finer fame than some of his later experiments have fetched him. As pieces for string choirs, it should lose no distinctive quality. Again, with a novel music, Mr. Monteux bids fair to be justified. The remainder of the programme [illegible] Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Chai- [illegible] symphony in F-minor and [illegible] version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." This Viennese transcription is more florid than Berlioz's familiar arrangement.

Such men as are the players in the Symphony Orchestra, such courses and works as they have long followed, deserve a reciprocating public and twice annually, at the concerts for the Pension Fund of the band, comes opportunity to prove appreciation by good deed. Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall befalls the first of these concerts for the current musical year. The orchestra is at the top of its new mettle; Mr. Monteux is a steadily ripening conductor; Chaikovsky with the "Pathetic Symphony," Strauss with the three tone-poems of "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration," divide the programme. There are virtually no expenses in the concert and every penny received cares for the members of the orchestra in sickness, in old age, in other retirement. What more is there to ask—except such heed and interest on the part of the public as best expresses itself in money laid upon the sill of the box-office? There and thereby reciprocity speaks clearest.

TRANS. NOV. 19.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RAKHMANINOV FOR RIDDLE; RAVEL FOR FERVOR

Again the Russian's Baffling Tone-Poem, "The Isle of the Dead" — Again the Parisian for the Beauty and the Passion of "Daphnis and Chloe"—Cherubini and Haydn for Ancients and for Honor

ONCE more yesterday afternoon, Rakhmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," was played at the Symphony Concerts and again inquiring hearers listened bewildered. They were the more put to confusion because the piece ran in a new version as lately revised by the composer, as made known recently at concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New York. By report in print, by evidence on Friday to the ear, Rakhmaninov has shortened the tone-poem; set to it a new ending; rewritten various measures. The innocent presumption was that these changes might clarify the design and purport of the music. In fact they left both more obscure than did the original pages. Eleven times in twelve years the public of the Symphony Concerts has heard "The Isle of the Dead" and unto the twelfth performance this evening the riddle of Rakhmaninov therein remains unsolved. The title set by the Russian to his music, the picture whence suggestions for it came imply certain moods, images, illusions. Once, however, the tone-poem is well under way, matter and manner seem almost denial of these implications; while the hearer flounders as best he may among contradictory impressions. Years ago when Rakhmaninov himself was conductor in the first performances of the piece in Boston, he clarified and reconciled—in degree—these confusions of purpose and outcome. With the best will in the world, Mr. Monteux, yesterday, seemed only to darken counsel.

By testimony of the title-page, Böcklin's familiar picture, likewise named "The Isle of the Dead," gave hint for the tone-poem. If recollection does not slip, the artist painted in subdued colors, over smooth surfaces, in persistent softness of line, in gentle harmonies of what technicians call "planes" and "values." His imaginative design, whether or not an island in the Bay of Naples stimulated his vision, was to suggest an abode of the dead, remote, still, changeless, where no wind stirred the cypresses, where the sea lapped mute shores in endless calm, where light was ever pale, thin and gray, where sunshine and shadow came not. Böcklin's canvas—again as it lingers in memory—perceptibly yielded such illusion. Since Rakhmaninov writes upon his title-page "to the Picture by A. Böcklin," he presumably would set similar suggestion in his music. Plausibly, impressively, the tone-poem so begins. The monotonous rhythm, the grey tonal color, the bleak profile of motivs and periods, the impassive pace, the reticence of modulation, invoke the images of the painter's picture, the composer's title. Rakhmaninov is writing music of intrinsic beauty and clear illusion.

Forthwith and of a sudden matter, mood and manner alter. Measures quiver and beat with longing or entreaty; mount insistently, even turbulently; before long, rise shrill and piercing. At moments the hearer might believe himself listening to Chaikovsky wrenched and torn by implacable desires; at others, hints of the Dies Iræ, the mediæval Roman hymn of the Last Judgment cross the music. They are more vivid in the revised than in the original version of the tone-poem; while similarly the measures of anguish cry more sharply. As "The Isle of the Dead" was first written, this aching longing, this piercing entreaty, gradually stilled and the piece ended in tone-picturing like to the beginning. As revised it closes rather abruptly with the crying rather than the mute dead vivid upon the ear.

What, then, was Rakhmaninov's design with this contradictory music? He only may say and he chooses the part of silence. Having pictured the dead in the isle, borne thither, as in Böcklin's picture by the mantled, motionless boatman, would be open, as it were, the Judgment Book before them, and set in tones their anguished dread, longing, entreaty? It is possible to infer as much from the version and the performance of the music heard yesterday. Yet what have these piteous pages to do with Böcklin's picture, with the imaginative scheme of the tone-poem as it still begins, as it used to end? Rakhmaninov, who writes music with a mind as well as a temperament, would hardly so destroy the unity of his piece alike in design and impression. Mr. Monteux chose to emphasize the anguish, the shrillness, the turbulence even, of these middle measures. If memory holds over long years Rakhmaninov as conducting composer, tended to subdue them. As some say, it was even possible to believe that he had written music of secret longings stirring in these dead but deathless souls—for those who in life had companioned them, for the joys and even the sorrows they had tasted in a world of warmth and motion. Fantastic motion, perhaps, yet one that gave the music a measure of unified scheme and outcome. The new version, the "reading" of Mr. Monteux, left not a vestige of these impressions. The still dead in their soundless isle, the anguished dead even at the Judgment Seat—and the tone-poem was done. Rakhmaninov's riddle passed still unread. The clapping audience applauded the prestige of an illustrious name and a favorite piece; the beauty and imagery of the music; possibly thereafter the perfervid anguish in the Chaikovskyan manner. It is high time for Rakhmaninov to write a programme-note.

The succeeding and the final number of the day was like quick wind dispersing these clouds and bright light scattering this darkness. For the first time since it was played at two pairs of concerts in a single season, the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphnis and Chloë" was heard in Symphony Hall. When Mr. Diaghilev's Russians first mimed the piece Mr. Monteux conducted. It remains music to quicken his best powers, put the virtuosi of the orchestra, like Mr. Laurent at the first flute, to their finest mettle. Seldom within recent memory has a flute been played hereabouts with such fullness, brightness, suppleness of tone. The ballet as such has never come to the stage in America; even Paris and London have seen and heard it seldom. The music, however, like not too much of the kind, speaks for itself with no more aid than title and brief programme-note may afford. The dawn quivers, stirs, waxes. The countryside gleams and tinkles. Daphnis, wakening from dream, beholds it fulfilled in the returned Chloe saved by Pan from pirates. Together the pair mime the old fable of Pan and Syrinx, the tale of the nymph fleeing the woodland god and turned by him into a reed-pipe for his tender pipings. The miming quickens into dance; other shepherds, the whole folk, swarm into it; "joyous tumult" the programme-note labels the ensuing measures.

Ravel can be dryly adept in his music, prefer ingenuity to imagination, let an ironic impulse and a sophisticated mood come uppermost. Again he can write with a directness and intensity that makes the tones one with the thought, image, passion. In the first vein, he achieves a rapier-like music so sharply is it etched, so quick and subtle are cut and thrust. In the second vein he writes a music aglow with beauty, a-tingle with power, set down as it were in a heat of vivid creation. So imagined and written are these fragments of "Daphnis and Chloë" and with an unflagging command of both the largest and the finest expressive means. It is hard to imagine more illusive music of dawn. Tones bear the tremors of light and sound, quickened into daily miracle. Artfully play rhythms, harmonies and timbres; feat succeeds felicity of skill; details point and pass—and a pastoral world awakes and is alive and glad. . . . The music hovers about Daphnis and speaks his simple, clear, devoted spirit. At once it is both gentle and radiant. The lovers mime their legend and the orchestra threads thin, silvery, evanescent images upon the air. The motion quickens; the colors warm; the web thickens and Ravel, with the largest means, is writing a music of rhythmed ecstasy, all leap and plunge and tumult, all beat and glow. Dancers, as it seems, having bodily limitations, would stay and dull it. Better to listen, like the rapt audience, of yesterday, as to fervors and transports—not so much of the theatre for which they were destined, as of the beings, the world, the emotions of the composer's direct and enkindled imagination. Whatever the substance, the surface, the impulse, of Ravel's music, it gives pleasure from his earliest to his latest years. As it runs in this Suite from "Daphnis and Chloë," delight becomes reciprocating ardor.

Mr. Monteux is man of the world as well as man of music. He takes quiet thought of courtesies; is mindful of considerate ceremonies. Yesterday happened to be the eighty-seventh birthday, had he lived, of the founder and long the sustainer of the Symphony Orchestra. The conductor sought Mrs. Higginson; discovered that Cherubini's Overture to his opera, "Anacreon," and Haydn's little Symphony in E-flat had been two of her husband's favorite pieces; set them both at the beginning of the pending concert, and added an explanatory line to the programme-book. As finely tempered as the remembrance was the playing of Cherubini's stripped, striding, sparing measures as they seem beside the lusher music of a later day. In them dwells not only an elder economy of means and austerity of method but an elder eloquence lucid and plastic after its reticent manner.

Foil was the smiling music of Haydn, when once it had passed the sombre drum-roll and the darksome measures of an introduction, tempting a conductor of 1921, as perhaps it tempted Mr. Monteux, to a weighty emphasis and a deep color of which the composer and his orchestra may hardly have dreamed. In more of his music does Haydn sombre endure for long. In this very Symphony, he is soon away in the graceful, spirited, quick-witted pattern-weaving of his Allegros, his pensive and pliable theme with variations, his stately but not stilted minuet. Genial is he as always, but in this Symphony with a hint of formality. Simple he also seems but throughout with clear vigor of mood and means. Less is he the homely and sportive Haydn than the Haydn bent to serious, even ceremonious, music-making according to the fashions of his time. When he is grave as he often was yesterday the big orchestras and sturdy emphases of our time seem inadvertently but appreciably to stiffen him.

H. T. PARKER.

TRANS. NOV. 19.

PENSION FUND BEAUTIFUL PROGRAM

Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, which is regarded not only as the greatest achievement of this composer, but as one of the foremost artistic works of Russia, will occupy the first portion of the 40th Pension Fund concert to be given by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux.

The latter part of the program will be entirely occupied by the three best known tone poems of Richard Strauss, the great composer, who is now visiting this country. They will be the dramatically impressive works, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Don Juan," and the humorous rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel." Surely three more brilliant scores could scarcely be found in the entire repertory of modern symphonic music.

AMER. NOV. 19.

SEVENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the seventh regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, November 2 and 26, which will precede the second regular trip of the orchestra, to occupy the following week, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, which has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons.

The other numbers will be the Tragic Overture of Brahms, the Schoenberg's Sextet for strings, "Verklarte Nocht" (Transcendent Night), including three, and the orchestral arrangement which Felix Weingartner has made of Weber's rondo, "Invitation to the Dance."

AMER. NOV. 19.

SYMPHONY PLAYS IN HIGGINSON'S MEMORY

Brilliant Performance of Two Classics

The first half of yesterday's Symphony program was played in memory of Maj Higginson, born Nov 18, 1834. The orchestra gave a performance of Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" and Haydn's E Flat Symphony "with the drum-roll," which proved that conductor and men are again capable of playing the classics as they should be played. The music sounded as though written yesterday, full of energy, brilliant, imaginative.

All that is now lacking is a little more suavity and subtlety in dynamics. The progress displayed over the slipshod perfunctory work of the orchestra in such music for two seasons past is surprising. A usually discriminating audience showed poor judgment in not bringing the orchestra to its feet after the Haydn symphony.

This customary tribute was paid instead to a fiery, but rather muddled performance of Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead." The five-four time of this piece is a difficulty no conductor and no orchestra is ever sure of surmounting, since it is in this instance hard to avoid lapsing into alternate measures of two-four and three-four time.

Yesterday the rhythm of the opening measures, which depict the motion over the waves of Charon's boat, was too jerky and too confused. At the climax, which the composer has wisely shorn of some of its Tschaikovsky false pomp by revision, the orchestra was quite together.

Mr Neumann, the kettle drummer, who is the most remarkable virtuoso in the present orchestra, had in this piece, as in the Haydn symphony, many opportunities to use his unrivaled skill. He deserves a special word of praise.

The final number was the second of the two suites Ravel has drawn for concert performance from his ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe." Mr Monteux, who conducted the original performance in Paris, is at his best in such music, which demands vigor, color and emotion of a conductor. A brilliant performance was warmly applauded.

The surprisingly miscellaneous program for next week includes Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Mr Weingartner; Schoenberg's sextet for strings and Tshaikovsky's hackneyed, banal "Fourth Symphony."

GLOBE- NOV 19.

SYMPHONY'S TRIBUTE TO HIGGINSON

Part of Programme in Memory of His Birthday

BY OLIN DOWNES

Cherubini's overture to the ballet-opera, "Anacreon" and Haydn's Symphony in E flat (B. & H. No. 1), were played in memory of the birthday of Henry Lee Higginson (Nov. 18, 1834), founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the concert given by that body yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

These compositions were followed by Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," after the picture of Arnold Bocklin, and orchestra fragments ("Lever du Jour-Pantomime-Danse General") from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe."

RESULTS OF MONTEUX'S LABOR

The melodiousness and brilliancy of Cherubini's writing, his easy mastery of form and of the art of instrumentation as known in his day, were emphasized in Mr. Monteux's admirable performance. Likewise in the symphony of Haydn—the symphony in which the theme of the introduction is suddenly and boldly reintroduced in the allegro of the first movement—the orchestral performance of which can only be described in terms of praise.

It was not only in the playing of Ravel's gorgeous music, but in the performance of these simple works of the classic school, that the orchestra showed the remarkable results of Mr. Monteux's labors.

Harmed by Revision

Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem has been extensively revised since the composer conducted its first performance by the Boston Symphony in this same hall in 1909. The revision does not help the work. It is shorter, but it is much less atmospheric. Where there were formerly tremendous moods and an atmosphere of profound reverie as a contrast to the climaxes of bitter complaint and lamentation, there is now only furious Tschaikowskian complaint and the fussy over-development of fragmentary motives derived from the plain chant, "Dies Irae." Farthest from the mood of Bocklin's picture is this revision of an originally inspired work. "It must produce such an effect of stillness," said the painter. "that anyone would be frightened at hearing a knock on the door." Paradoxical as it may seem, this stillness was in the original symphonic poem, scored for many instruments. It was present as in certain passages of Turgenieff, which caused the beautiful words of Renan, to the effect that "the reveries of centuries had amassed themselves about his heart." Was the absence of this atmosphere purely the fault of the composer?

Mr. Monteux's reading was highly dramatic, and in the exterior sense effective. Doubtless he followed the directions in the score. But there is a spirit that the letter cannot imprison. No conductor save Rachmaninoff himself has achieved the brooding introspection of this music. Others have grasped the outside but not the inside of it.

That unique mood which the composer achieved with his pen and his baton was present neither in yesterday's performance nor in any but one that we have heard.

The triumph of the concert was the performance of the gorgeous music—one might almost call it painting—of Ravel. This is such a piece of orchestral color as is seldom met with even in these days of orchestration run riot. Percussion instruments as well as instruments of wood and brass and string are used for purposes of tone-quality. Sounds of the most ravishing and mysterious character come from the orchestra, sounds that only the most expert could have predicted from a glance at the printed page—if they could.

One remembers the remark MacDowell made when he first heard Strauss' "Zarathustra." "This may not be music. It may be a new art." The performance was masterly, intoxicating in its vividness and variety of tone-painting. The audience remained some time in the hall—an exception after a long orchestral programme—to encore conductor and orchestra.

POST-NOV. 19

6TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead," Revised, Played Here for First Time

BIRTHDAY OF MAJ. HIGGINSON HONORED

By PHILIP HALE

The 6th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Cherubini, Overture to "Anacreon"; Haydn, Symphony, E flat major (B. & H. No. 1); Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead"; Ravel, Second Suite from the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

The revised version of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem was heard here for the first time. The composer has cut out portions and changed the ending. The [illegible] was performed

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FEATURED BY ENSEMBLE WORK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 41st season in this city last evening in Infantry Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted and the assisting soloist was Helen Stanley, soprano.

Fresh, vigorous and inspired by that influence which comes of continued association together under the baton of an able and magnetic leader, the men played with the spirit and splendidly balanced ensemble which has characterized their performances here in former seasons. The organization of about 100 players is virtually the same in personnel as last year. Mr. G. Fourel, leader of the violin section, is the only newcomer.

M. Morteux provided the following programme:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," op. 55 .... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9 ...... Berlioz
Aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Pordigue" .. Debussy
Aria, "Conchita" .... Zandonai
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), op. 20 .... Strauss

To those who have been regular attendants at Boston Symphony concerts for the past 10 years or more, the orchestra's present state of artistic excellence is undoubtedly a source of great satisfaction. The troubles and trials which beset the orchestra a few years ago, and at one time seriously threatened its very existence, caused a reorganization in personnel. This disturbance in artistic make-up might naturally be expected to lead to less finished performances. If, for a brief period, such an effect was actually produced, there is no inkling of it in the orchestra's playing to-day. On the contrary, the new blood injected into the orchestral veins brought renewed health and vigor to the organization. M. Monteaux's splendid ability is shown in the results he has accomplished since he assumed the orchestra's leadership.

In the upbuilding of a magnificent spirit of co-operation among the men his success has been complete. His broad musicianship and great ability as interpreter are now, under the more favorable conditions, brought about by finely trained, loyal players, is seen in clearer light than ever before. The Beethoven symphony No. 3, "Eroica," is commonly supposed to be based in form and content on the composer's admiration for Napoleon Boraparte. Whatever the source of Beethoven's inspiration, the symphony remains a monument to his genius. Its pages are filled with tremendous orchestral effects and M. Monteux made its performance one of brilliance and grandeur. The opening allegro was played with breadth and power. The funeral march is long and is the only movement of the symphony which can be said to show traces of dullness. Here, passages of great beauty and solemnity alternate with those of lesser interest.

The Scherzo, gay and sprightly, was played with fine unanimity in the strings. The finale is one of Beethoven's characteristic brilliant, sustained efforts. Themetic material is used in ingenious fashion with the color and richness of Beethoven at his best. This movement M. Monteaux brought to a vigorous and impressive close.

The Berlioz "Roman Carnival," originally intended as an overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," is a collection of descriptive musical episodes relating to the action in the opera. It is bright and sparkling music for the most part and filled with many catchy effects of rhythm.

Helen Stanley, soprano soloist, sang her Debussy aria with dramatic feeling. Her voice shows point and power, and she made an excellent impression with her audience. After the Zandonal aria. "Conchita," which was sung with abandon, Miss Stanley was recalled several times.

Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," is based on Nicholas Lenan's poem of that name. The hero is represented as a man eternally pursuing women. Failing to discover his ideal, he finally becomes a prey of despair. Strauss has built in this tone poem the massive musical effects which are chacteristic of his orchestral works. A master of the technique of polyphonic writing, he revels in kaleidescopic changes of harmony. Volume and brilliance hold sway in the progress of this work. It was played in inspiring style by M. Monteux and his men and brought an interesting concert to a close.

A. F. P.

PROV. BULLTN NOV. 16

MUSIC of Schönberg will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next week for the first times since, years ago as they seem, his "Five Pieces for Orchestra" fell upon amused, puzzled, scandalized ears. Then and there Dr. Muck decreed exile for Schönberg. Now Mr. Monteux brings him back again—in very different guise. In his younger days Schönberg wrote a Sextet for Strings—"Verklärte Nacht," or "Transcendant Night"—once and twice played here by the Kneisel Quartet and "assisting artists." In his later days Schönberg rescored the piece for full string orchestra. New York so heard it late last winter and Boston will so hear it next Friday and Saturday. As sextet, "Transcendent Night" was everywhere applauded as music of beauty, power and passion, deepening the poetic background whence it sprang, assuring the composer a finer fame than some of his later experiments have fetched him. As pieces for string choirs, it should lose no distinctive quality. Again, with a novel music, Mr. Monteux bids fair to be justified. The remainder of the programme lists: Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Chaikovsky's Symphony in F-minor and [illegible] version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." This Viennese transcription is more florid than Berlioz's familiar arrangement.

Such men as are the players in the Symphony Orchestra, such courses and works as they have long followed, deserve a reciprocating public and twice annually, at the concerts for the Pension Fund of the band, comes opportunity to prove appreciation by good deed. Tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall befalls the first of these concerts for the current musical year. The orchestra is at the top of its new mettle; Mr. Monteux is a steadily ripening conductor; Chaikovsky with the "Pathetic Symphony," Strauss with the three tone-poems of "Don Juan," "Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration," divide the programme. There are virtually no expenses in the concert and every penny received cares for the members of the orchestra in sickness, in old age, in other retirement. What more is there to ask—except such heed and interest on the part of the public as best expresses itself in money laid upon the sill of the box-office? There and thereby reciprocity speaks clearest.

TRANS. NOV. 19

SYMPHONY CONCERT

RAKHMANINOV FOR RIDDLE; RAVEL FOR FERVOR

Again the Russian's Baffling Tone-Poem, "The Isle of the Dead" — Again the Parisian for the Beauty and the Passion of "Daphnis and Chloe"—Cherubini and Haydn for Ancients and for Honor

ONCE more yesterday afternoon, Rakhmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," was played at the Symphony Concerts and again inquiring hearers listened bewildered. They were the more put to confusion because the piece ran in a new version as lately revised by the composer, as made known recently at concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New York. By report in print, by evidence on Friday to the ear, Rakhmaninov has shortened the tone-poem; set to it a new ending; rewritten various measures. The innocent presumption was that these changes might clarify the design and purport of the music. In fact they left both more obscure than did the original pages. Eleven times in twelve years the public of the Symphony Concerts has heard "The Isle of the Dead" and unto the twelfth performance this evening the riddle of Rakhmaninov therein remains unsolved. The title set by the Russian to his music, the picture whence suggestions for it came imply certain moods, images, illusions. Once, however, the tone-poem is well under way, matter and manner seem almost denial of these implications; while the hearer flounders as best he may among contradictory impressions. Years ago when Rakhmaninov himself was conductor in the first performances of the piece in Boston, he clarified and reconciled—in degree—these confusions of purpose and outcome. With the best will in the world, Mr. Monteux, yesterday, seemed only to darken counsel.

By testimony of the title-page, Böcklin's familiar picture, likewise named "The Isle of the Dead," gave hint for the tone-poem. If recollection does not slip, the artist painted in subdued colors, over smooth surfaces, in persistent softness of line, in gentle harmonies of what technicians call "planes" and "values." His imaginative design, whether or not an island in the Bay of Naples stimulated his vision, was to suggest an abode of the dead, remote, still, changeless, where no wind stirred the cypresses, where the sea lapped mute shores in endless calm, where light was ever pale, thin and gray, where sunshine and shadow came not. Böcklin's canvas—again as it lingers in memory—perceptibly yielded such illusion. Since Rakhmaninov writes upon his title-page "to the Picture by A. Böcklin," he presumably would set similar suggestion in his music. Plausibly, impressively, the tone-poem so begins. The monotonous rhythm, the grey tonal color, the bleak profile of motivs and periods, the impassive pace, the reticence of modulation, invoke the images of the painter's picture, the composer's title. Rakhmaninov is writing music of intrinsic beauty and clear illusion.

Forthwith and of a sudden matter, mood and manner alter. Measures quiver and beat with longing or entreaty; mount insistently, even turbulently; before long, rise shrill and piercing. At moments the hearer might believe himself listening to Chaikovsky wrenched and torn by implacable desires; at others, hints of the Dies Iræ, the mediæval Roman hymn of the Last Judgment cross the music. They are more vivid in the revised than in the original version of the tone-poem; while similarly the measures of anguish cry more sharply. As "The Isle of the Dead" was first written, this aching longing, this piercing entreaty, gradually stilled and the piece ended in tone-picturing like to the beginning. As revised it closes rather abruptly with the crying rather than the mute dead vivid upon the ear.

What, then, was Rakhmaninov's design with this contradictory music? He only may say and he chooses the part of silence. Having pictured the dead in the isle, borne thither, as in Böcklin's picture by the mantled, motionless boatman, would be open, as it were, the Judgment Book before them, and set in tones their anguished dread, longing, entreaty? It is possible to infer as much from the version and the performance of the music heard yesterday. Yet what have these piteous pages to do with Böcklin's picture, with the imaginative scheme of the tone-poem as it still begins, as it used to end? Rakhmaninov, who writes music with a mind as well as a temperament, would hardly so destroy the unity of his piece alike in design and impression. Mr. Monteux chose to emphasize the anguish, the shrillness, the turbulence even, of these middle measures. If memory holds over long years Rakhmaninov as conducting composer, tended to subdue them. As some say, it was even possible to believe that he had written music of secret longings stirring in these dead but deathless souls—for those who in life had companioned them, for the joys and even the sorrows they had tasted in a world of warmth and motion. Fantastic motion, perhaps, yet one that gave the music a measure of unified scheme and outcome. The new version, the "reading" of Mr. Monteux, left not a vestige of these impressions. The still dead in their soundless isle, the anguished dead even at the Judgment Seat—and the tone-poem was done. Rakhmaninov's riddle passed still unread. The clapping audience applauded the prestige of an illustrious name and a favorite piece; the beauty and imagery of the music; possibly thereafter the perfervid anguish in the Chaikovskyan manner. It is high time for Rakhmaninov to write a programme-note.

The succeeding and the final number of the day was like quick wind dispersing these clouds and bright light scattering this darkness. For the first time since it was played at two pairs of concerts in a single season, the Second Suite from Ravel's ballet of "Daphnis and Chloë" was heard in Symphony Hall. When Mr. Diaghilev's Russians first mimed the piece Mr. Monteux conducted. It remains music to quicken his best powers, put the virtuosi of the orchestra, like Mr. Laurent at the first flute, to their finest mettle. Seldom within recent memory has a flute been played hereabouts with such fullness, brightness, suppleness of tone. The ballet as such has never come to the stage in America; even Paris and London have seen and heard it seldom. The music, however, like not too much of the kind, speaks for itself with no more aid than title and brief programme-note may afford. The dawn quivers, stirs, waxes. The countryside gleams and tinkles. Daphnis, wakening from dream, beholds it fulfilled in the returned Chloe saved by Pan from pirates. Together the pair mime the old fable of Pan and Syrinx, the tale of the nymph fleeing the woodland god and turned by him into a reed-pipe for his tender pipings. The miming quickens into dance; other shepherds, the whole folk, swarm into it; "joyous tumult" the programme-note labels the ensuing measures.

Ravel can be dryly adept in his music, prefer ingenuity to imagination, let an ironic impulse and a sophisticated mood come uppermost. Again he can write with a directness and intensity that makes the tones one with the thought, image, passion. In the first vein, he achieves a rapier-like music so sharply is it etched, so quick and subtle are cut and thrust. In the second vein he writes a music aglow with beauty, a-tingle with power, set down as it were in a heat of vivid creation. So imagined and written are these fragments of "Daphnis and Chloë" and with an unflagging command of both the largest and the finest expressive means. It is hard to imagine more illusive music of dawn. Tones bear the tremors of light and sound, quickened into daily miracle. Artfully play rhythms, harmonies and timbres; feat succeeds felicity of skill; details point and pass—and a pastoral world awakes and is alive and glad. . . . The music hovers about Daphnis and speaks his simple, clear, devoted spirit. At once it is both gentle and radiant. The lovers mime their legend and the orchestra threads thin, silvery, evanescent images upon the air. The motion quickens; the colors warm; the web thickens and Ravel, with the largest means, is writing a music of rhythmed ecstasy, all leap and plunge and tumult, all beat and glow. Dancers, as it seems, having bodily limitations, would stay and dull it. Better to listen, like the rapt audience, of yesterday, as to fervors and transports—not so much of the theatre for which they were destined, as of the beings, the world, the emotions of the composer's direct and enkindled imagination. Whatever the substance, the surface, the impulse, of Ravel's music, it gives pleasure from his earliest to his latest years. As it runs in this Suite from "Daphnis and Chloë," delight becomes reciprocating ardor.

Mr. Monteux is man of the world as well as man of music. He takes quiet thought of courtesies; is mindful of considerate ceremonies. Yesterday happened to be the eighty-seventh birthday, had he lived, of the founder and long the sustainer of the Symphony Orchestra. The conductor sought Mrs. Higginson; discovered that Cherubini's Overture to his opera, "Anacreon," and Haydn's little Symphony in E-flat had been two of her husband's favorite pieces; set them both at the beginning of the pending concert, and added an explanatory line to the programme-book. As finely tempered as the remembrance was the playing of Cherubini's stripped, striding, sparing measures as they seem beside the lusher music of a later day. In them dwells not only an elder economy of means and austerity of method but an elder eloquence lucid and plastic after its reticent manner.

Foil was the smiling music of Haydn, when once it had passed the sombre drum-roll and the darksome measures of an introduction, tempting a conductor of 1921, as perhaps it tempted Mr. Monteux, to a weighty emphasis and a deep color of which the composer and his orchestra may hardly have dreamed. In more of his music does Haydn sombre endure for long. In this very Symphony, he is soon away in the graceful, spirited, quick-witted pattern-weaving of his Allegros, his pensive and pliable theme with variations, his stately but not stilted minuet. Genial is he as always, but in this Symphony with a hint of formality. Simple he also seems but throughout with clear vigor of mood and means. Less is he the homely and sportive Haydn than the Haydn bent to serious, even ceremonious, music-making according to the fashions of his time. When he is grave as he often was yesterday the big orchestras and sturdy emphases of our time seem inadvertently but appreciably to stiffen him.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. NOV. 19.

[21]

PENSION FUND BEAUTIFUL PROGRAM

Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, which is regarded not only as the greatest achievement of this composer, but as one of the foremost artistic works of Russia, will occupy the first portion of the 40th Pension Fund concert to be given by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux.

The latter part of the program will be entirely occupied by the three best known tone poems of Richard Strauss, the great composer, who is now visiting this country. They will be the dramatically impressive works, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Don Juan," and the humorous rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel." Surely three more brilliant scores could scarcely be found in the entire repertory of modern symphonic music.

AMER. NOV. 19

SEVENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The program for the seventh regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, November 25 and 26, which will precede the second regular trip of the orchestra; to occupy the following week, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, which has not been heard at these concerts for several seasons.

The other numbers will be the Tragic Overture of Brahms, the Schoenberg's Sextet for strings "Verklarte Nocht" (Transcendent Night), including three, and the orchestral arrangement which Felix Weingartner has made of Weber's rondo, "Invitation to the Dance."

AMER. NOV. 19.

SYMPHONY PLAYS IN HIGGINSON'S MEMORY

Brilliant Performance of Two Classics

The first half of yesterday's Symphony program was played in memory of Maj Higginson, born Nov 18, 1834. The orchestra gave a performance of Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" and Haydn's E Flat Symphony "with the drum-roll," which proved that conductor and men are again capable of playing the classics as they should be played. The music sounded as though written yesterday, full of energy, brilliant, imaginative.

All that is now lacking is a little more suavity and subtlety in dynamics. The progress displayed over the slipshod perfunctory work of the orchestra in such music for two seasons past is surprising. A usually discriminating audience showed poor judgment in not bringing the orchestra to its feet after the Haydn symphony.

This customary tribute was paid instead to a fiery, but rather muddled performance of Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead." The five-four time of this piece is a difficulty no conductor and no orchestra is ever sure of surmounting, since it is in this instance hard to avoid lapsing into alternate measures of two-four and three-four time.

Yesterday the rhythm of the opening measures, which depict the motion over the waves of Charon's boat, was too jerky and too confused. At the climax, which the composer has wisely shorn of some of its Tschaikovsky false pomp by revision, the orchestra was quite together.

Mr Neumann, the kettle drummer, who is the most remarkable virtuoso in the present orchestra, had in this piece, as in the Haydn symphony, many opportunities to use his unrivaled skill. He deserves a special word of praise.

The final number was the second of the two suites Ravel has drawn for concert performance from his ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe." Mr Monteux, who conducted the original performance in Paris, is at his best in such music, which demands vigor, color and emotion of a conductor. A brilliant performance was warmly applauded.

The surprisingly miscellaneous program for next week includes Brahms' "Tragic Overture," Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated by Mr Weingartner; Schoenberg's sextet for strings and Tshaikovsky's hackneyed, banal "Fourth Symphony."

GLOBE - NOV. 19.

SYMPHONY'S TRIBUTE TO HIGGINSON

Part of Programme in Memory of His Birthday

BY OLIN DOWNES

Cherubini's overture to the ballet-opera, "Anacreon" and Haydn's Symphony in E flat (B. & H. No. 1), were played in memory of the birthday of Henry Lee Higginson (Nov 18, 1834), founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the concert given by that body yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

These compositions were followed by Rachmaninoff's "Isle of the Dead," after the picture of Arnold Bocklin, and orchestra fragments ("Lever du Jour-Pantomime-Danse General") from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe."

RESULTS OF MONTEUX'S LABOR

The melodiousness and brilliancy of Cherubini's writing, his easy mastery of form and of the art of instrumentation as known in his day, were emphasized in Mr. Monteux's admirable performance. Likewise in the symphony of Haydn—the symphony in which the theme of the introduction is suddenly and boldly reintroduced in the allegro of the first movement—the orchestral performance of which can only be described in terms of praise.

It was not only in the playing of Ravel's gorgeous music, but in the performance of these simple works of the classic school, that the orchestra showed the remarkable results of Mr. Monteux's labors.

Harmed by Revision

Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem has been extensively revised since the composer conducted its first performance by the Boston Symphony in this same hall in 1909. The revision does not help the work. It is shorter, but it is much less atmospheric. Where there were formerly tremendous moods and an atmosphere of profound reverie as a contrast to the climaxes of bitter complaint and lamentation, there is now only furious Tschaikowskian complaint and the fussy over-development of fragmentary motives derived from the plain chant, "Dies Irae." Farthest from the mood of Bocklin's picture is this revision of an originally inspired work. "It must produce such an effect of stillness," said the painter, "that anyone would be frightened at hearing a knock on the door." Paradoxical as it may seem, this stillness was in the original symphonic poem, scored for many instruments. It was present as in certain passages of Turgenieff, which caused the beautiful words of Renan, to the effect that "the reveries of centuries had amassed themselves about his heart." Was the absence of this atmosphere purely the fault of the composer?

Mr. Monteux's reading was highly dramatic, and in the exterior sense effective. Doubtless he followed the directions in the score. But there is a spirit that the letter cannot imprison. No conductor save Rachmaninoff himself has achieved the brooding introspection of this music. Others have grasped the outside but not the inside of it.

That unique mood which the composer achieved with his pen and his baton was present neither in yesterday's performance nor in any but one that we have heard.

The triumph of the concert was the performance of the gorgeous music—one might almost call it painting—of Ravel. This is such a piece of orchestral color as is seldom met with even in these days of orchestration run riot. Percussion instruments as well as instruments of wood and brass and string are used for purposes of tone-quality. Sounds of the most ravishing and mysterious character come from the orchestra, sounds that only the most expert could have predicted from a glance at the printed page—if they could.

One remembers the remark MacDowell made when he first heard Strauss' "Zarathustra." "This may not be music. It may be a new art." The performance was masterly, intoxicating in its vividness and variety of tone-painting. The audience remained some time in the hall—an exception after a long orchestral programme—to encore conductor and orchestra.

POST-NOV. 19

6TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead," Revised, Played Here for First Time

BIRTHDAY OF MAJ. HIGGINSON HONORED

By PHILIP HALE

The 6th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Cherubini, Overture to "Anacreon"; Haydn, Symphony, E flat major (B. & H. No. 1); Rachmaninoff, "The Island of the Dead"; Ravel, Second Suite from the Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

The revised version of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem was heard here for the first time. The composer has cut out portions and changed the ending. The [illegible] was performed

TIGHT BINDING

...w York last month at a Philhar... concert.

...may still be asked, what connec... has this music with the picture by ...klin? The painter called "The Isl... of the Dead" a dream picture. He ...to a countess, the possessor of the ...from his second sketch: "It must ...ce such an effect of stillness that ...ne would be frightened at hearing ...ock on the door."

...is picture is familiar to us all. ...impression made by it is one of ...n quiet. The sea is still; the ...yman rows noiselessly to the island ...towering cypresses and sombre ... Surely the white figure near the ...n is not giving way to wild lamen...n. Swinburne's lines come into the ... of the spectator:

"Then star nor sun shall waken
Nor any change of light;
Nor sound of waters shaken,
Nor any sound or sight;
Nor wintry leaves nor vernal,
Nor days nor things diurnal;
Only the sleep eternal
In an eternal night."

...he first pages of the music are, in... a tonal expression of the picture; ... the greater part of the piece is ...rged with anguish and despair; ... that is at times boisterous, at ...es a ululation. Boecklin's island ...ht be the abode of tormented souls. ... was there in Rachmaninoff's mind ... thought of those left behind, mourn... who would not be comforted, ...urners wailing as in an ancient pro...sion to the grave. And why is so ...ch made of the plain song "Dies ...e," the awful hymn of the Last ...dgment? The music without refer...ce to Boecklin's picture is impressive, ...though in this new version it is at ...es fussy and overworked. As a ...anslation into tones of the picture's ...ntiment it is singularly incongruous. ...en now it might be still more im...essive if it were shorter; if the ...ony were not so prolonged; if the ...vailing characteristic were of ...red hush and the final peace that ...ust come to the most turbulent.

...Ravel's cunningly and gorgeously or...hestrated ballet bears separation from ... stage and stage effects, the dancers ...d the mimes. Nor is it necessary for ...e's enjoyment to be concerned with ... adventures of Daphnis and Chloe. ...ere is something more than purple ...atches of instrumental color and dex...rous juggling with surprising com...inations of timbres. There is form, ...ere is melody; there are ravishing ...armonic devices; there is, above all, ...etic imagination. Mr. Monteux, who ...onducted the first performance in ...aris by the Ballet Russe, gave with ...he superb orchestra a performance of ...avishing beauty and dazzling bril...liance.

...Cherubini's overture and Haydn's ...ymphony were played, the program ...tated, in commemoration of the birth...ay of the late Maj. Higginson, Nov. 18, ...834. The overture mocks the years ...hat have passed. It is over a century ...ld: but it still excites admiration by ...he workmanship, and by the purity and ...obility of the musical thought. "No...ility" is the word. How few of the ...odern composers know the meaning of ...his word, or, knowing it, fail to ex...ress it in their music! This overture ... indeed classic as a drama of So...phocle's; the Venus of Milo; a poem by ...Walter Savage Landor. No wonder that ...Beethoven greeted Cherubini as the ...reatest of his contemporaries. The over...ure was nobly played, while the reading ...f Haydn's symphony was delightful.

...The concert will be repeated tonight. ...he program of the concerts next week ... as follows: Brahms, Tragic Over...ture; Weber-Weingartner, Invitation to ...he Dance; Schoenberg, Sextet for ...trings, "Radiant Night," arranged for ...trings (first time in Boston); Tschai...owsky Symphony No. 4, F minor.

HERALD-NOV...

...schaikowsky Work at Pension Concert

...schaikowsky's "Pathetic" Sym...ny, No. 6, will occupy the first por...n of the 14th pension fund concert ...be given by the full Boston Sym...ny orchestra in Symphony Hall to...rrow afternoon at 3:30 under its reg...ar conductor, Pierre Monteux.

The latter part of the program will ...entirely given by the three best ...own tone poems of Richard Strauss.

...NOV...

...H BOSTON SYMPHON...

...program for the Symphony con... in Symphony Hall next Friday ...oon and Saturday evening will ... Tschaikowsky's Fourth Sym... in F minor, which has not been ...at these concerts for several sea...

...other numbers will be the Tragic ...e of Brahms, Schoenberg's sex... strings and Weingartner's ar...ent of Weber's rondo, "Invitation ... Dance."

...ION FUND CONCERT

...kowsky's ever popular "Pathetic" ...ny, No. 6, will occupy the first ... the symphony concert at Sym...all this afternoon at 3:30 by the ...Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Mon...nductor. The proceeds will be ...to the pension fund for retired ...s of the orchestra. The second ... the program will be entirely ... by the three best known tone ... Richard Strauss, "Death and ...uration," "Don Juan" and "Till ...egel."

...ALD-NOV. 20

MUSICAL COMMENT—OLIN DOWNES

Strauss Compositions This Afternoon—Will Paderewski Return?—Galli-Curci Dec. 4—Extra Concerts by Symphony—Handel and Haydn Season

Richard Strauss sat at tea last Sunday afternoon following his concert in Symphony Hall. An eager young man, who believes that "Also Sprach Zarathustra," after Nietzsche's famous poem, is one of the greatest of modern orchestral masterpieces, asked Mr. Strauss in German of an extremely broken kind whether he had changed his opinion of Nietzsche's philosophy at all since he had composed "Zarathustra." Mr. Strauss replied, "Nietszche's philosophy? Anybody can dabble with a philosophy and believe now this philosophy, now that one. Nietszche as a poet, is the man I have always admired. My philosophy at this late day is work, and more work. On the whole I think that is the best philosophy."

Three compositions of Strauss will be heard this afternoon in Symphony Hall. First is the early "Don Juan"—the Don Juan of Lenau, whose adventures are not merely fleshly, but, as portrayed by Lenau and by Strauss, semi-spiritual, the adventures of an indomitable search for the ideal woman. Then comes "Death and Transfiguration," in which Strauss writes with flaming heroism of the last supreme adventure of the spirit of man, in terms of Liszt and Wagner, but at times in the spirit of Beethoven. Finally comes the incomparable "Till Eulenspiegel" ("Till Owlglass"), music of German legend and fairy tale, quickened by a sardonic humor and an incisive musical utterance that was almost Gallic. Strauss has been no more willing to explain "Till Eulenspiegel" to eager newspapermen than he was willing to explain "Zarathustra," or other of his works on the occasion herein previously noted. He turns off an inquiry as to what he means with a laugh. You must go to his music. Till, as we understand him from Strauss' score, is the arch-rogue, the free artist's spirit, which defies convention. Under all his excellent fooling, he is an anarchist, let loose in a bourgeois society. This complaisant society, scandalized, at last, to the limit, hangs Till up on a gibbet, and Strauss must have laughed heartily at the terror and the wrath of critics who were disturbed at his humorous portrayal of the rascal Till hoisted into the air, his expiring death-rattle, and so forth. Till dies but his spirit lives, and the fairy-tale prologue with which the symphonic poem opens returns at its end. Has the composer seemed serious for a moment? Have his irony and his wit more than once a bitter taste? "You are mistaken," says Strauss, "I have only been telling you a folk-tale of old Germany; how Till scandalized the town, upset the apple-carts, mocked a monk and made impudent love to a lady, defied the citizens and the constabulary, and was at last caught and punished for his misdeeds. So it happened, once upon a time"—and the symphonic poem has come to an end. No work of Strauss will outlive it. Few of his compositions stand by its side for clearness, melody, music.

In addition to these works of Strauss there will be played Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, a symphony in which some say the composer apprehended his end. Eliminating all the sentimentalizing and the romancing which have been aroused by this strange and most eloquent work, it remains the most original and the most powerful symphony that Tschaikowsky wrote. As such, it need not be relegated to the Pension Fund concerts. It would be well to hear it now and again at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony, for the respectable of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening are just as capable of responding to real, intensely human music as the public that attends the Sunday afternoon Pension Fund affairs. At the next pair of subscription concerts Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony will be played. Some rank this and the fifth symphony higher than the "Pathetic." It is hard to see how they can. What is there in either of the two earlier works that nearly approaches the battle-drunk march and the epic lamentation of the last two moments of the "Symphonie Pathetique?"

Tschaikowsky died, as some say, of cholera, as others say, a suicide. He had burned his diaries in which he had written all his life. He had written his last confession in this "Pathetic" symphony. Few are the men who could sing such a swan song.

Seventh Symphony Programme

The programme for the seventh regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 25-26, which will precede the second regular trip of the orchestra, to occupy the following week, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, which has not been heard at these concerts for several weeks.

The other numbers will be the Tragic Overture of Brahms, Schonberg's Sextet for Strings, "Verklarte Nacht," and the orchestral arrangement which Felix Weingartner has made of Weber's rondo, "Invitation to the Dance."

Symphony Gems at Pension Concert

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S perennially popular "Pathetic" Symphony, which is regarded as one of the foremost artistic achievements of Russia, will occupy the first part of the pension fund concert to be given at Symphony Hall this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor. he second part of the program will include the three best-known tone poems of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Don Juan" and the humorous "Till Eulenspiegel."

ADVTSR. NOV. 20

FIRST EXTRA SYMPHONY

The opening concert of the extra series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux will be given in Symphony Hall on Monday, Nov. 28, at 8:15. The concert will begin with Cesar Franck's symphony. John Powell, pianist, will play with the orchestra Liszt's Fantasy on Hungarian folk tunes. The remaining numbers will include the Overture and Fifth Ballet from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus," which has solo parts for the 'cello, harp, flute, clarinet and bassoon; also the Spanish Caprice by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

HERALD-NOV. 20

PENSION CONCERT TODAY

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, which is regarded as one of the foremost artistic achievements of Russia, will occupy the first part of the symphony concert to be given at Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3.30 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, the proceeds to be devoted to the Pension Fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. The second part of the programme will be entirely occupied by the three best known tone poems of Richard Strauss, the great composer, who is now visiting this country. They will be the dramatically impressive works, "Death and Transfiguration," and "Don Juan," and the humorous rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel." Surely three more brilliant scores could scarcely be found in the

POST- NOV. 20.

SYMPHONY HALL today at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. First concert in aid of the Pension Fund. "Pathetic" Symphony, Tschaikowsky; "Till Eulenspiegel," "Tod und Verklaerung," "Don Juan," Strauss. There is no soloist.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventh program. Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky; "Tragic Overture," Brahms; "Verklaerte Nacht," Schonberg; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Weingartner. There is no soloist.

The program of the first of the extra Monday evening Symphony concerts, Nov 28, contrary to expectation does not duplicate those of this year's regular concerts. It runs as follows: Symphony in D minor, Franck; Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes for piano and orchestra, Liszt; Overture and Fifth Ballet from "Prometheus," Beethoven; "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky Korsakov. Soloist, John Powell.

GLOBE-NOV. 20.

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Splendid Concert Delights a Large Audience

At the first concert for this season given by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund Symphony Hall was filled yesterday afternoon in every part with an audience that manifested its appreciation of the efforts of Mr. Monteux and the musicians with vigorous applause at every point where it was appropriate. This approval and its expression seemed to be not a bit clouded by the sombre, tragic character of the program and the fact that only two composers were represented, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss.

The first half of the concert was given over to the Russian composer's "Pathetic" symphony. The second half consisted of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Here were sorrow and pathos and tragedy raised to the nth power and continued through the long stretches of harmony, melody and artistic dissonance, until the comparatively short jingling jocosity of the "Merry Pranks" was reached. For, although "Don Juan" is streaked all through with the musical expression of the hero's variegated amorous passions, he had his troubles because of them and Strauss does not neglect them.

But the audience did not seem to care whether Tschaikowsky's despair was incurable, whether death as portrayed by Strauss was an excessively noisy affair, whether Don Juan got what he deserved for his flitting from flower to flower. It was rejoiced by the magnificent manner in which the musical ideas of the composers were portrayed by the orchestra and its energetic leader, and it drank in with delight the matchless beauties of the lyric portions of the "Pathetic" symphony, the beautiful transfiguration harmonies of Strauss and the entrancing love songs of Don Juan.

The orchestra was never more on its mettle to do its best in spirit, in vigor and in delicacy of expression, so that the whole result was splendid.

HERALD-NOV. 21.

CONTRAST IN FIRST PENSION CONCERT

Tschaikovsky and Strauss on Symphony Program

An audience that nearly, but not quite, filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first of this year's special concerts in aid of the pension fund for retired members. Mr Monteux chose a program calculated to please both the old fashioned and the ultra modern among concertgoers. In consequence, the latter resigned themselves to boredom during Tschaikovsky's hackneyed "Pathetic Symphony" for the sake of the three-tones poems by Richard Strauss, which followed, while those who had revelled in Tschaikovsky departed in droves as soon as they became sure that Strauss' music bore no resemblance to that of the composer of the "Blue Danube," his namesake.

One wondered whether a Beethoven-Wagner or a Wagner-Strauss program would not prove a better drawing card for such a concert. They used to be so in former seasons.

Mr Monteux did his conscientious best at the performance to make Tchaikovsky's music dramatic and thrilling. His vehement version of the third movement in particular stirred the audience to unusual applause. Every accent in it was a strong accent. More pains at rehearsal would have made the ensemble less sloppy. The attacks lacked crispness.

"Don Juan," which has been played at the regular concerts this Fall, was given yesterday with remarkable precision of detail, as well as fire and brilliance. "Till Eulenspiegel," too, was really well played, but "Tod und Verklaerung," like the symphony, might have been much better done.

There is not much difference between the dates of the composition of Strauss' tone poems and Tschaikovsky's last symphony. "Tod und Verklaerung" and "Don Juan" had been performed in public before the Russian thought of his pathetic magnum opus, in 1893. "Till" dates from 1895, two years after the symphony. But nobody in 1921 would guess it.

There are in music, as in hats, extreme and flashy styles which have a great vogue for a season and then grow out of date. There are other styles which are conservative, but colorless, and still others which seem queer at first, but grow upon one till their excellence is universally acknowledged. Tschaikovsky's musical style is of the first sort, Strauss', like Beethoven's and Wagner's in earlier days, is of the last sort.

It is already more than 10 years since the "Pathetic" symphony figured on a regular Boston Symphony program. In another 20 years only the "Nutcracker Suite," "1812" and other light pieces will keep Tschaikovsky before the concert-going public. Meanwhile Mr Monteux and the orchestra do their duty by him and please the gray-headed part of the audience.

GLOBE-NOV 21

Symphony Wins Great Ovation

Tschaikowsky's personally popular "Pathetic" symphony and three of the Richard Strauss tone poems, "Death of Transfiguration," "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," made up a notable program at the pension fund concert given at Symphony Hall, yesterday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps there was too much Strauss music, which is still caviare to the general public. At any rate, the audience did not fill the hall. Mr. Monteux and his orchestra were honored with an ovation after the performance of the symphony.

ADVTSR- NOV. 21.

The Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Monteux for Its Pension Fund — Strauss, Chaikovsky and the Regular Thing in the Regular Way—Need of a New Fillip—Elgar from the People's Orchestra Bettered

As the ancient and honorable phrase goes, the audience should have been larger at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon for the increase of its Pension Fund. Hardly an empty chair was to be seen in the second balcony of Symphony Hall, where prices are lowest and where also gathers, at both regular and occasional concerts, the newer public of the band. Gradually it has won these listeners; steadily it keeps them; upon them, as some believe, depends in no small measure its future fortunes. For this public, in degree the impending series of "special concerts" has been arranged. Within a week they will begin; but there it was yesterday to swell receipts and plaudits at a concert of, by, and for the members of the orchestra. Such reciprocating goodwill is stimulus and safeguard for [illegible] present and future. For too many years the Symphony Orchestra was content with hearers who naturally gravitated to it or who sought it out of long habit. Others gradually discovered it; the management of the orchestra gradually discovered them; now each is advantage to the other. Across the bridge from the older to the newer Boston, even (as some would say) the Symphony Concerts are moving.

In turn the lower balcony—region of middling prices and middling loyalties—was passably populated; but on the floor were far too many gashs of empty seats. Within easy recollection subscribers to the regular concerts filled many of them whenever the orchestra asked aid and comfort for its Pension Fund. Yesterday, at casual glance over the company, such hearers seemed few and far between. For the most part a miscellaneous assembly replaced them, much less numerous than the occasion deserved. Perhaps this changed and diminished audience was merely the chance of the day; perhaps Chaikovsky of The Pathetic Symphony and Strauss through three tone-poems was too much or too familiar. It is easy to be persuaded that the regular concerts are enough and to act accordingly. Yet from one Pension-Fund Concert to another, an observable fact stands clear. Within the past three years the Symphony Orchestra has become virtually a new body, pursuing new policies under a new régime, with its way to make anew. Not a few of those who most applauded these changes no longer seek these Pension-Fund Concerts. Yet under the old dispensation they rarely missed them. Human nature, like Mother Goose's lady, is contrary.

Possibly, however, in the programmes chosen, in the absence of "assisting artists" or "guest" conductors, lies the root of the diminished audiences at these concerts. On the stage yesterday sat the familiar orchestra, once more proving its new and excellent mettle in The Pathetic Symphony in "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan" and "Til Eulenspiegel." Through all four pieces Mr. Monteux led it in familiar fashion, with his zest for transition and contrast, rhythmic and melodic vividness, characterizing intensity, running more than usually high. Yet in sum the concert yielded only expected pleasure, in expected ways, from well-tested sources. There was not a novel flavor in it to win an audience within and without the subscribers to the regular concerts. "Guest" conductors of eminence, passing across the American horizon, have been bidden to these Pension-Fund concerts and have come gladly. A reciprocating audience has filled Symphony Hall. Eminent pianists, violinists, singers have accepted similar invitations and with like outcome. Without "assisting artist" or visiting conductor, programmes from Wagner's music of the opera house, an occasional programme of dance-music—waltzes by the elder Strauss included—have been as potent in the auditorium. They departed—and with savor—from the regular thing in the regular way at the Symphony Concerts. Yesterday, programme, players, performance, were too "close to type" to spur an audience.

H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV. 21

SCHOENBERG'S SEXTET

A NOTABLE PIECE TO RETURN IN NEW VOICE

Full String Choir at the Symphony Concerts This Week Instead of Six Instruments—A Rearrangement by the Composer Himself — Remarkable Music Twice Heard by Stirred Audiences

NEARLY six years ago, in March of 1915, the Kneisel Quartet, with "assisting artists," played for the first time in Boston Schönberg's Sextet for Two Violins, two Violas and two Violoncellos. "Verklärte Nacht" or, in English, "Transfigured Night." Two years later at the final concert of "The Kneisels" in Boston they repeated the piece. Next Friday and Saturday at the Symphony Concerts, it will be heard again—this time as music for the full string choir of a symphony orchestra. Not long ago Schönberg himself so rearranged the music, adding double-basses for groundwork to divided violins, violas, violoncellos. Otherwise he has made no material change in the form, the substance, the movement of the sextet. The distribution of the voices is unaltered; the expression-marks are unchanged. Here and there, however, he has indicated the playing of very soft measures by a single pair of instruments. In this version for string-choir the Sextet was heard in New York late last winter and will soon be heard in Chicago. Between stand the impending performances at Symphony Hall. There the beauty and the power of the music bid fair to renew the impression they originally made in the voices of "The Kneisels."

Since in essentials and in details, "Transfigured Night" is unchanged, the note written for the Transcript by Philip Greeley Clapp as preface to the performance of 1915 may serve like purpose for the performance of 1921. "'Verklärte Nacht,'" Mr Clapp then wrote, "means either a cloudy night cleared or a night of emotional darkness transfigured or illuminated, according to your choice; or, better still from the poetic point of view, both at once. Richard Dehmel's poem, 'Weib und Welt' ('Woman and World'), which serves as 'programme' for Schönberg's sextet, takes advantage of these opportunities for poetic double meaning to the extent of clothing a somewhat meagre idea with a beautiful expressive dress. Driven by hopelessness, a woman has sinned, only later to meet the true lover whom she had longed for but had despaired of, just as she is about to become a mother. Walking with this lover across the cold heath on a moonlit night, she

[22]

TIGHT BINDING

MUSICAL COMMENT—OLIN DOWNES

Strauss Compositions This Afternoon—Will Paderewski Return?—Galli-Curci Dec. 4—Extra Concerts by Symphony—Handel and Haydn Season

Richard Strauss sat at tea last Sunday afternoon following his concert in Symphony Hall. An eager young man, who believes that "Also Sprach Zarathustra," after Nietzsche's famous poem, is one of the greatest of modern orchestral masterpieces, asked Mr. Strauss in German of an extremely broken kind whether he had changed his opinion of Nietszche's philosophy at all since he had composed "Zarathustra." Mr. Strauss replied, "Nietszche's philosophy? Anybody can dabble with a philosophy and believe now this philosophy, now that one, Nietszche as a poet, is the man I have always admired. My philosophy at this late day is work, and more work. On the whole I think that is the best philosophy."

Three compositions of Strauss will be heard this afternoon in Symphony Hall. First is the early "Don Juan"—the Don Juan of Lenau, whose adventures are not merely fleshly, but, as portrayed by Lenau and by Strauss, semi-spiritual, the adventures of an indomitable search for the ideal woman. Then comes "Death and Transfiguration," in which Strauss writes with flaming heroism of the last supreme adventure of the spirit of man, in terms of Liszt and Wagner, but at times in the spirit of Beethoven. Finally comes the incomparable "Till Eulenspiegel" ("Till Owlglass"), music of German legend and fairy tale, quickened by a sardonic humor and an incisive musical utterance that was almost Gallic. Strauss has been no more willing to explain "Till Eulenspiegel" to eager newspapermen than he was willing to explain "Zarathustra," or other of his works on the occasion herein previously noted. He turns off an inquiry as to what he means with a laugh. You must go to his music. Till, as we understand him from Strauss' score, is the arch-rogue, the free artist's spirit, which defies convention. Under all his excellent fooling, he is an anarchist, let loose in a bourgeois society. This complaisant society, scandalized, at last, to the limit, hangs Till up on a gibbet, and Strauss must have laughed heartily at the terror and the wrath of critics who were disturbed at his humorous portrayal of the rascal Till hoisted into the air, his expiring death-rattle, and so forth. Till dies, but his spirit lives, and the fairy-tale prologue with which the symphonic poem opens returns at its end. Has the composer seemed serious for a moment? Have his irony and his wit more than once a bitter taste? "You are mistaken," says Strauss, "I have only been telling you a folk-tale of old Germany; how Till scandalized the town, upset the apple-carts, mocked a monk and made impudent love to a lady, defied the citizens and the constabulary, and was at last caught and punished for his misdeeds. So it happened, once upon a time"—and the symphonic poem has come to an end. No work of Strauss will outlive it. Few of his compositions stand by its side for clearness, melody, music.

In addition to these works of Strauss there will be played Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, a symphony in which some say the composer apprehended his end. Eliminating all the sentimentalizing and the romancing which have been aroused by this strange and most eloquent work, it remains the most original and the most powerful symphony that Tschaikowsky wrote. As such, it need not be relegated to the Pension Fund concerts. It would be well to hear it now and again at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony, for the respectable of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening are just as capable of responding to real, intensely human music as the public that attends the Sunday afternoon Pension Fund affairs. At the next pair of subscription concerts Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony will be played. Some rank this and the fifth symphony higher than the "Pathetic." It is hard to see how they can. What is there in either of the two earlier works that nearly approaches the battle-drunk march and the epic lamentation of the last two moments of the "Symphonie Pathetique?"

Tschaikowsky died, as some say, of cholera, as others say, a suicide. He had burned his diaries in which he had written all his life. He had written his last confession in this "Pathetic" symphony. Few are the men who could sing such a swan song.

Seventh Symphony Programme

The programme for the seventh regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 25-26, which will precede the second regular trip of the orchestra, to occupy the following week, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, which has not been heard at these concerts for several weeks.

The other numbers will be the Tragic Overture of Brahms, Schonberg's Sextet for Strings, "Verklarte Nacht," and the orchestral arrangement which Felix Weingartner has made of Weber's rondo, "Invitation to the Dance."

PENSION CONCERT TODAY

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, which is regarded as one of the foremost artistic achievements of Russia, will occupy the first part of the symphony concert to be given at Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3.30 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, the proceeds to be devoted to the Pension Fund for retired musicians of the orchestra. The second part of the programme will be entirely occupied by the three best known tone poems of Richard Strauss, the great composer, who is now visiting this country. They will be the dramatically impressive works, "Death and Transfiguration," and "Don Juan," and the humorous rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel." Surely three more brilliant scores could scarcely be found in the

POST- NOV. 20.

SYMPHONY HALL today at 3:30, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. First concert in aid of the Pension Fund. "Pathetic" Symphony, Tschaikowsky; "Till Eulenspiegel," "Tod und Verklaerung" and "Don Juan," [illegible]. There is no soloist.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, seventh program. Fourth Symphony, Tschaikowsky; "Tragic Overture," Brahms; "Verklaerte Nacht," Schonberg; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Weingartner. There is no soloist.

The program of the first of the extra Monday evening Symphony concerts, Nov 28, contrary to expectation does not duplicate those of this year's regular concerts. It runs as follows: Symphony in D minor, Franck; Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes for piano and orchestra, Liszt; Overture and Fifth Ballet from "Prometheus," Beethoven; "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky Korsakov. Soloist, John Powell.

Symphony Gems at Pension Concert

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S perennially popular "Pathetic" Symphony, which is regarded as one of the foremost artistic achievements of Russia, will occupy the first part of the pension fund concert to be given at Symphony Hall this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor. he second part of the program will include the three best-known tone poems of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Don Juan" and the humorous "Till Eulenspiegel."

ADVTSR. NOV. 20.

FIRST EXTRA SYMPHONY

The opening concert of the extra series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux will be given in Symphony Hall on Monday, Nov. 28, at 8:15. The concert will begin with Cesar Franck's symphony. John Powell, pianist, will play with the orchestra Liszt's Fantasy on Hungarian folk tunes. The remaining numbers will include the Overture and Fifth Ballet from Beethoven's "Creatures of Prometheus," which has solo parts for the 'cello, harp, flute, clarinet and bassoon, also the Spanish Caprice by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

HERALD- NOV. 20

GLOBE- NOV. 20.

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Splendid Concert Delights a Large Audience

At the first concert for this season given by the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund Symphony Hall was filled yesterday afternoon in every part with an audience that manifested its appreciation of the efforts of Mr. Monteux and the musicians with vigorous applause at every point where it was appropriate. This approval and its expression seemed to be not a bit clouded by the sombre, tragic character of the program and the fact that only two composers were represented, Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss.

The first half of the concert was given over to the Russian composer's "Pathetic" symphony. The second half consisted of Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Here were sorrow and pathos and tragedy raised to the nth power and continued through the long stretches of harmony, melody and artistic dissonance, until the comparatively short jingling jocosity of the "Merry Pranks" was reached. For, although "Don Juan" is streaked all through with the musical expression of the hero's variegated amorous passions, he had his troubles because of them and Strauss does not neglect them.

But the audience did not seem to care whether Tschaikowsky's despair was incurable, whether death as portrayed by Strauss was an excessively noisy affair, whether Don Juan got what he deserved for his flitting from flower to flower. It was rejoiced by the magnificent manner in which the musical ideas of the composers were portrayed by the orchestra and its energetic leader, and it drank in with delight the matchless beauties of the lyric portions of the "Pathetic" symphony, the beautiful transfiguration harmonies of Strauss and the entrancing love songs of Don Juan.

The orchestra was never more on its mettle to do its best in spirit, in vigor and in delicacy of expression, so that the whole result was splendid.

HERALD-NOV. 21.

CONTRAST IN FIRST PENSION CONCERT

Tschaikovsky and Strauss on Symphony Program

An audience that nearly, but not quite, filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first of this year's special concerts in aid of the pension fund for retired members. Mr Monteux chose a program calculated to please both the old fashioned and the ultra modern among concertgoers. In consequence, the latter resigned themselves to boredom during Tschaikovsky's hackneyed "Pathetic Symphony" for the sake of the three-tones poems by Richard Strauss, which followed, while those who had revelled in Tschaikovsky departed in droves as soon as they became sure that Strauss' music bore no resemblance to that of the composer of the "Blue Danube," his namesake.

One wondered whether a Beethoven-Wagner or a Wagner-Strauss program would not prove a better drawing card for such a concert. They used to be so in former seasons.

Mr Monteux did his conscientious best at the performance to make Tchaikovsky's music dramatic and thrilling. His vehement version of the third movement in particular stirred the audience to unusual applause. Every accent in it was a strong accent. More pains at rehearsal would have made the ensemble less sloppy. The attacks lacked crispness.

"Don Juan," which has been played at the regular concerts this Fall, was given yesterday with remarkable precision of detail, as well as fire and brilliance. "Till Eulenspiegel," too, was really well played, but "Tod und Verklaerung," like the symphony, might have been much better done.

There is not much difference between the dates of the composition of Strauss' tone poems and Tschaikovsky's last symphony. "Tod und Verklaerung" and "Don Juan" had been performed in public before the Russian thought of his pathetic magnum opus, in 1893. "Till" dates from 1895, two years after the symphony. But nobody in 1921 would guess it.

There are in music, as in hats, extreme and flashy styles which have a great vogue for a season and then grow out of date. There are other styles which are conservative, but colorless, and still others which seem queer at first, but grow upon one till their excellence is universally acknowledged. Tschaikovsky's musical style is of the first sort, Strauss', like Beethoven's and Wagner's in earlier days, is of the last sort.

It is already more than 10 years since the "Pathetic" symphony figured on a regular Boston Symphony program. In another 20 years only the "Nutcracker Suite," "1812" and other light pieces will keep Tschaikovsky before the concert-going public. Meanwhile Mr Monteux and the orchestra do their duty by him and please the gray-headed part of the audience.

GLOBE- NOV. 21

Symphony Wins Great Ovation

Tschaikowsky's personally popular "Pathetic" symphony and three of the Richard Strauss tone poems, "Death of Transfiguration, "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," made up a notable program at the pension fund concert given at Symphony Hall, yesterday, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps there was too much Strauss music, which is still caviare to the general public. At any rate, the audience did not fill the hall. Mr. Monteux and his orchestra were honored with an ovation after the performance of the symphony.

ADVTSR- NOV. 21

The Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Monteux for Its Pension Fund — Strauss, Chaikovsky and the Regular Thing in the Regular Way—Need of a New Fillip—Elgar from the People's Orchestra Bettered

AS the ancient and honorable phrase goes, the audience should have been larger at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon for the increase of its Pension Fund. Hardly an empty chair was to be seen in the second balcony of Symphony Hall, where prices are lowest and where also gathers, at both regular and occasional concerts, the newer public of the band. Gradually it has won these listeners; steadily it keeps them; upon them, as some believe, depends in no small measure its future fortunes. For this public, in degree the impending series of "special concerts" has been arranged. Within a week they will begin; but there it was yesterday to swell receipts and plaudits at a concert of, by, and for the members of the orchestra. Such reciprocating goodwill is stimulus and safeguard for both present and future. For too many years the Symphony Orchestra was content with hearers who naturally gravitated to it or who sought it out of long habit. Others gradually discovered it; the management of the orchestra gradually discovered them; now each is advantage to the other. Across the bridge from the older to the newer Boston, even (as some would say) the Symphony Concerts are moving.

In turn the lower balcony—region of middling prices and middling loyalties—was passably populated; but on the floor were far too many gashs of empty seats. Within easy recollection subscribers to the regular concerts filled many of them whenever the orchestra asked aid and comfort for its Pension Fund. Yesterday, at casual glance over the company, such hearers seemed few and far between. For the most part a miscellaneous assembly replaced them, much less numerous than the occasion deserved. Perhaps this changed and diminished audience was merely the chance of the day; perhaps Chaikovsky of The Pathetic Symphony and Strauss through three tone-poems was too much or too familiar. It is easy to be persuaded that the regular concerts are enough and to act accordingly. Yet from one Pension-Fund Concert to another, an observable fact stands clear. Within the past three years the Symphony Orchestra has become virtually a new body, pursuing new policies under a new régime, with its way to make anew. Not a few of those who most applauded these changes no longer seek these Pension-Fund Concerts. Yet under the old dispensation they rarely missed them. Human nature, like Mother Goose's lady, is contrary.

Possibly, however, in the programmes chosen, in the absence of "assisting artists" or "guest" conductors, lies the root of the diminished audiences at these concerts. On the stage yesterday sat the familiar orchestra, once more proving its new and excellent mettle in The Pathetic Symphony in "Death and Transfiguration," "Don Juan" and "Til Eulenspiegel." Through all four pieces Mr. Monteux led it in familiar fashion, with his zest for transition and contrast, rhythmic and melodic vividness, characterizing intensity, running more than usually high. Yet in sum the concert yielded only expected pleasure, in expected ways, from well-tested sources. There was not a novel flavor in it to win an audience within and without the subscribers to the regular concerts. "Guest" conductors of eminence, passing across the American horizon, have been bidden to these Pension-Fund concerts and have come gladly. A reciprocating audience has filled Symphony Hall. Eminent pianists, violinists, singers have accepted similar invitations and with like outcome. Without "assisting artist" or visiting conductor, programmes from Wagner's music of the opera house, an occasional programme of dance-music—waltzes by the elder Strauss included—have been as potent in the auditorium. They departed—and with savor—from the regular thing in the regular way at the Symphony Concerts. Yesterday, programme, players, performance, were too "close to type" to spur an audience.

H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV. 21

SCHOENBERG'S SEXTET

A NOTABLE PIECE TO RETURN IN NEW VOICE

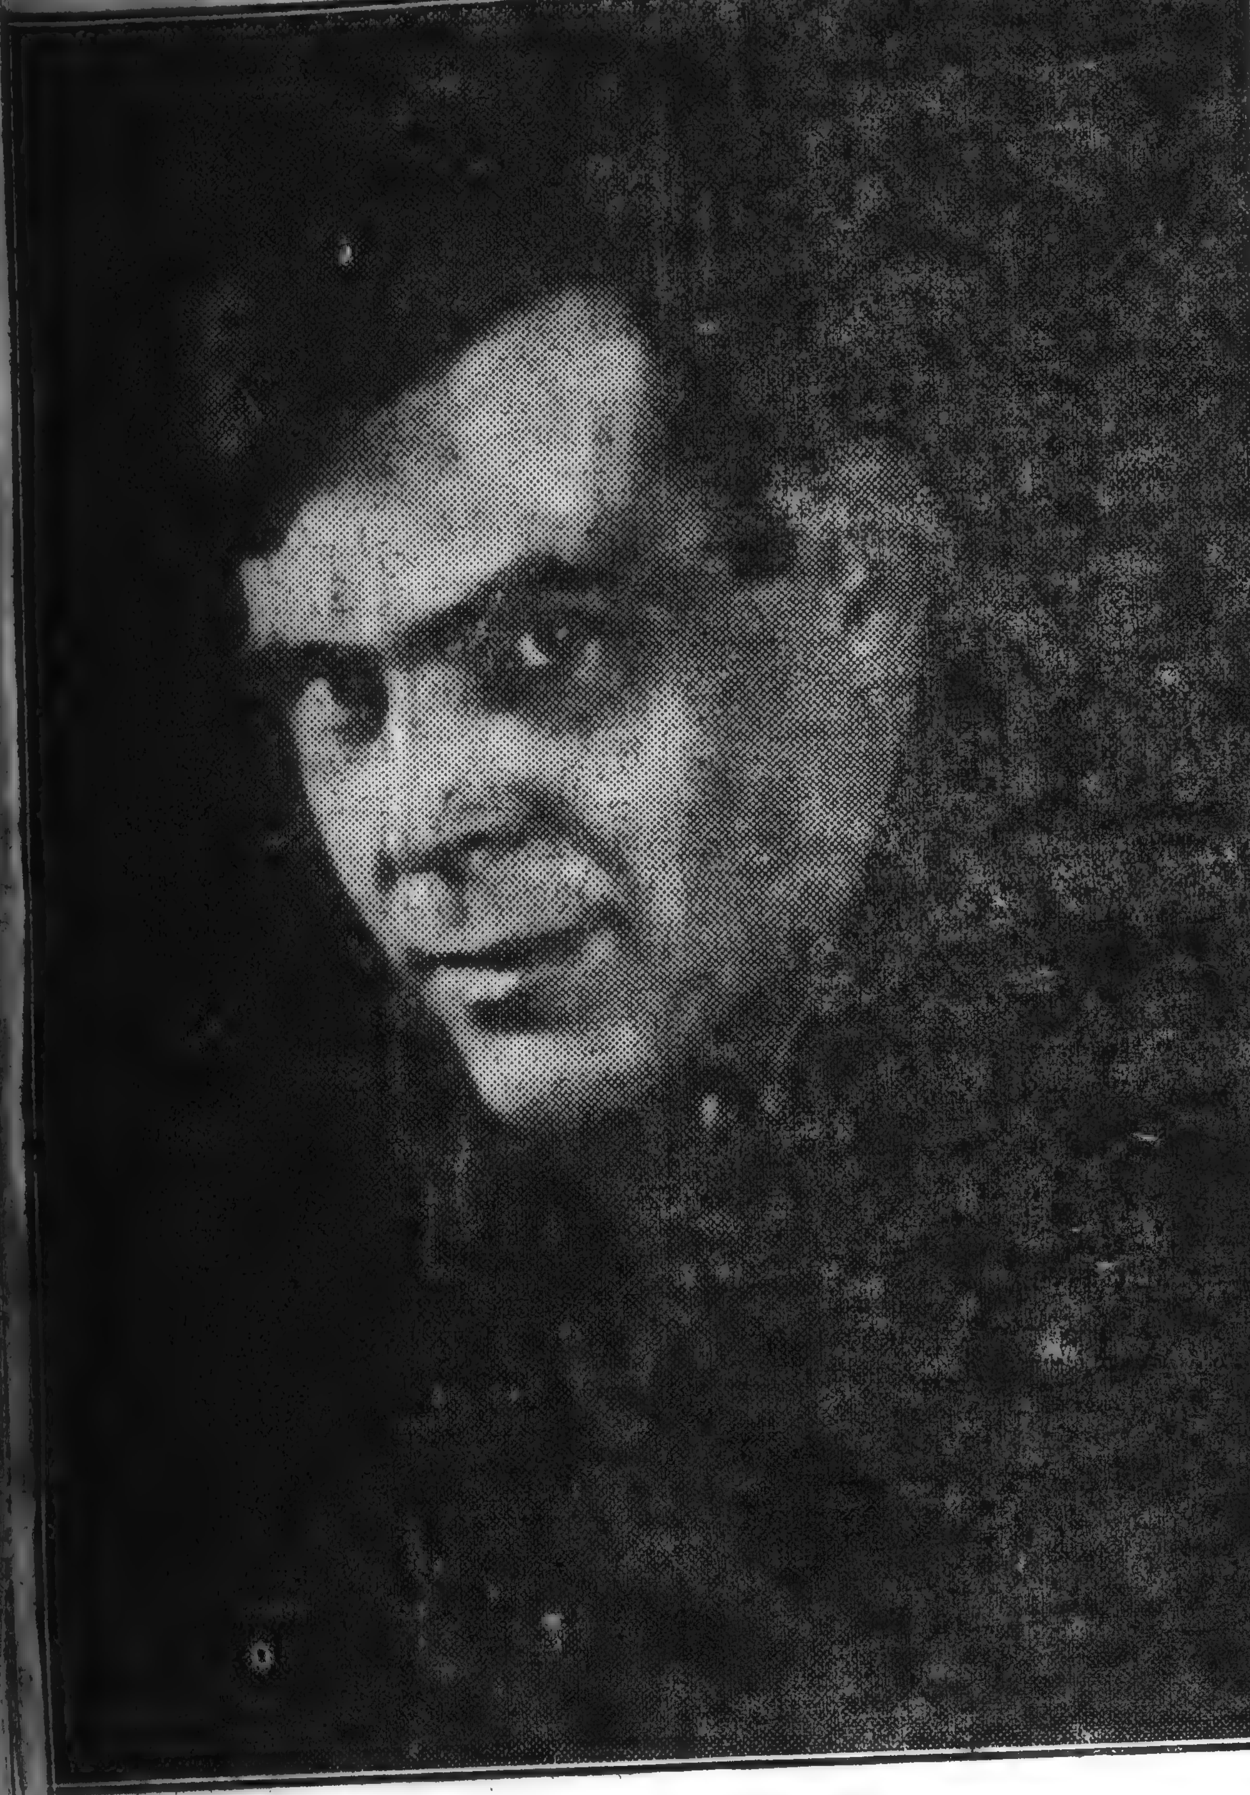
Full String Choir at the Symphony Concerts This Week Instead of Six Instruments—A Rearrangement by the Composer Himself — Remarkable Music Twice Heard by Stirred Audiences

NEARLY six years ago, in March of 1915, the Kneisel Quartet, with "assisting artists," played for the first time in Boston Schönberg's Sextet for Two Violins, two Violas and two Violoncellos. "Verklärte Nacht" or, in English, "Transfigured Night." Two years later at the final concert of "The Kneisels" in Boston they repeated the piece. Next Friday and Saturday at the Symphony Concerts, it will be heard again—this time as music for the full string choir of a symphony orchestra. Not long ago Schönberg himself so rearranged the music, adding double-basses for groundwork to divided violins, violas, violoncellos. Otherwise he has made no material change in the form, the substance, the movement of the sextet. The distribution of the voices is unaltered; the expression-marks are unchanged. Here and there, however, he has indicated the playing of very soft measures by a single pair of instruments. In this version for string-choir the Sextet was heard in New York late last winter and will soon be heard in Chicago. Between stand the impending performances at Symphony Hall. There the beauty and the power of the music bid fair to renew the impression they originally made in the voices of "The Kneisels."

Since in essentials and in details, "Transfigured Night" is unchanged, the note written for the Transcript by Philip Greeley Clapp as preface to the performance of 1915 may serve like purpose for the performance of 1921. "'Verklärte Nacht,'" Mr Clapp then wrote, "means either a cloudy night cleared or a night of emotional darkness transfigured or illuminated, according to your choice; or, better still from the poetic point of view, both at once. Richard Dehmel's poem, 'Weib und Welt' ('Woman and World'), which serves as 'programme' for Schönberg's sextet, takes advantage of these opportunities for poetic double meaning to the extent of clothing a somewhat meagre idea with a beautiful expressive dress. Driven by hopelessness, a woman has sinned, only later to meet the true lover whom she had longed for but had despaired of, just as she is about to become a mother. Walking with this lover across the cold heath on a moonlit night, she

[22]

A Smiling Devil in His Eye



John Powell, Pianist

Returning to the Symphony Orchestra Next Monday

falteringly makes her confession to him; his generous forgiveness and warm love irradiate her, and the two walk on, 'transfigured' into the 'transfigured' night.

"The Sextet begins with a pianissimo reiterated pedal D, which suggests the trudging footsteps of the couple. A descending figure, weary and languid in character, is added and developed at some length; an atmosphere of suppressed discouragement is definitely established. The pace quickens; a new figure of more agitated character enters, and in turn is developed for a while, elaborating and complementing the first. B-flat minor: a light, shimmering tremulo and soft melodic figures in a very high register prepare the way for something ominous and unknown. Lamenting figures adroitly insinuate themselves into the development of the foregoing material. There is much modulation and several changes of rhythm; eventually a broad climax in E major ends the first portion of the woman's speech. A theme of transcendant beauty, E major, 9-8 rhythm, peaceful and serene, seems to portray the woman's dream that in motherhood she might attain happiness and self-fulfilment. A harsh chord and a growling tremulo in the bass ends this dream, and a long section follows in which agitation and despair reach a passionate and powerful climax; then there is pleading theme of short duration, and a heavy-hearted resumption of the trudging march. Silence.

"The man's voice, as typified by the first 'cello, speaks; the key is D major, the atmosphere that of reassurance. The first lamenting motive appears tenderly and comfortingly 'transfigured' in the violins and violas. F-sharp major: a new accompaniment figure is established and a love-duet of ethereal beauty begins. Some of the old motives are reassuringly 'transfigured' in turn. There is a flash of warm enthusiasm, D-flat major, 6-8. The old doubts are remembered, but not heeded. A new broad theme leads to a climax and a return to D major. Very softly, over a shimmering accompaniment, variants of sundry themes associated with the man and the woman unite in the final love-duet. The new broad theme and an echo of the enthusiastic motive return in D major, which is also the key of the ineffably rich and sweet pianissimo close. In determining his form, Schönberg has been strategic in the choice of a poem whose text divides itself naturally into easily recognizable units of mood; for each of these the music presents a similar unit, of proportionate duration and emphasis, except that the final union of the lovers leads Schönberg into taking the desirable liberty of greatly lengthening the love-duet.

"Since the moods of the poem logically proceed out of one another, it naturally follows that the moods of the music do likewise; since the poem falls naturally into the broad divisions of a prologue, two contrasting presentations of personal points of view, and a summary, it naturally follows that the music proceeds according to the aesthetically satisfactory cyclic formula of an introduction, two contrasting 'movements' unified each in itself, and an apotheosis. Of conventional 'form,' with its stereotyped academic division into exposition, development, and recapitulation there is not a jot of genuine unity, balance and mass, of real thematic variation and treatment and within these of a true creative and re-creative process of persistent and constant exposition, development and recapitulation, there is so much, and all is so well done, that the composition rightfully should be recognized as a masterpiece.

[illegible] of this fairly early work of Schönberg are not at all the revo tionary dissonances'' which in his la works have so frequently proved the selves caviar to the general. The famo chords containing eight, nine, ten or ele separate constituents, resolving into oth of like character, are here not to be foun the richest chromatic shadings of the ge tler triads, seventh and ninth chords, h suffice. The style is not exactly that Haydn, but at least it does not go beyond 'Tristan,' to whose family it belongs. On the other hand it does not seem imitative of its parent style, or of its cousin, Debussy.

"What might be expected pleasantly to disappoint the pessimist, except that the pessimist will alaways stick to his theories against the evidence of his senses, the abundance in this work of rich and beautiful melody. The procedure is sometimes that of devoting a full-length complete melody to one or two instruments, sometimes that of passing melodic phrases from one instrument to another. The quality of the melodic material is always warmly emotional, and as the mood clarifies and intensifies toward the close, there is an imperceptibly gradual broadening of phrase, combined with an increase of the interweaving of counter-melodic voices, to which a New York reviewer has aptly applied the title-word, 'transfigured.'"

So much for exposition. For impression, the reviewer for the Transcript, J. N. B., wrote of "Verklärte Nacht" after the performance by "The Kneisels" in 1917: "The tone-poem is decisive and eloquent proof to any who may doubt, of a thorough, inspired, highly skilled, broadly proportioning, composer, powerfully independent in the seizure and pursuit of his own ideas, but at the same time a well-grounded, sober, authoritative, and instinctive evolutionary pioneer, and no mere eccentric iconoclast. Schönberg's later work may be momentarily incomprehensible, it may be intellectually intricate and experimentally hazardous. But the composer of such music as 'Verklärte Nacht' is no impostor or idler, and never could be; there must be intuitive and guiding force behind his experimentalism, and those who have delved as deeply as he into the well of art could never content themselves with skimming the surface afterwards.

"In the first place, Schönberg found a sensible and suitable medium in the combination of six stringed instruments wherein to compromise the largeness, complexity and orchestral and dramatic instincts of the romanticists with the clearer and purer medium of chamber music, once so nearly eclipsed by the passion for musical structures of Valhalla proportions. The string sextet assembled under Schönberg's skilful manipulation, body, volume and basic power, without the loss of tonal unity and purity, or the individual intimate beauties of chamber music, which combinations for wood-wind choirs by no means attain. To hear the music is to realize at once that this is no chance or even experimental combination. As for the style, it is largely conventional, both harmonically and melodically and romantically, as an early work naturally must be. The bold incursions into individual speech are the natural growth and offshoot of convention, facilitated by a heightened sense and proficiency in the simultaneous manipulation of voices, and a heightened sense of effect, integrity, dramatic surge and dramatic contrast, which need not cling blindly or unimaginatively to precedent and rules of practicability.

"Formally the Sextet is freest of all rhapsodic and fantasia-like, but with no poverty of ideas, and with propulsive and unifying motive behind its procedure. The use of the tremolo is no mere filling-in but takes its individual trend in supplying immediate dramatic requirements, just as the melody fills its own ends, and the contrapuntal usage is subjected entirely to purposes of expression. It is an impassioned love song, generally resembling many previous ones in character, working up to the frenzies of 'Tristan' without being a slave to them. The very times when the composer begins to depart from the approved and tried ways are those moments when he is so excited by the heat of his work as to forget calculation and analysis, and let his musical intuitions lead him. This above everything speaks in favor of his abrupt departures, although later indications argue cerebral tendencies. The elevated and noble climax, and the final lapse into quiet and beautiful poetry is the crowning confirmation of love music that has been excelled by few, and chamber music which, in its kind, has been equalled by none."

TRANS-NOV.23

Here in Boston

The first of the "special concerts" of the Symphony Orchestra, designed for a public unable or unwilling to seek the regular series, will take place in Symphony Hall on Monday evening next. Thereafter the orchestra will visit New Haven, Brooklyn and New York. It will be heard again at home on Friday afternoon, Dec. 9 and Saturday evening, Dec. 10, when Mr. d'Indy will lead it as "guest conductor." He will fill the first half of a long programme with ancient pieces: the Overture to the earliest of operas, Monteverde's "Orpheus"; Lalande's Chaconne, music for the suppers of Louis XIV., King of France; a Concerto of Bach, in D major, for Piano and Orchestra and a Serenade of Mozart for Two String Orchestras with Drums. In Bach's Concerto, Mr. Bruce Simonds, an instructor in music at Yale and recently a favorite pupil of Mr. d'Indy, will play the piano-part. In the second division of the programme stand a Piece for Orchestra, "To the Dead," written by another of the conductor-composer's pupils, Monsieur Le Flem; a fragment, "The Gods in the Shadows of the Caverns" from Roussel's "Evocations," little known music in America; and Mr. d'Indy's own "Poème des Rivages"—sea-pictures suggested by a recent journey along the coasts of Italy.

For the two concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York next week, Mr. Monteux has set programmes not drawn altogether from pieces recently heard in Boston. Thus, one list, for Thursday evening, Dec. 1, traverses Sibelius's Second Symphony; Weingartner's arrangement for orchestra of Weber's Invitation to the Dance"; Schönberg's Sextet for Strings, "Transfiguring Night"; Beethoven's third "Leonora" Overture. The other programme, for Saturday afternoon, Dec. 3, comprises: Franck's Symphony; Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; three short tone-pictures by Liadov; and the fragments of Ravel's Ballet, "Dahpns and Chloë," heard in Boston last week.

TRANS-NOV.25.

MUSIC

Boston Music

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's seventh program, given on November 25, was as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Weber-Weingartner, Invitation to the Dance; Schönberg, sextet for strings, "Radiant Night"; Tschaikowsky, fourth symphony in F minor.

This program, ranging from the austerities of Brahms, through the complexities of Schönberg and the emotionalism of Tschaikowsky to the graceful, pleasing and obvious Weber must have offered at least one number to suit the taste of every one in yesterday's audience. Few programs could be arranged which would require more diversity of style, quicker sensitiveness, a wider range of musical understanding than this one, and yet throughout the afternoon, Mr. Monteux gave evidence of a complete comprehension of the works in hand and succeeded in bringing out fully and sympathetically the characteristic points of each composition. He passed from the severe and restrained Brahms to the light and graceful "Invitation to the Dance" and thence to the involved sextet by Schönberg without perceptible effort. It was a remarkable feat of virtuosity, done so quietly and unostentatiously that few realized how remarkable it really was.

Of course the work of outstanding interest was Schönberg's sextet, "Radiant Night." The name of Schönberg has to many minds been synonymous with that of dissonance. This sextet belongs to an earlier period, one evidently in which the composer had not yet learned to conceal his poverty of invention, and the triteness of his musical utterances in a veil of polyphonic cacophony. There are distinct melodies in this sextet, albeit of a somewhat commonplace order. There is little that startles the ear harmonically, and the development is somewhat diffuse, yet there are impressive moments, as for example the chords which immediately precede the theme announced by the cellos (we believe it is intended to personify the consoling voice of the man in Dehmel's poem, a portion of which inspired this work.) The sextet as a whole is monotonous and would have been tiresome but for the playing of the orchestra. A sextet of solo players could scarcely have played with more freedom and elasticity or more perfect ensemble.

Tschaikowsky's symphony was played with the necessary appreciation of its dramatic qualities. The second and third movements, if musically somewhat slight, never fail of their effect. Nowadays it is sometimes difficult to take all of Tschaikowsky's rant and bombast seriously yet he often produces his thrill in spite of our better judgment.

On November 23, Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital, assisted by Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, and Arthur Fiedler, accompanist. With Mr. Gebhard he played Beethoven's sonata in A major and Huré's in F sharp. He also played solo pieces. Huré's sonata is an imaginative, if somewhat over developed composition and contains many pages of real inspiration. The two instruments are treated with evident understanding of their capabilities, both separately and together. Mr. Bedetti's qualities as a soloist and as a musician are already well known. It is sufficient to say that they were once again appreciated by a large and musically representative audience.

MONITOR-NOV.26

Symphony Plays Schoenberg Gem

Schoenberg's "Radiant Night," a tone picture of lovers astray in the moonlight, was heard at a Symphony concert yesterday for the first time. Originally a bit of chamber music, it has been arranged for string orchestra, with impressive results. This post-Wagnerian masterpiece was stirringly performed. So was Weingartner's brilliant orchestral arrangement of Weber's charming "Invitation to the Dance." There was a performance worthy at last of the Ballet Russe!

Brahms' "Tragic Overture," rapidly growing old-fashioned, and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, with the dazzling pizzicato movement, are also on this seventh program. The concert will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-NOV.26.

Symphony Orchestra Gives Fine Performance

Schoenberg's Sextet for Strings, arranged by the composer for string orchestra, and played for the first time at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, is music as original and as intense as any written by a living composer. Those whose chief impression of Schoenberg was derived from the Five Orchestral Pieces played at a Symphony concert in 1914 were doubtless astonished to find him writing in an idiom not startlingly different from that of other recent great composers.

The Sextet is an early work, dating from days before he set out to invent a completely new musical language on the theory that everything worth saying by the usual medium of musical expression has already been said by others.

The mood and the harmonies of "Verklaerte Nacht" often recall Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Wagner's "Tristan." It has a literary program, part of Richard Dehmel's poem, "Weib und die Welt," but music as strong as this sextet might better stand alone, since it speaks to the hearer more clearly than words can speak.

The applause which followed a remarkably moving performance, although it came from a minority of those present, was strong enough to make Mr Monteux have the players stand to share in it. No new piece has been better played here in recent years. A repetition of "Verklaerte Nacht" and the performance of other music by Schoenberg may now be hoped for.

When Mr Monteux has sufficient time to rehearse he can make music such as Tschaikowsky's rather empty and trivial Fourth Symphony sound like new. The present orchestra came very near equaling the best work of former years in this symphony yesterday, playing with a vehement eloquence which involved no sacrifice of precision in detail.

Brahm' "Tragic Overture," which is perhaps his best work, was, on the other hand, badly played. Brahms was thinking of Sophocles as he wrote, or at least in the spirit of Sophocles. Mr Monteux seemingly assumed that the music was the attempt of a dull pedant to catch the spirit of such tawdry romantic plays as Hugo's "Ruy Blas." The splendid ensemble playing shown in the Schoenberg and most of the Tschaikowsky was sadly lacking in the Brahms.

The other number was something most of us scarcely expected to hear at a Boston Symphony concert, Weber's not especially brilliant rondo "The Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated with German efficiency by Weingartner. If we must have popular music at the Symphony there are those who would prefer to have Mr Monteux follow Mr Ganz' recent example with the St Louis Symphony and put a fox trot on the program. A large part of the audience liked the Weber, but as many would like a fox trot.

Since the only chance America has of ever developing its own school of serious music is to make American popular music more subtle and more unified, there is much to be said in favor of playing really good "jazz" at the Symphony. But why play fourth-rate German dance tunes when Beethoven has written an "apotheosis of the dance" in his Seventh Symphony? If Weber's piece had one-tenth the beauty and power of Johann Strauss' "The Beautiful Blue Danube," the case would be different.

There are no Symphony concerts next week. D'Indy will conduct a varied program Dec 9 and 10.

GLOBE-NOV.26

[23]

SYMPHONY GIVES 7TH CONCERT

Orchestra Presents Remarkable Performance of "Radiant Night"

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Weber-Weingartner, Invitation to the Dance; Schoenberg, "Radiant Night" for orchestra of strings; Tschaikovsky, Symphony No. 4, F minor.

"Radiant Night" was first published as a sextet for strings. It was first played here at a Kneisel Quartet concert in 1915. Schoenberg afterwards added double basses and made some changes in the score. This revised edition, published four years ago, was performed yesterday for the first time in Boston.

Schoenberg's music illustrates singular lines of an erotic nature from Dehmel's "Woman and the World." A woman and a man meet in a grove by moonlight. She tells her story: How, longing for motherhood, she gave herself, "shuddering" to a man, without a formal introduction. In fact she did not know him. Now she is in love with her companion in the grove. He is of an accommodating nature and listens cheerfully to her confession. The child to be born will be "transfigured" and a great comfort to them both. "For she has inspired the brilliant glow within him and made him, too, a child." However strange this reasoning may seem to a stern logician, the two embrace wildly and the moon shines on.

This is a modest prapaphrase of the lines by a deep-thinking German. Schoenberg's music to be enjoyed does not need either the original verse or the paraphrase. Indeed, it would be better if the argument were not printed for the concertgoer. As it is, he may be too anxious to discover the emancipated woman and the good, easy-going, complaisant man in the music, and be oblivious to the strains of beauty and passion. For this music, on the whole prolix, has beautiful and passionate pages of compelling eloquence. Other pages are a sandy, dreary waste. The impression made would be still stronger, the music still more significant, if the composition were much shorter. The performance—and the difficulties presented are great—was one that glorified the string section of the orchestra. Whether the music itself gains by the revision and the enlargement is a question that admits of discussion. As the new version was performed under Mr. Monteux, the music was undoubtedly more imposing. And it may be said without exaggeration that never in the history of the orchestra was a performance by strings alone so remarkable.

The Tragic overture is among the greatest works of Brahms; by its structure, and by its depth of feeling. Here is tragedy that answers Aristotle's definition. There is no hysterical outburst; no shrieking in despair; no peevish or sullen woe. No obtruding suggestion of personal suffering. The German commentators have cudgeled their brains to find a hero in the music; Hamlet, Faust, this one, that one. They have labored in vain. The soul of tragedy speaks in the music.

If Tschaikovsky had a program in mind when he composed his fifth and sixth symphonies, he never published it to the world; but for the fourth he wrote an elaborate one. Does the music gain by it? To us the fourth symphony is interesting because it seems nearer the Russian spirit and life as portrayed by Dostoievsky than the later ones. Even the ornamentation, the arabesques, that in another's music would seem as so many excrescences, perhaps frivolous, are here in place. The neurotic, self-torturing Tschaikovsky was for years obsessed by the thought of death and the charnal-house. Fate was to him not a word to be associated only with the story of Oedipus or Pelop's line. The fourth symphony is a personal document, revealing the man as his letters revealed him. It is easy to pick flaws in it; to dismiss it as a Suite, not a symphony; to complain of this or that; but the music with its deep-rooted melancholy, its noisy attempt to forget the inevitable end, its drunken hilarity, its dark and sinister sadness, is not easily to be put aside, not easily to be forgotten.

Weingartner's amusing arrangement of Weber's piano piece, with its diabolical cleverness in juxtaposition of themes, its discreet yet brilliant orchestration, was joyfully received by the audience.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. M. Vincent d'Indy will conduct the concerts of Dec. 9 and 10. The program will be as follows: Monteverdi, overture to "Orfeo" (1607); Lalande, Chaconne (1712); Bach, Concerto in D major for piano (Bruce T. Simonds, pianist); Mozart, Serenata Notturna in D major for two string orchestras, one with kettle drums; Le Flem, Pour les Morts; Roussel, "Les Dieux a l'ombre des Cavernes" from "Evocations"; d'Indy, Poeme des Rivages (four movements). The pieces by Monteverdi, Lalande, Le Flem, Roussel and d'Indy will be played for the first time in Boston.

HERALD

A Smiling Devil in His Eye

John Powell, Pianist

Returning to the Symphony Orchestra Next Monday

falteringly makes her confession to him; his generous forgiveness and warm love irradiate her, and the two walk on, 'transfigured' into the 'transfigured' night.

"The Sextet begins with a pianissimo reiterated pedal D, which suggests the trudging footsteps of the couple. A descending figure, weary and languid in character, is added and developed at some length; an atmosphere of suppressed discouragement is definitely established. The pace quickens; a new figure of more agitated character enters, and in turn is developed for a while, elaborating and complementing the first. B-flat minor: a light, shimmering tremulo and soft melodic figures in a very high register prepare the way for something ominous and unknown. Lamenting figures adroitly insinuate themselves into the development of the foregoing material. There is much moduation and several changes of rhythm; eventually a broad climax in E major ends the first portion of the woman's speech. A theme of transcendant beauty, E major, 9-8 rhythm, 'peaceful and serene, seems to portray the woman's dream that in motherhood she might attain happiness and self-fulfilment. A harsh chord and a growling tremulo in the bass ends this dream, and a long section follows in which agitation and despair reach a passionate and powerful climax; then there is pleading theme of short duration, and a heavy-hearted resumption of the trudging march. Silence.

"The man's voice, as typified by the first 'cello, speaks; the key is D major, the atmosphere that of reassurance. The first lamenting motive appears tenderly and comfortingly 'transfigured' in the violins and violas. F-sharp major: a new accompaniment figure is established and a love-duet of ethereal beauty begins. Some of the old motives are reassuringly 'transfigured' in turn. There is a flash of warm enthusiasm, D-flat major, 6-8. The old doubts are remembered, but not heeded. A new broad theme leads to a climax and a return to D major. Very softly, over a shimmering accompaniment, variants of sundry themes associated with the man and the woman unite in the final love-duet. The new broad theme and an echo of the enthusiastic motive return in D major, which is also the key of the ineffably rich and sweet pianissimo close. In determining his form, Schönberg has been strategic in the choice of a poem whose text divides itself naturally into easily recognizable units of mood; for each of these the music presents a similar unit, of proportionate duration and emphasis, except that the final union of the lovers leads Schönberg into taking the desirable liberty of greatly lengthening the love-duet.

"Since the moods of the poem logically proceed out of one another, it naturally follows that the moods of the music do likewise; since the poem falls naturally into the broad divisions of a prologue, two contrasting presentations of personal points of view, and a summary, it naturally follows that the music proceeds according to the aesthetcally satisfactory cyclic formula of an introduction, two contrasting 'movements' unified each in itself, and an apotheosis. Of conventional 'form,' with its stereotyped academic division into exposition, development, and recapitulation there is not a jot; of genuine unity, balance and mass, of real thematic variation and treatment and within these of a true creative and re-creative process of persistent and constant exposition, development and recapitulation, there is so much, and all is so well done, that the composition rightfully should be recognized as a masterpiece of form.

"The harmonies of this fairly early work of Schönberg are not at all the revo tionary dissonances" which in his la works have so frequently proved the selves caviar to the general. The fam chords containing eight, nine, ten or el separate constituents, resolving into oth of like character, are here not to be fou the richest chromatic shadings of the g tler triads, seventh and ninth chords, h suffice. The style is not exactly that Haydn, but at least it does not go beyond 'Tristan,' to whose family it belongs. On the other hand it does not seem imitative of its parent style, or of its cousin, Debussy.

"What might be expected pleasantly to disappoint the pessimist, except that the pessimist will alaways stick to his theories against the evidence of his senses, the abundance in this work of rich and beautiful melody. The procedure is sometimes that of devoting a full-length complete melody to one or two instruments, sometimes that of passing melodic phrases from one instrument to another. The quality of the melodic material is always warmly emotional, and as the mood clarifies and intensifies toward the close, there is an imperceptibly gradual broadening of phrase, combined with an increase of the interweaving of counter-melodic voices, to which a New York reviewer has aptly applied the title-word, 'transfigured.'"

So much for exposition. For impression, the reviewer for the Transcript, J. N. B., wrote of "Verklärte Nacht" after the performance by "The Kneisels" in 1917: "The tone-poem is decisive and eloquent proof to any who may doubt, of a thorough, inspired, highly skilled, broadly proportioning, composer, powerfully independent in the seizure and pursuit of his own ideas, but at the same time a well-grounded, sober, authoritative, and instinctive evolutionary pioneer, and no mere eccentric iconoclast. Schönberg's later work may be momentarily incomprehensible, it may be intellectually intricate and experimentally hazardous. But the composer of such music as 'Verklärte Nacht' is no impostor or idler, and never could be; there must be intuitive and guiding force behind his experimentalism, and those who have delved as deeply as he into the well of art could never content themselves with skimming the surface afterwards.

"In the first place, Schönberg found a sensible and suitable medium in the combination of six stringed instruments wheren to compromise the largeness, complexity and orchestral and dramatic instincts of the romanticists with the clearer and purer medium of chamber music, once so nearly eclipsed by the passion for musical structures of Valhalla proportions. The string sextet assembled under Schönberg's skilful manipulation, body, volume ume and basic power, without the loss tonal unity and purity, or the individual intimate beauties of chamber music, which combinations for wood-wind choirs by no means attain. To hear the music is to realize at once that this is no chance or even experimental combination. As for the style, it is largely conventional, both harmonically and melodically and romantically, as an early work naturally must be. The bold incursions into individual speech are the natural growth and offshoot of convention, facilitated by a heightened sense and proficiency in the simultaneous manipulation of voices, and a heightened sense of effect, integrity, dramatic surge and dramatic contrast, which need not cling blindly or unimaginatively to precedent and rules of practicability.

"Formally the Sextet is freest of all, rhapsodic and fantasia-like, but with no poverty of ideas, and with propulsive and unifying motive behind its procedure. The use of the tremolo is no mere filling-in, but takes its individual trend in supplying immediate dramatic requirements, just as the melody fills its own ends, and the contrapuntal usage is subjected entirely to purposes of expression. It is an impassioned love song, generally resembling many previous ones in character, working up to the frenzies of 'Tristan' without being a slave to them. The very times when the composer begins to depart from the approved and tried ways are those moments when he is so excited by the heat of his work as to forget calculation and analysis, and let his musical intuitions ead him. This above everything speaks n favor of his abrupt departures, although ater indications argue cerebral tendencies. The elevated and noble climax, and the inal lapse into quiet and beautiful poetry s the crowning confirmation of love, music that has been excelled by few, and chamber music which, in its kind, has been equalled by none."

Here in Boston

The first of the "special concerts" of the Symphony Orchestra, designed for a public unable or unwilling to seek the regular series, will take place in Symphony Hall on Monday evening next. Thereafter the orchestra will visit New Haven, Brooklyn and New York. It will be heard again at home on Friday afternoon, Dec. 9 and Saturday evening, Dec. 10, when Mr. d'Indy will lead it as "guest conductor." He will fill the first half of a long programme with ancient pieces: the Overture to the earliest of operas, Monteverde's "Orpheus"; Lalande's Chaconne, music for the suppers of Louis XIV., King of France; a Concerto of Bach, in D major, for Piano and Orchestra and a Serenade of Mozart for Two String Orchestras with Drums. In Bach's Concerto, Mr. Bruce Simonds, an instructor in music at Yale and recently a favorite pupil of Mr. d'Indy, will play the piano-part. In the second division of the programme stand a Piece for Orchestra, "To the Dead," written by another of the conductor-composer's pupils, Monsieur Le Flem; a fragment, "The Gods in the Shadows of the Caverns" from Roussel's "Evocations," little known music in America; and Mr. d'Indy's own "Poème des Rivages"—sea-pictures suggested by a recent journey along the coasts of Italy.

For the two concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York next week, Mr. Monteux has set programmes not drawn altogether from pieces recently heard in Boston. Thus, one list, for Thursday evening, Dec. 1, traverses Sibelius's Second Symphony; Weingartner's arrangement for orchestra of Weber's Invitation to the Dance"; Schönberg's Sextet for Strings, "Transfiguring Night"; Beethoven's third "Leonora" Overture. The other programme, for Saturday afternoon, Dec. 3, comprises: Franck's Symphony; Brahms's "Tragic Overture"; three short tone-pictures by Liadov; and the fragments of Ravel's Ballet, "Dahpns and Chloë," heard in Boston last week.

MUSIC

Boston Music

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's seventh program, given on November 25, was as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Weber-Weingartner, Invitation to the Dance; Schönberg, sextet for strings, "Radiant Night"; Tschaikowsky, fourth symphony in F minor.

This program, ranging from the austerities of Brahms, through the complexities of Schönberg and the emotionalism of Tschaikowsky to the graceful, pleasing and obvious Weber must have offered at least one number to suit the taste of every one in yesterday's audience. Few programs could be arranged which would require more diversity of style, quicker sensitiveness, a wider range of musical understanding than this one, and yet throughout the afternoon, Mr. Monteux gave evidence of a complete comprehension of the works in hand and succeeded in bringing out fully and sympathetically the characteristic points of each composition. He passed from the severe and restrained Brahms to the light and graceful "Invitation to the Dance" and thence to the involved sextet by Schönberg without perceptible effort. It was a remarkable feat of virtuosity, done so quietly and unostentatiously that few realized how remarkable it really was.

Of course the work of outstanding interest was Schönberg's sextet, "Radiant Night." The name of Schönberg has to many minds been synonymous with that of dissonance. This sextet belongs to an earlier period, one evidently in which the composer had not yet learned to conceal his poverty of invention, and the triteness of his musical utterances in a veil of polyphonic cacophony. There are distinct melodies in this sextet, albeit of a somewhat commonplace order. There is little that startles the ear harmonically, and the development is somewhat diffuse, yet there are impressive moments, as for example the chords which immediately precede the theme announced by the cellos (we believe it is intended to personify the consoling voice of the man in Dehmel's poem, a portion of which inspired this work.) The sextet as a whole is monotonous and would have been tiresome but for the playing of the orchestra. A sextet of solo players could scarcely have played with more freedom and elasticity or more perfect ensemble.

Tschaikowsky's symphony was played with the necessary appreciation of its dramatic qualities. The second and third movements, if musically somewhat slight, never fail of their effect. Nowadays it is sometimes difficult to take all of Tschaikowsky's rant and bombast seriously yet he often produces his thrill in spite of our better judgment.

On November 23, Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital, assisted by Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, and Arthur Fiedler, accompanist. With Mr. Gebhard he played Beethoven's sonata in A major and Huré's in F sharp. He also played solo pieces. Huré's sonata is an imaginative, if somewhat over developed composition and contains many pages of real inspiration. The two instruments are treated with evident understanding of their capabilities, both separately and together. Mr. Bedetti's qualities as a soloist and as a musician are already well known. It is sufficient to say that they were once again appreciated by a large and musically representative audience.

Symphony Plays Schoenberg Gem

Schoenberg's "Radiant Night," a tone picture of lovers astray in the moonlight, was heard at a Symphony concert yesterday for the first time. Originally a bit of chamber music, it has been arranged for string orchestra, with impressive results. This post-Wagnerian masterpiece was stirringly performed. So was Weingartner's brilliant orchestral arrangement of Weber's charming "Invitation to the Dance." There was a performance worthy at last of the Ballet Russe!

Brahms' "Tragic Overture," rapidly growing old-fashioned, and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, with the dazzling pizzicato movement, are also on this seventh program. The concert will be repeated tonight.

Symphony Orchestra Gives Fine Performance

Schoenberg's Sextet for Strings, arranged by the composer for string orchestra, and played for the first time at the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, is music as original and as intense as any written by a living composer. Those whose chief impression of Schoenberg was derived from the Five Orchestral Pieces played at a Symphony concert in 1914 were doubtless astonished to find him writing in an idiom not startlingly different from that of other recent great composers.

The Sextet is an early work, dating from days before he set out to invent a completely new musical language on the theory that everything worth saying by the usual medium of musical expression has already been said by others.

The mood and the harmonies of "Verklaerte Nacht" often recall Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Wagner's "Tristan." It has a literary program, part of Richard Dehmel's poem, "Weib und die Welt," but music as strong as this sextet might better stand alone, since it speaks to the hearer more clearly than words can speak.

The applause which followed a remarkably moving performance, although it came from a minority of those present, was strong enough to make Mr Monteux have the players stand to share in it. No new piece has been better played here in recent years. A repetition of "Verklaerte Nacht" and the performance of other music by Schoenberg may now be hoped for.

When Mr Monteux has sufficient time to rehearse he can make music such as Tschaikowsky's rather empty and trivial Fourth Symphony sound like new. The present orchestra came very near equaling the best work of former years in this symphony yesterday, playing with a vehement eloquence which involved no sacrifice of precision in detail.

Brahm' "Tragic Overture," which is perhaps his best work, was, on the other hand, badly played. Brahms was thinking of Sophocles as he wrote, or at least in the spirit of Sophocles. Mr Monteux seemingly assumed that the music was the attempt of a dull pedant to catch the spirit of such tawdry romantic plays as Hugo's "Ruy Blas." The splendid ensemble playing shown in the Schoenberg and most of the Tschaikowsky was sadly lacking in the Brahms.

The other number was something most of us scarcely expected to hear at a Boston Symphony concert, Weber's not especially brilliant rondo "The Invitation to the Dance," orchestrated with German efficiency by Weingartner. If we must have popular music at the Symphony there are those who would prefer to have Mr Monteux follow Mr Ganz' recent example with the St Louis Symphony and put a fox trot on the program. A large part of the audience liked the Weber, but as many would like a fox trot.

Since the only chance America has of ever developing its own school of serious music is to make American popular music more subtle and more unified, there is much to be said in favor of playing really good "jazz" at the Symphony. But why play fourth-rate German dance tunes when Beethoven has written an "apotheosis of the dance" in his Seventh Symphony? If Weber's piece had one-tenth the beauty and power of Johann Strauss' "The Beautiful Blue Danube," the case would be different.

There are no Symphony concerts next week. D'Indy will conduct a varied program Dec 9 and 10.

GLOBE-NOV. 26

[illegible]

SYMPHONY GIVES 7TH CONCERT

Orchestra Presents Remarkable Performance of "Radiant Night"

PROGRAM WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Weber-Weingartner, Invitation to the Dance; Schoenberg, "Radiant Night" for orchestra of strings; Tschaikovsky, Symphony No. 4, F minor.

"Radiant Night" was first published as a sextet for strings. It was first played here at a Kneisel Quartet concert in 1915. Schoenberg afterwards added double basses and made some changes in the score. This revised edition, published four years ago, was performed yesterday for the first time in Boston.

Schoenberg's music illustrates singular lines of an erotic nature from Dehmel's "Woman and the World." A woman and a man meet in a grove by moonlight. She tells her story: How longing for motherhood, she gave herself, "shuddering" to a man, without a formal introduction. In fact she did not know him. Now she is in love with her companion in the grove. He is of an accommodating nature and listens cheerfully to her confession. The child to be born will be "transfigured" and a great comfort to them both. "For she has inspired the brilliant glow within him and made him, too, a child." However strarge this reasoning may seem to a stern logician, the two embrace wildly and the moon shines on.

This is a modest prapaphrase of the lines by a deep-thinking German. Schoenberg's music to be enjoyed does not need either the original verse or the paraphrase. Indeed, it would be better if the argument were not printed for the concertgoer. As it is, he may be too anxious to discover the emancipated woman and the good, easy-going, complaisant man in the music, and be oblivious to the strains of beauty and passion. For this music, on the whole prolix, has beautiful and passionate pages of compelling eloquence. Other pages are a sandy, dreary waste. The impression made would be still stronger, the music still more significant, if the composition were much shorter. The performance—and the difficulties presented are great—was one that glorified the string section of the orchestra. Whether the music itself gains by the revision and the enlargement is a question that admits of discussion. As the new version was performed under Mr. Monteux, the music was undoubtedly more imposing. And it may be said without exaggeration that never in the history of the orchestra was a performance by strings alone so remarkable.

The Tragic overture is among the greatest works of Brahms: by its structure, and by its depth of feeling. Here is tragedy that answers Aristotle's definition. There is no hysterical outburst; no shrieking in despair: no peevish or sullen woe. No obtruding suggestion of personal suffering. The German commentators have cudgeled their brains to find a hero in the music: Hamlet, Faust, this one, that one. They have labored in vain. The soul of tragedy speaks in the music.

If Tschaikovsky had a program in mind when he composed his fifth and sixth symphonies, he never published it to the world; but for the fourth he wrote an elaborate one. [illegible] music gain by it? To us the fourth symphony is interesting because it [illegible] nearer the Russian spirit and life as portrayed by Dostoievsky than the [illegible] ones. Even the ornamentation, [illegible] would, [illegible] besques, that in another's [illegible] perhaps seem as so many excrescences, [illegible] The frivolous, are here in [illegible] Tschaikovsky, neurotic, self-torturing, [illegible] thought was for years obsessed by [illegible] Fate, of death and the charnel-h[illegible] was to him not a word [illegible] associated only with the story of [illegible] Pelop's line. The fourth symphony is a personal document, revealing the man, as his letters revealed him. It is easy to pick flaws in it; to dis[illegible] as a suite, not a symphony; to [illegible] of this or that; but the music with its deep-rooted melancholy, its noisy attempt to forget the inevitable end, its drunken hilarity its dark and sinister sadness, is not easily to be [illegible] aside, not easily to be forgotten.

Weingartner's amusing arrangement of Weber's piano piece, with its diabolical cleverness in juxtaposition of themes, its discreet yet brilliant orchestration, was joyfully received by the audience.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. M. Vincent d'Indy will conduct the concerts of Dec. 9 and 10. The program will be as follows: Monteverdi, overture to "Orfeo" (1607); Lalande, Chaconne (1712); Bach, Concerto in D major for piano (Bruce T. Simonds, pianist); Mozart, Serenata Notturna in D major for two string orchestras, one with kettle drums; Le Flem, Pour les Morts; Roussel, "Les Dieux a l'ombre des Cavernes" from "Evocations"; d'Indy, Poeme des Rivages (four movements). The pieces by Monteverdi, Lalande, Le Flem, Roussel and d'Indy will be played for the first time in Boston.

HERAL

TIGHT BINDING

E PROGRAM
ENDERED BY SYMPHONY

onberg's "Radiant Night" layed for First Time by Boston Orchestra

e seventh of the season's regular erts by Boston Symphony Or-tra in Symphony Hall was thor-
ly enjoyable. The program fol-
: "Tragic Overture, Op. 81," ams; "Invitation to the Dance"
nged for orchestra by Felix
ngartner), Weber; "Verklarte ht" (Radiant Night), sextet Opus
arranged for string orchestra,
nberg; "Symphony No. 4 in F or, Op. 36," Tschaikowsky.
e novelty was Schonberg's "Rat Night," a very difficult and tiful number. It was played ad-
bly, especially the exquisite end-Salvos of applause greeted the icians at the conclusion. Mr.
teux was kept bowing a long
.

was the first time Schonberg's
ly composition has been played hese concerts. Without doubt it grace another program ere long.
Kneisel Quartet gave the first
ormance in Boston of this num-
at Steinert Hall, March 16, 1915.
quartet was assisted by Samuel
dner, viola, and Hyman Eisen-
, 'cello, at the first performance.
theme on which it is written
ld make a good "thriller" for the ies or a "best seller." The story probably not without its counterin real life. Women have been wn to express similar sentiments
those uttered by the woman who nted a child.

he playing of Mr. Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's compo-
on elicited much applause, as also
the third movement of Tschaikow-
's symphony, with its capricious besques. The story of the comition of this symphony is well
own. It was dedicated to Nadejda aretovna von Meck, regarded by composer as his "best friend."
story of their intimate correndence, although they never met, ld make good material for a elist. The manner in which the inent Russian wrote his Fourth
mphony, and dedicated it to her af-she ceased to write him, adds to human interest. It is said that he not recover from her eventual inference. The symphony was tten after the break in their detful friendship.

NDY TO CONDUCT

ncent d'Indy will conduct the next gramme to be given by the Boston
phony Orchestra in Symphony
on Friday afternoon and Saturevening, December 9 and 10. The part of the programme will be upied by the overture to Montede's opera, "Orfeo," Lalande's Chane and Bach's piano concerto in major. There will also be played art's Nocturnal Serenade in D mafor two string orchestras with pani.

TRA SYMPHONY
NCERTS

splendid programme will inaugu-
the first of the new series of five certs which will be given next nday evening in Symphony Hall at
by the full Boston Symphony Orstra, under its conductor, Pierre nteux. A fitting symphony to open series is the masterpiece of Cesar nck, the Belgian composer.
Beethoven will be represented by the erture and Fifth Ballet (an adagio)
m his Ballet, "The Creatures of metheus." The concert will close h Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on nish Themes." The soloist will be n Powell.

[illegible]-NOV. [illegible]

YMPHONY DISPLAYS
SCHONBERG

omantic "Radiant Night" for Strings
in New Dress

BY OLIN DOWNES

e feature of the seventh pro-
mme of the Boston Symphony
hestra, Pierre Monteux, con-
ctor, played yesterday afternoon
Symphony Hall, was the first perrmance here of Schonberg's sextet,
erklarte Nacht" ("Radiant Night")
arranged by the composer for
ing orchestra.

This work was first performed in Boston in its original shape as a string sextet at a concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Steinert Hall in 1915. The composer has since scored the composition for full string orchestra, and has made some changes in the music.

NUMBERLESS EFFECT

The change from six strings to approximately 60 is well justified by the results, for this is less a string sextet, than a symphonic poem, and furthermore, Schonberg in using many stringed instruments has provided or discovered an amazing number of effects which often suggest those of a full orchestra.

The poetic basis of the music is the text of Richard Dehmel: "Two mortals walk through a cold, barren grove. The moon sails over the tall oaks, which send their scowny branches up through the onclouded moonlight. A woman speaks she confesses, to her companion, whom she loves, a mortal sin. A man speaks. Let her not burden her soul with guilt. See, the moon's sheen enwraps the universe. Together they are driving over chill waters, but a flame from each warms the other. They sink into each others arms. Their breaths meet in kisses in the air. Two mortals wander through the wondrous moonlight."

Beautiful and Romantic

For the Schonberg of today this music is perhaps old-fashioned, even though he has touched up the outpouring of an earlier period. To us who listened yesterday it is extremely beautiful and romantic music. It mirrors the sheen of the moon. The musical dialogue is dramatic, impassioned. True, it is long drawn out. The composer has so many ideas, so many masterly transformations of his musical material to offer that there is over-richness and a tendency to be prolix. But the audience listened fascinated by the simplicity and eloquence of his speech, by its rich harmonic color, its emotional accent, its clear and cohesive succession of mood-pictures.

The remainder of the programme consisted of Brahms tragic overture, Weingartners version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. At times, in the music of Brahms, there is noble, Greeklike mood, which few composers have ever attained. The lack of sensuousness is most appropriate, and the classic clearness of style is the only one, perhaps, wholly suitable for such an expression. At other times there is conventional precedure, a regularity of sequence and repetition of theme, which weaken greatly the effect of really grand thoughts. Weingartner's treatment to Weber's piece, with all its gratuitous counterpoint and the equally gratuitious and sometimes cheap effects of instrumentation is for us atrocious and very inferior to Berlioz' orchestration of the same music. Poor Weber! He once wrote a simple and delightful piano piece, "Invitation to the Dance."

POST-NOV. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AFTERNOON OF CONTRASTS AN SCHOENBERG

Chaikovsky Beside Brahms, Weber, Weingartner, and Not to the Russian's Advantage—His Music Thin and Faded, with a "Tragic Overture" and a Brilliant Virtuoso-Piece for Neighbors — "Transfiguring Night" in Beauty, Passion and Illusion

ONCE upon a time a composer wrote a tone-poem—as many do. For performance he proffered it to a conductor, known to have a spice of malice within him. The music pleased the conductor; he agreed to play it in the course of a season; he honestly sought to find a place for it in his programmes from which the merit of the piece would shine. The composer, however, lacked patience, discretion. He would have his tone-poem played forthwith. With insistence he haunted the conductor's door-step. Then malice came uppermost as it will in short tempers. "At the earliest opportunity," the conductor indeed kept his promise, but before the new tone-poem, in the order of the programme, stood a masterpiece of Richard Strauss; after it ensued a living and pervading classic. And the new piece was as though it had never been.

There is no visible malice in Mr. Monteux's temperament. Rather is he a forbearing man of exemplary patience. Yet back to memory came this true tale of conductor and composer when the programme for the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon began with Brahms's "Tragic Overture," proceeded with Weingartner's orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and ended with Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony—the Symphony with the Scherzo of the picked strings. French conductors, though they be as catholic of spirit as Mr. Monteux, do not usually warm to the Russian's music. In these days, and regardless of nationality, most conductors of his quality and ambition look askance upon Chaikovsky and nearly all his works. They are "old hat," as the Parisian vernacular has it—very "old hat." But audiences in America and in England, especially elderly audiences, will have them—even unto the Pathetic Symphony and this very Fourth. One or another of the Russian's Fantasias seem less worn by time, less changed by fashion. One or another of his Suites and minor pieces still amuses. Yet the public will have the symphonies. What is a dutiful conductor to do? Set out occasionally on his programmes of course—but also exercise due care as to what pieces companion it.

With or without malice, Mr. Monteux yesterday hardly took such pains. In the innocent [illegible], not a few of us believed that Chaikovsky wrote colorfully for orchestral voices. Keen seemed his rhythms, sharp his modulations, vivid and various his play with harmonies and timbres. Most of us are more sophisticated now. Beside his fellow-Russian Rimsky-Korsokov, we count him poor and faded in these display-ful but useful qualities. Beside a Ravel, for instance from the younger generation, he seems no more than tepid. Still worse does he fare on these scores when no more than half an hour away is Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's dance-poem (as we should say nowadays) inexuberant and exhaustless feat of orchestral virtuosity. Weingartner keeps the music in flashing keys; he lavishes upon it every brilliance that instrumental voices may lend as in those glinting wood-winds ever sparkling about the melody; he twines and intertwines motivs, concentrating, expanding; he sets in little ornaments of his own inventing. New harmonies color Weber's sentiment; new modulations make his dance-rhythms more sensuous. At the transcriber's will the pace slows or quickens and every change tells upon stirred ears.

The whole arrangement is marvel of orchestral fancy, orchestral ingenuity, orchestral "effect," done as it seems in a heat of re-creation and doubtless, like most such things, overdone. But how poor, thin, faded, labored, sterile seem the ways of Chaikovsky in these things beside such fertility, vigor and glow! The listener hears Weingartner and Weber with exhilaration, even elation. Before the Russian's Fourth Symphony from the vociferous proclamations of fate, through waltz and canzonetta, "picked" Scherzo and finale of the song of the birch-tree (that will never grow and never wither) too many of us only hear—and are patient.

Over pages of the programme-book ran letters of Chaikovsky, reciting the moods, the images, the passionate and introspective play of feeling, he would body forth in this Fourth Symphony. They were very real to him; beyond a doubt they wrenched and tortured him, they filled his imagination when he set to music to paper; let the cynics say that then and there he caressed them. Yet how little of all these things does the Fourth Symphony bear today even when the listener strains every sympathy of comprehension and response. According to Chaikovsky, sleep-chasings, flitting fantasms of dream race through the Scherzo of the picked strings. Yet to many an ear of 1921, it seems but exacting exercise for an orchestral choir and pleasing pastime for a fascinated audience. Not too impressively may all-compelling fate thunder in an introduction and "despondency and despair" stalk up and down when a few pages onward come waltz-measures endearing Chaikovsky to any ballet-master. The "canzona" has withered into a melancholy song, far below the consuming intensities of the slow-movement of the Fifth Symphony or the ghostly syncopations of the Sixth. A dash of military music across the Scherzo glorifies by comparison the earlier waltz-rhythms. Only the native wildness of the Finale—and Mr. Monteux and the orchestra made the most of it—persists, monotonously. "I speak the truth," wrote Chaikovsky to Tanéev, about the Fourth Symphony, "if somewhat grandiloquently." There is not a doubt thereof; but the lapsing years gnaw hard at grandiloquence; while grandiloquence is one of the moods and manners of music with which our time is instinctively and unsparingly at odds.

A tragic music, as he himself felt, made and heard it, Chaikovsky surely believed he had written in this symphony in F minor. An hour before, at the beginning of the concert, the audience had heard another tragic music—the Overture, so named, of Brahms. About it he wrote no explanatory letters; the most penetrating commentators have been unable to set to it any plausible gloss—and on that score the pedants are hard to outdo. Conductor and orchestra wrung every drop out of Chaikovsky to the limit of Mr. Monteux's imagination and sense of effect; whereas in Brahms's piece they were no more than earnestly, straightforwardly and somewhat bluntly eloquent. Yet out of the music rose, as always, the sense of fate that mortal spirit may not conquer, the image of heroic striving and endurance; the vision illuminating, the pity comforting; the end as in exalted submission.

The motivs whence the overture unfolds; the grave progress in which they move; the sombre modulations of the musical speech; the colors, dusky or pale, upon it; the whole inevitable design, the whole full-measured accomplishment are at one—the voice of tragic poetry as it were in tonal epitome. A loftier music, deeper of thought, emotion, imagery and impression, few composers have written. Not even in his First Symphony has Brahms conceived and wrought so complete a masterpiece. As yet tragic destiny—destiny endured, illuminated, pitied—has hardly found comparable expression in music. Here spoke tragedy in almost epic measures. Over the way, Chaikovsky, in comparison, whined and simpered; wrote in dance-rhythms, picked the strings and rioted around a birch-tree.

Apart from these pieces, among them rather than of them, stood Schönberg's Sextet, "Transfiguring Night," played for the first time in Boston as music for full string choir in a spacious hall rather than the six instruments in chamber-concert, for which the composer originally destined it. He himself so transformed it and at his door must be laid the inevitable loss of intimate and piercing sensation. Of old in Steinert Hall from "The Kneisels," the listener heard the piece almost as though he caught the speech and followed the steps of the tortured and illuminated pair in Dehmel's verse and Schönberg's tones. Yesterday, he heard the piece magnified in sound but in illusion also thinned. Of old, he took little thought of the playing musicians, so engrossing was the piece. Yesterday he marvelled at the ability, the sensibility, the mingling of skill and imagination with which conductor and choir accomplished both all that Schönberg set to music-paper, and not a little that black and white could only suggest.

With reason the poet's verse enkindled the composer's tones. The [illegible]tained as it is, asks for music in the two voices, contrasted, blended and together transfigured; in the eerie atmosphere, the preoccupation with spiritual sensations. Out of it Schönberg has distilled into his tones the gnawing woe and the longing lament of the woman; the deep and comforting affection of the man; the final spiritualizing of their passion. Around is the background of still and ghostly wood, of black and silvered water, of moonlit and tremulous air. Across it sounds their slow foot-fall. Illusively at the beginning Schönberg's music suggests personages and background, air and light. Soon he and it are absorbed in the spiritual communings of the pair, but by recurring implication in most adroit and imaginative strokes of harmony and timbres, the background never quite vanishes.

The motives that embody the moods, the impulses, the reactions and the passion of the lovers are more vivid and vital than the words that originally embodied them. These motives flower into melody of rich sensuous beauty and of poignant power. The play of them discloses and characterizes, advances and cumulates, penetrates the mind and searches the heart like music-drama itself. The end is of the transfigured beauty and the spiritualizing power that only music may compass. As painter, poet and dramatist in tones, Schönberg accomplishes these things through mastery of cyclic form, clear-eyed and unwavering faculty of design, wealth and aptitude of melodic invention and fruition, imagination and skill with every necessary means of music. Over them, out of them plays a responsive and transmitting passion as intense as it is controlled. The outcome, the inevitable outcome, is high moments of beauty and of power. Whatever Schönberg may have now become, he wrote this Sextet at the fullest as a master, even a genius, of music.

H. T. PARKER

The Symphony Orchestra in New Venture —Chaliapin Comes — Mr. de Gogorza, Familiar, and Mme. Ney, Novel—The London String Quartet at Cambridge—Lesser Recitals

AT eight-fifteen, instead of the usual eight, next Monday evening in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting, will begin the first of its new series of "special concerts." In general they are designed for those who are unable or unwilling to attend the regular subscription concerts of Friday afternoons or Saturday evenings. In particular, they are intended for the younger generation with an increasing liking for symphonic music, but with none too large means or frequent opportunity to gratify it. Various organizations, like the Women's Educational Union and the Young Women's Christian Association, have joined with the management of the orchestra to promote the concerts. The response of the desired public has pleased all concerned. It will deserve the conductor, the orchestra and a programme no whit below the standards of either. The pieces are: Franck's Symphony; the Overture and a Dance (with many solo-passages) from Beethoven's Ballet, "Prometheus"; Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Folk-Tunes for Piano and Orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakov's warmly colored and keenly rhythmed "Spanish Caprice." In the Fantasia, John Powell, with a Lisztian temperament of his own, will play the piano-part.

TRANS. NOV. 26.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

Tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux will give the first of its new series of five extra concerts. A memorable program will inaugurate the series, no numbers of which occur in the other symphony concerts in Boston. The principal work will be the great symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck. The soloist will be John Powell, the talented young American pianist who, in concerts of his own and appearances with orchestras in this country and in Europe, has established for himself an enviable reputation. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's Fantasy on Hungarian folk tunes. The music of Russia will be represented on this programme by Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes, noted for its gorgeous colorings and pictorial magnificence. A chance to hear the various virtuosos of the orchestra will be afforded by the numbers from Beethoven's ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus," in which the solo parts will be taken by Mr. Bedetti, 'cello; Mr. Laurent, flute; Mr. Sand, clarinet; Mr. Laus, bassoon, and Mr. Holy, harp.

HERALD-NOV. 27.

D'INDY AS CONDUCTOR

The next pair of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 9 and 10, following the second regular trip to New York which will occupy the coming week. This pair of concerts will be notable in that Vincent d'Indy, the great musician of France, now on his way to America, will appear as guest conductor.

M. d'Indy will devote the first half of the program to the music of the early masters before the time of Beethoven, and the latter portion to his own music, together with music by his two foremost pupils in his famous Schola Cantorum at Paris, Paul Le Flem and Albert Roussel.

He will begin with the overture, including Toccata and Ritornello, to the opera "Orfeo" by Monteverde, the pioneer of opera in Italy, who wrote this, his masterpiece, in 1607. This opera has been revived in its entirety by M. d'Indy in Paris. The second number will be a Chaconne, written by Lalande to be played at the royal table while Louis XIV dined. Bach will be represented by his piano concerto in D major, B. & H. No. 12, in which the piano part will be taken by Bruce T. Simonds, who has studied composition with d'Indy in the Schola Cantorum. Mr. Simonds is now connected with the School of Music at Yale University. Another number of interest will be Mozart's nocturnal serenade in D major for two string orchestras, one with kettle drums. Le Flem's "To the Dead" has never been performed, and is being brought to America by M. d'Indy for this purpose. Rusell will be represented by "Les Dieux a l'ombre des Cavernes" from "Evocations," opus 15. The concert will end with d'Indy's new work, conducted by the composer from manuscript score. This work, entitled "Poeme des Rivages," is as yet unperformed, and contains the following movements: Calm and Light, The Joy of the Blue Depths, Green Horizons; The Mystery of the Ocean.

HERALD-NOV. 27.

[24]

VES
ERT

Reance
t"

E IGHT

the Boston
ontaux con-
y afternoon.
Brahms,
Weingartner,
Schoenberg,
chestra of phony No. 4, published was first uartet con-afterwards made some evised edi-

, was per-st time in tes singufrom Dehorld." A grove by tory: How,

gave her-without she did love with
. He is of and listens
. The child
ured" and a
"For she within ild." How-may seem embrace on.
ase of the German.
njoyed does verse or the
ld be better printed for
, he may be emancipated
y-going, com-usic, and be f beauty and on the whole nd passionate quence. Other y waste. The still stronger,
ificant, if the shorter. The fficulties pre-that glorified
he orchestra.
gains by the nt is a quession. As the
d under Mr.
undoubtedly nay be said never in the
was a ter-so remark-

among the
by its struc-
eling. Here
stotle's defi-
al outburst;
peevish or suggestion he German geled their
the music;
t one. They soul of trag-

program in is fifth and published it fourth he es the music
th symphony seems nearer as portrayed
later ones,
, the ara-
music would nces, perhaps place. The Tschaikovsky
y the thought
-house. Fate to be assoof Oedipus or symphony is ling the man.
n. It is easy smiss it as a o complain of usic with its its noisy at-table end, its and sinister
be put aside.
n.
arrangement with its dia-taposition of illiant orcheseived by the

eated tonight.
ay next week.
nduct the con-
The program
verdi, overture
nde, Chaconne n D major for nds, pianist);
rna in D ma-
stras, one with Pour les Morts;
ombre des Cavtions"; d'Indy, ur movements).
rdi, Lalande, Le
y will be played oston.

Nov. 26

NE PROGRAM ENDERED BY SYMPHONY

onberg's "Radiant Night" layed for First Time by Boston Orchestra

e seventh of the season's regular rts by Boston Symphony Or-tra in Symphony Hall was thor-
ly enjoyable. The program fol-
: "Tragic Overture, Op. 81," ms; "Invitation to the Dance"
nged for orchestra by Felix
gartner), Weber; "Verklarte
t" (Radiant Night), sextet Opus
arranged for string orchestra,
nberg; "Symphony No. 4 in F
or, Op. 36," Tschaikowsky.

e novelty was Schonberg's "Rat Night," a very difficult and tiful number. It was played ad-
bly, especially the exquisite end-
Salvos of applause greeted the
icians at the conclusion. Mr.
teux was kept bowing a long
e.

was the first time Schonberg's
ly composition has been played these concerts. Without doubt it grace another program ere long.
Kneisel Quartet gave the first
ormance in Boston of this num-
at Steinert Hall, March 16, 1915.
quartet was assisted by Samuel
dner, viola, and Hyman Eisen-
, 'cello, at the first performance.
theme on which it is written
ld make a good "thriller" for the ies or a "best seller." The story
probably not without its counter-
in real life. Women have been wn to express similar sentiments
those uttered by the woman who ted a child.

he playing of Mr. Weingartner's
arrangement of Weber's compo-
on elicited much applause, as also
the third movement of Tschaikow-
's symphony, with its capricious besques. The story of the com-
ition of this symphony is well
wn. It was dedicated to Nadejda aretovna von Meck, regarded by composer as his "best friend."
story of their intimate corre-ondence, although they never met, uld make good material for a elist. The manner in which the inent Russian wrote his Fourth
mphony, and dedicated it to her af-
she ceased to write him, adds to human interest. It is said that he not recover from her eventual inference. The symphony was itten after the break in their dehtful friendship.

NDY TO CONDUCT

ncent d'Indy will conduct the next
gramme to be given by the Boston
phony Orchestra in Symphony
l on Friday afternoon and Saturevening, December 9 and 10. The part of the programme will be upied by the overture to Monte-
de's opera, "Orfeo," Lalande's Cha-
ne and Bach's piano concerto in major. There will also be played zart's Nocturnal Serenade in D mafor two string orchestras with
pani.

TRA SYMPHONY NCERTS

splendid programme will inaugu-
the first of the new series of five certs which will be given next
nday evening in Symphony Hall at
by the full Boston Symphony Orstra, under its conductor, Pierre
nteux. A fitting symphony to open series is the masterpiece of Cesar
nck, the Belgian composer.
Beethoven will be represented by the rture and Fifth Ballet (an adagio)
m his Ballet, "The Creatures of ometheus." The concert will close
h Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on nish Themes." The soloist will be n Powell.

-N. 2

YMPHONY DISPLAYS SCHONBERG

omantic "Radiant Night" for Strings in New Dress

BY OLIN DOWNES

e feature of the seventh pro-
mme of the Boston Symphony
estra, Pierre Monteux, con-
ctor, played yesterday afternoon
Symphony Hall, was the first per-mance here of Schonberg's sextet,
erklarte Nacht" ("Radiant Night")
arranged by the composer for
ing orchestra.

This work was first performed in Boston in its original shape as a string sextet at a concert of the Kneisel Quartet in Steinert Hall in 1915. The composer has since scored the composition for full string orchestra, and has made some changes in the music.

NUMBERLESS EFFECT

The change from six strings to approximately 60 is well justified by the results, for this is less a string sextet, than a symphonic poem, and furthermore, Schonberg in using many stringed instruments has provided or discovered an amazing number of effects which often suggest those of a full orchestra.

The poetic basis of the music is the text of Richard Dehmel: "Two mortals walk through a cold, barren grove. The moon sails over the tall oaks, which send their scowny branches up through the onclouded moonlight. A woman speaks she confesses, to her companion, whom she loves, a mortal sin. A man speaks. Let her not burden her soul with guilt. See, the moon's sheen enwraps the universe. Together they are driving over chill waters, but a flame from each warms the other. They sink into each others arms. Their breaths meet in kisses in the air. Two mortals wander through the wondrous moonlight."

Beautiful and Romantic

For the Schonberg of today this music is perhaps old-fashioned, even though he has touched up the outpouring of an earlier period. To us who listened yesterday it is extremely beautiful and romantic music. It mirrors the sheen of the moon. The musical dialogue is dramatic, impassioned. True, it is long drawn out. The composer has so many ideas, so many masterly transformations of his musical material to offer that there is over-richness and a tendency to be prolix. But the audience listened fascinated by the simplicity and eloquence of his speech, by its rich harmonic color, its emotional accent, its clear and cohesive succession of mood-pictures.

The remainder of the programme consisted of Brahms tragic overture, Weingartners version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. At times, in the music of Brahms, there is noble, Greek-like mood, which few composers have ever attained. The lack of sensuousness is most appropriate, and the classic clearness of style is the only one, perhaps, wholly suitable for such an expression. At other times there is conventional precedure, a regularity of sequence and repetition of theme, which weaken greatly the effect of really grand thoughts. Weingartner's treatment to Weber's piece, with all its gratuitous counterpoint and the equally gratuitious and sometimes cheap effects of instrumentation is for us atrocious and very inferior to Berlioz' orchestration of the same music. Poor Weber! He once wrote a simple and delightful piano piece, "Invitation to the Dance."

POST-NOV. 26.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

AFTERNOON OF CONTRASTS AND SCHOENBERG

Chaikovsky Beside Brahms, Weber, Weingartner, and Not to the Russian's Advantage—His Music Thin and Faded, with a "Tragic Overture" and a Brilliant Virtuoso-Piece for Neighbors — "Transfiguring Night" in Beauty, Passion and Illusion

ONCE upon a time a composer wrote a tone-poem—as many do. For performance he proffered it to a conductor, known to have a spice of malice within him. The music pleased the conductor; he agreed to play it in the course of a season; he honestly sought to find a place for it in his programmes from which the merit of the piece would shine. The composer, however, lacked patience, discretion. He would have his tone-poem played forthwith. With insistence he haunted the conductor's door-step. Then malice came uppermost as it will in short tempers. "At the earliest opportunity," the conductor indeed kept his promise, but before the new tone-poem, in the order of the programme, stood a masterpiece of Richard Strauss; after it ensued a living and pervading classic. And the new piece was as though it had never been.

There is no visible malice in Mr. Monteux's temperament. Rather is he a forbearing man of exemplary patience. Yet back to memory came this true tale of conductor and composer when the programme for the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon began with Brahms's "Tragic Overture," proceeded with Weingartner's orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and ended with Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony—the Symphony with the Scherzo of the picked strings. French conductors, though they be as catholic of spirit as Mr. Monteux, do not usually warm to the Russian's music. In these days, and regardless of nationality, most conductors of his quality and ambition look askance upon Chaikovsky and nearly all his works. They are "old hat," as the Parisian vernacular has it—very "old hat." But audiences in America and in England, especially elderly audiences, will have them—even unto the Pathetic Symphony and this very Fourth. One or another of the Russian's Fantasias seem less worn by time, less changed by fashion. One or another of his Suites and minor pieces still amuses. Yet the public will have the symphonies. What is a dutiful conductor to do? Set out occasionally on his programmes of course—but also exercise due care as to what pieces companion it.

With or without malice, Mr. Monteux yesterday hardly took such pains. In the innocent nineties, not a few of us believed that Chaikovsky wrote colorfully for orchestral voices. Keen seemed his rhythms, sharp his modulations, vivid and various his play with harmonies and timbres. Most of us are more sophisticated now. Beside his fellow-Russian Rimsky-Korsokov, we count him poor and faded in these displayful but useful qualities. Beside a Ravel, for instance from the younger generation, he seems no more than tepid. Still worse does he fare on these scores when no more than half an hour away is Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's dance-poem (as we should say nowadays) inexuberant and exhaustless feat of orchestral virtuosity. Weingartner keeps the music in flashing keys; he lavishes upon it every brilliance that instrumental voices may lend as in those glinting wood-winds ever sparkling about the melody; he twines and intertwines motivs, concentrating, expanding; he sets in little ornaments of his own inventing. New harmonies color Weber's sentiment; new modulations make his dance-rhythms more sensuous. At the transcriber's will the pace slows or quickens and every change tells upon stirred ears.

The whole arrangement is marvel of orchestral fancy, orchestral ingenuity, orchestral "effect," done as it seems in a heat of re-creation and doubtless, like most such things, overdone. But how poor, thin, faded, labored, sterile seem the ways of Chaikovsky in these things beside such fertility, vigor and glow! The listener hears Weingartner and Weber with exhilaration, even elation. Before the Russian's Fourth Symphony from the vociferous proclamations of fate, through waltz and canzonetta, "picked" Scherzo and finale of the song of the birch-tree (that will never grow and never wither) too many of us only hear—and are patient.

Over pages of the programme-book ran letters of Chaikovsky, reciting the moods, the images, the passionate and introspective play of feeling, he would body forth in this Fourth Symphony. They were very real to him; beyond a doubt they wrenched and tortured him, they filled his imagination when he set to music to paper; let the cynics say that then and there he caressed them. Yet how little of all these things does the Fourth Symphony bear today even when the listener strains every sympathy of comprehension and response. According to Chaikovsky, sleep-chasings, flitting fantasms of dream race through the Scherzo of the picked strings. Yet to many an ear of 1921, it seems but exacting exercise for an orchestral choir and pleasing pastime for a fascinated audience. Not too impressively may all-compelling fate thunder in an introduction and "despondency and despair" stalk up and down when a few pages onward come waltz-measures endearing Chaikovsky to any ballet-master. The "canzona" has withered into a melancholy song, far below the consuming intensities of the slow-movement of the Fifth Symphony or the ghostly syncopations of the Sixth. A dash of military music across the Scherzo glorifies by comparison the earlier waltz-rhythms. Only the native wildness of the Finale—and Mr. Monteux and the orchestra made the most of it—persists, monotonously. "I speak the truth," wrote Chaikovsky to Tanéev, about the Fourth Symphony, "if somewhat grandiloquently." There is not a doubt thereof; but the lapsing years gnaw hard at grandiloquence; while grandiloquence is one of the moods and manners of music with which our time is instinctively and unsparingly at odds.

A tragic music, as he himself felt, made and heard it, Chaikovsky surely believed he had written in this symphony in F minor. An hour before, at the beginning of the concert, the audience had heard another tragic music—the Overture, so named, of Brahms. About it he wrote no explanatory letters; the most penetrating commentators have been unable to set to it any plausible gloss—and on that score the pedants are hard to outdo. Conductor and orchestra wrung every drop out of Chaikovsky to the limit of Mr. Monteux's imagination and sense of effect; whereas in Brahms's piece they were no more than earnestly, straightforwardly and somewhat bluntly eloquent. Yet out of the music rose, as always, the sense of fate that mortal spirit may not conquer, the image of heroic striving and endurance; the vision illuminating, the pity comforting; the end as in exalted submission.

The motivs whence the overture unfolds; the grave progress in which they move; the sombre modulations of the musical speech; the colors, dusky or pale, upon it; the whole inevitable design, the whole full-measured accomplishment are at one—the voice of tragic poetry as it were in tonal epitome. A loftier music, deeper of thought, emotion, imagery and impression, few composers have written. Not even in his First Symphony has Brahms conceived and wrought so complete a masterpiece. As yet tragic destiny—destiny endured, illuminated, pitied—has hardly found comparable expression in music. Here spoke tragedy in almost epic measures. Over the way, Chaikovsky, in comparison, whined and simpered; wrote in dance-rhythms, picked the strings and rioted around a birch-tree.

Apart from these pieces, among them rather than of them, stood Schönberg's Sextet, "Transfiguring Night," played for the first time in Boston as music for full string choir in a spacious hall rather than the six instruments in chamber-concert, for which the composer originally destined it. He himself so transformed it and at his door must be laid the inevitable loss of intimate and piercing sensation. Of old in Steinert Hall from "The Kneisels," the listener heard the piece almost as though he caught the speech and followed the steps of the tortured and illuminated pair in Dehmel's verse and Schönberg's tones. Yesterday, he heard the piece magnified in sound but in illusion also thinned. Of old, he took little thought of the playing musicians, so engrossing was the piece. Yesterday he marvelled at the ability, the sensibility, the mingling of skill and imagination with which conductor and choir accomplished both all that Schönberg set to music-paper, and not a little that black and white could only suggest.

With reason the poet's verse enkindled the composer's tones. The poetry, self-contained as it is, asks for music in the two voices, contrasted, blended and together transfigured; in the eerie atmosphere, the preoccupation with spiritual sensations. Out of it Schönberg has distilled into his tones the gnawing woe and the longing lament of the woman; the deep and comforting affection of the man, the final spiritualizing of their passion. Around is the background of still and ghostly wood, of black and silvered water, of moonlit and tremulous air. Across it sounds their slow foot-fall. Illusively at the beginning Schönberg's music suggests personages and background, air and light. Soon he and it are absorbed in the spiritual communings of the pair, but by recurring implication in most adroit and imaginative strokes of harmony and timbres, the background never quite vanishes.

The motives that embody the moods, the impulses, the reactions and the passion of the lovers are more vivid and vital than the words that originally embodied them. These motives flower into melody of rich sensuous beauty and of poignant power. The play of them discloses and characterizes, advances and cumulates, penetrates the mind and searches the heart like music-drama itself. The end is of the transfigured beauty and the spiritualizing power that only music may compass. As painter, poet and dramatist in tones, Schönberg accomplishes these things through mastery of cyclic form, clear-eyed and unwavering faculty of design, wealth and aptitude of melodic invention and fruition, imagination and skill with every necessary means of music. Over them, out of them plays a responsive and transmitting passion as intense as it is controlled. The outcome, the inevitable outcome, is high moments of beauty and of power. Whatever Schönberg may have now become, he wrote this Sextet at the fullest as a master, even a genius, of music.

H. T. PARKER

The Symphony Orchestra in New Venture —Chaliapin Comes — Mr. de Gogorza, Familiar, and Mme. Ney, Novel—The London String Quartet at Cambridge—Lesser Recitals

AT eight-fifteen, instead of the usual eight, next Monday evening in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting, will begin the first of its new series of "special concerts." In general they are designed for those who are unable or unwilling to attend the regular subscription concerts of Friday afternoons or Saturday evenings. In particular, they are intended for the younger generation with an increasing liking for symphonic music, but with none too large means or frequent opportunity to gratify it. Various organizations, like the Women's Educational Union and the Young Women's Christian Association, have joined with the management of the orchestra to promote the concerts. The response of the desired public has pleased all concerned. It will deserve the conductor, the orchestra and a programme no whit below the standards of either. The pieces are: Franck's Symphony; the Overture and a Dance (with many solo-passages) from Beethoven's Ballet, "Prometheus"; Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Folk-Tunes for Piano and Orchestra, and Rimsky-Korsakov's warmly colored and keenly rhythmed "Spanish Caprice." In the Fantasia, John Powell, with a Lisztian temperament of his own, will play the piano-part.

TRANS. NOV. 26.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

Tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux will give the first of its new series of five extra concerts. A memorable program will inaugurate the series, no numbers of which occur in the other symphony concerts in Boston. The principal work will be the great symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck. The soloist will be John Powell, the talented young American pianist who, in concerts of his own and appearances with orchestras in this country and in Europe, has established for himself an enviable reputation. He will play with the orchestra Liszt's Fantasy on Hungarian folk tunes. The music of Russia will be represented on this programme by Rimsky-Korsakoff's caprice on Spanish themes, noted for its gorgeous colorings and pictorial magnificence. A chance to hear the various virtuosos of the orchestra will be afforded by the numbers from Beethoven's ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus," in which the solo parts will be taken by Mr. Bedetti, 'cello; Mr. Laurent, flute; Mr. Sand, clarinet; Mr. Laus, bassoon, and Mr. Holy, harp.

HERALD-NOV 27.

D'INDY AS CONDUCTOR

The next pair of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 9 and 10, following the second regular trip to New York which will occupy the coming week. This pair of concerts will be notable in that Vincent d'Indy, the great musician of France, now on his way to America, will appear as guest conductor.

M. d'Indy will devote the first half of the program to the music of the early masters before the time of Beethoven, and the latter portion to his own music, together with music by his two foremost pupils in his famous Schola Cantorum at Paris, Paul Le Flem and Albert Roussel.

He will begin with the overture, including Toccata and Ritornello, to the opera "Orfeo" by Monteverde, the pioneer of opera in Italy, who wrote this, his masterpiece, in 1607. This opera has been revived in its entirety by M. d'Indy in Paris. The second number will be a Chaconne, written by Lalande to be played at the royal table while Louis XIV dined. Bach will be represented by his piano concerto in D major, B. & H. No. 12, in which the piano part will be taken by Bruce T. Simonds, who has studied composition with d'Indy in the Schola Cantorum. Mr. Simonds is now connected with the School of Music at Yale University. Another number of interest will be Mozart's nocturnal serenade in D major for two string orchestras, one with kettle drums. Le Flem's "To the Dead" has never been performed, and is being brought to America by M. d'Indy for this purpose. Rusell will be represented by "Les Dieux a l'ombre des Cavernes" from "Evocations," opus 15. The concert will end with d'Indy's new work, conducted by the composer from manuscript score. This work, entitled "Poeme des Rivages," is as yet unperformed, and contains the following movements: Calm and Light, The Joy of the Blue Depths, Green Horizons; The Mystery of the Ocean.

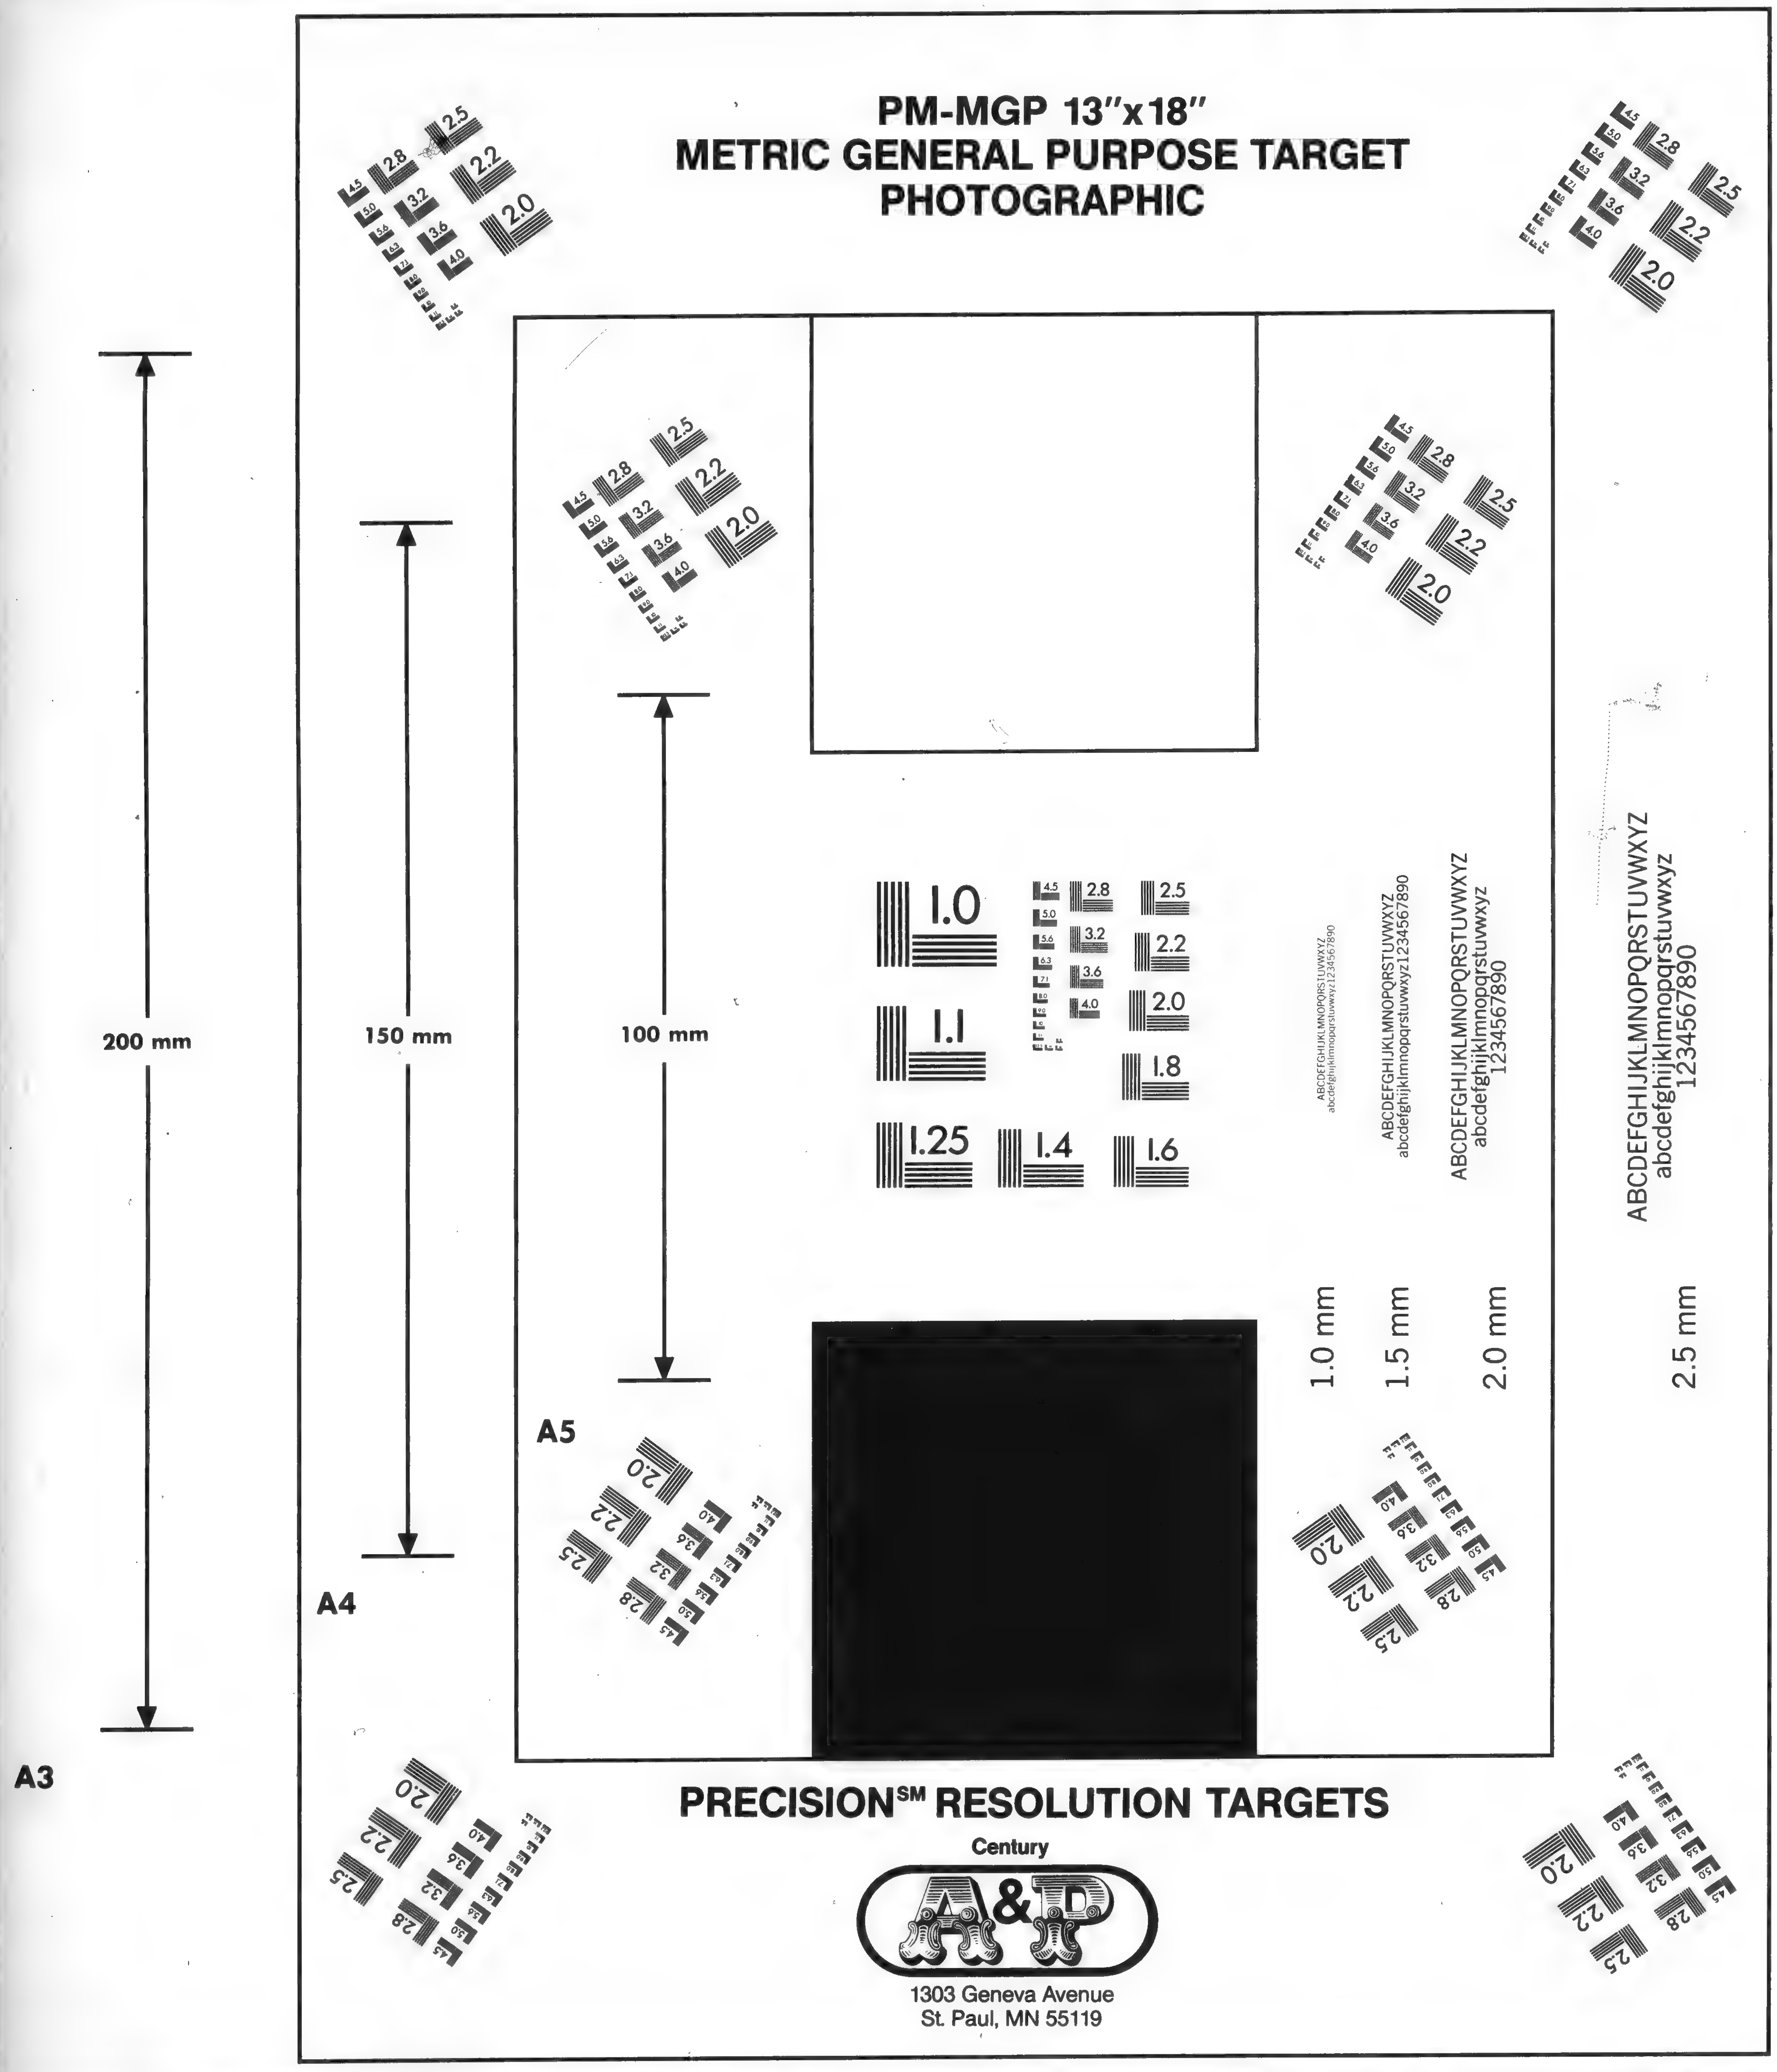
HERALD-NOV. 27.

[24]

REDUCTION RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

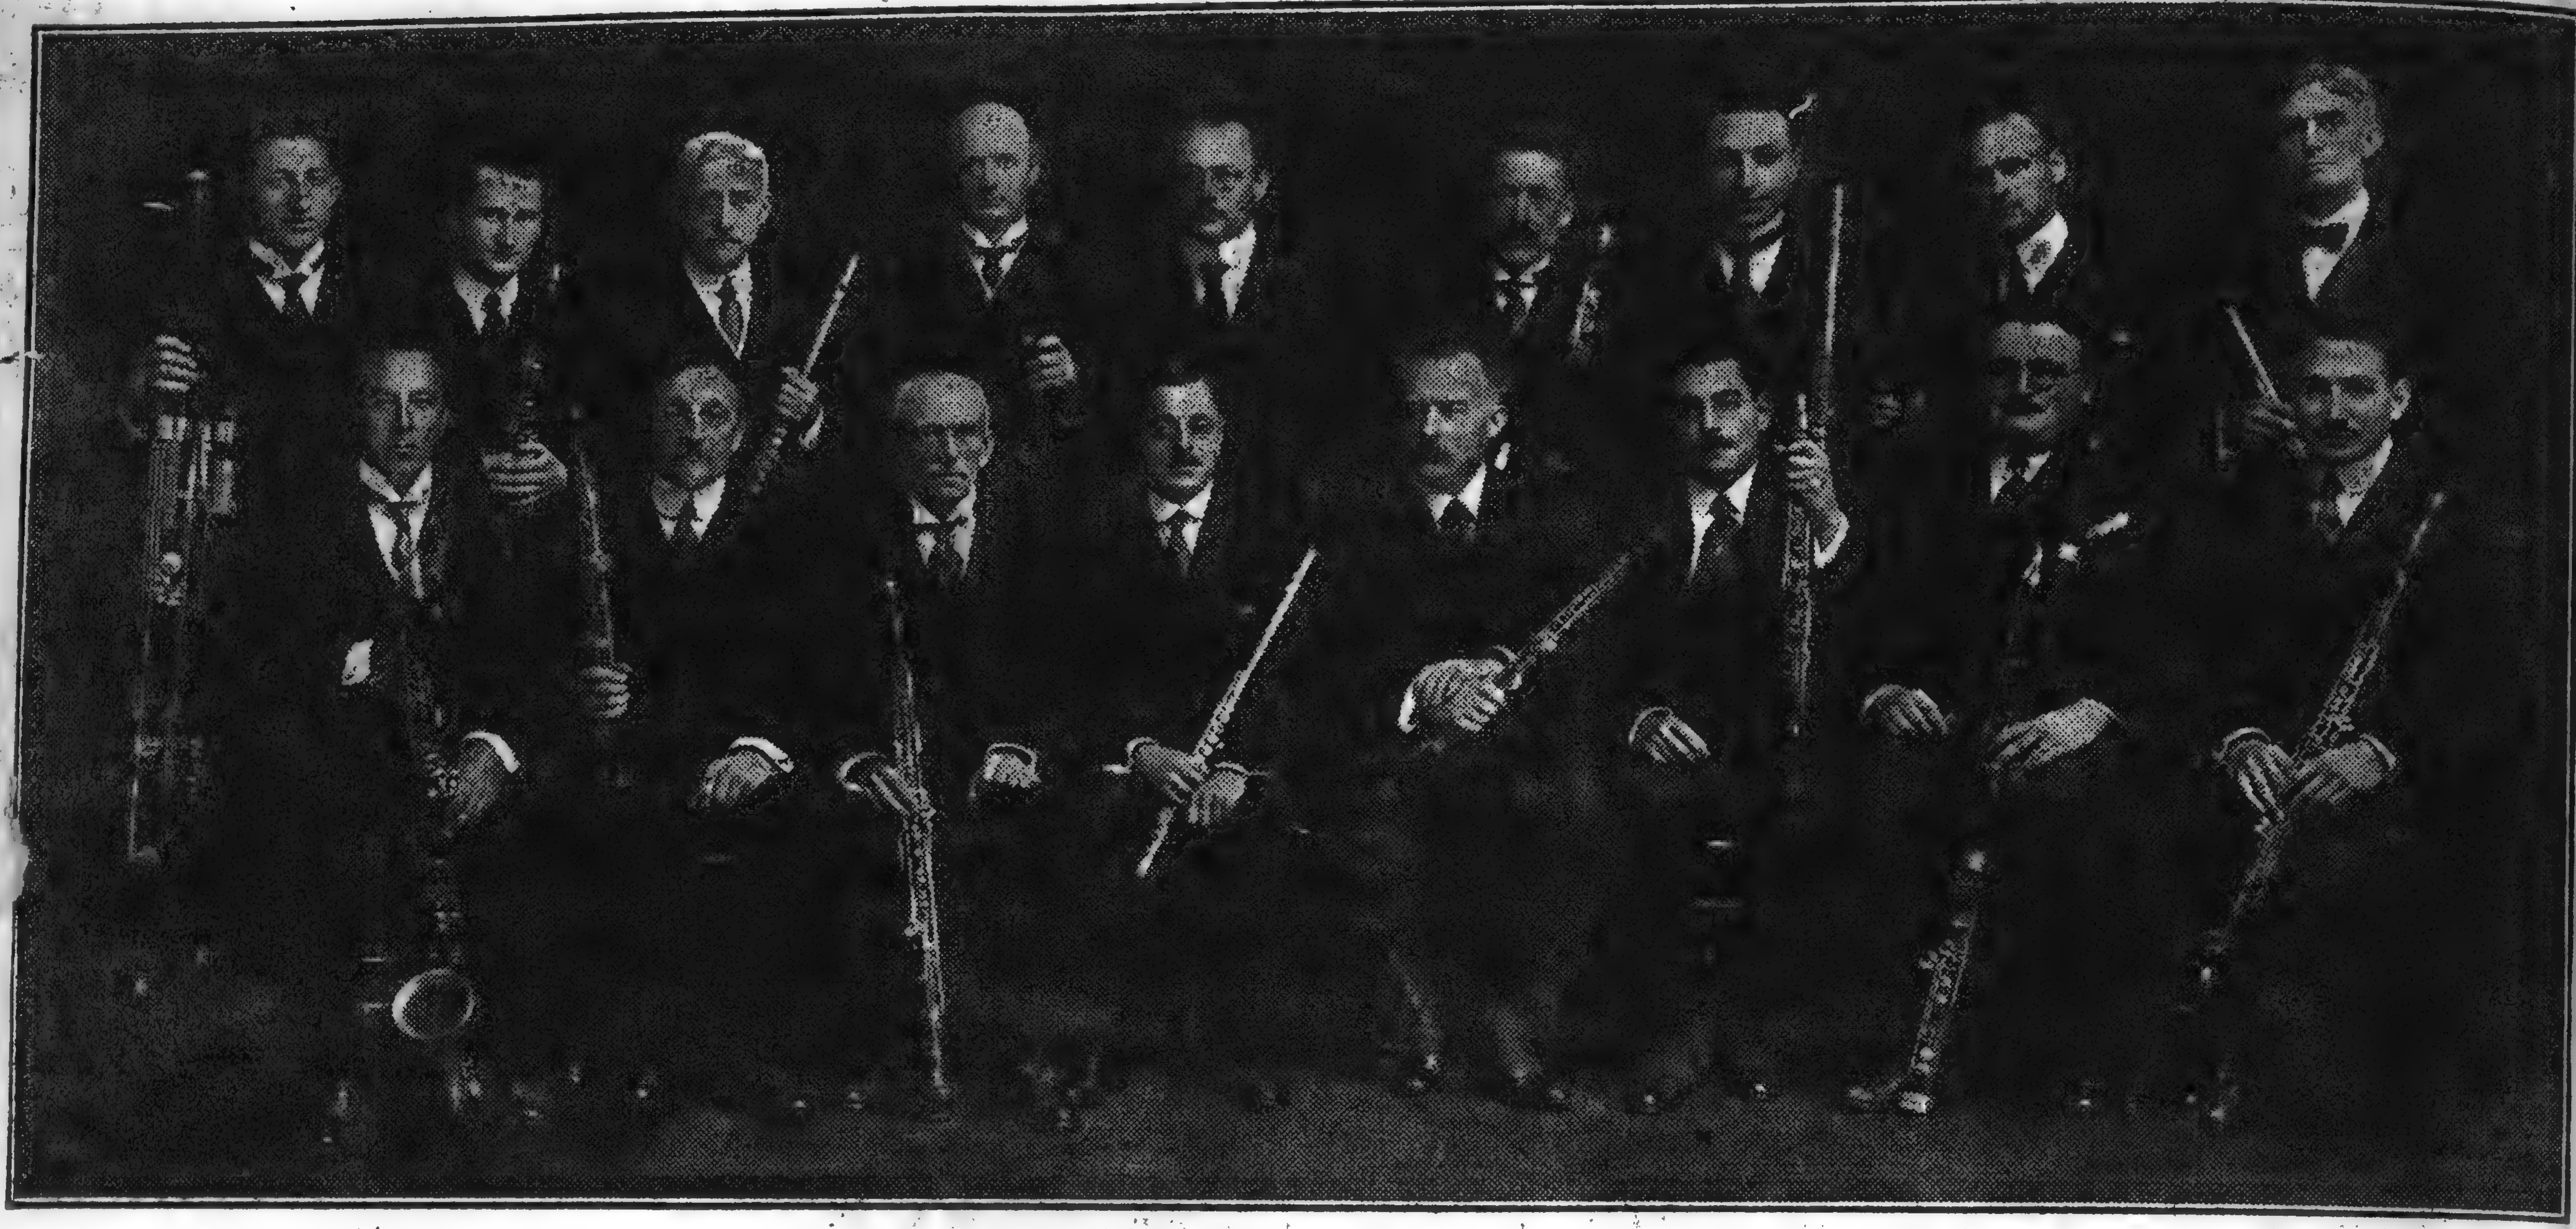
Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Youth Now Leavens Prime

Leaders and Choirs of the Symphony Orchestra for the Current Season

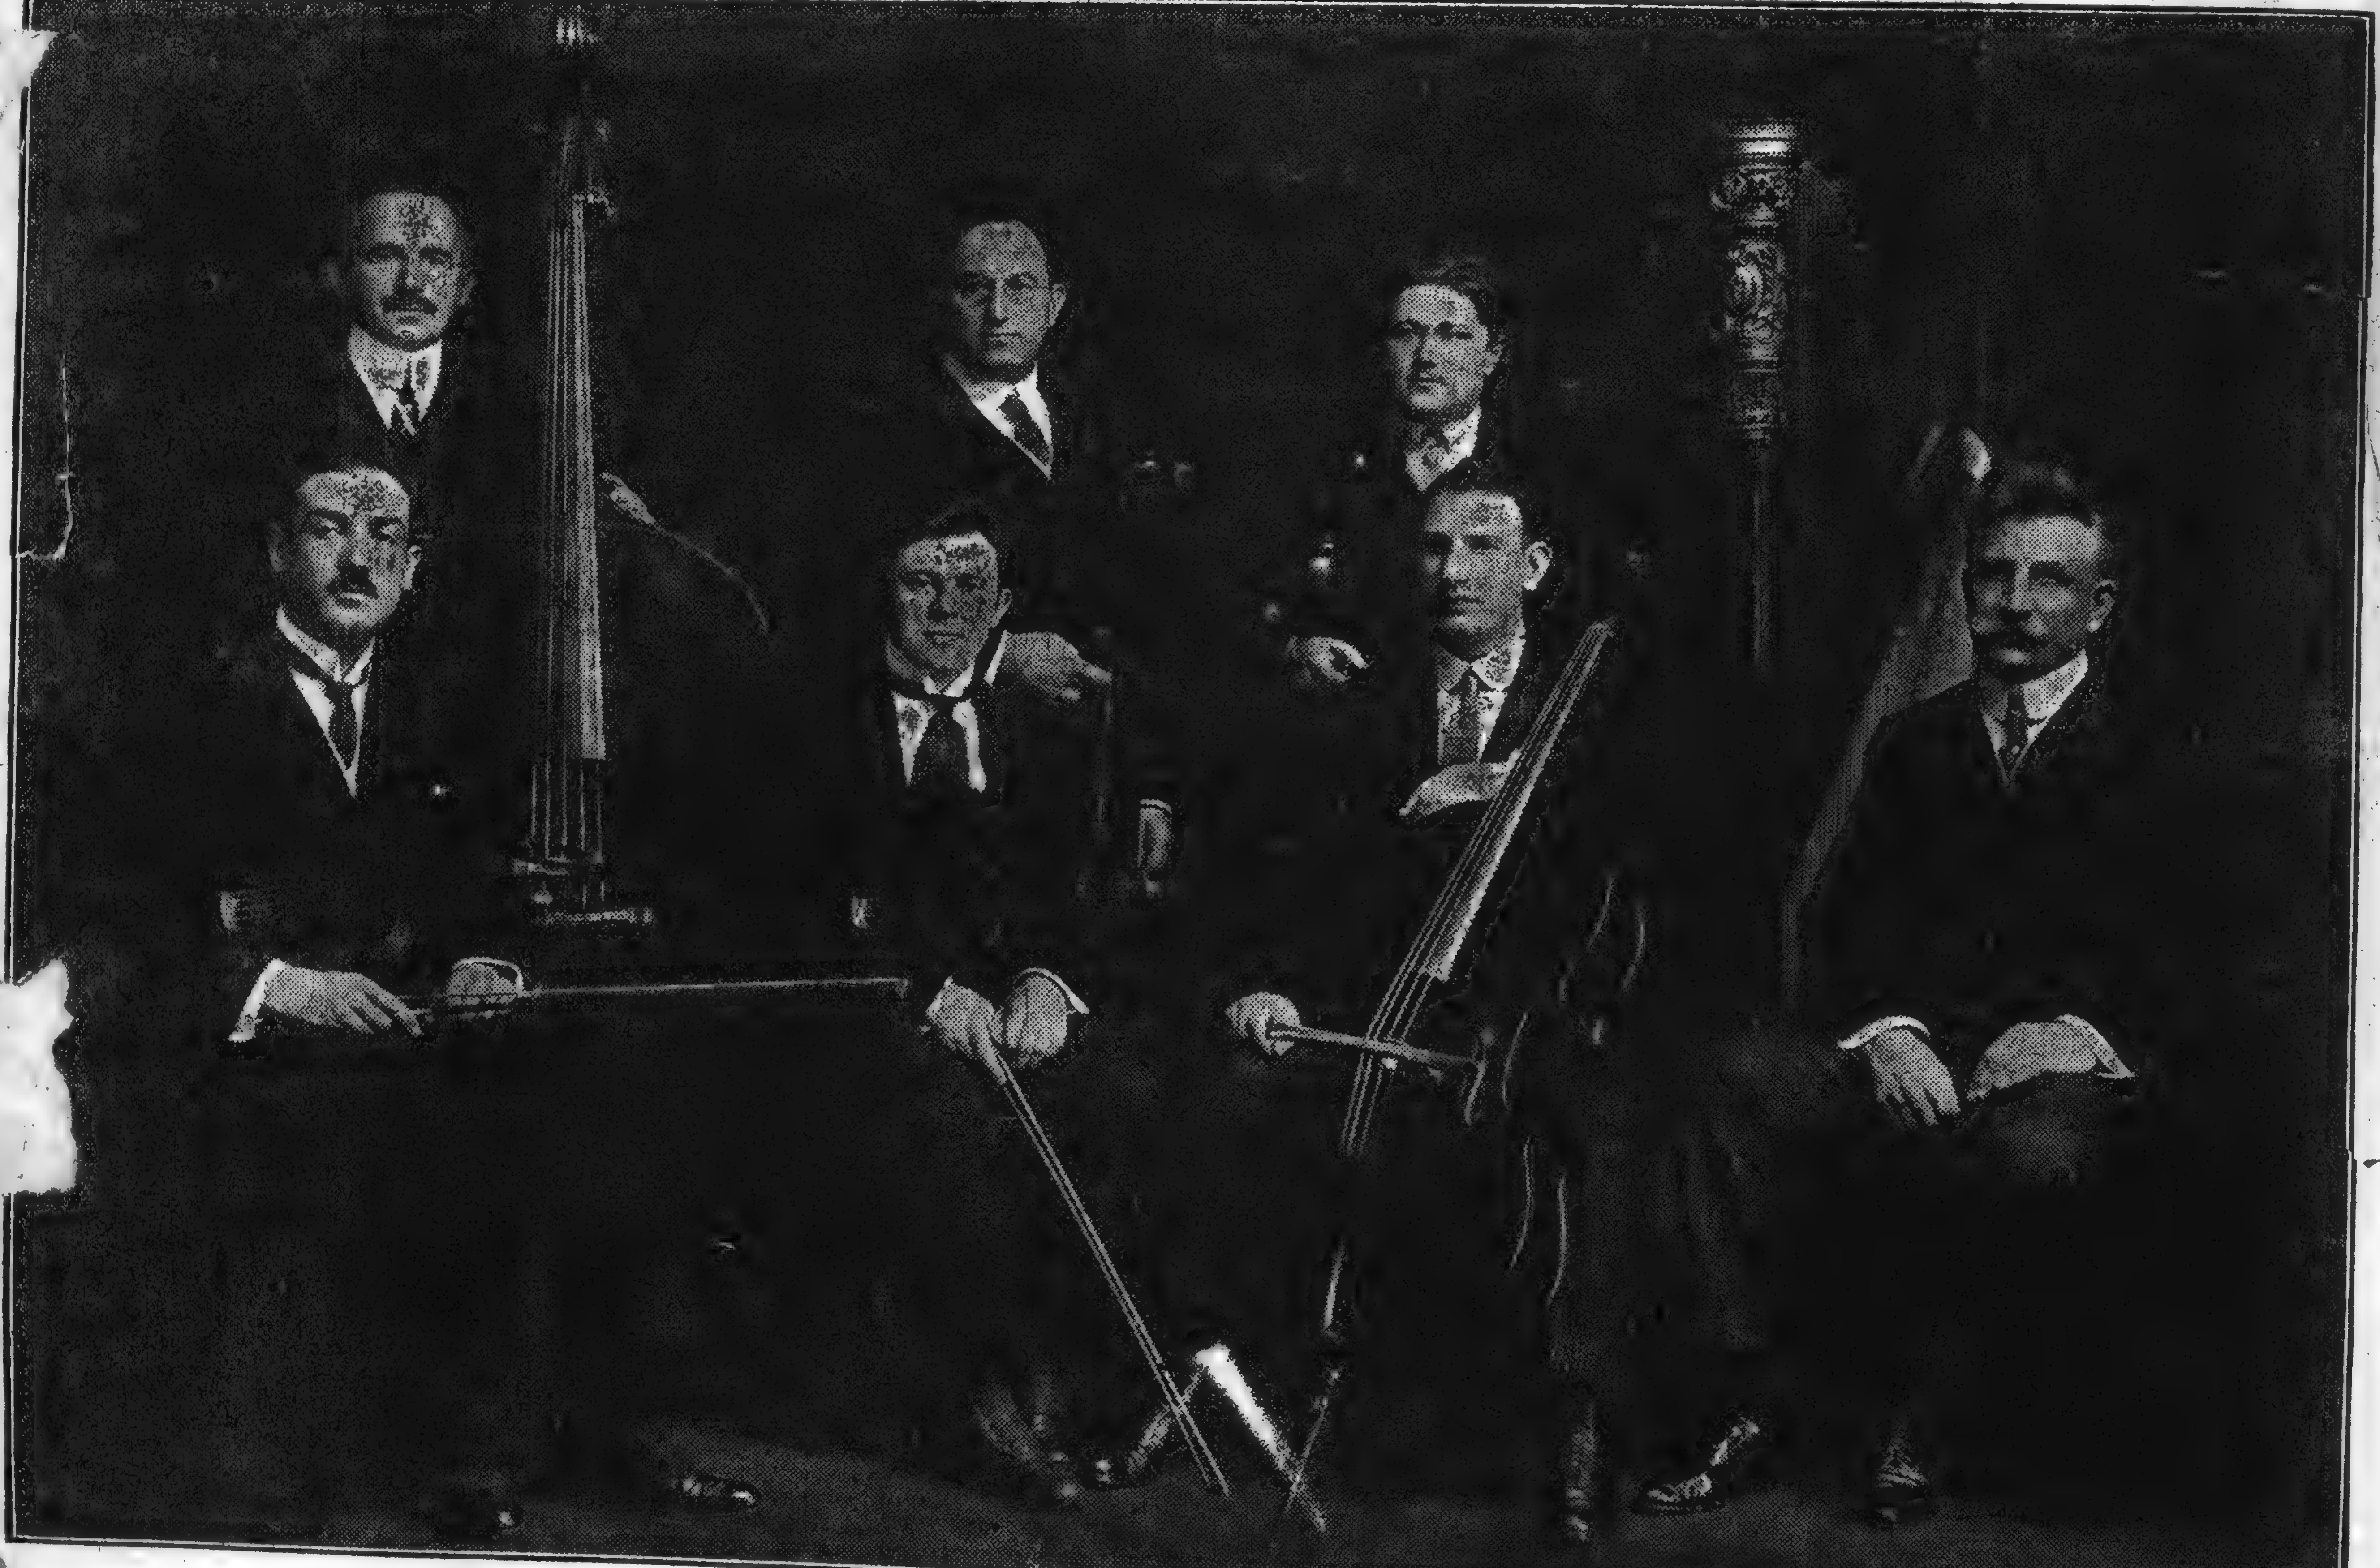
Familiar Figures Freshly Grouped

(Photographs by Horner)



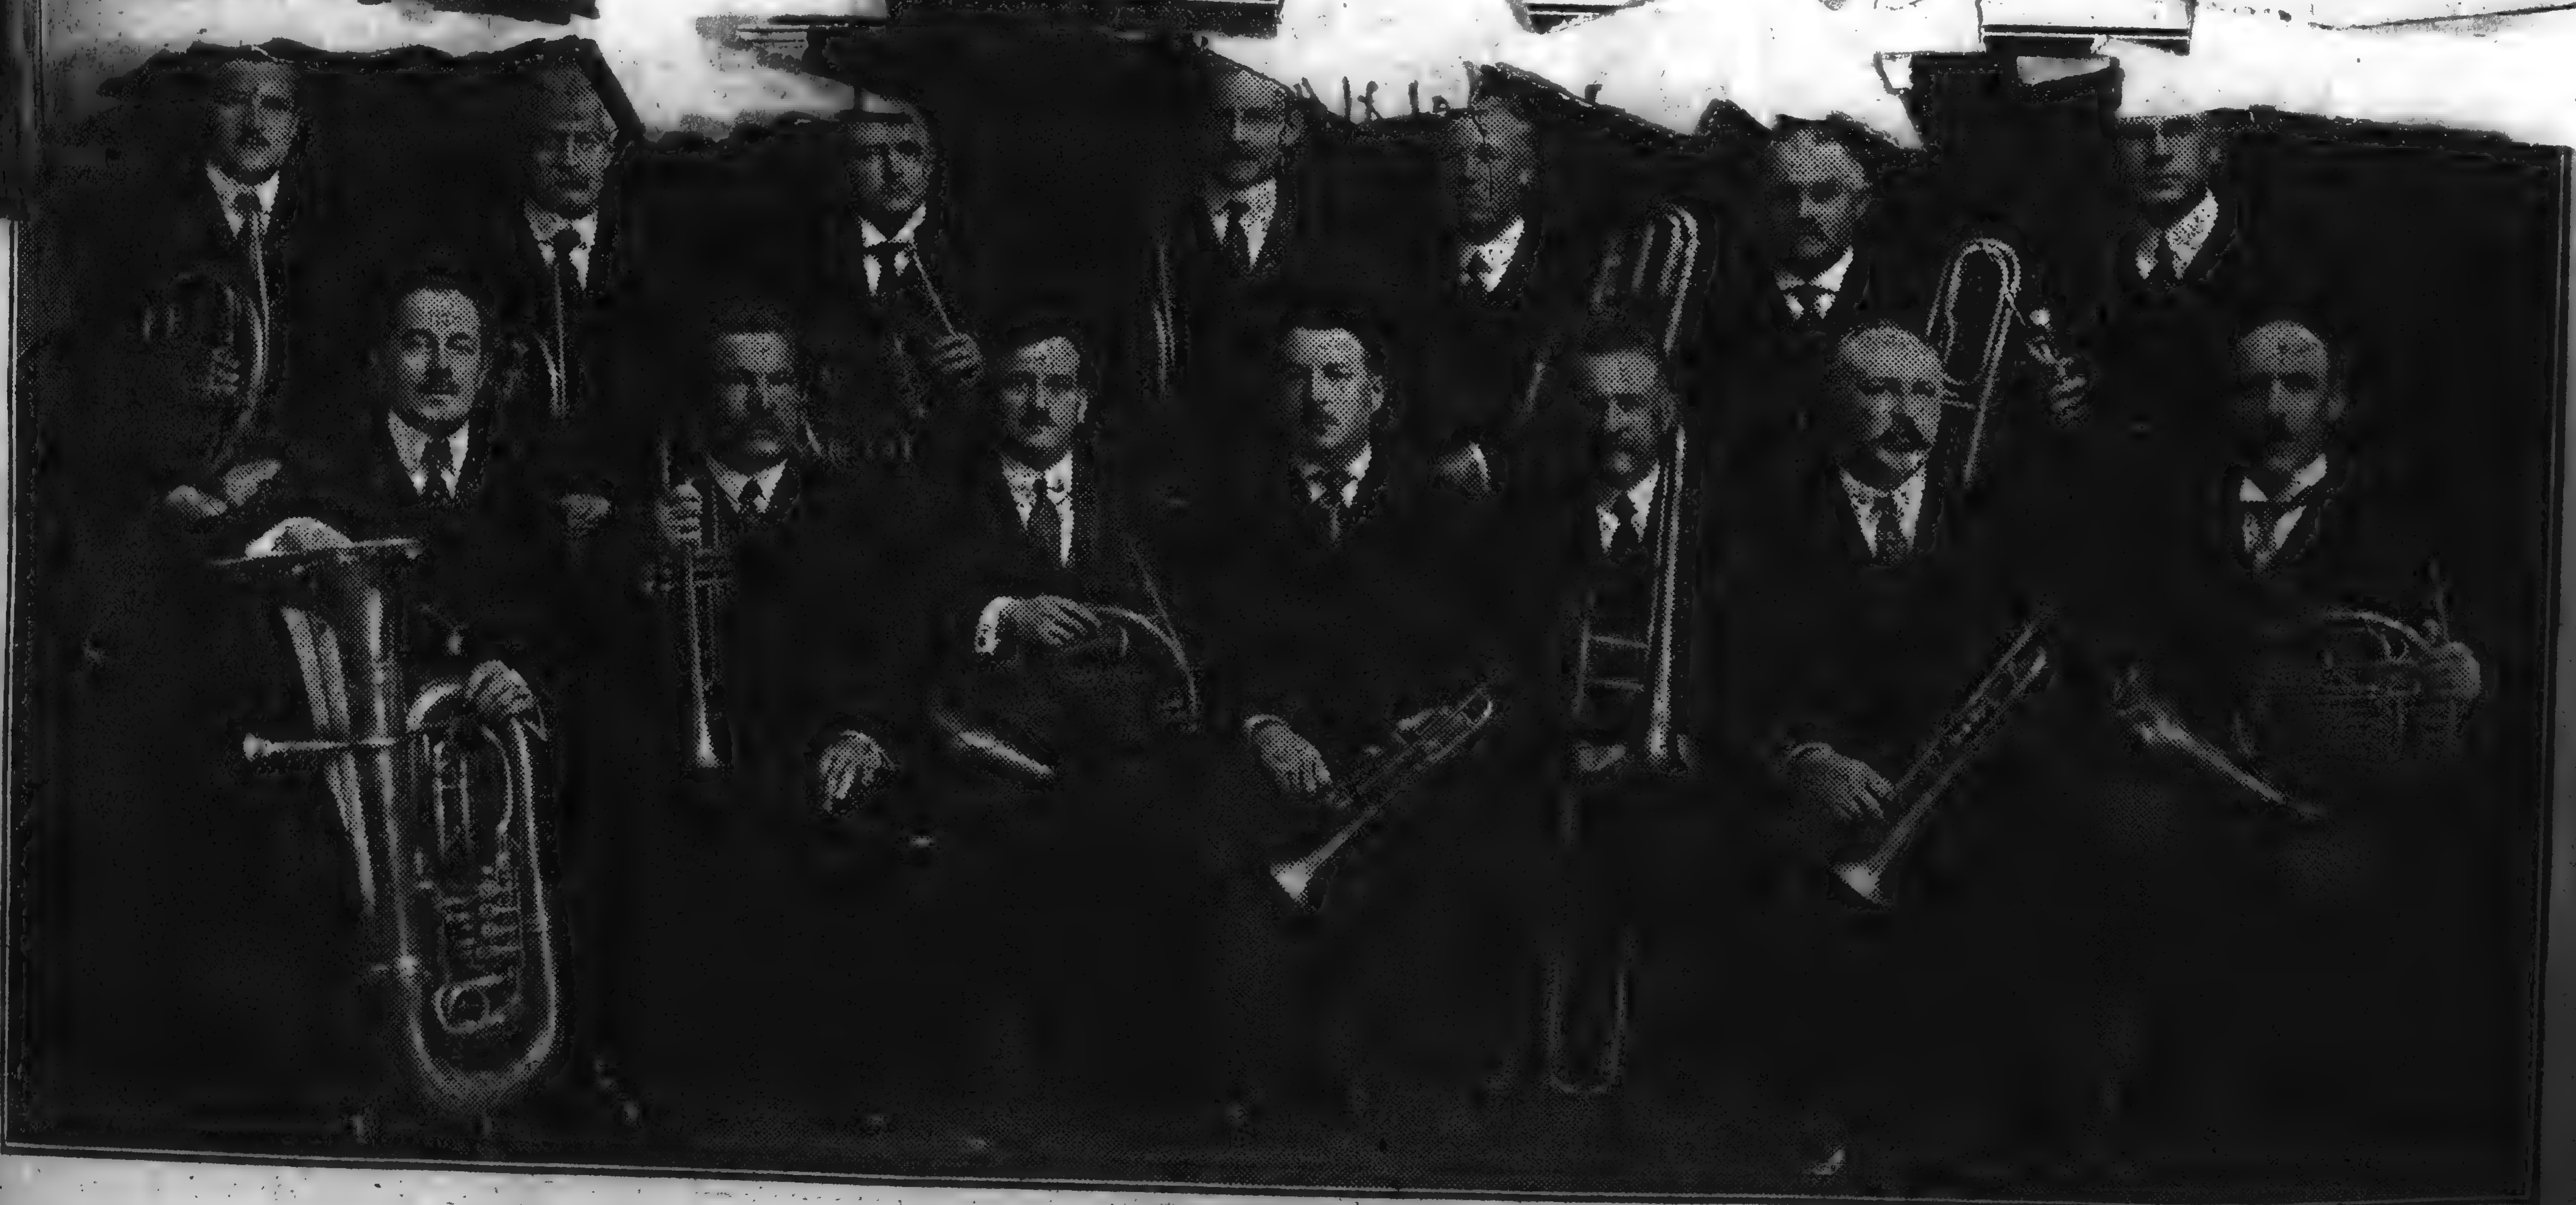
Wood-Wind Choir

Left to Right, Seated—P. Mimart, Bass Clarinet; C. Lenom, Oboe; F. Mueller, English Horn; G. Laurent, First Flute; G. Longy, First Oboe; A. Sand, First Clarinet; A. Laus, First Bassoon; L. Speyer, English Horn.
Left to Right, Standing—B. Piller, Contra Bassoon; E. Arcieri, Clarinet; A. Brook, Flute; H. Stanislaus, Oboe; E. Mueller, Bassoon; A. Vannini, Clarinet; P. Amerena, Flute; F. Bettoney, Bassoon; A. Battles, Piccolo.



Leaders of the String Choir

Left to Right, Seated—Georges Fourel, First Viola; Richard Burgin, [illegible]ncertmaster; Jean Bedetti, First Violoncellist; Alfred Holy, First Harp.
Left to Right, St[illegible]—Max Kunze, First Double Bass; Julius Th[illegible]orowicz, Second Concertmaster; Fernand Thillois, Leader of Second Violins.



Brass Choir

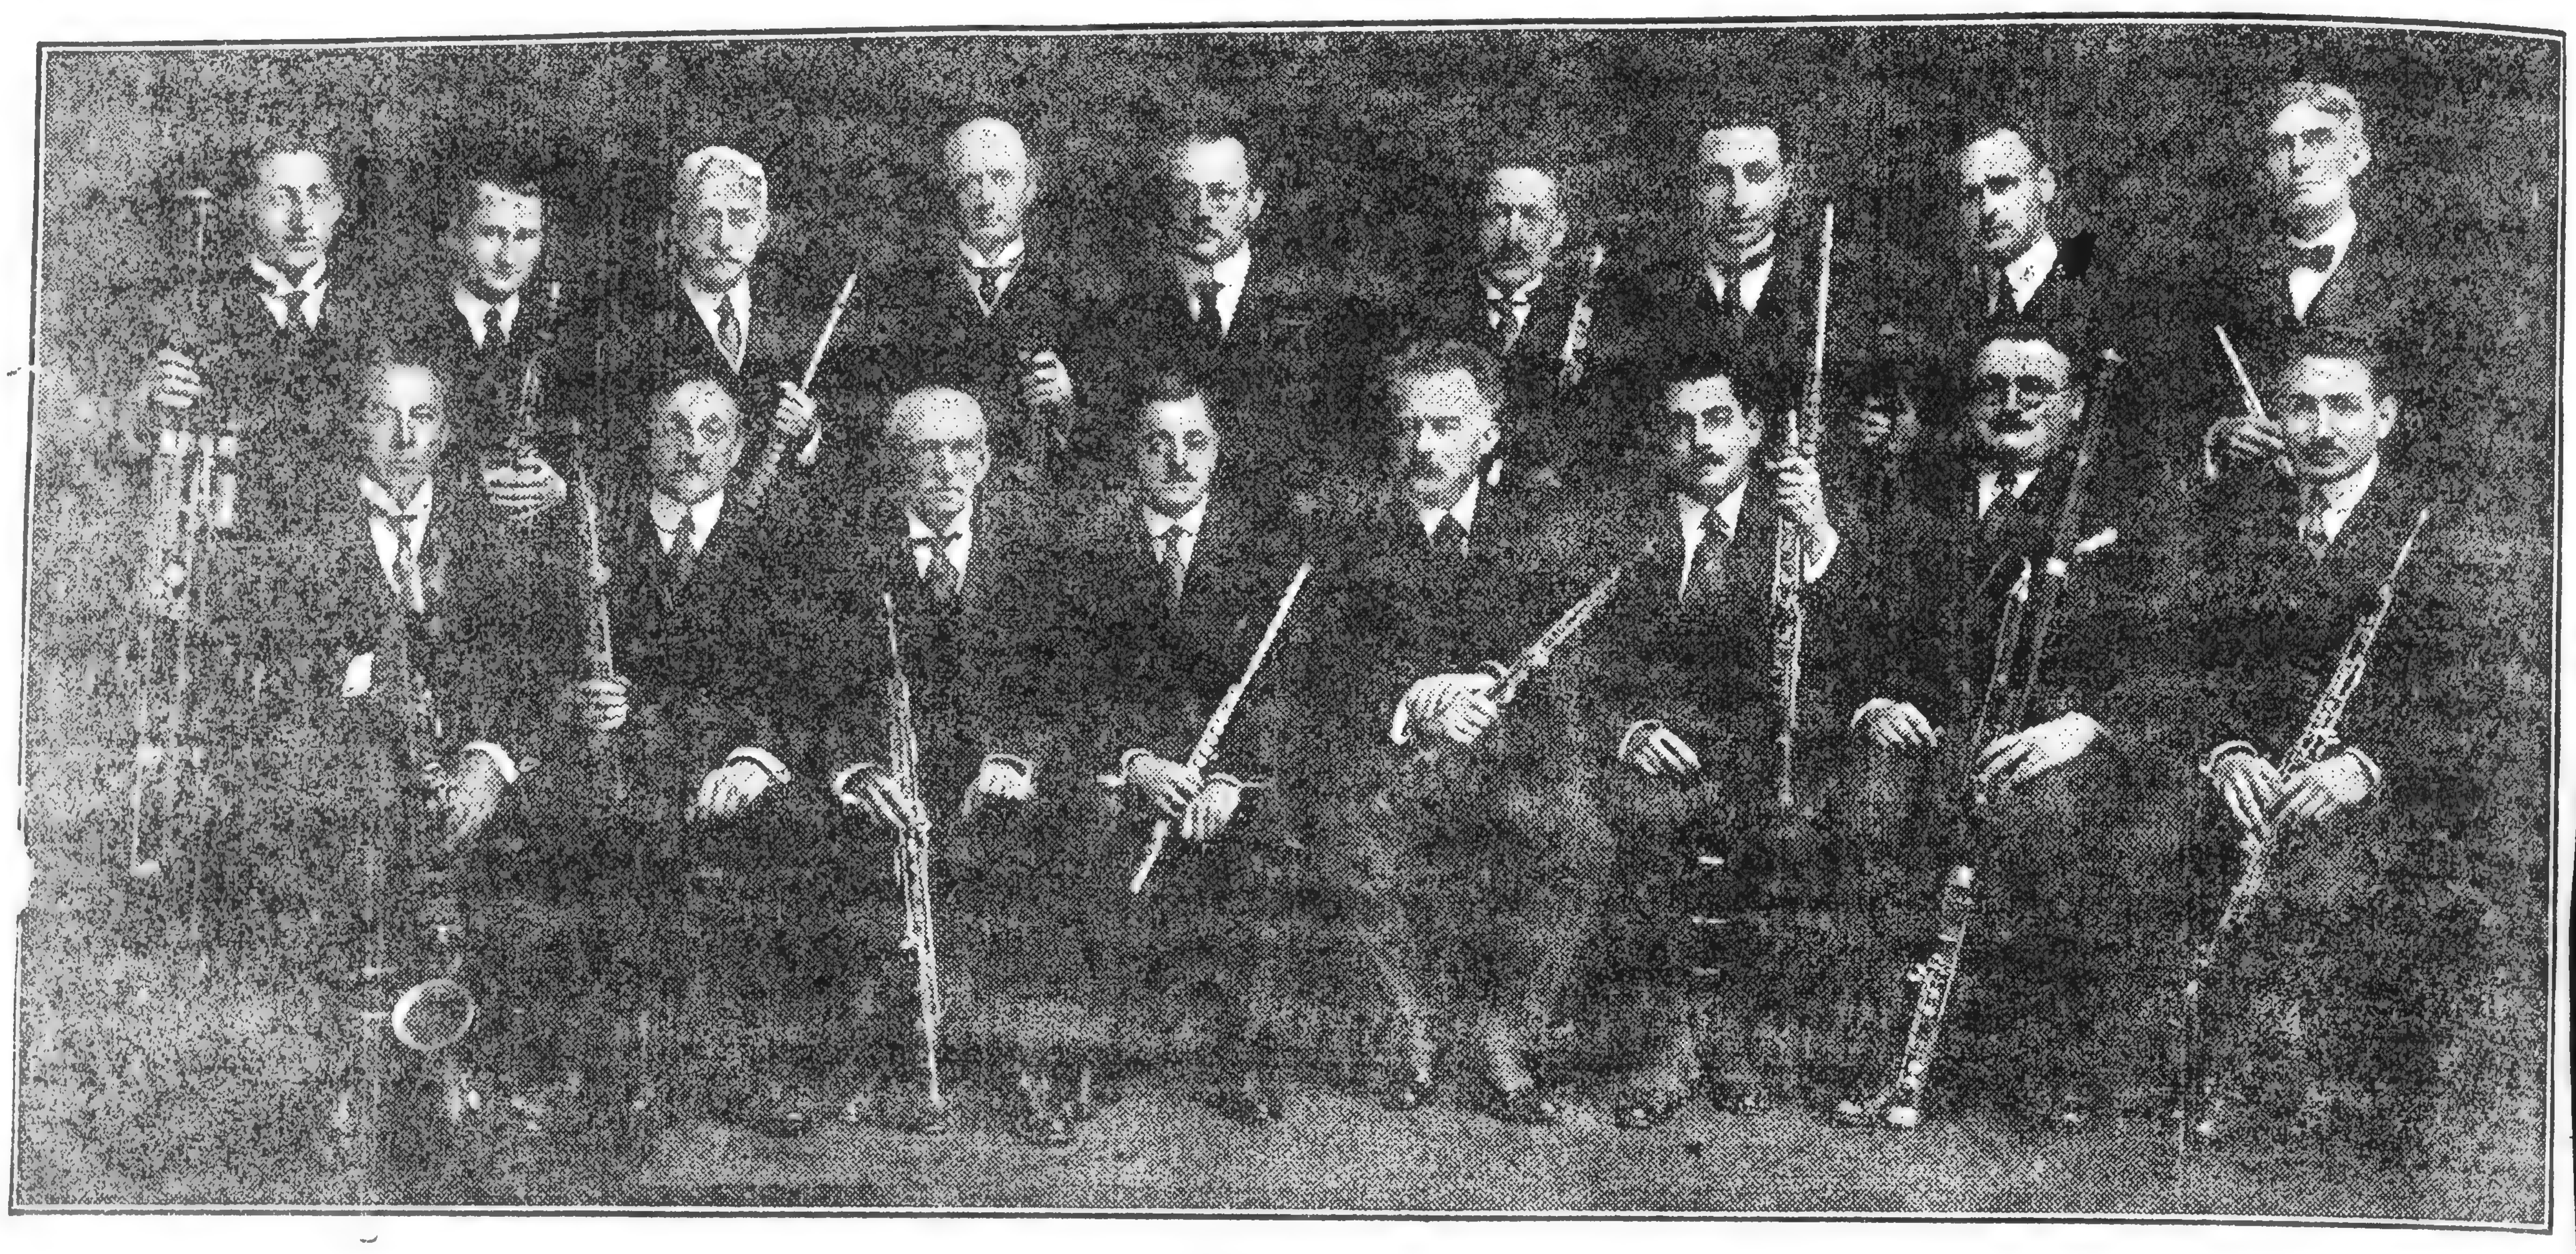
Left to Right, Seated—E. Adams, Tuba; J. Mann, Trumpet; G. Wendler, First Horn; G. Mager, First Trumpet; C. Hampe, First Trombone; L. Kloepfel, Trumpet; C. Van Den Berg, Horn.
Left to Right, Standing—W. Gebhardt, H. Lorbeer, M. Hess, F. Hain, Horns; L. Kenfield, Trombone; A. Mausebach, Trombone; G. Perret, Trumpet.

Youth Now Leavens Prime

Leaders and Choirs of the Symphony Orchestra for the Current Season

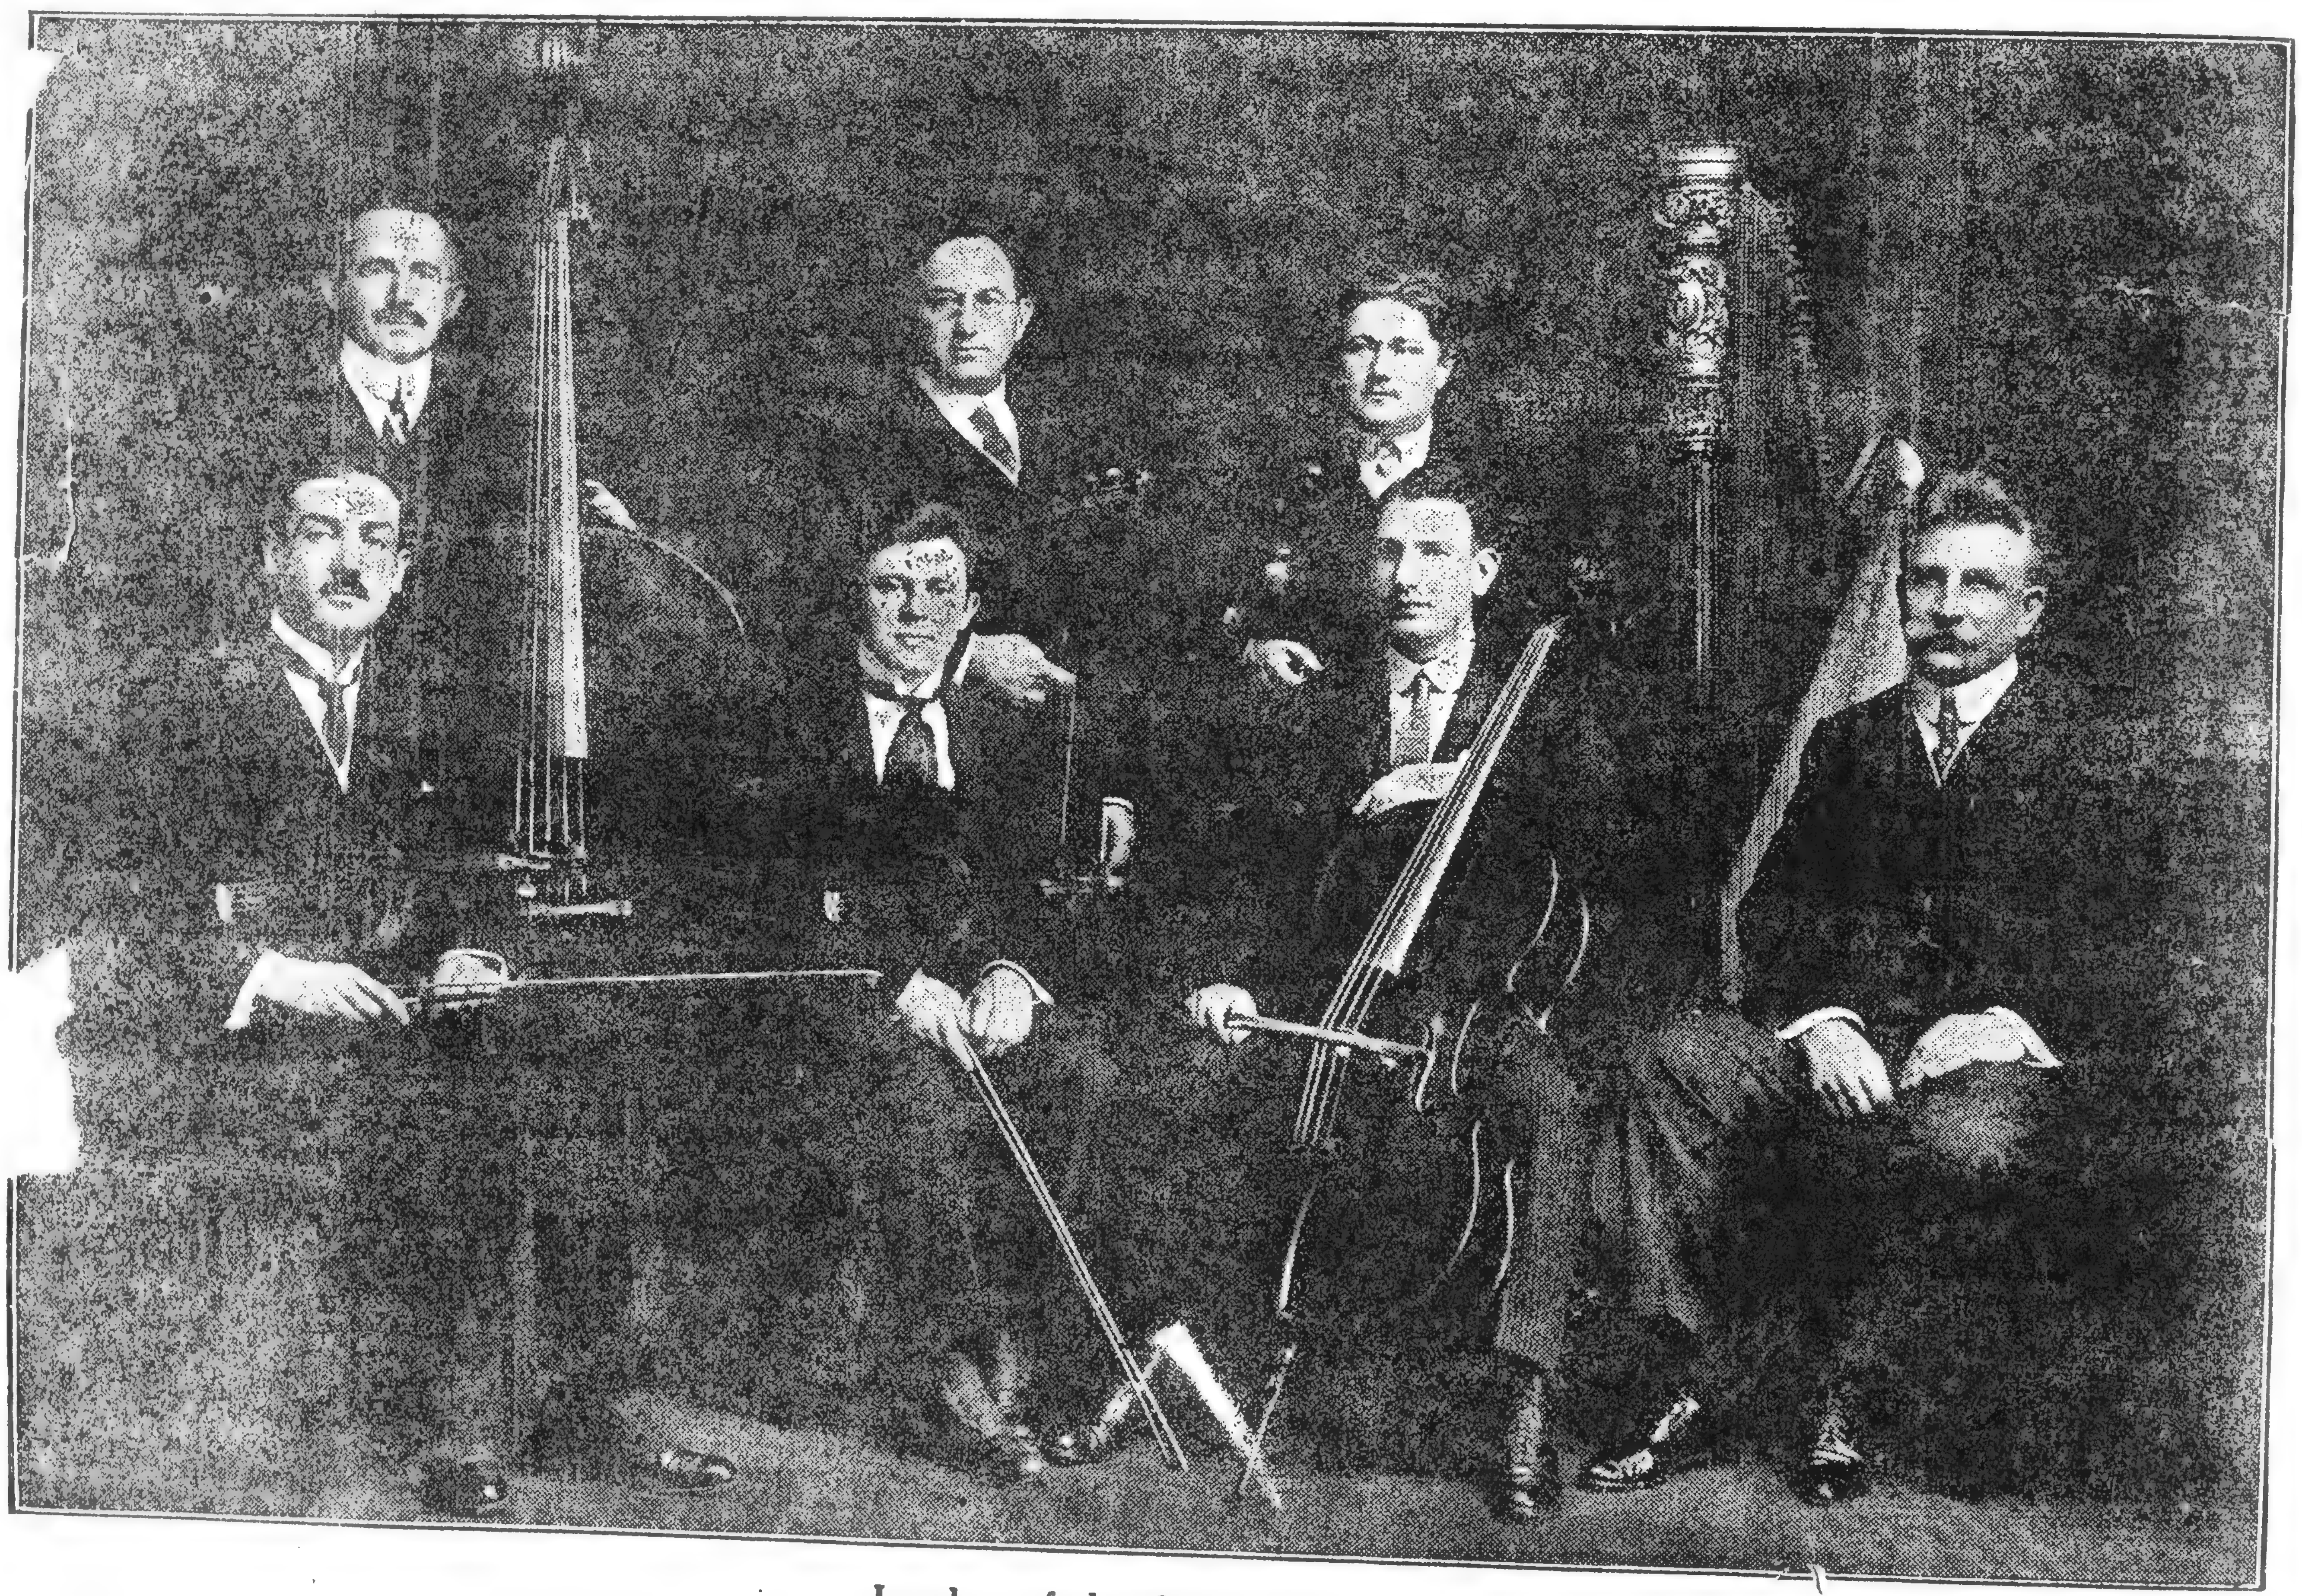
Familiar Figures Freshly Grouped

(Photographs by Horner)



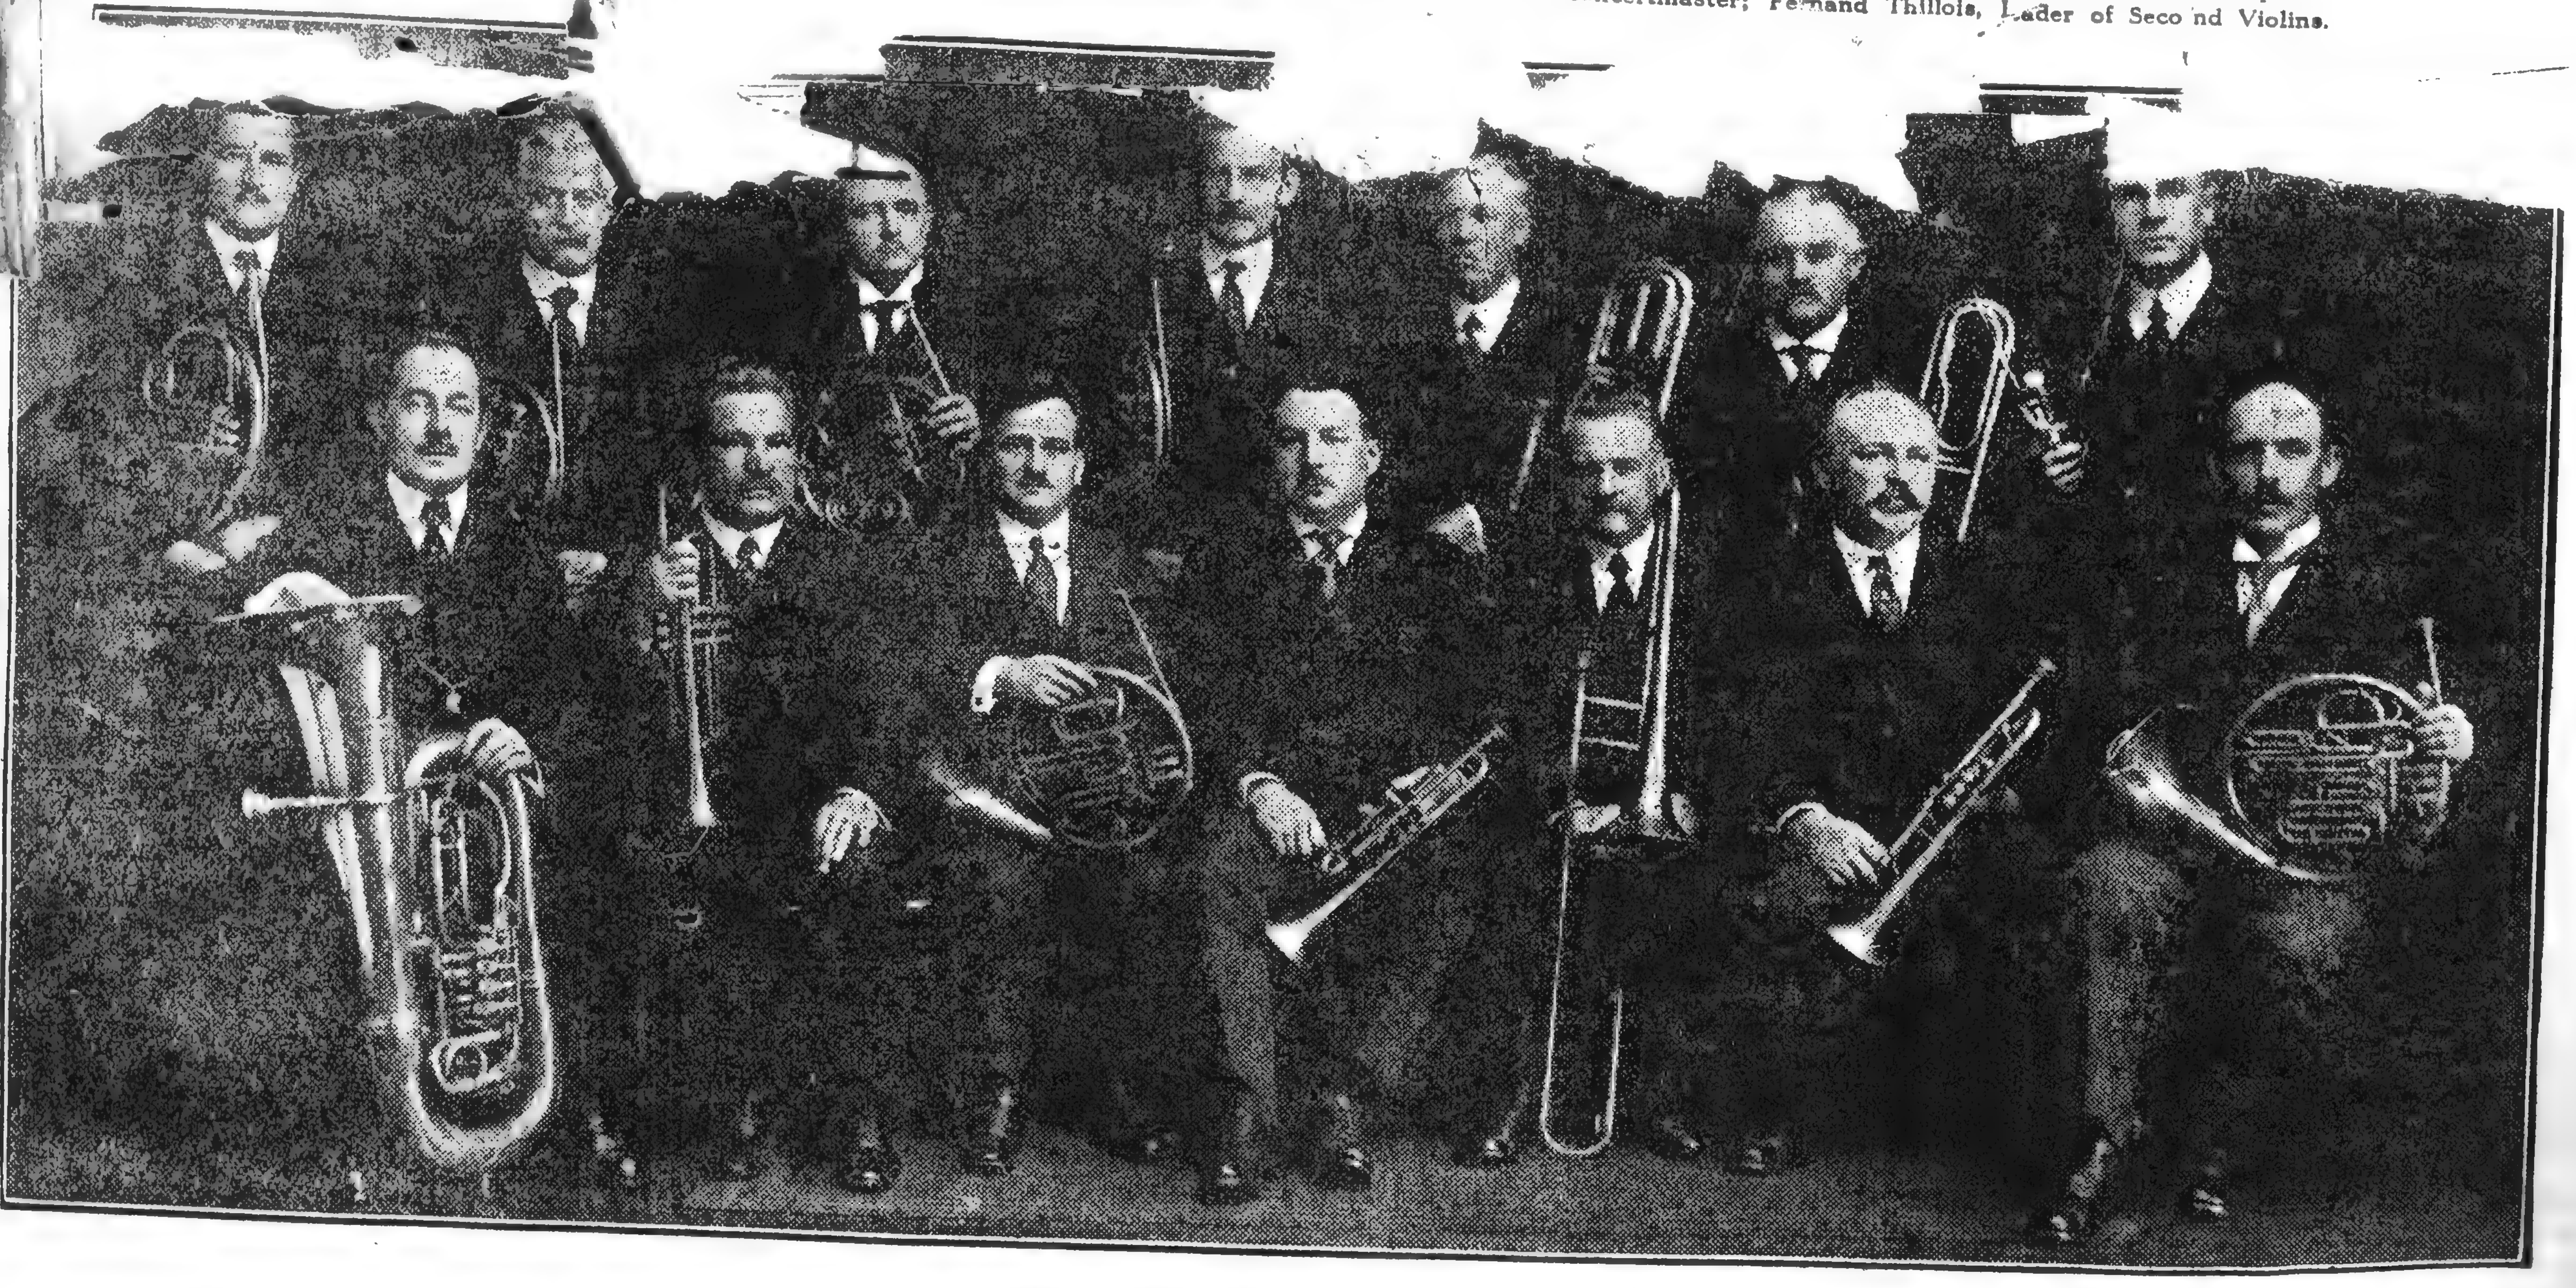
Wood-Wind Choir

Left to Right, Seated—P. Mimart, Bass Clarinet; C. Lenom, Oboe; F. Mueller, English Horn; G. Laurent, First Flute; G. Longy, First Oboe; A. Sand, First Clarinet; A. Laus, First Bassoon; L. Speyer, English Horn.
Left to Right, Standing—B. Piller, Contra Bassoon; E. Arcieri, Clarinet; A. Brook, Flute; H. Stanislaus, Oboe; E. Mueller, Bassoon; A. Vannini, Clarinet; P. Amerena, Flute; F. Bettoney, Bassoon; A. Battles, Piccolo.



Leaders of the String Choir

Left to Right, Seated—Georges Fourel, First Viola; Richard Burgin, ncertmaster; Jean Bedetti, First Violoncellist; Alfred Holy, First Harp.
Left to Right, St —Max Kunze, First Double Bass; Julius Th orowicz, Secon Concertmaster; Fernand Thillois, Leader of Second Violins.



Brass Choir

Left to Right, Seated—E. Adams, Tuba; J. Mann, Trumpet; G. Wendler, First Horn; G. Mager, First Trumpet; C. Hampe, First Trombone; L. Kloepfel, Trumpet; C. Van Den Berg, Horn.
Left to Right, Standing—W. Gebhardt, H. Lorbeer, M. Hess, F. Hain, Horns; L. Kenfield, Trombone; A. Mausebach, Trombone; G. Perret, Trumpet.

Youth Now Leavens Prime

Leaders and Choirs of the Symphony Orchestra for the Current Season

Familiar Figures Freshly Grouped

(Photographs by Horner)

Wood-Wind Choir

Left to Right, Seated—P. Mimart, Bass Clarinet; C. Lenom, Oboe; F. Mueller, English Horn; G. Laurent, First Flute; G. Longy, First Oboe; A. Sand, First Clarinet; A. Laus, First Bassoon; L. Speyer, English Horn.
Left to Right, Standing—B. Piller, Contra Bassoon; E. Arcieri, Clarinet; A. Brook, Flute; H. Stanislaus, Oboe; E. Mueller, Bassoon; A. Vannini, Clarinet; P. Amerena, Flute; F. Bettoney, Bassoon; A. Battles, Piccolo.

Brass Choir

Left to Right, Seated—E. Adams, Tuba; J. Mann, Trumpet; G. Wendler, First Horn; G. Mager, First Trumpet; C. Hampe, First Trombone; L. Kloepfel, Trumpet; C. Van Den Berg, Horn.
Left to Right, Standing—W. Gebhardt, H. Lorbeer, M. Hess, F. Hain, Horns; L. Kenfield, Trombone; A. Mausebach, Trombone; G. Perret, Trumpet.

Leaders of the String Choir

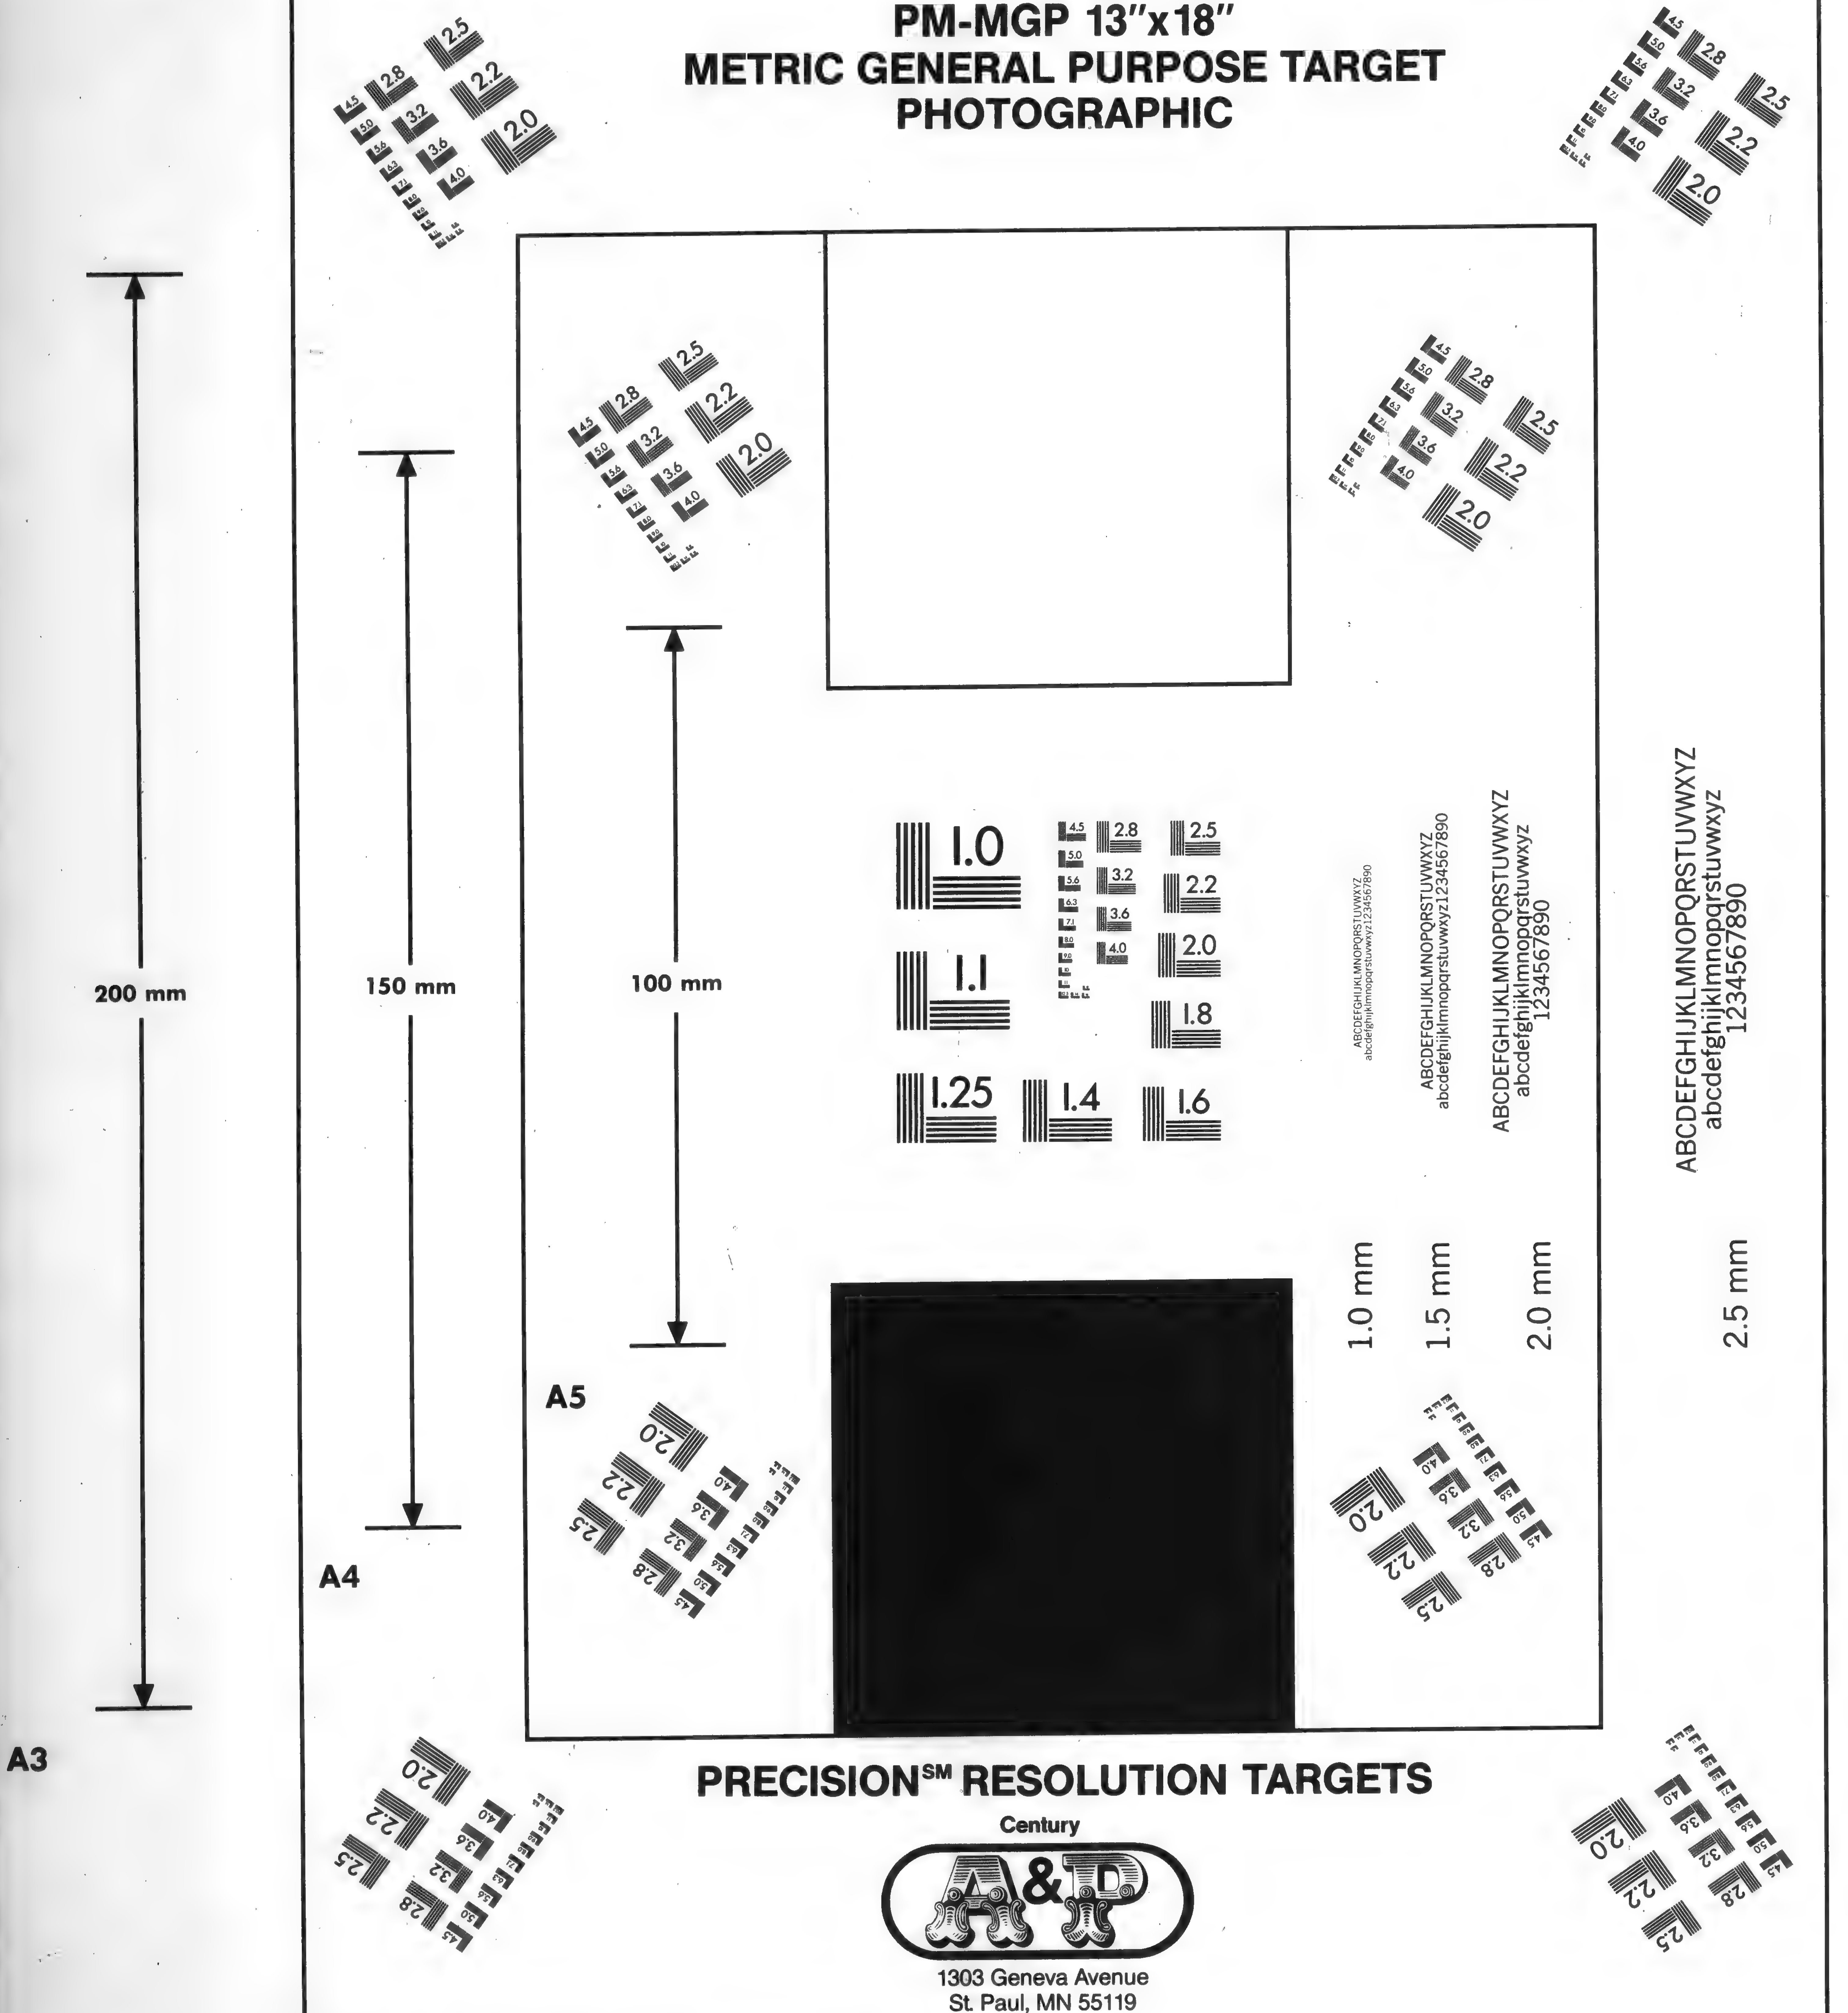
Left to Right, Seated—Georges Fourel, First Viola; Richard Burgin, ncertmaster; Jean Bedetti, First Violoncellist; Alfred Holy, First Harp.
Left to Right, St— —Max Kunze, First Double Bass; Julius Th orowicz, Secon Concertmaster; Fernand Thillois, L der of Second Violins.

TRANS - NOV. 26.

[25]

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.2
2.0
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

TIGHT BINDING

A Boston Music ommission? If Boston could have a commission backed by the authority of the State the city, but serving without pay d free from political "pull," to as- me the financial and musical responsi- lity of bringing to this city the best utside musical performers of all sorts, ere would be no danger of this city sing its position as a musical center. All that is needed is one or more men ith the vision and courage of the late aj Higginson, to whom we owe our ymphony Orchestra, to see that this ty is given a chance to support the st music. The official sanction, ough desirable, could be dispensed ith, as it has been by the Symphony rchestra under Maj Higginson and the esent trustees. But there are few en of affairs who care enough to do hat he did for its sake—pledge their tire fortunes every year of their lives backing an endeavor to give the pub- the best music.

What Atlanta has done for a dozen ars with the Metropolitan Opera is case in point. A group of prominent en there have guaranteed the ex- enses of a week's visit by the best pera company in America, and induced to come each season to a remote city naller than Providence. Last year ere was no deficit, so that they lost othing by the venture, but it is always ossible that they may have to meet loss of many thousand dollars. The etropolitan could certainly have been rought to Boston much more easily an to Atlanta, had there been any- ody here to assume responsibility for e undertaking.

hat Might Be Done

This season, Richard Strauss, who is great conductor as well as a great mposer, is giving a series of orches- concerts in New York. The public re is large enough to make the ven- a good financial speculation. But bring Strauss to Boston with an or- stra for a series of concerts would be un a risk of financial loss too great be braved by the ordinary com- cial manager. There might not be rge deficit, but there could hardly much money in it under the most orable circumstances.

st year the London String Quartet, iously unheard in America, was ght to this country by the generosi- Mrs Coolidge. She saw to it that gave a concert, open to the public of charge, at Harvard, but they heard for the first time in Boston erday, only after a great public suc- in New York and elsewhere last had made it seem a profitable ven- for a commercial manager to bring n here. If this city had had a music mission, official or unofficial, with or more responsible members, we ld have had the London String Quar- here last year to give the series of ethoven quartets they gave in New k.

xamples such as these of what an terprising music commission could for the musical life of the city might indefinitely multiplied. There is a merous and intelligent concert-going blic here, educated by many years of mirable opportunities to listen to the music. This public is skeptical of new musical undertakings which k prominent responsible sponsors, be- use so many inferior performers have the past been foisted on the local blic by unscrupulous speculators. It es not wholly trust the newspaper ad- nce notices, but it too often has noth- else to guide its buying of concert kets for artists unknown here.

f any sort of management could gain local reputation for setting the high- musical standards without regard profit and loss that management uld have only to announce a con- rt, or a series of concerts, to sell most the tickets in advance, provided not o many concerts were offered.

The Symphony concerts have from beginning to the present day com- nded the heartfelt respect of every- e hereabouts who cares to listen to usic. They have never made money. t most of the tickets have invariably en sold at high prices.

uarantee Fund Needed

If any rich man in the city now had j Higginson's fanatical devotion to is,c, and his taste and sense, tha an could at any time organize a music mmission, obtain for it the nominal nction of the State and city, raise solicitation from the public, or from s friends, the necessary large guarantee nd, which would have to be at least 0,000 a year, and then see to it that oston had its chance to support every ceptionally worthwhile musical per- rmance offered to the New York pub- . It would probably not actually cost the uarantors in any one season the full minal amount of the necessary guaran- fund. But some one must assume l financial responsibility if the Met- politan Opera, Richard Strauss with orchestra, the London String Quar- , or any other organization of the t rank is to be brought here.

This city has at present several ex- llent concert managers, none of whom n afford to face a season which is not tty certain to bring them at least modest profit. But the experience of ery city on the continent of Europe shown that the best sort of musical rformances must in the long run be en for glory, rather than for assured fit. Boston is very fortunate to mber among its citizens men willing pay the inevitable deficits of a first e Symphony Orchestra. We are ky enough to have several profes- nal concert managers who know the st when they hear it, and take as ny risks as they can afford to take offering it to the local public. But city is in great need of someone ling to do for other sorts of music at the present trustees are doing for Symphony.

Why not a music commission of the t sketched in this article? What her alternative short of municipal or ate control is there, if Boston is to main a musical center of the first nk?

Vincent D'Indy Coming

Vincent d'Indy, who is one of the best own living French composers, will nduct the regular Boston Symphony ncerts of Dec 9 and 10. He will also ve a piano recital at the Copley-Plaza tel Dec 18.

d'Indy will lead the first perform- e in Boston of his new "Poeme des vages," in four movements, which is to be played in Paris until January. will be given for the first time any- ere in New York Dec 1 and 2 by the mphony Society. His program for Symphony concerts also includes a piece, "Aux Morts," by his pupil, l Le Flem, and "Des Dieux a mbre des cavernes," from Roussel's ocations." A third pupil from the la Cantorum, the Paris music ool of which d'Indy is the head, ce Simonds, will play the piano part ach's D Major Concerto (B. and H. 2).

other numbers are the overture [illegible] in 1607, a chaconne written by Lalande to be played while Louis XIV dined at Versailles, and Mozart's Serenade in D Major for two string orchestras and kettle drums.

The program for his piano recital is not yet announced, but it will presumably include pieces by d'Indy, his pupils, and his revered teacher, Cesar Franck, as well as other standard music.

Monday Symphony Concerts Begin Tomorrow Night

The first of the new series of five Monday evening Boston Symphony concerts will be given at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, with John Powell, the well-known American pianist and composer, as soloist. Mr Powell will play the piano part in Liszt's Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes for piano and orchestra.

The chief number on the program is Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor, one of the very few symphonies which can be mentioned in the same breath with those of Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms. The composer was Belgian by birth, but long residence in Paris and the teaching of compositions to pupils who included d'Indy, Ropartz and Duparc, have made him regarded as primarily a French composer.

The other numbers are Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," and excerpts from Beethoven's ballet, "Prometheus," one of his minor works which is seldom heard nowadays. This piece affords a chance to notice the solo work of Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist; Georges Laurent, flute; Albert Sand, clarinet; Abdon Laus, bassoon, and Alfred Holy, harpist. It makes obvious the fact that the Boston orchestra contains many players who are easily capable of setting up as solo performers.

None of these numbers is to be included in any of the regular symphony programs this season, though all of them are part of the usual repertory of the orchestra. Anybody willing to listen carefully should be able to enjoy this concert without effort, even if unaccustomed to hearing orchestral music. A few seats are still available at very reasonable prices.

Monday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, first concert of new special series. Symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck; overture and fifth ballet from "Prometheus," Beethoven; Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes, Liszt, and "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky-Korsakov. Soloist, John Powell.

GLOBE-NOV. 27.

Symphony Series Opens

Tomorrow evening, Nov. 28, in Symphony Hall at 8:15 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will give the first of its new series of five extra concerts. A memorable programme will inaugurate the series, no numbers of which occur in the other symphony concerts in Boston. The principal work will be the great symphony in D minor by the Belgian master Cesar Franck, which, by its noble conception and soaring eloquence, is generally regarded as the finest achievement in the modern French school of music.

The soloist at this concert will be John Powell, the talented young American pianist who, in concerts of his own and appearances with orchestras in this country and in Europe, has established for himself an enviable reputation. He will play with the great Orchestra Liszt's Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes. The music of Russia will be represented on this programme by Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, noted for its gorgeous colorings and pictorial magnificence. The numbers are Two Alboradas, Variations, Scene and Gypsy Song, and Fandango of the Asturias. A chance to hear the various virtuosos of the orchestra will be afforded by the numbers from Beethoven's Ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus," in which the solo parts will be taken by Jean Bedetti, 'cello; Georges Laurent, flute; Albert Sand, clarinet; Abdon Laus, bassoon, and Alfred Holy, harp.

POST NOV. 27.

Extra Symphony Concerts Start Tomorrow

TOMORROW night, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will give the first of its new series of five extra concerts. A memorable program will inaugurate the series, no numbers of which occur in the other Symphony concerts in Boston. The principal work will be the symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the finest achievement in modern French music.

The soloist will be John Powell, young American pianist, who will play with orchestra Liszt's "Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes." Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," and Beethoven's ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus," will also be played.

D'INDY TO CONDUCT

The next Symphony concerts to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 9 and 10, will be notable in that Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, will appear as guest conductor. His program will include music from Monteverde's "Orfeo," a Lalande chaconne, the Mozart string serenade in D major, the Bach piano concerto (with Bruce Simonds, a D'Indy pupil, as soloist), short pieces by Paul Le Flem and Albert Roussel and D'Indy's new "Poems des Rivages," for full orchestra.

ADVER-NOV 27

[26]

NEW SYMPHONY CONCERTS ARE POPULAR

A large and very appreciative audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the first of the Winter season's series of Monday night concerts.

If there was any doubt that the Monday night concerts would be as successful as the Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts, it was removed last night. And the audience was not disappointed, for Pierre Monteux, conductor, furnished an excellently balanced program.

The concert began with Cesar Franck's majestic, peastic and perfectly beautiful symphony in D minor. The work of the orchestra in this striking symphony was a rare delight to music lovers.

Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus," consisting of the overture and Ballet No. 5, Adagio, was the second number. Particularly pleasing was the Adagio, with its solo flute, solo clarinet, solo bassoon, solo violoncello and solo harp.

John Powell, pianist, was soloist of the evening. His playing was exceptional, and he was recalled again and again by the audience, which was swept off its feet by this brilliant performer. He played Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Tunes.

AMER - NOV. 29.

NEW SERIES OPENED BY SYMPHONY

First of Five Extra Concerts Instant Success

BY OLIN DOWNES

The public response to the first of the series of five extra concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, in Symphony Hall, must have been heartening to the management of that institution. In spite of the weather there was a very large audience, an audience made up of all classes of music lovers, with enthusiasm as great as it was warranted by the occasion.

TWO MASTERPIECES

The programme was admirably arranged, of compositions which are among the most representative in the orchestral repertory, compositions at the same time calculated not only to display the capacities of the orchestra but to interest the great public which does not listen to 24 concerts, season in an out, of symphonic music. It opened with the wondrous symphony of Cesar Franck, a symphony which will probably rank higher than any other composed since the day of Beethoven; two movements, the Overture and Adagio from Beethoven's "Prometheus music"; Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy" for piano and orchestra with John Powell for the piano soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's scintillating masterpiece of instrumentation, the "Spanish Caprice."

Much has been written of this work, famous in the annals of modern orchestration. Mr. Monteux brought out the last color tint, the uttermost sonority in the score.

Mr. Powell played Liszt's rather worn-out old warhorse extremely well. He has the musicianship as well as the technical resource and the virtuoso spirit to make such a work fully effective. It is a pity that he was not asked to play his own "Negro Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra, an uncommonly interesting, original, and exciting composition, in which, as everyone who has heard it knows, this American composer and pianist excels. The audience applauded Mr. Powell to the echo and recalled him, a just recognition of his accomplishment.

The Prometheus music is early Beethoven, but its clarity, its melodiousness, and the beautiful scoring of the Adagio struck precisely the right note of contrast between the extravagant and lively music of Liszt and the supreme nobility of the symphony of Cesar Franck.

The concert was in every way a worthy beginning of a new enterprise on the part of the Boston Symphony management. The attendance and the enthusiasm manifested show that there is in this city a large public, in addition to that which patronizes the Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts, willing and eager to support Symphony concerts outside of the regular subscription series.

POST-NOV. 29

NEW SERIES OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

First of Five Given, With John Powell as Piano Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its new series of five Monday evening concerts last night to an enthusiastic audience, which left few vacant seats in Symphony Hall. Program, soloist and performance were in every way similar to the regular Symphony series, except that none of the numbers played is to be duplicated at the other Boston concerts this season. The orchestra is wisely giving its new public its best work, with no concessions to what is often miscalled popular taste.

John Powell, the Virginian pianist and composer, played the piano part in Liszt's showy fantasy on Hungarian folk tunes with a clarity and vigor which won him many recalls.

This music demands of the performer more energy than subtlety, more bravado than decorum. Mr Powell is too good an American to be able to let himself go in public like the gypsy mountebank Liszt's enemies called him. He was not quite "volcanic" enough, nor were his loud chords as full and sonorous as they might have been. His performance was competent rather than dazzling.

Mr Monteux gave a painstaking yet thrilling performance of the Franck symphony, a masterpiece which as a loyal Frenchman he likes to put on his programs for gala occasions. The brass might have been a bit more subdued at the climaxes in the first allegro. The climaxes in the last movement were a little hurried, at a sacrifice of precision in ensemble.

This music, whether or not one accepts the rhapsodic comments of such partial critics as d'Indy, is original and stirring. The ideas in it may or may not be lofty and profound. The emotion is at least genuine, if less aweinspiring than that in the best work of Bach and Beethoven.

One wished that Mr Monteux had chosen a nobler example from the latter composer's work than the rather trivial excerpts from "Prometheus," though these gave several of the players a chance to demonstrate their skill in solo work.

The final number was Rimsky Korsakoff's brilliant "Spanish Caprice," which uses every resource of the orchestra with the utmost technical skill. The audience obviously enjoyed it.

The second Monday concert will be given Jan 16, with Estelle Liebling, soprano, as soloist.

GLOBE NOV 29.

NEW SERIES BY THE SYMPHONY

First in Group of Extra Concerts Heard by Large Audience

APPEALS TO WIDE VARIETY OF TASTES

In Symphony Hall last night the first of the series of five extra concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. The program was as follows: Symphony in D minor, Franck; Overture and Ballet No. 5, adagio, from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Tunes, for piano and orchestra, Liszt; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff. The soloist was John Powell.

That this group of extra concerts was wisely conceived, both from the point of view of the public and the orchestra and that its success is assured, was strikingly proved by the opening one. The house was filled with few empty seats showing, and this in the face of a record-breaking storm.

The program while not "popular" in the common sense of the word was of a kind to appeal to a wide variety of tastes and required no "musical education" to appreciate and enjoy. Conductor and orchestra were imbued with the desire to give the "outside public" that for different reasons does not hear the regular symphony concerts the best of their artistry. That public, as represented by last night's throng, was plainly hungry for just the sort of music as that offered, performed in just the superb way in which it was given, and devoured it with avidity and keen pleasure.

The audience was stirred to enthusiasm at the start by the splendors and beauties of Cesar Franck's glorification of faith and the joy of living. The delicate yet firm loveliness of Beethoven's Prometheus ballet music was absorbed in a tense silence rarely known in Symphony Hall. At its close and after the people had a chance to hear the solo virtuosity of Mr. Bedetti, violin-'cello; Mr. Laurent, flute; Mr. Sand, clarinet; Mr. Laus, bassoon, and Mr. Holy, harp, the applause was spontaneous and great and prolonged until all the solo performers were forced to rise and acknowledge the tribute. Beethoven made the "hit" of the concert.

Mr. Powell, whose work as a pianist is known to Boston, but who appeared with the orchestra for the first time, played the lively Liszt piece in a way that roused a storm of approval. He had to "come out" four or five times.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Russian interpretation of Spanish themes—morning serenade, variations, gypsy song and fandango, full of sparkle, zest, color zip and splendors of tone—was a fitting ending for a delightful musical feast.

HERALD-NOV. 29.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

NEW PUBLIC FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Auspicious Beginning with the "Special Concerts"—A Numerous Interested and Significant Audience — Conductor and Band on Their Mettle—Harvard Hears the London String Quartet

CLEARLY the new series of Symphony Concerts, begun last evening in Symphony Hall, has awakened interest and quickened curiosity. In spite of a storm that, in degree, isolated the suburbs from the city, there were few vacant places in the balconies, and not too many upon the higher-priced floor. According to expectation and desire, the audience was a variegated company. For auspicious sign, men abounded in it—many more of them than the "regular concert" of Friday afternoon assembles; quite as many as that of Saturday evening musters. Evidently, the masculine ear still hears the Symphony Orchestra gladly, though the cautious masculine spirit may hesitate to commit itself to twenty-four repetitions of the experience. Youthful faces were also many; whereas the usual aspect of Symphony Hall on a Friday or a Saturday is middle-aged, not to say elderly. Frequenters of any and all concerts were discoverable in parquet and balconies; some who have mistakenly mistrusted the merit of the orchestra since the days of reorganization, returned unobtrusively—and doubtless perceived how groundless were many of their doubts and alarms. The prospectus of many a Bostonian school names the Symphony Concerts as one of the pleasures and advantages of academic residence hereabouts. The pupils do not always seem like-minded; but last evening in appreciable numbers students came to hear. None the less, to watch and to listen to the audience was to discover one pervading mood. The major part of it had come on a voyage of discovery; had heard of the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Concerts; had wondered over them; wished now to learn how much individual satisfaction was to be found in them

This mood of curiosity and test made the response of the audience the most significant incident of the evening. Here in germ was a new, a widened, a perpetuating public for the Symphony Concerts, a public that long since they should have cultivated, a public well worth the winning for its own sake and for the sake of the orchestra. Interest, curiosity, anticipation had assembled it. If it were pleased, it would return, spread good report, make an experiment of 1921-22 regular course in the concerts of 1922-23. Throughout the evening and by every sign the audience was interested but as plainly it was feeling its way. There was more applause for Mr. Monteux as the concert advanced than when he came first to the conductor's stand. Manifestly his hearers wished to make acquaintance with him before they approved or welcomed. At no time were the plaudits long and insistent enough to bring the whole orchestra to its feet but they fell in showers upon the first flute, the first clarinet, the first violoncello, the first harp, after their displayful exercises in a dance from Beethoven's "Prometheus." Once and twice all four rose from their places at the conductor's call. Longer and louder was the clapping for Mr. Powell, playing the piano-part in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia and playing it with none too much rhapsodic fervor. Plainly the audience pricked up its ears when isolated orchestral voices began to exchange cadenzas in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice."

By these signs contributing persons rather than the orchestra in itself or the chosen pieces in themselves most interested "the new public" or at the least most warmed it to applause. For the music as such Franck's Symphony seemed somewhat to baffle it and Beethoven's Overture to the ballet of "Prometheus" to leave it cold. The latter piece has fared no better with more practised audiences; the former asks not a little of unprepared hearers. (Possibly the elder, transparent music of Haydn or Mozart might better have provided a symphony.) On the other hand, the Hungarian Fantasia—or Mr. Powell for the moment incarnating it—pleased much; while the "Spanish Caprice," fanciful and vivid, highly colored and sharply rhythmed, won the heartiest plaudits of all. It might have done as much at any Symphony Concert. As most signs went, a pleased audience departed. It had discovered that Symphony Concerts are not awesome; it had learned that a Symphony Orchestra gives pleasure. Progress and reward enough for two hours in one evening.

As became the occasion, conductor and orchestra were on their mettle. Easily at "regular concerts" at home, they can take their audience for granted as it—somewhat too often—takes them. A new public to be pleased and won is fresh impulse. Hence, perhaps, the verve and virtuosity of the playing of the "Spanish Caprice," show-piece these many years for the band; the full-throated vigors of Francks more sonorous periods; the soft suavity and lustre of tone upon Beethoven's songful and filagreed dance. On other occasions, it would be permissible to write of Mr. Monteux's occasional excess of zeal with Franck's Symphony, moving it in over-thick tonal masses, over-emphasizing the clangorous motiv of faith and freedom until at the end no climax remains within it. There also might be discourse upon the emptiness of Liszt's Fantasia unless pianist and conductor can make it sound like twenty Hungarian gypsies alternating fiddles and cimbalons. But in the beginnings of last evening the audience—that long-desired "new public"—was the essential thing.

H. T. P.

TRANS-NOV 29.

TIGHT BINDING

A Boston Music ommission?

If Boston could have a commission
backed by the authority of the State
the city, but serving without pay d free from political "pull," to as-me the financial and musical responsi-ility of bringing to this city the best tside musical performers of all sorts, ere would be no danger of this city
sing its position as a musical center.
All that is needed is one or more men ith the vision and courage of the late aj Higginson, to whom we owe our ymphony Orchestra, to see that this y is given a chance to support the st music. The official sanction, ough desirable, could be dispensed ith, as it has been by the Symphony rchestra under Maj Higginson and the esent trustees. But there are few en of affairs who care enough to do hat he did for its sake—pledge their tire fortunes every year of their lives backing an endeavor to give the pub-the best music.
What Atlanta has done for a dozen ars with the Metropolitan Opera is case in point. A group of prominent en there have guaranteed the exenses of a week's visit by the best era company in America, and induced to come each season to a remote city aller than Providence. Last year ere was no deficit, so that they lost thing by the venture, but it is always ssible that they may have to meet loss of many thousand dollars. The etropolitan could certainly have been ought to Boston much more easily an to Atlanta, had there been anydy here to assume responsibility for e undertaking.

hat Might Be Done

This season, Richard Strauss, who is great conductor as well as a great mposer, is giving a series of orches-l concerts in New York. The public re is large enough to make the ven-e a good financial speculation. But bring Strauss to Boston with an orstra for a series of concerts would be run a risk of financial loss too great be braved by the ordinary com-rcial manager. There might not be arge deficit, but there could hardly much money in it under the most orable circumstances.
ast year the London String Quartet, viously unheard in America, was ught to this country by the generosiof Mrs Coolidge. She saw to it that y gave a concert, open to the public of charge, at Harvard, but they re heard for the first time in Boston terday, only after a great public suc-s in New York and elsewhere last ar had made it seem a profitable ven-e for a commercial manager to bring em here. If this city had had a music mmission, official or unofficial, with or more responsible members, we uld have had the London String Quarhere last year to give the series of ethoven quartets they gave in New rk.
Examples such as these of what an terprising music commission could for the musical life of the city might indefinitely multiplied. There is a merous and intelligent concert-going blic here, educated by many years of mirable opportunities to listen to the st music. This public is skeptical of new musical undertakings which k prominent responsible sponsors, be-use so many inferior performers have the past been foisted on the local blic by unscrupulous speculators. It es not wholly trust the newspaper ad-nce notices, but it too often has nothelse to guide its buying of concert
kets for artists unknown here.
f any sort of management could gain local reputation for setting the hight musical standards without regard profit and loss that management uld have only to announce a con-rt, or a series of concerts, to sell most the tickets in advance, provided not many concerts were offered.
The Symphony concerts have from beginning to the present day comanded the heartfelt respect of every-e hereabouts who cares to listen to usic. They have never made money.
t most of the tickets have invariably en sold at high prices.

uarantee Fund Needed

f any rich man in the city now had j Higginson's fanatical devotion to usic, and his taste and sense, that an could at any time organize a music mmission, obtain for it the nominal nction of the State and city, raise solicitation from the public, or from friends, the necessary large guarantee nd, which would have to be at least 0,000 a year, and then see to it that ston had its chance to support every ceptionally worthwhile musical perrmance offered to the New York pub-
It would probably not actually cost the arantors in any one season the full minal amount of the necessary guaran-fund. But some one must assume financial responsibility if the Metpolitan Opera, Richard Strauss with orchestra, the London String Quar-or any other organization of the t rank is to be brought here.
This city has at present several ex-llent concert managers, none of whom n afford to face a season which is not tty certain to bring them at least modest profit. But the experience of ry city on the continent of Europe
s shown that the best sort of musical rformances must in the long run be ven for glory, rather than for assured fit. Boston is very fortunate to mber among its citizens men willing pay the inevitable deficits of a first e Symphony Orchestra. We are cky enough to have several profesnal concert managers who know the t when they hear it, and take as ny risks as they can afford to take offering it to the local public. But city is in great need of someone lling to do for other sorts of music at the present trustees are doing for e Symphony.
Why not a music commission of the t sketched in this article? What er alternative short of municipal or te control is there, if Boston is to main a musical center of the first nk?

Vincent D'Indy Coming

Vincent d'Indy, who is one of the best nown living French composers, will nduct the regular Boston Symphony ncerts of Dec 9 and 10. He will also e a piano recital at the Copley-Plaza
tel Dec 18.
d'Indy will lead the first perform-e in Boston of his new "Poeme des ages," in four movements, which is to be played in Paris until January.
will be given for the first time any-ere in New York Dec 1 and 2 by the mphony Society. His program for Symphony concerts also includes a piece, "Aux Morts," by his pupil, l Le Flem, and "Des Dieux a bre des cavernes," from Roussel's ocations." A third pupil from the ola Cantorum, the Paris music
ool of which d'Indy is the head, ce Simonds, will play the piano part ach's D Major Concerto (B. and H.
12).
e other numbers are the overture onteverde's [illegible] composed in 1607, a chaconne written by Lalande to be played while Louis XIV dined at Versailles, and Mozart's Serenade in D Major for two string orchestras and kettle drums.

The program for his piano recital is not yet announced, but it will presumably include pieces by d'Indy, his pupils, and his revered teacher, Cesar Franck, as well as other standard music.

Monday Symphony Concerts Begin Tomorrow Night

The first of the new series of five Monday evening Boston Symphony concerts will be given at Symphony Hall tomorrow evening, with John Powell, the well-known American pianist and composer, as soloist. Mr Powell will play the piano part in Liszt's Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes for piano and orchestra.

The chief number on the program is Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor, one of the very few symphonies which can be mentioned in the same breath with those of Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms. The composer was Belgian by birth, but long residence in Paris and the teaching of compositions to pupils who included d'Indy, Ropartz and Duparc, have made him regarded as primarily a French composer.

The other numbers are Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," and excerpts from Beethoven's ballet, "Prometheus," one of his minor works which is seldom heard nowadays. This piece affords a chance to notice the solo work of Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist; Georges Laurent, flute; Albert Sand, clarinet; Abdon Laus, bassoon, and Alfred Holy, harpist. It makes obvious the fact that the Boston orchestra contains many players who are easily capable of setting up as solo performers.

None of these numbers is to be included in any of the regular symphony programs this season, though all of them are part of the usual repertory of the orchestra. Anybody willing to listen carefully should be able to enjoy this concert without effort, even if unaccustomed to hearing orchestral music. A few seats are still available at very reasonable prices.

Monday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, first concert of new special series. Symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck; overture and fifth ballet from "Prometheus," Beethoven; Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes, Liszt, and "Spanish Caprice," Rimsky-Korsakov. Soloist, John Powell, pianist.

GLOBE - NOV. 27

Symphony Series Opens

Tomorrow evening, Nov. 28, in Symphony Hall at 8:15 the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will give the first of its new series of five extra concerts. A memorable programme will inaugurate the series, no numbers of which occur in the other symphony concerts in Boston. The principal work will be the great symphony in D minor by the Belgian master Cesar Franck, which, by its noble conception and soaring eloquence, is generally regarded as the finest achievement in the modern French school of music.

The soloist at this concert will be John Powell, the talented young American pianist who, in concerts of his own and appearances with orchestras in this country and in Europe, has established for himself an enviable reputation. He will play with the great Orchestra Liszt's Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes. The music of Russia will be represented on this programme by Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, noted for its gorgeous colorings and pictorial magnificence. The numbers are Two Alboradas, Variations, Scene and Gypsy Song, and Fandango of the Asturias. A chance to hear the various virtuosos of the orchestra will be afforded by the numbers from Beethoven's Ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus," in which the solo parts will be taken by Jean Bedetti, 'cello; Georges Laurent, flute; Albert Sand, clarinet; Abdon Laus, bassoon, and Alfred Holy, harp.

POST NOV. 27

Extra Symphony Concerts Start Tomorrow

TOMORROW night, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will give the first of its new series of five extra concerts. A memorable program will inaugurate the series, no numbers of which occur in the other Symphony concerts in Boston. The principal work will be the symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the finest achievement in modern French music.

The soloist will be John Powell, young American pianist, who will play with orchestra Liszt's "Fantasy on Hungarian Folk Tunes." Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," and Beethoven's ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus," will also be played.

D'INDY TO CONDUCT

The next Symphony concerts to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 9 and 10, will be notable in that Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, will appear as guest conductor. His program will include music from Monteverde's "Orfeo," a Lalande chaconne, the Mozart string serenade in D major, the Bach piano concerto (with Bruce Simonds, a D'Indy pupil, as soloist), short pieces by Paul Le Flem and Albert Roussel and D'Indy's new "Poems des Rivages," for full orchestra.

ADVER - NOV 27

[26]

NEW SYMPHONY CONCERTS ARE POPULAR

A large and very appreciative audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the first of the Winter season's series of Monday night concerts.

If there was any doubt that the Monday night concerts would be as successful as the Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts, it was removed last night. And the audience was not disappointed, for Pierre Monteux, conductor, furnished an excellently balanced program.

The concert began with Cesar Franck's majestic, peastic and perfectly beautiful symphony in D minor. The work of the orchestra in this striking symphony was a rare delight to music lovers.

Beethoven's "The Creatures of Prometheus," consisting of the overture and Ballet No. 5. Adagio, was the second number. Particularly pleasing was the Adagio, with its solo flute, solo clarinet, solo bassoon, solo violoncello and solo harp.

John Powell, pianist, was soloist of the evening. His playing was exceptional, and he was recalled again and again by the audience, which was swept off its feet by this brilliant performer. He played Liszt's Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Tunes.

AMER - NOV. 29.

NEW SERIES OPENED BY SYMPHONY

First of Five Extra Concerts Instant Success

BY OLIN DOWNES

The public response to the first of the series of five extra concerts to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, in Symphony Hall, must have been heartening to the management of that institution. In spite of the weather there was a very large audience, an audience made up of all classes of music lovers, with enthusiasm as great as it was warranted by the occasion.

TWO MASTERPIECES

The programme was admirably arranged, of compositions which are among the most representative in the orchestral repertory, compositions at the same time calculated not only to display the capacities of the orchestra but to interest the great public which does not listen to 24 concerts, season in an out, of symphonic music. It opened with the wondrous symphony of Cesar Franck, a symphony which will probably rank higher than any other composed since the day of Beethoven; two movements, the Overture and Adagio from Beethoven's "Prometheus music"; Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy" for piano and orchestra with John Powell for the piano soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's scintillating masterpiece of instrumentation, the "Spanish Caprice."

Much has been written of this work, famous in the annals of modern orchestration. Mr. Monteux brought out the last color tint, the uttermost sonority in the score.

Mr. Powell played Liszt's rather worn-out old warhorse extremely well. He has the musicianship as well as the technical resource and the virtuoso spirit to make such a work fully effective. It is a pity that he was not asked to play his own "Negro Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra, an uncommonly interesting, original, and exciting composition, in which, as everyone who has heard it knows, this American composer and pianist excels. The audience applauded Mr. Powell to the echo and recalled him, a just recognition of his accomplishment.

The Prometheus music is early Beethoven, but its clarity, its melodiousness, and the beautiful scoring of the Adagio struck precisely the right note of contrast between the extravagant and lively music of Liszt and the supreme nobility of the symphony of Cesar Franck.

The concert was in every way a worthy beginning of a new enterprise on the part of the Boston Symphony management. The attendance and the enthusiasm manifested show that there is in this city a large public, in addition to that which patronizes the Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts, willing and eager to support Symphony concerts outside of the regular subscription series.

POST - NOV. 29.

NEW SERIES OF SYMPHONY CONCERTS

First of Five Given, With John Powell as Piano Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its new series of five Monday evening concerts last night to an enthusiastic audience, which left few vacant seats in Symphony Hall. Program, soloist and performance were in every way similar to the regular Symphony series, except that none of the numbers played is to be duplicated at the other Boston concerts this season. The orchestra is wisely giving its new public its best work, with no concessions to what is often miscalled popular taste.

John Powell, the Virginian pianist and composer, played the piano part in Liszt's showy fantasy on Hungarian folk tunes with a clarity and vigor which won him many recalls.

This music demands of the performer more energy than subtlety, more bravado than decorum. Mr Powell is too good an American to be able to let himself go in public like the gypsy mountebank Liszt's enemies called him. He was not quite "volcanic" enough, nor were his loud chords as full and sonorous as they might have been. His performance was competent rather than dazzling.

Mr Monteux gave a painstaking yet thrilling performance of the Franck symphony, a masterpiece which as a loyal Frenchman he likes to put on his programs for gala occasions. The brass might have been a bit more subdued at the climaxes in the first allegro. The climaxes in the last movement were a little hurried, at a sacrifice of precision in ensemble.

This music, whether or not one accepts the rhapsodic comments of such partial critics as d'Indy, is original and stirring. The ideas in it may or may not be lofty and profound. The emotion is at least genuine, if less awe-inspiring than that in the best work of Bach and Beethoven.

One wished that Mr Monteux had chosen a nobler example from the latter composer's work than the rather trivial excerpts from "Prometheus," though these gave several of the players a chance to demonstrate their skill in solo work.

The final number was Rimsky Korsakoff's brilliant "Spanish Caprice," which uses every resource of the orchestra with the utmost technical skill. The audience obviously enjoyed it.

The second Monday concert will be given Jan 16, with Estelle Liebling, soprano, as soloist.

GLOBE NOV 29.

NEW SERIES BY THE SYMPHONY

First in Group of Extra Concerts Heard by Large Audience

APPEALS TO WIDE VARIETY OF TASTES

In Symphony Hall last night the first of the series of five extra concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given. The program was as follows: Symphony in D minor, Franck; Overture and Ballet No. 5, adagio, from Beethoven's ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus"; Fantasia on Hungarian Folk Tunes, for piano and orchestra, Liszt; Caprice on Spanish Themes, Rimsky-Korsakoff. The soloist was John Powell.

That this group of extra concerts was wisely conceived, both from the point of view of the public and the orchestra and that its success is assured, was strikingly proved by the opening one. The house was filled with few empty seats showing, and this in the face of a record-breaking storm.

The program while not "popular" in the common sense of the word was of a kind to appeal to a wide variety of tastes and required no "musical education" to appreciate and enjoy. Conductor and orchestra were imbued with the desire to give the "outside public" that for different reasons does not hear the regular symphony concerts the best of their artistry. That public, as represented by last night's throng, was plainly hungry for just the sort of music as that offered, performed in just the superb way in which it was given, and devoured it with avidity and keen pleasure.

The audience was stirred to enthusiasm at the start by the splendors and beauties of Cesar Franck's glorification of faith and the joy of living. The delicate yet firm loveliness of Beethoven's Prometheus ballet music was absorbed in a tense silence rarely known in Symphony Hall. At its close and after the people had a chance to hear the solo virtuosity of Mr. Bedetti, violin-'cello; Mr. Laurent, flute; Mr. Sand, clarinet; Mr. Laus, bassoon, and Mr. Holy, harp, the applause was spontaneous and great and prolonged until all the solo performers were forced to rise and acknowledge the tribute. Beethoven made the "hit" of the concert.

Mr. Powell, whose work as a pianist is known to Boston, but who appeared with the orchestra for the first time, played the lively Liszt piece in a way that roused a storm of approval. He had to "come out" four or five times.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Russian interpretation of Spanish themes—morning serenade, variations, gypsy song and fandango, full of sparkle, zest, color zip and splendors of tone—was a fitting ending for a delightful musical feast.

HERALD - NOV. 29.

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

NEW PUBLIC FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Auspicious Beginning with the "Special Concerts"—A Numerous Interested and Significant Audience — Conductor and Band on Their Mettle—Harvard Hears the London String Quartet

CLEARLY the new series of Symphony Concerts, begun last evening in Symphony Hall, has awakened interest and quickened curiosity. In spite of a storm that, in degree, isolated the suburbs from the city, there were few vacant places in the balconies and not too many upon the higher-priced floor. According to expectation and desire, the audience was a variegated company. For auspicious sign, men abounded in it—many more of them than the "regular concert" of Friday afternoon assembles; quite as many as that of Saturday evening musters. Evidently, the masculine ear still hears the Symphony Orchestra gladly, though the cautious masculine spirit may hesitate to commit itself to twenty-four repetitions of the experience. Youthful faces were also many; whereas the usual aspect of Symphony Hall on a Friday or a Saturday is middle-aged, not to say elderly. Frequenters of any and all concerts were discoverable in parquet and balconies; some who have mistakenly mistrusted the merit of the orchestra since the days of reorganization, returned unobtrusively—and doubtless perceived how groundless were many of their doubts and alarms. The prospectus of many a Bostonian school names the Symphony Concerts as one of the pleasures and advantages of academic residence hereabouts. The pupils do not always seem like-minded; but last evening in appreciable numbers students came to hear. None the less, to watch and to listen to the audience was to discover one pervading mood. The major part of it had come on a voyage of discovery; had heard of the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Concerts; had wondered over them; wished now to learn how much individual satisfaction was to be found in them

This mood of curiosity and test made the response of the audience the most significant incident of the evening. Here in germ was a new, a widened, a perpetuating public for the Symphony Concerts, a public that long since they should have cultivated, a public well worth the winning for its own sake and for the sake of the orchestra. Interest, curiosity, anticipation had assembled it. If it were pleased, it would return, spread good report, make an experiment of 1921-22 regular course in the concerts of 1922-23. Throughout the evening and by every sign the audience was interested but as plainly it was feeling its way. There was more applause for Mr. Monteux as the concert advanced than when he came first to the conductor's stand. Manifestly his hearers wished to make acquaintance with him before they approved or welcomed. At no time were the plaudits long and insistent enough to bring the whole orchestra to its feet but they fell in showers upon the first flute, the first clarinet, the first violoncello, the first harp, after their displayful exercises in a dance from Beethoven's "Prometheus." Once and twice all four rose from their places at the conductor's call. Longer and louder was the clapping for Mr. Powell, playing the piano-part in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia and playing it with none too much rhapsodic fervor. Plainly the audience pricked up its ears when isolated orchestral voices began to exchange cadenzas in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice."

By these signs contributing persons rather than the orchestra in itself or the chosen pieces in themselves most interested "the new public" or at the least most warmed it to applause. For the music as such Franck's Symphony seemed somewhat to baffle it and Beethoven's Overture to the ballet of "Prometheus" to leave it cold. The latter piece has fared no better with more practised audiences; the former asks not a little of unprepared hearers. (Possibly the elder, transparent music of Haydn or Mozart might better have provided a symphony.) On the other hand, the Hungarian Fantasia—or Mr. Powell for the moment incarnating it—pleased much; while the "Spanish Caprice," fanciful and vivid, highly colored and sharply rhythmed, won the heartiest plaudits of all. It might have done as much at any Symphony Concert. As most signs went, a pleased audience departed. It had discovered that Symphony Concerts are not awesome; it had learned that a Symphony Orchestra gives pleasure. Progress and reward enough for two hours in one evening.

As became the occasion, conductor and orchestra were on their mettle. Easily at "regular concerts" at home, they can take their audience for granted as it—somewhat too often—takes them. A new public to be pleased and won is fresh impulse. Hence, perhaps, the verve and virtuosity of the playing of the "Spanish Caprice," show-piece these many years for the band; the full-throated vigors of Francks more sonorous periods; the soft suavity and lustre of tone upon Beethoven's songful and filagreed dance. On other occasions, it would be permissible to write of Mr. Monteux's occasional excess of zeal with Franck's Symphony, moving it in over-thick tonal masses, over-emphasizing the clangorous motiv of faith and freedom until at the end no climax remains within it. There also might be discourse upon the emptiness of Liszt's Fantasia unless pianist and conductor can make it sound like twenty Hungarian gypsies alternating fiddles and cimbalons. But in the beginnings of last evening the audience—that long-desired "new public"—was the essential thing.

H. T. P.

TRANS - NOV 29.

…EY TO CONDUCT

…next pair of Symphony concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and …day evening, December 9 and … Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, will preside as guest conductor. At these concerts he will conduct the following music of early …composers: Monteverde's overture to "Orfeo," the Chaconne, written by de Lalande; Bach's piano concerto in D major, and Mozart's nocturnal serenade for two string orchestras.

AMER-DEC. 3.

D'Indy with the Symphony Orchestra—Rakhmaninov as Pianist—The Cecilia in "The Damnation of Faust"—The Gideons' Novel Recital — Assorted Pianists and Singers

At the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux for the first times during his term in Boston, will give place to a visiting conductor—the Parisian composer, Vincent d'Indy, now making a round of cities in the United States. Sixteen years ago, he similarly led the Symphony Orchestra; but in those days his music, name and fame were less familiar than they have since become. In 1921 he returns with reason to reap this deserved harvest from a responsive orchestra and public. For the impending concerts he has divided his programme between ancient pieces and music by himself and his pupils. From the ancients he chooses the Overture to "Orpheus," Monteverde's opera of 1607; a Chaconne by the Parisian, Lalande, dating from 1712; a concerto in D major by Bach for piano and orchestra; a Serenade for two string orchestras and drums by Mozart—all four unfamiliar numbers. In the Concerto, Mr. Bruce Simonds, instructor in music at Yale and recently pupil at Mr. d'Indy's school of music in Paris, will play the solo part. The second division of the programme begins with a tone-poem, "To the Dead" by Le Fleur, another little known pupil; proceeds with a fragment of Roussel's "Evocations" and ends with the newest music of the composer-conductor himself—a "Poem of the Seashore." Therein he would evoke in tones "Calm and Light," "Blue Depths," "Green Horizons" and "The Mystery of the Ocean." A recent journey up and down Italian coasts suggested the music. Since the ancient pieces are short, the length of the programme is not so formidable as it seems.

With Mr. Monteux conducting, the Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening at the third of its current concerts in Cambridge. Three numbers fill the programme: Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" with which the conductor is eloquent; Haydn's Concerto for violoncello; the fragments from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë," lately heard at Symphony Hall. In the Concerto, Mr. Bedetti, notable virtuoso though he sit in the orchestra, will play the solo…

TRANS-DEC-3.

D'Indy at Symphony Concerts

At the next pair of Symphony concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 9 and 10, Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, will preside as guest conductor.

At these concerts he will conduct the following music of early composers: Monteverde's overture to "Orfeo," one of the first operas ever written (1607); the Chaconne, written by DeLalande for Louis XIV (1712); Bach's piano concerto in D minor, in which Bruce T. Simonds, the young pupil of M. d'Indy, will play the piano part (1724); and Mozart's nocturnal serenade for two-string orchestras (1776).

TRAV. DEC-3.

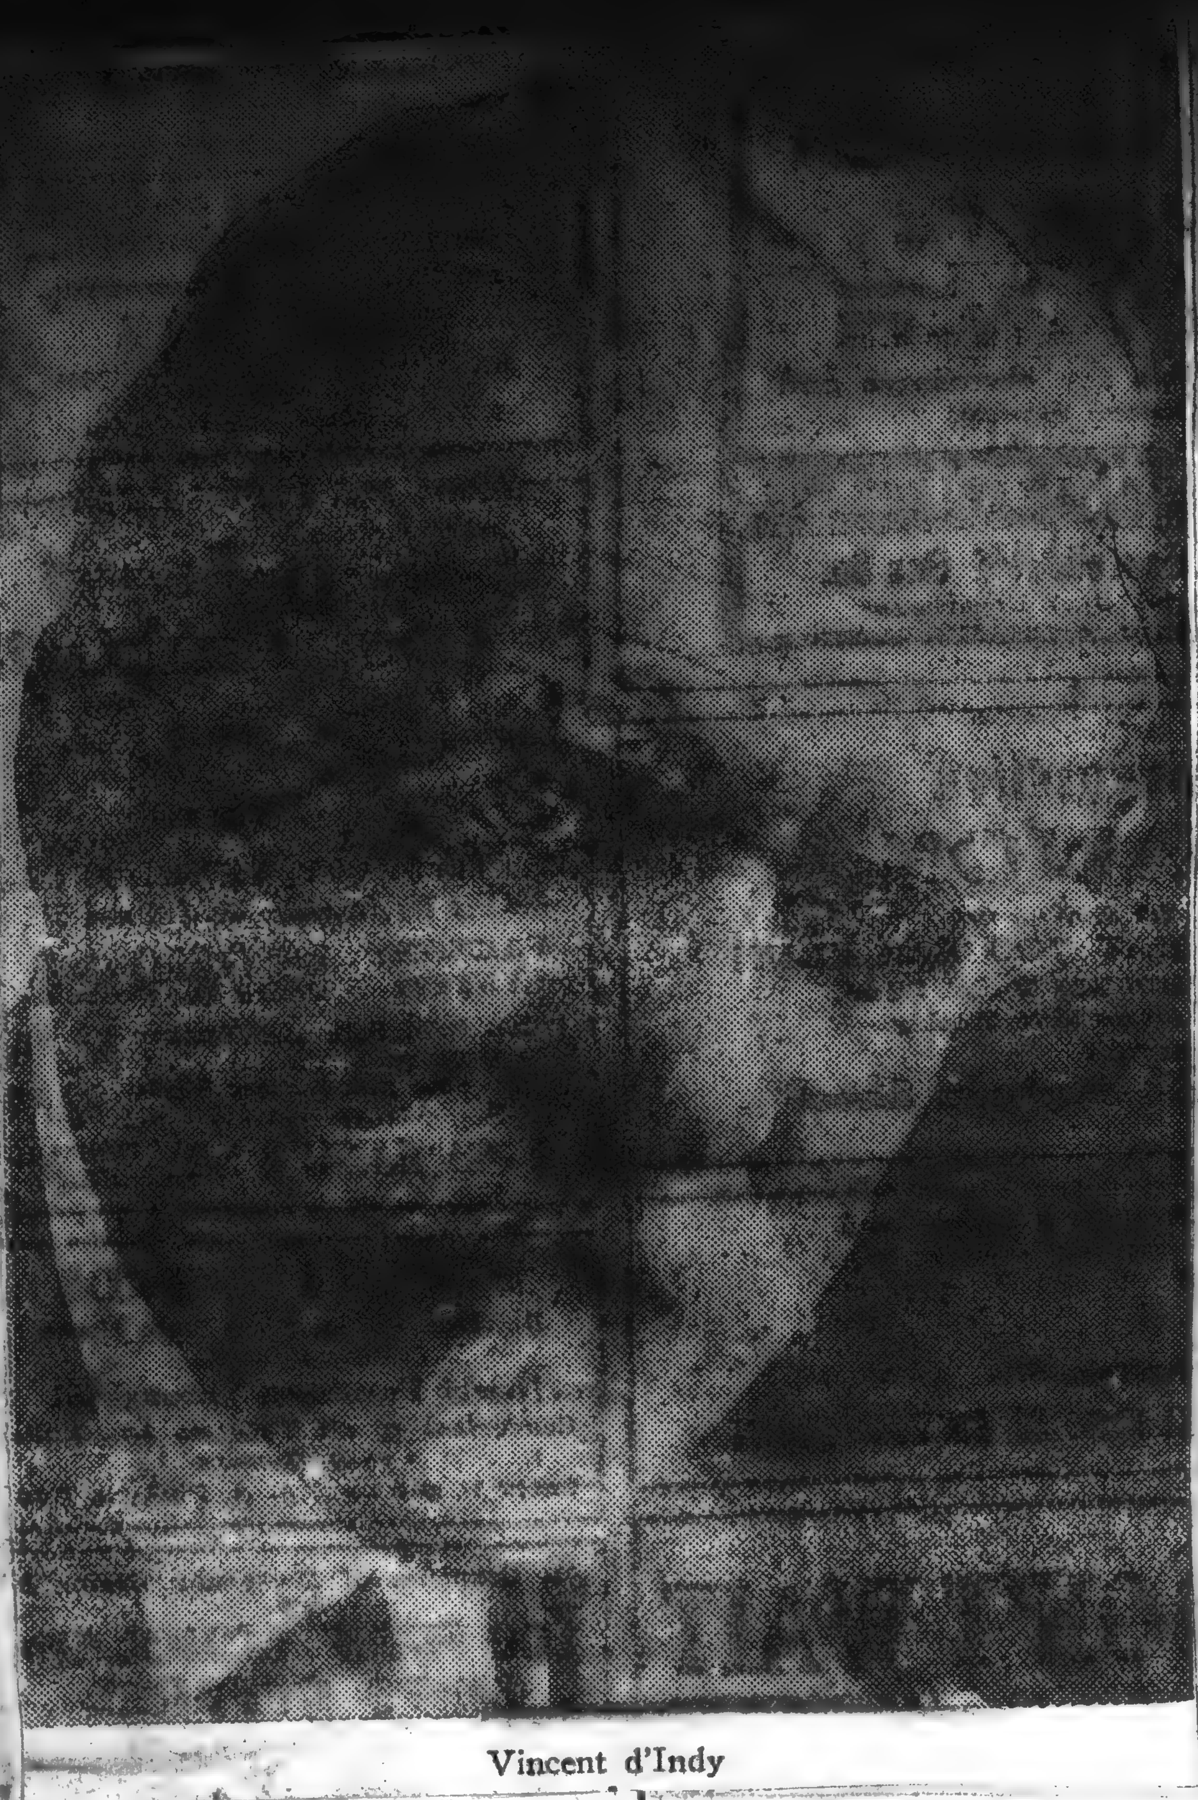
Mr. d'Indy returns to visit us, a distinguished musical guest, after a lapse of some years. He will be welcomed with a welcome given not only to a representative of his nation, but to one of the most individual and impressive creative talents of the present day. He will be heard here not only as a conductor, but as a pianist and an interpreter in intimate surroundings of his own music. It is rather a pity that these surroundings should be of the semi-social character that the performance in a big Boston hotel will unquestionably assume. There are others beside musical specialists and the socially occupied who should hear Mr. d'Indy and he is too great a musician to be so served to the Boston public. But at any rate there will be the opportunity of hearing early and late compositions of this modern master.

The programme to be given at the Symphony concerts will be one of the most interesting programmes to have been presented of late years by the Boston orchestra in Symphony Hall. It differs strikingly from the programme Mr. d'Indy arranged for the Boston Symphony patrons when he was here before in that it will be of old rather than new music, yet music far less familiar here than the modern French compositions which Mr. d'Indy interpreted as guest conductor on his previous visit. At that time Mr. d'Indy, who thought he had arranged for music lovers of this city a programme of new compositions, discovered that every single work he had elected to play was known in advance by his audience, not excluding d'Indy's own 2nd smyphony, recently completed at that time.

But as a musical antiquarian, as a passionate and illuminating student and anything but a dry pedant in his researches into the musical past, Mr. d'Indy will be a surprise and a discovery to many Bostonians. Much of the music he discourses this time will be new to his hearers—new to them for the paradoxical reason that it is so old.

D'INDY TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

…air of Boston Sym…



Vincent d'Indy

phony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 9 and 10, Vincent d'Indy, the celebrated French musician, will appear as guest conductor. M. d'Indy recently arrived in New York in prepaparation for several concerts in this country.

This will be the second time that this composer has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for when he paid his earlier visit to America in 1905, he conductd Boston Symphony concerts in Boston and other cities.

Vincent d'Indy's reputation as a creative artist is of the highest and of long standing. Attaining prominence in his youth by the beauty of his compositions, he became a foremost pupil and disciple of Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, and has written a notable book on the life and art of his beloved confrere. Since his last visit here he has added works of high importance to the list of his original compositions, and trained some pupils of notable talent in his Schola Cantorum in Paris.

He has chosen the following unusual programme for his appearance here, of which the first portion will comprise music before the time of Beethoven, and the second portion, music by the two most distinguished pupils of the Schola Cantorum, together with his own latest work. The numbers follow:

Monteverde's Overture to the Opera, "Orfeo" (1607); de LaLande's Chaconne, written for Louis XIV. (1712); Bach's D-major Concerto for Piano, in which the piano part will be taken by Bruce T. Simonds, the talented young American musician, who has studied with d'Indy; Mozart's "Nocturnal Serenade" for Two-String Orchestras, in D major; a new piece, entitled "To the Dead," by LeFlem, and "The Gods in the Shadows of the Caverns" from Roussel's "Evocations." D'Indy's new work, which will close the programme, is called "Poeme des Rivages," and includes— 1, "Calme et lumiere"; 2, "La joie du Bleu profond"; 3, "Horizons verts"; 4, "Le mystere de l'Ocean."

POST-DEC. 4.

VINCENT D'INDY

Following his appearance as conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next week, Vincent d'Indy will give a piano recital in the ballroom of the Copley-Plaza Hotel on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 18, at 4 o'clock. The program:

L'Entretien des Muses (1724)	Rameau
Sonata en Fa dieze mineur (1794)	Rust
Sarabande (1872)	Castillon
Gibraltar (1914)	Turina
(Extrait de l'Album de Viaje.)
Poems des Montagnes (1881)	D'Indy
Harmonie. Le Chant des Bruyeres.
Danse rythmiquez.
Plain air. Harmonie.
Paysage	Chabrier
Melancolie (1888)
Scherzo valse
(Extraits des Pieces pittoresques.)

HERALD-DEC. 4.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Vincent d'Indy, guest conductor. Overture to "Orfeo," Monteverde; Chaconne, Lalande; Concerto in D major for piano and orchestra, Bach; Serenade for Two String Orchestras, in D major, Mozart; "Pour les morts," Le Flem (First time here); "Les Dieux à l'ombre des cavernes," Roussel; "Poems des Rivages," d'Indy (First time here). Soloist, Bruce T. Simonds.

GLOBE-DEC. 4.

Items and Incidents

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra played Franck's Symphony in New York last Saturday afternoon and The Herald found in the performance "much beauty of tone, with color and with warmth of delivery. It might have been possible to make some parts of the work more transparent and others more luminous, but on the whole the performance was one to command admiration." In turn The Times spoke warmly of the playing of the string choir on the preceding Thursday through Schönberg's Sextet, "Transfiguring Night."

TRANS-DEC 5.

BOSTON RECEIVES "POEM OF YOUTH" WITH HIGH PRAIS

David Stanley Smith's Lates Played By Symphony Orchestra Of That City.

REFLECTS GOLDEN YEAR

Similar In Feeling To "Princ Hal" (1912)—Notes By Composer.

At a recent program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the forty-first season—the first performance was given of David Stanley Smith's "A Poem of Youth," which the criticisms have been most enthusiastic.

Dean Smith's "Prince Hal" gave the talented author standing when it appeared and now follows this more ambitious work.

"Prince Hal," was intended by the composer as "a sort of musical portrait of Shakespeare's prince as he is delineated in 'Henry IVY' This overture composed in 1911 was performed for the first time at a concert of the New Haven (Conn.) Orchestra in December, 1912.

"A Poem of Youth" was composed during the summer of 1920 at Pocono Lake, Pennsylvania. It is scored for three flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, double-bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, military drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, harp, and the usual strings.

The literature of the recent occasion in Boston contains some notes on the "Poem of Youth" (op. 47) which will interest friends of the Dean of the Yale Music school.

A Glorification of Youth.

"My intention was to write a piece similar in feeling to my overture, 'Prince Hal,' at the same time making use of the increased power which ten years' experience had presumably been storing up since the composition of the earlier work. As it turns out, the similarity does not extend beyond a prevailing expression in each piece of good humor and youthful buoyance. In structure and material the new work is considerably different.

"Rough speaking, the 'Poem of Youth' presents the same material twice, the exposition and recapitulation being in their usual places, but it departs from the sonata form in that a quiet middle section takes the place of the traditional free fantasia. The piece opens with short contrasting passages, alternately fast and slow. During this introductory portion there is free use of unresolved dissonances. One of these, E-natural over a B-flat major chord, has an important place in the thematic scheme. It will be noted also that the oboe solo in the first slow passage becomes the principal melody of the middle section of the work.

"The actual first subject of the fast movement is a long, simple melody for high violins in the key of B-flat. A sprightly passage in E-major for oboes marks the entrance of subsidiary material.

"There was no program in the composer's mind while writing this music. The title has no further significance than that of calling attention to the purport of the work, namely, good cheer, impulsiveness, and manly vigor and freshness. The lyric middle section, tranquil, even wistful at times, serves as a relaxation of the tension, and is inserted on musical rather than programmatic grounds."

Dean Smith's Musical Career

Mr. Smith was graduated from Yale university in 1900. He studied music chiefly with Horatio Parker. After graduation he spent two years in London, Munich and Paris. He played the organ in churches of New Haven from 1905 till 1916. Appointed instructor of musical theory at Yale in 1903, he was made professor of that branch in 1916. He is now dean of the Yale School of Music, conductor of the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, and conductor of the Horatio Parker choir. He received the degree of Doctor of Music from Northwestern university, Evanston, Ill., in 1918.

Among his other compositions are: Symphony No. 1, F minor, Op. 28 (Chicago, December 13, 1912); Suite, "Impressions," Op. 40 (Minneapolis and Chicago); Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 42 (Norfolk, Conn., Festival, June 3, 1917; Chicago, February 7 1919).

N.H. JOURNEL COO. DEC. 8

D'INDY AS A VISITING CONDUCTOR

Symphony Plays Old and New Works Under His Baton

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vincent D'Indy appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Some had hoped that the programme would contain more than one work by d'Indy. Mr. d'Indy himself had planned otherwise. He was present not as a propagandist of d'Indy, but as a high priest of art.

18TH CENTURY GLORIES

He brought freshly to the attention and the wonder of an audience the glories of the 18th century music in conducting performances of the Mozart "Serenata notturna" in D major for two string orchestras, Lalande's "Musique pour les soupers du Roy," and J. S. Bach's concerto in D major for harpsichord, the piano part played by Bruce Simonds, the young American musician, who is a pupil of Mr. d'Indy.

The new work was Mr. d'Indy's "Poeme des Rivages" ("Poem of the Seas"), composed or completed this year, played for the first time anywhere in New York on Dec. 1, and played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon.

Players and Hearers Rise

Every honor was extended to this distinguished composer. Orchestra and audience rose when he appeared on the stage, and stood while applause swept the hall. At the end of the "Poeme des Rivages" the people remained for some moments, recalling him to the platform.

The "Poeme des rivages" is in four movements. A formalist might call it a symphonic suite. The titles of the movements are, "Calm and Light," "The Joy of the Deep Blue," "Green Horizons," "The Ocean's Mystery." Their movements are contrasted in movement and mood. At the same time, while the manner of the composer is often impressionistic, they are symphonic in the manipulation of thematic material, and they are bound together by motives which recur worigwol or altered forms in different movements. The first movement is not unremindful of pages of Mr. d'Indy's symphony, "Summer Day on the Mountain." It may be said that in no one of his works has this composer proven more expert in his mastery of the tone-colors of the orchestra.

Colors in Picture

After the broad, introductory first movement the second, more virile and animated in mood, is in the spirit of a symphonic allegro. The third movement has much humor. The composer's little joke as he watches different vistas of the shore at Falconera, on the Adriatic, where this movement, it appears, was composed.

There is a movement which tarts slowly and then grows faster, until it hums along as a train might hum "allegro" along the rails and over the humming figure are heard more or less whimsical flourishes, squeaks, etc., and then a funny little tune. There is a more poetic interlude. The style is that of a scherzo.

In Tragic Cast

In the last movement there is first a reminder of the mysterious introduction of the opening, but the music assumes a more tragic and majestic cast, a requiem, as it might be, of the deep. This merge into a fast movement, joyous, elemental, like a sport of the waves. Through these sounds, toward the last is heard again the motive of the requiem, as we choose to call it (let not the reader think Mr. d'Indy is annoying his hearers with a programme. They are left to imagine what they like and so are we). The end is calm again, a brooding calm, like nature, like deep waters.

This last movement is the most symphonic in character of the four. It has the strongest physiognomy. It is interesting and typical of d'Indy, elsewhere in the work; that however impressionistic he may be, however intent of evoking a mood of a musical structure, his writing and his coloring are extremely clear.

Sane, Clear and Logical

How much of orchestration is the deliberate reflection and workmanship of the composer, and how much is the orchestration an instinctive reflex of the composers mind, just as a man's hand-writing is the reflex of his mind, or his nerves, or both? Masters of their art, like Mr. d'Indy use instruments in many different ways, but each way is unmistakably characteristic of one man.

The sanity, the clearness, logic, and sense of proportion, above all, the nobility of character which animate the man and his life and his works, permeate not only the music itself, but the beautiful instrumentation of this "Poem of the Seas."

NDY TO CONDUCT

t the next pair of Symphony concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 9 and 10, Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, will preside as guest conductor. At these concerts he will conduct the following music of early composers: Monteverde's overture to "Orfeo," the Chaconne, written by de Lalande; Bach's piano concerto in D major, and Mozart's nocturnal serenade for two string orchestras.

AMER-DEC. 3.

D'Indy with the Symphony Orchestra—Rakhmaninov as Pianist—The Cecilia in "The Damnation of Faust"—The Gideons' Novel Recital — Assorted Pianists and Singers

AT the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux for the first times during his term in Boston, will give place to a visiting conductor—the Parisian composer, Vincent d'Indy, now making a round of cities in the United States. Sixteen years ago, he similarly led the Symphony Orchestra; but in those days his music, name and fame were less familiar than they have since become. In 1921 he returns with reason to reap this deserved harvest from a responsive orchestra and public. For the impending concerts he has divided his programme between ancient pieces and music by himself and his pupils. From the ancients he chooses the Overture to "Orpheus," Monteverde's opera of 1607; a Chaconne by the Parisian, Lalande, dating from 1712; a concerto in D major by Bach for piano and orchestra; a Serenade for two string orchestras and drums by Mozart—all four unfamiliar numbers. In the Concerto, Mr. Bruce Simonds, instructor in music at Yale and recently pupil at Mr. d'Indy's school of music in Paris, will play the solo part. The second division of the programme begins with a tone-poem, "To the Dead" by Le Fleur, another little known pupil; proceeds with a fragment of Roussel's "Evocations" and ends with the newest music of the composer-conductor himself—a "Poem of the Seashore." Therein he would evoke in tones "Calm and Light," "Blue Depths," "Green Horizons" and "The Mystery of the Ocean." A recent journey up and down Italian coasts suggested the music. Since the ancient pieces are short, the length of the programme is not so formidable as it seems.

With Mr. Monteux conducting, the Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening at the third of its current concerts in Cambridge. Three numbers fill the programme: Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" with which the conductor is eloquent; Haydn's Concerto for violoncello; the fragments from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloë," lately heard at Symphony Hall. In the Concerto, Mr. Bedetti, notable virtuoso though he sit in the orchestra, will play the solo part.

TRANS-DEC-3.

D'Indy at Symphony Concerts

At the next pair of Symphony concerts, which will take place in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 9 and 10, Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, will preside as guest conductor.

At these concerts he will conduct the following music of early composers: Monteverde's overture to "Orfeo," one of the first operas ever written (1607); the Chaconne, written by DeLalande for Louis XIV (1712); Bach's piano concerto in D minor, in which Bruce T. Simonds, the young pupil of M. d'Indy, will play the piano part (1724); and Mozart's nocturnal serenade for two-string orchestras (1776).

TRAV. DEC-3.

Mr. d'Indy returns to visit us, a distinguished musical guest, after a lapse of some years. He will be welcomed with a welcome given not only to a representative of his nation, but to one of the most individual and impressive creative talents of the present day. He will be heard here not only as a conductor, but as a pianist and an interpreter in intimate surroundings of his own music. It is rather a pity that these surroundings should be of the semi-social character that the performance in a big Boston hotel will unquestionably assume. There are others beside musical specialists and the socially occupied who should hear Mr. d'Indy and he is too great a musician to be so served to the Boston public. But at any rate there will be the opportunity of hearing early and late compositions of this modern master.

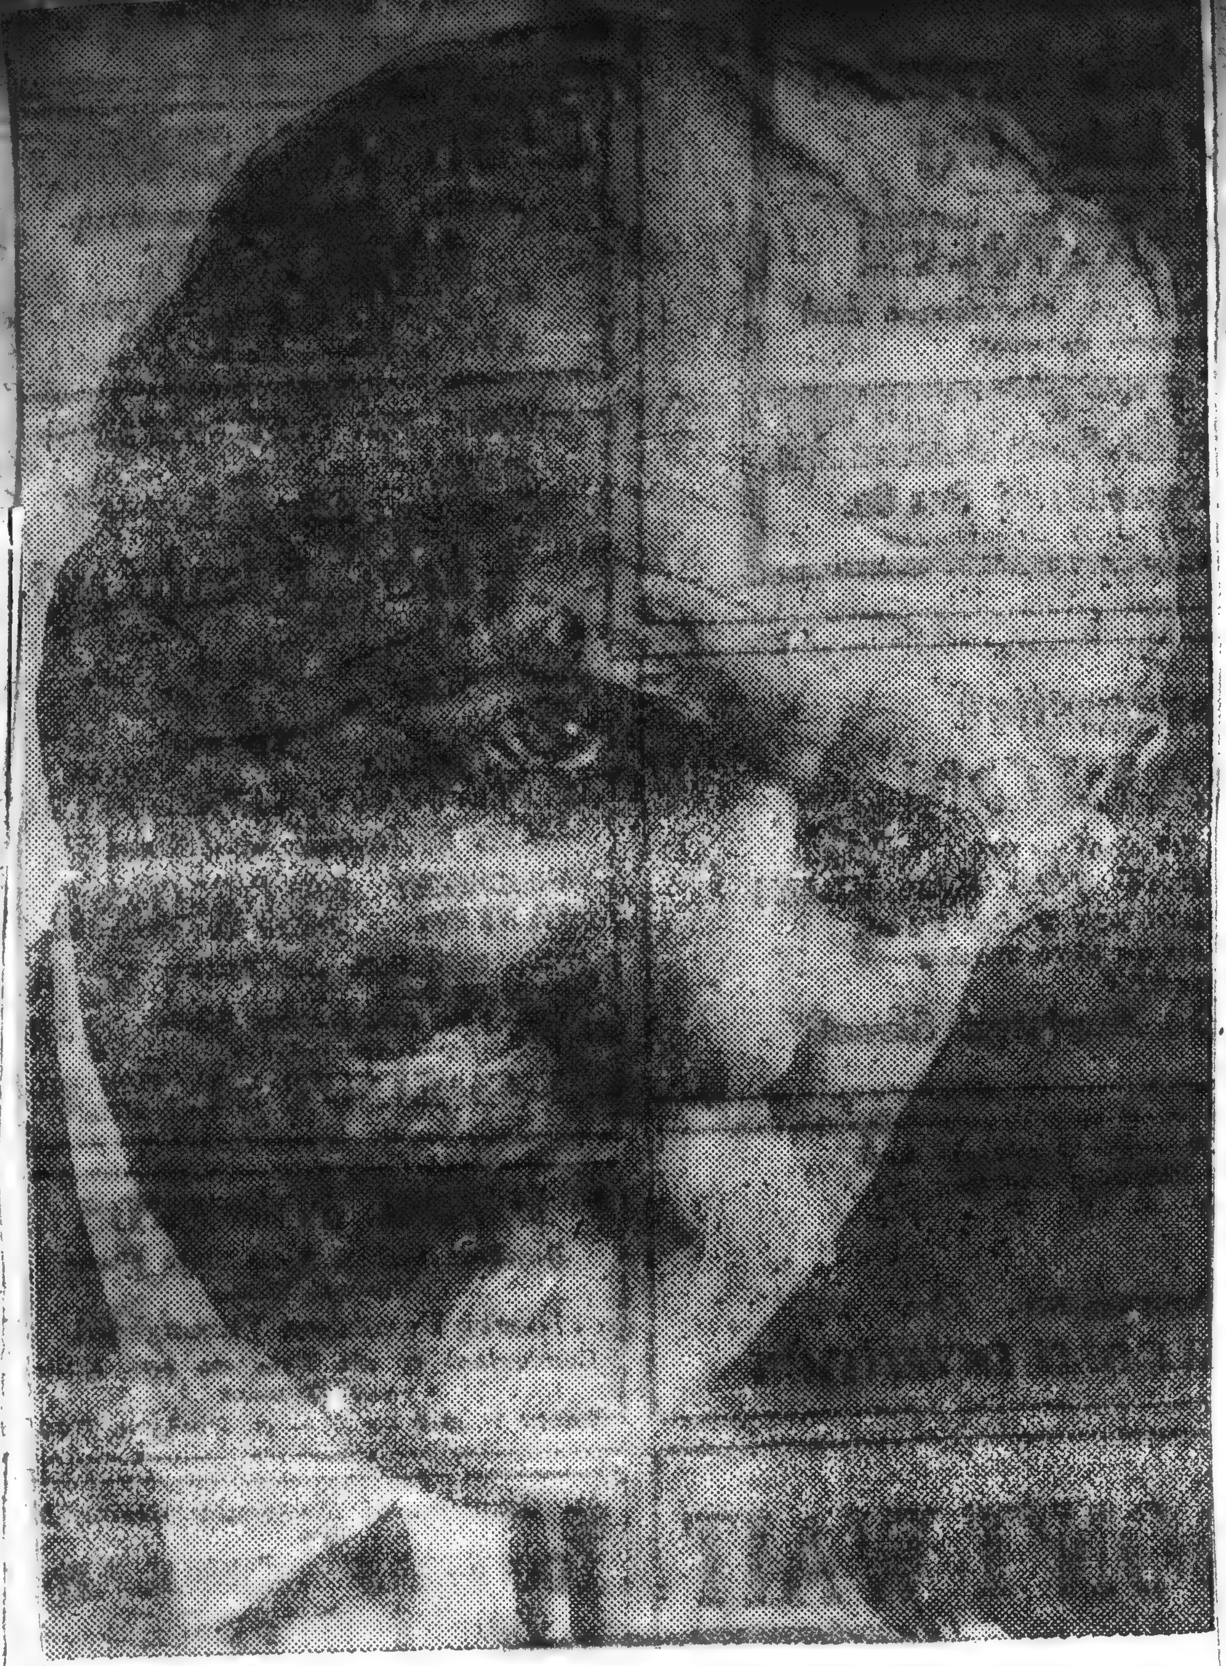
The programme to be given at the Symphony concerts will be one of the most interesting programmes to have been presented of late years by the Boston orchestra in Symphony Hall. It differs strikingly from the programme Mr. d'Indy arranged for the Boston Symphony patrons when he was here before in that it will be of old rather than new music, yet music far less familiar here than the modern French compositions which Mr. d'Indy interpreted as guest conductor on his previous visit. At that time Mr. d'Indy, who thought he had arranged for music lovers of this city a programme of new compositions, discovered that every single work he had elected to play was known in advance by his audience, not excluding d'Indy's own 2nd smyphony, recently completed at that time.

But as a musical antiquarian, as a passionate and illuminating student and anything but a dry pedant in his researches into the musical past, Mr. d'Indy will be a surprise and a discovery to many Bostonians. Much of the music he discourses this time will be new to his hearers—new to them for the paradoxical reason that it is so old.

D'INDY TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

pair of Boston Sym-

given at Sym-



Vincent d'Indy

phony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 9 and 10, Vincent d'Indy, the celebrated French musician, will appear as guest conductor. M. d'Indy recently arrived in New York in prepaparation for several concerts in this country.

This will be the second time that this composer has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for when he paid his earlier visit to America in 1905, he conductd Boston Symphony concerts in Boston and other cities.

Vincent d'Indy's reputation as a creative artist is of the highest and of long standing. Attaining prominence in his youth by the beauty of his compositions, he became a foremost pupil and disciple of Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, and has written a notable book on the life and art of his beloved confrere. Since his last visit here he has added works of high importance to the list of his original compositions, and trained some pupils of notable talent in his Schola Cantorum in Paris.

He has chosen the following unusual programme for his appearance here, of which the first portion will comprise music before the time of Beethoven, and the second portion, music by the two most distinguished pupils of the Schola Cantorum, together with his own latest work. The numbers follow:

Monteverde's Overture to the Opera, "Orfeo" (1607); de LaLande's Chaconne, written for Louis XIV. (1712); Bach's D-major Concerto for Piano, in which the piano part will be taken by Bruce T. Simonds, the talented young American musician, who has studied with d'Indy; Mozart's "Nocturnal Serenade" for Two-String Orchestras, in D major; a new piece, entitled "To the Dead," by LeFlem, and "The Gods in the Shadows of the Caverns" from Roussel's "Evocations." D'Indy's new work, which will close the programme, is called "Poeme des Rivages," and includes— 1, "Calme et lumiere"; 2, "La joie du Bleu profond"; 3, "Horizons verts"; 4, "Le mystere de l'Ocean."

POST-DEC.4.

Items and Incidents

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra played Franck's Symphony in New York last Saturday afternoon and The Herald found in the performance "much beauty of tone, with color and with warmth of delivery. It might have been possible to make some parts of the work more transparent and others more luminous, but on the whole the performance was one to command admiration." In turn The Times spoke warmly of the playing of the string choir on the preceding Thursday through Schönberg's Sextet, "Transfiguring Night."

TRANS-DEC5.

VINCENT D'INDY

Following his appearance as conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall next week, Vincent d'Indy will give a piano recital in the ballroom of the Copley-Plaza Hotel on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 18, at 4 o'clock. The program:

L'Entretien des Muses (1724) .... Rameau
Sonata en Fa dieze mineur (1794) .... Rust
Sarabande (1872) .... Castillon
Gibraltar (1914) .... Turina
(Extrait de l'Album de Viaje.)
Poems des Montagnes (1881) .... D'Indy
Harmonie. Le Chant des Bruyeres.
Danse rythmiquez.
Plain air, Harmonie.
Paysage .... } Chabrier
Melancolie (1888) .... }
Scherzo valse .... }
(Extraits des Pieces pittoresques.)

HERALD-DEC.4.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Vincent d'Indy, guest conductor. Overture to "Orfeo," Monteverde; Chaconne, Lalande; Concerto in D major for piano and orchestra, Bach; Serenade for Two String Orchestras, in D major, Mozart; "Pour les morts," Le Flem (First time here); "Les Dieux a l'ombre des cavernes," Roussel; "Poems des Rivages," d'Indy (First time here). Soloist, Bruce T. Simonds.

GLOBE-DEC.4.

BOSTON RECEIVES "POEM OF YOUTH" WITH HIGH PRAIS

David Stanley Smith's Lates Played By Symphony Orchestra Of That City.

REFLECTS GOLDEN YEAR

Similar In Feeling To "Princ Hal" (1912)—Notes By Composer.

At a recent program of the Bosto Symphony Orchestra—the forty first season—the first performanc was given of David Stanley Smith's "A Poem of Youth," which the criticisms have been most enthusiastic.

Dean Smith's "Prince Hal" gave the talented author standing when it appeared and now follows this more ambitious work.

"Prince Hal," was intended by the composer as "a sort of musical portrait of Shakespeare's prince as he is delineated in 'Henry IV.' This overture composed in 1911 was performed for the first time at a concert of the New Haven (Conn.) Orchestra in December, 1912.

"A Poem of Youth" was composed during the summer of 1920 at Pocono Lake, Pennsylvania. It is scored for three flutes, two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, double-bassoon, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, kettledrums, military drum, bass drum, cymbals, triangle, harp, and the usual strings.

The literature of the recent occasion in Boston contains some notes on the "Poem of Youth" (op. 47) which will interest friends of the Dean of the Yale Music school.

A Glorification of Youth.

"My intention was to write a piece similar in feeling to my overture, 'Prince Hal,' at the same time making use of the increased power which ten years' experience had presumably been storing up since the composition of the earlier work. As it turns out, the similarity does not extend beyond a prevailing expression in each piece of good humor and youthful buoyance. In structure and material the new work is considerably different.

"Rough speaking, the 'Poem of Youth' presents the same material twice, the exposition and recapitulation being in their usual places, but it departs from the sonata form in that a quiet middle section takes the place of the traditional free fantasia. The piece opens with short contrasting passages, alternately fast and slow. During this introductory portion there is free use of unresolved dissonances. One of these, E-natural over a B-flat major chord, has an important place in the thematic scheme. It will be noted also that the oboe solo in the first slow passage becomes the principal melody of the middle section of the work.

"The actual first subject of the fast movement is a long, simple melody for high violins in the key of B-flat. A sprightly passage in E-major for oboes marks the entrance of subsidiary material.

"There was no program in the composer's mind while writing this music. The title has no further significance than that of calling attention to the purport of the work, namely, good cheer, impulsiveness, and manly vigor and freshness. The lyric middle section, tranquil, even wistful at times, serves as a relaxation of the tension, and is inserted on musical rather than programmatic grounds."

Dean Smith's Musical Career

Mr. Smith was graduated from Yale university in 1900. He studied music chiefly with Horatio Parker. After graduation he spent two years in London, Munich and Paris. He played the organ in churches of New Haven from 1905 till 1916. Appointed instructor of musical theory at Yale in 1903, he was made professor of that branch in 1916. He is now dean of the Yale School of Music; conductor of the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, and conductor of the Horatio Parker choir. He received the degree of Doctor of Music from Northwestern university, Evanston, Ill., in 1918.

Among his other compositions are: Symphony No. 1, F minor, Op. 28 (Chicago, December 13, 1912); Suite, "Impressions," Op. 40 (Minneapolis and Chicago); Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 42 (Norfolk, Conn., Festival, June 3, 1917; Chicago, February 7 1919).

N.H. JOURNEL COU. DEC. 8

D'INDY AS A VISITING CONDUCTOR

Symphony Plays Old and New Works Under His Baton

BY OLIN DOWNES

Vincent D'Indy appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Some had hoped that the programme would contain more than one work by d'Indy. Mr. d'Indy himself had planned otherwise. He was present not as a propagandist of d'Indy, but as a high priest of art.

18TH CENTURY GLORIES

He brought freshly to the attention and the wonder of an audience the glories of the 18th century music in conducting performances of the Mozart "Serenata notturna" in D major for two string orchestras, Lalande's "Musique pour les soupers du Roy," and J. S. Bach's concerto in D major for harpsichord, the piano part played by Bruce Simonds, the young American musician, who is a pupil of Mr. d'Indy.

The new work was Mr. d'Indy's "Poeme des Rivages" ("Poem of the Seas"), composed or completed this year, played for the first time anywhere in New York on Dec. 1, and played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon.

Players and Hearers Rise

Every honor was extended to this distinguished composer. Orchestra and audience rose when he appeared on the stage, and stood while applause swept the hall. At the end of the "Poeme des Rivages" the people remained for some moments, recalling him to the platform.

The "Poeme des rivages" is in four movements. A formalist might call it a symphonic suite. The titles of the movements are, "Calm and Light," "The Joy of the Deep Blue," "Green Horizons," "The Ocean's Mystery." Their movements are contrasted in movement and mood. At the same time, while the manner of the composer is often impressionistic, they are symphonic in the manipulation of thematic material, and they are bound together by motives which recur worigwol or altered forms in different movements. The first movement is not unremindful of pages of Mr. d'Indy's symphony, "Summer Day on the Mountain." It may be said that in no one of his works has this composer proven more expert in his mastery of the tone-colors of the orchestra.

Colors in Picture

After the broad, introductory first movement the second, more virile and animated in mood, is in the spirit of a symphonic allegro. The third movement has much humor. The composer's little joke as he watches different vistas of the shore at Falconera, on the Adriatic, where this movement, as it appears, was composed.

There is a movement which starts slowly and then grows faster, until it hums along as a train might hum "allegro" along the rails and over the humming figure are heard more or less whimsical flourishes, squeaks, etc., and then a funny little tune. There is a more poetic interlude. The style is that of a scherzo.

In Tragic Cast

In the last movement there is first a reminder of the mysterious introduction of the opening, but the music assumes a more tragic and majestic cast, a requiem, as it might be, of the deep. This merge into a fast movement, joyous, elemental, like a sport of the waves. Through these sounds, toward the last is heard again the motive of the requiem, as we choose to call it (let not the reader think Mr. d'Indy is annoying his hearers with a programme. They are left to imagine what they like and so are we). The end is calm again, a brooding calm, like nature, like deep waters.

This last movement is the most symphonic in character of the four. It has the strongest physiognomy. It is interesting and typical of d'Indy, elsewhere in the work; that however impressionistic he may be, however intent of evoking a mood of a musical structure, his writing and his coloring are extremely clear.

Sane, Clear and Logical

How much of orchestration is the deliberate reflection and workmanship of the composer, and how much is the orchestration an instinctive reflex of the composers mind, just as a man's hand-writing is the reflex of his mind, or his nerves, or both? Masters of their art, like Mr. d'Indy use instruments in many different ways, but each way is unmistakably characteristic of one man.

The sanity, the clearness, logic and sense of proportion; above all, the nobility of character which animate the man and his life and his works, permeate not only the music itself, but the beautiful instrumentation of this "Poem of the Seas."

t's Delightful Serenata

only for this was the audience ted to Mr. d'Indy. The Serenata certainly one of the most delightful inspired of all Mozart's compositions for concerted instruments. What did he write this piece for? Probably somebody's birthday. It is simply captivating. The two orchestra properly consist of one orchestra of 2 principal violins, a viola and a double bass, and the other orchestra of 3 violins, a second viola, a violoncello and kettle-drums. The directions in the score are that these orchestras shall be placed far apart. There was an ensemble of many string instruments yesterday to supplement the efforts of the players of solo parts, and all the players kept their accustomed places in the orchestra.

Courtly and Profound

And Lalande's piece! Great heavens, what music they made in France in the 15th century. The beauty of this piece is so courtly and yet so profound; so formal, if you like, yet so reflective, so wise, so aware of the fact that an artist's business is to make beautiful art and not ask too many questions about it or life either, that at the moment the storm and stress the passionate emotion, the philosophy, the ardent realism of 19th century art seem mere brawling and ignorance and vulgarity by the side of it.

Mr. Simonds' Playing

Mr. Simonds played the piano part of Bach's concerto modestly, with self-effacement, with technical fluency. It is less a virtuoso piece than an example of chamber music in which all instruments have parts of importance, and so it was played. Bach wrote his concerto with no more self-conciousness or formality than Mozart his serenata. Only, Bach was a contrapuntist, and right merrily, or, as in the slowly movement, contentedly, does he make his music move along. They made music in those days, and its substance, compared to much of the music now manufactured, was as sturdy old broadcloth to the cheapest shoddy.

Mr. d'Indy conducted not like a petted prima donna of the baton, not as an actor before an audience, but like a very serious, modest, earnest musician, happy in bringing together his audience and his art.

POST-DEC. 10

VINCENT D'INDY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

MARY JANE WALLACE

Vincent d'Indy, composer of note and illustrious member of the world of music of the day, is visiting Boston and was 'guest' conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon.

The program arranged was an interesting one not from point of unique compositions and odd arrangements but from a truly musical one.

The first part was made up of three compositions, Mozart's "Serrenata Notturna in D major," "Chaccone Gracieuse," by Lalande and a Bach "Piano Concerto." This latter was played by Bruce Simonds, a pupil of M. d'Indy.

The Mozart number is a joy. It is written for two string orchestras, the first of which is made up of two first violins, a viola and a double bass. It is in three parts, "Marcia," "Menuetto" and "Rondo." As interpreted yesterday it was at once a work filled with dignity and graceful orchestral passages.

The Lalande number is a worthy work and was a fitting number to come between the Mozart and Bach compositions. The latter was played by Mr. Simonds, who is a very young man. It is not the most difficult work of the sort in the world, but it is a piece which needs close attention to details and a finished style tention to details and a finished style of playing. He proved himself equal to its needs throughout the course of his playing.

The last number on the program was by D'Indy himself. "Poeme des Rivages," four sea pictures full of imaginings and warmth of color. The first rendition of these pieces was during the concert given a week ago in New York by the Symphony orchestra, Monsieur d'Indy conducting.

The composer might easily have called them "Sea Color Pictures" or some other such names, they are so vivid in musical expression and tonal qualities.

As a composer Vincent d'Indy ranks with the world's greatest, as a teacher he has all the elements which go to make success for his pupils, not alone from artistic standpoint but as man and as a conductor he leads with intuitive sense of music values.

TRAV. DEC. 10

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

FROM THE ANCIENTS TO d'INDY "A GUEST"

An Innovation That Might Wisely Repeated—Audience and Conducto Composer—None Too Interesting Moza and Bach at His Hands—The More Nov and Fresher Lalande—His Own Tone Poem of Sea and Shore, Renewin Familiar Powers, Opening New Sym pathies

It is not of the slightest interest to kno whether Mr. So-and-So likes or dislikes this or that dramatic or musical work. [Vincent d'Indy, 1899.

WISELY "guest-conductors" might be bidden oftener to the Symphony Concerts. True, they are expensive luxuries, since, in spite of the name convention gives them, they usually receive substantial fees. Yet, beyond doubting, they diversify a long series of concerts; bring into them for the moment an individual note; interest [illegible] impress audiences. We in Boston [illegible] notable new music as soon as the pages come overseas. By the same token we might well hear notable conductors when they make visits to the United States. Mr. Albert Coates, the British conductor, came a year ago from London to New York as "guest" of the New York Symphony Orchestra. He is now on his way thither for a longer stay. By common consent he shines in certain music—in that of Skriabin, for example; he brings with him, besides, interesting and novel pieces by the younger British composers. Unless contract, cost or pressing labors withhold him, he might reasonably be asked to lead at a pair of Symphony Concerts in Boston. Mr. Mengelberg—a more illustrious name—will soon come to New York a second time to be "guest" of the Philharmonic Society for two months. With it, he will be heard in Boston next February at a concert in the Steinert Series. Even so, he might well grace a pair of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra. For more than once, and openly, he has been considered as conductor for it.

Still more stimulating and deserving are such "guests," when they happen, like Mr. d'Indy of yesterday, to be eminent composers as well as more or less able conductors. It would be interesting to hear Mr. Rakhmaninov, for example, not "at the piano," but on the conductor's stand to which he often stepped in his own Russia. Less in the background sits, for the moment, Richard Strauss, remarkable conductor in his own music and the music of other composers. Too large a fee may close his way to the regular Symphony Concerts; but at a concert for the Pension Fund, there can be no doubt of his welcome. Or, if a notable composer visiting the United States, lacks ability and ambition as conductor but excels, say, as pianist, why should not he also be summoned to the Symphony Concerts? He would grace them quite as much as do various "assisting artists." If he were Mr. Scott of last season or Mr. Casella of the current musical year, he would whet more curiosities.

Costs aside, the usual objection to "guest-conductors" at Symphony Hall is the assumed unwillingness of the regular conductor to forego his usual place. Perhaps Dr. Muck and some of his predecessors of the Higginsonian day fostered this mistaken notion. Mr. Monteux, fine-spirited, open-spirited, man of the world as well as able conductor, seems of another mind. He welcomed the coming of Mr. d'Indy; he went himself to Strauss to press the suggestion of a concert for the Pension Fund; he would gladly see Mr. Casella, for example, "at the piano" beside him. His way seems the wiser. The interlude of a visitor in a long series of concerts brings the public back the fresher to the customary conductor; while his merit has sometimes stood the clearer beside the labors of the "guest" as leader or programme-maker.

The demeanor of the audience yesterday afternoon and the demand for tickets for the opener concert this evening point these notions. Without ceremony, the conductor and composer "as guest" came to his place, probably pleased, after his modest habit, that no one gave him escort and that the orchestra sounded no fanfare. It did rise to receive him and some—perhaps half—of the audience stood likewise; but the consequent confusion little dulled the hearty applause. It was renewed at each pause in the programme; whenever Mr. d'Indy quitted or mounted the conductor's stand; and at the end of the concert—good fortune, usually, of rare and exceptionally well-liked piece. Few, too, were the customary incomings and outgoings, through the course of the concert, of the public of Friday afternoons.

Mr. d'Indy received this warmth and deference with his natural calm. It is sixteen years since most Bostonians last looked upon him, and he now nears his seventieth birthday. His carriage and his gait do not disguise his years; but his head and countenance outside grizzling brows and hair, give little sign of them. As man, he remains the quiet, poised, altogether self-subordinating figure that he has always been—all for the music, the work, and his associates in it. As conductor, he is the same calm, clear-minded, intelligible and unassertive leader that he was in his earlier visit. He would be the discerning and full-voiced spokesman of the composer and no more. Never does he impose himself upon another's music or too obviously upon his own. Enough that the piece in hand runs free and revealing course. Yet in the progress of his own Poem of Sea and Shore, it was impossible to wish him more of the intensifying and projecting power that is crowning virtue of the born, practised, habitual conductor.

For some listeners and his own Poem aside, Mr. d'Indy might have set a more interesting programme, retained more of the pieces he originally chose. No doubt his concert with the New York Symphony Orchestra proved over-long; but, if the cargo must be lightened, why not have thrown overboard more of the ancients and less of the moderns? One ancient, Monteverde, had indeed vanished; but his Toccata and Ritornello had come and gone in a moment. Of the other three, neither Mozart in a "Nocturnal Serenade" nor Bach in a Concerto in D major for Piano and Orchestra, wrote exactly the stuff that has made him classic and perennial. In interest for twentieth-century ears, the obscure Lalande in his supper-music for Louis the Great—and also the Glutton—had rather the better of it. The chances are that Monsieur Roussel of our own day and voice would have been more interesting and individual than all these ancients together. Yet his "Evocation" was omitted, along with Le Flem's lengthy tone poem of mourning. The more the pity; but Mr. d'Indy was "guest," and in his latter years his mind and heart go out to the elder masters. It is the privilege of age so to find pleasure in leaves turned backward.

"The Nocturnal Serenade," moreover ill suits a spacious concert-hall or a numerous string choir. Mozart wrote it for hearing in a drawing-room, with four violins, two violas, one violoncello, one bass-viol and a kettledrum for all the instruments. He divided them into answering, "echoing" groups, placed at opposite ends of the salon or in adjoining chambers—procedure and pastime, pleasing to eighteenth-century ears. Yesterday, the leaders of the string-choir sat as one "orchestra"; while [illegible] players [illegible] other. Nor were the two bands any appreciable distance from one another. The unescapable outcome was the thickening and the stiffening of Mozart's transparent, light-paced, quickly turning music and a sort of solemnizing of his playful dialogue and "echoes." Thereby a pretty trifle for fifteen minutes at a party became a formal rite of the concert-hall. March, Minuet and Rondo fill the Serenade, according to the conventions of the time. Had the matter been of more Mozartian freshness and charm, had the treatment been more deft and fanciful in gay Mozartian manner, the conditions of the performance would still have sat heavy and clouding upon the music.

And the Bach of the first and the last movements of the Concerto was usually the pedestrian Bach setting to paper, in the routine of the day, familiar eighteenth-century processes and periods. Only in the intermediate Largo came the expected flow of warmly musing, expanding and ascendant song. Like all else in the Concerto it gained by the limpid tone, the gently modulating and varying touch, the sense of line and accent, the regard for a part within an whole of the pianist, Mr. Simonds, instructor in music at Yale. Mr. d'Indy's school in Paris gave him the finer ear, the finer taste, the balanced freedoms and formalities essential with such music. Finally with the "Chaconne Gracieuse pour les Soupers du Roy"—Louis XIV in his old age—Lalande was stately and sonorous, inventive in his variations, supple and fanciful in his blended or contrasted instrumental voices, keeping a ceremonial music in character yet writing as scholar and musician as well. Even for ears easily satiated with eighteenth-century patterns and procedures these tones, gone to court, still keep pleasure.

The more, then, was the many-voiced orchestra of our own day good to hear when conductor and band set to his tone-poem. (The formalists will call it a 'Symphonic Suite'). The more stimulating seemed the play of incisive harmonies, and coloring timbres; the more interesting to follow was the course of motivs divided and interwoven, contrasted, diminished, amplified in the voice of our time; the more sympathetic moods and pictures of sea and shore made moods and pictures in tones in a fashion of which Mozart's Vienna, Bach's Leipzig or Lalande's Versailles would never have dreamed. They and their world were deaf to suggestion from landscape and seascape. Ours, looking upon them touches sensibility into beauty and eloquence. Mr. d'Indy uses a full modern orchestra in this 'Poèm des Rivages,' both expert and imaginative with its speech of many colors. Nowhere, perhaps, unless in pages of "St. Christopher" has he been so zealous and fanciful with the instruments of percussion. Throughout, he plies his characteristic harmonies thin-voiced, sharp-edged, often falling like a drop of acid upon the ear. Again return the Franckian or the Wagnerian formulas of his lifelong devotion—the ascents from tonal darkness into tonal light, the climax gathering and regathering upon the listening nerves, the motivs and the fragments of motivs, divided and distributed with unflagging throught and skill, yet sure to return, to blend, to sum and round unity of design and impression. By mental measure and meditation, by the processes and in the manners that he most prefers, according to the principles and procedures long since ingrained in him does Mr. d'Indy still make music.

In this particular tone-poem Mr. d'Indy has also written with an imagination, a warmth, a humanity not always stirring through him in these later years. By temperament, his eyes see, his heart stirs, his mind awakes and his spirit glows before mountains and so enkindled he wrote what some prefer to his other music, the tone-poem "Jour d'Eté a la Montagne," of his own Cévennes as from boyhood he had known them. And lo! the music bore images and emotion of general human understanding and appeal. The sea and the shores of the sea—his own Latin waters of the Mediterranean and the Adriatic—it now appears, may also stir him to music as warmly thought and felt, as wide-voiced and illuding. Naturally, Mr. d'Indy has no mind to the trite tone-picturing of mechanical "Ocean Symphonies" and all that specious kind. He knows the grey calm of even these southern seas; he has seen light lay quickening fingers upon them; he has seen them blaze in quivering air and sunshine. His spirit stirred as he looked, and the sight and the emotion speak from the first division of the "Poème des Rivages." Likewise he has seen the blue depths of the waters on a sunlit day from the cliffs of Mediterranean shore, and felt the glow of the sight within him. The blue may change, but the blue haunts—and Mr. d'Indy writes a second division curiously ingenious in a mingled changefulness and consistency, bright yet deep in the colorings of harmonies and timbres.

Sea, shore and sky may set the fancy awake as half-closed eyes watch light playing over them until they seem to flicker into a single hue. These optical, these spiritual fancies, transmuted into like fancies in tones fill a third division, Scherzo-like, fitful, glinting with instrumental quirks and quivers. To watch and know the sea is also to feel it strange, mysterious, unfathomable and so broods Mr. d'Indy through the fourth and over-long division of his Poem. In it he reads less the ocean than the human mind and heart before the might and the mystery of the waters. The magic has fled; the majesty endures. The fascination has faded. Who may read the secrets? Out of humanity some in old age harden. Into humanity, in these his final years Mr. d'Indy seems to enter. A new sympathy, broadening and deepening, touched here and there his symphony of the late war. It permeates his Poem of the Seas.

H. T. PARKER.

TRANS. DEC. 10

Friday afternoon, Dec. 28, [illegible] Hall, the ninth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and a women's chorus assisting. It will be heard in Liszt's "Dante Symphony," revived after five years, Massenet's overture, "Phèdre," and Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture, "Night on Mount Triglav" are the other numbers of the programme.

TRANS. DEC. 10

NEXT SYMPHONY BILL

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra will be on a trip North. The Christmas week program will feature Liszt's "Choral Symphony." A chorus of women's voices will assist. Massenet's "Phedre" overture, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff" are also billed.

ADVTSR-DEC. 11.

Musical Comment---Olin Downes

A Chat With Mr. d'Indy—His Defence of French Clarity of Thought and Sense of Proportion—Philharmonic Society—Braslau and Harvard Glee Club

Up to the present time there is only one composer we are willing to talk to just after a work of his has been performed. That is Mr. Vincent d'Indy. He does not tell you that he reads everything you write, nor does he take obvious pains to tell you that he doesn't care a hoot what you write. Nor does he say he didn't read it, but he is told that you wrote a very nice article about him. Mr. d'Indy really is not interested or self-conscious about what you write or what you think of his music. He is the most modest, the most honestly absorbed in his art of any composer we ever talked with.

Mr. d'Indy is now in his 70th year, tall, clear-eyed, animated in his conversation, delightfully affable, candid, and full of enthusiasm for ideas. He had been mobbed in the green room of Symphony Hall, following the first performance here of his new "Poeme des rivages." He sat down, willing and interested to talk about his art. "But you are too tired, Mr. d'Indy."

"No"—we are translating the sense of his French, "I'm not tired. I'm in the habit of working a great deal. I rise at 6 in Paris and I am at work before 8. I work until at least 8 in the evening. It is my custom."

High living and high thinking! This tells in his music. He lit a cigarette, and was ready to talk about anything.

"We are told by some musicians, Mr. d'Indy, that you are not really a representative of French art—that your art is too cerebral, too much influenced by the German symphonists, to be characteristic of the French national genius."

This amused him. He shrugged and smiled. "How can I tell? I have to write as I think and feel. But is not this true: Is it not true that critics are prone to make some sweeping generalization of a nation's art or a nation's conciousness, and after that fit the generalization rather than modify the generalization to conform to fact?"

"I find two qualities which are practically never absent in representative French art. They are clearness and proportion. Whether my music has these qualities is not for me to say, but certainly I love logic, and the architecture of music, certainly I feel that they are indispensable characteristics of the finest compositions.

"Have French musicians ever lost sight of these things? Seldom, indeed. We alone, of all the European nations, even of Russia, refused to bend to the yoke of the Italian operatic composers of the 17th and early 18th centuries. We were not seduced by the florid melodies of the descendants of Scarlatti. We were not fascinated to the complete temporary loss of our national genius by Italian virtuosity or even by the beautiful 'bel canto' of Italian song. We insisted on musical idioms of our own, typical not only of our spirit but intimately associated with our ideals of truthful dramatic expression. Over the rest of the world the Italian opera of the Rossini type spread its mantle. France alone had ideas and standards which she maintained in the face of every foreign influence.

"Therefore French artists have frequently been called chauvavists." They are so much worse than that. Of course Italy influenced France. Ther Wagner—profoundly. But Wagner di not dominate French music. French music enriched itself through the geniu of Wagner. His was a genius essentially Teutonic, genius extraordinarily lacking in the sense of symmetry con ciseness, or proportion. But full o great things. Not the least interestin chapter in the history of French mus is the chapter or rather chapters which will eventually be devoted to its re actions to the influence of Richard Wagner. I think that today most Frenchmen, like myself, revere his art. We have learned much from Wagner as we learned from the Russian Moussorgsky, from men of genius of many lands, but I think we have always contrived to remain ourselves, and in that I have perhaps the right, also, to say that I am a Frenchman!"

"There is of course, such a thing a chauvanism in art. It is harmful. The French have not been free from it, nor has any other nation. But nationa consciousness in art is essential. France has always possessed this. The time is coming, I believe, when in America a similar spirit will be felt. In the pas your young musicians have studied composition in Leipsic; more lately, in Paris. It is very commendable to find out what other nationalities are doing in their art, but before you can create an art of your own you must listen to yourselves, not to others, and must bravely seek to fashion for yourself a form of expression which will be racial, sincere, and at the same time, artistically representative in its form and idiom."

Let us here digress for an instant from Mr. d'Indy's conversation and speak of his "Cours du Composition Musicale," an extraordinary document, an incredibly honest, naive, and profoundly religious work. To say "religious" in connection with a textbook on musical composition may seem to some very strange. It is not strange with Mr. d'Indy. Here are some paragraphs from his monumental work, as Englished by Mr. Philip Hale, and quoted in the programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are mediaeval in their faith. From volume I:

"That the pupil, called to deserve the titl eof artist, should never lose sight of his natural endowment, three virtues are necessary to arrive at the maximum that he has set out to attain, three virtues named in the text of an anthem for Maundy Thursday, the music of which is as admirable as the words are lofty: 'And now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.'

"Yes, the artist should first of all have Faith, faith in God, faith in his art; for it is Faith that incites him to understand, and by this understanding to mount higher and higher on the ladder of being, towards his goal, which is God.

"Yes, the artist should practise Hope, for he expects nothing from the present; he knows that his mission is to serve, and to contribute by his work to the instruction and the life of the generations that will come after him.

"Yes, the artist should be inspired by sublime Charity, the greatest of the three; to love should be his aim, for the sole principle of all creation is great, divine, charitable Love."

And this: "Overcome by the Christian Faith, Pride, man's formidable enemy, seldom showed itself in the soul of an artist of the Middle Ages; but as religious belief grew weak, with the Spirit of the Reformation applying itself almost at the same time to all branches of human learning, we see pride reappear and watch its veritable Renaissance."

"And what, Mr. d'Indy," we asked, "is to be the cure for the artistic sterility of this age, when the great musicians seem to have gone, or not to have arrived?"

"That is too great a question," he answered, "for anyone in the age of which he speaks to answer. My belief, however, is that artistic sterility is caused today largely by the decay of religion in the world. The war has done a great deal of harm to men's minds. The aftermath of it is in some respects worse than the actual fighting—unemployment, profiteers, and much general misery. The artistic good of the war will come later. I think. Whether our modern society can shake off its shackles and become one more free of corrupt politics and finance, short-sighted selfishness and greed in financial arrangements, which now make the merest slaves of a large proportion of the population, is another question. After all, what have we to do with that? The artist has his Faith, his creative power. It is by such tokens that he lives. It is his mission to seek earnestly and eternally after Truth and Beauty. In his art lies his happiness and salvation.

"And what art, outside of music itself," we asked, "has influenced you the most in your development?"

It seemed that the terminology of the question did not satisfy him. "For there is only one Art," he said. "It has different manifestations, and all of these appeal to me—architecture, painting, poetry, the dance—these are only different aspects of the one Art. I canont remain indifferent to one of them. If we must be very precise, I will say that since music and architecture are very closely allied, architecture, after music, has perhaps the deepest appeal to me."

"Given the ability to invent, Mr. d'Indy, what is the second most necessary thing for a composer's equipment?"

"The judgement," he answered at once, "to choose the right material."

"That was a characteristic of the greatest masters," he continued. "A composer must have unlimited patience, determination, self-denial. Patience to wait for the right idea to come; determination to put down nothing which falls beneath the level of his ideals; self-denial, to refuse to go forward until the idea has been completely perfected for its final uses."

"As for me," he went on, "often I wait months for a thought to complete itself in my head. I have the first part, the nub of my musical sentence. It is incomplete. My brain refuses to complete it for me. The time comes, often quite suddenly, when the remainder of the idea declares itself. Then is the time to sit down and write."

is very easy for a young co especially if he have some color and impressioni

From

Mozart's Delightful Serenata

Not only for this was the audience indebted to Mr. d'Indy. The Serenata is certainly one of the most delightful and inspired of all Mozart's compositions for concerted instruments. What did he write this piece for? Probably somebody's birthday. It is simply captivating. The two orchestra properly consist of one orchestra of 2 principal violins, a viola and a double bass, and the other orchestra of 2 violins, a second viola, a violoncello and kettle-drums. The directions in the score are that these orchestras shall be placed far apart. There was an ensemble of many string instruments yesterday to supplement the efforts of the players of solo parts, and all the players kept their accustomed places in the orchestra.

Courtly and Profound

And Lalande's piece! Great heavens, what music they made in France in the 15th century. The beauty of this piece is so courtly and yet so profound; so formal, if you like, yet so reflective, so wise, so aware of the fact that an artist's business is to make beautiful art and not ask too many questions about it or life either, that at the moment the storm and stress the passionate emotion, the philosophy, the ardent realism of 19th century art seem mere brawling and ignorance and vulgarity by the side of it.

Mr. Simonds' Playing

Mr. Simonds played the piano part of Bach's concerto modestly, with self-effacement, with technical fluency. It is less a virtuoso piece than an example of chamber music in which all instruments have parts of importance, and so it was played. Bach wrote his concerto with no more self- conciousness or formality than Mozart his serenata. Only, Bach was a contrapuntist, and right merrily, or, as in the slowly movement, contentedly, does he make his music move along. They made music in those days, and its substance, compared to much of the music now manufactured, was as sturdy old broadcloth to the cheapest shoddy.

Mr. d'Indy conducted not like a petted prima donna of the baton, not as an actor before an audience, but like a very serious, modest, earnest musician, happy in bringing together his audience and his art.

POST-DEC. 10

VINCENT D'INDY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

MARY JANE WALLACE

Vincent d'Indy, composer of note and illustrious member of the world of music of the day, is visiting Boston and was 'guest' conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon.

The program arranged was an interesting one not from point of unique compositions and odd arrangements but from a truly musical one.

The first part was made up of three compositions, Mozart's "Serrenata Notturna in D major," "Chaccone Gracieuse," by Lalande and a Bach "Piano Concerto." This latter was played by Bruce Simonds, a pupil of M. d'Indy.

The Mozart number is a joy. It is written for two string orchestras, the first of which is made up of two first violins, a viola and a double bass. It is in three parts, "Marcia," "Menuetto" and "Rondo." As interpreted yesterday it was at once a work filled with dignity and graceful orchestral passages..

The Lalande number is a worthy work and was a fitting number to come between the Mozart and Bach compositions. The latter was played by Mr. Simonds, who is a very young man. It is not the most difficult work of the sort in the world, but it is a piece which needs close attention to details and a finished style tention to details and a finished style of playing. He proved himself equal to its needs throughout the course of his playing.

The last number on the program was by D'Indy himself. "Poeme des Rivages," four sea pictures full of imaginings and warmth of color. The first rendition of these pieces was during the concert given a week ago in New York by the Symphony orchestra, Monsieur d'Indy conducting.

The composer might easily have called them "Sea Color Pictures" or some other such names, they are so vivid in musical expression and tonal qualities.

As a composer Vincent d'Indy ranks with the world's greatest, as a teacher he has all the elements which go to make success for his pupils, not alone from artistic standpoint but as man and as a conductor he leads with intuitive sense of music values.

TRAV. DEC. 10

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

FROM THE ANCIENTS TO d'INDY "A GUEST"

An Innovation That Might Wisely
Repeated — Audience and Conducto
Composer—None Too Interesting Moza and Bach at His Hands—The More Nov and Fresher Lalande — His Own Tone
Poem of Sea and Shore, Renewin Familiar Powers, Opening New Sym pathies

It is not of the slightest interest to know whether Mr. So-and-So likes or dislikes this or that dramatic or musical work. [Vincent d'Indy, 1899.

WISELY "guest-conductors" might be bidden oftener to the Symphony Concerts. True, they are expensive luxuries, since, in spite of the name convention gives them, they usually receive substantial fees. Yet, beyond doubting, they diversify a long series of concerts; bring into them for the moment an individual note; interest and often impress audiences. We in Boston often hear notable new music as soon as the pages come overseas. By the same token we might well hear notable conductors when they make visits to the United States. Mr. Albert Coates, the British conductor, came a year ago from London to New York as "guest" of the New York Symphony Orchestra. He is now on his way thither for a longer stay. By common consent he shines in certain music—in that of Skriabin, for example; he brings with him, besides, interesting and novel pieces by the younger British composers. Unless contract, cost or pressing labors withhold him, he might reasonably be asked to lead at a pair of Symphony Concerts in Boston. Mr. Mengelberg—a more illustrious name—will soon come to New York a second time to be "guest" of the Philharmonic Society for two months. With it, he will be heard in Boston next February at a concert in the Steinert Series. Even so, he might well grace a pair of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra. For more than once, and openly, he has been considered as conductor for it.

Still more stimulating and deserving are such "guests," when they happen, like Mr. d'Indy of yesterday, to be eminent composers as well as more or less able conductors. It would be interesting to hear Mr. Rakhmaninov, for example, not "at the piano," but on the conductor's stand to which he often stepped in his own Russia. Less in the background sits, for the moment, Richard Strauss, remarkable conductor in his own music and the music of other composers. Too large a fee may close his way to the regular Symphony Concerts; but at a concert for the Pension Fund, there can be no doubt of his welcome. Or, if a notable composer visiting the United States, lacks ability and ambition as conductor but excels, say, as pianist, why should not he also be summoned to the Symphony Concerts? He would grace them quite as much as do various "assisting artists." If he were Mr. Scott of last season or Mr. Casella of the current musical year, he would whet more curiosities.

Costs aside, the usual objection to "guest-conductors" at Symphony Hall is the assumed unwillingness of the regular conductor to forego his usual place. Perhaps Dr. Muck and some of his predecessors of the Higginsonian day fostered this mistaken notion. Mr. Monteux, fine-spirited, open-spirited, man of the world as well as able conductor, seems of another mind. He welcomed the coming of Mr. d'Indy; he went himself to Strauss to press the suggestion of a concert for the Pension Fund; he would gladly see Mr. Casella, for example, "at the piano" beside him. His way seems the wiser. The interlude of a visitor in a long series of concerts brings the public back the fresher to the customary conductor; while his merit has sometimes stood the clearer beside the labors of the "guest" as leader or programme-maker.

* * *

The demeanor of the audience yesterday afternoon and the demand for tickets for the opener concert this evening point these notions. Without ceremony, the conductor and composer "as guest" came to his place, probably pleased, after his modest habit, that no one gave him escort and that the orchestra sounded no fanfare. It did rise to receive him and some—perhaps half—of the audience stood likewise; but the consequent confusion little dulled the hearty applause. It was renewed at each pause in the programme; whenever Mr. d'Indy quitted or mounted the conductor's stand; and at the end of the concert—good fortune, usually, of rare and exceptionally well-liked piece. Few, too, were the customary incomings and outgoings, through the course of the concert, of the public of Friday afternoons.

Mr. d'Indy received this warmth and deference with his natural calm. It is sixteen years since most Bostonians last looked upon him, and he now nears his seventieth birthday. His carriage and his gait do not disguise his years; but his head and countenance outside grizzling brows and hair, give little sign of them. As man, he remains the quiet, poised, altogether self-subordinating figure that he has always been—all for the music, the work, and his associates in it. As conductor, he is the same calm, clear-minded, intelligible and unassertive leader that he was in his earlier visit. He would be the discerning and full-voiced spokesman of the composer and no more. Never does he impose himself upon another's music or too obviously upon his own. Enough that the piece in hand runs free and revealing course. Yet in the progress of his own Poem of Sea and Shore, it was impossible to wish him more of the intensifying and projecting power that is crowning virtue of the born, practised, habitual conductor.

* * *

For some listeners and his own Poem aside, Mr. d'Indy might have set a more interesting programme, retained more of the pieces he originally chose. No doubt his concert with the New York Symphony Orchestra proved over-long; but, if the cargo must be lightened, why not have thrown overboard more of the ancients and less of the moderns? One ancient, Monteverde, had indeed vanished; but his Toccata and Ritornello had come and gone in a moment. Of the other three, neither Mozart in a "Nocturnal Serenade" nor Bach in a Concerto in D major for Piano and Orchestra, wrote exactly the stuff that has made him classic and perennial. In interest for twentieth-century ears, the obscure Lalande in his supper-music for Louis the Great—and also the Glutton—had rather the better of it. The chances are that Monsieur Roussel of our own day and voice would have been more interesting and individual than all these ancients together. Yet his "Evocation" was omitted, along with Le Flem's lengthy tone poem of mourning. The more the pity; but Mr. d'Indy was "guest," and in his latter years his mind and heart go out to the elder masters. It is the privilege of age so to find pleasure in leaves turned backward.

"The Nocturnal Serenade," moreover ill suits a spacious concert-hall or a numerous string choir. Mozart wrote it for hearing in a drawing-room, with four violins, two violas, one violoncello, one bass-viol and a kettledrum for all the instruments. He divided them into answering, "echoing" groups, placed at opposite ends of the salon or in adjoining chambers—procedure and pastime, pleasing to eighteenth-century ears. Yesterday, the leaders of the string-choir sat as one "orchestra"; while many more string-players filled the other. Nor were the two bands at any appreciable distance from one another. The unescapable outcome was the thickening and the stiffening of Mozart's transparent, light-paced, quickly turning music and a sort of solemnizing of his playful dialogue and "echoes." Thereby a pretty trifle for fifteen minutes at a party became a formal rite of the concert-hall. March, Minuet and Rondo fill the Serenade, according to the conventions of the time. Had the matter been of more Mozartian freshness and charm, had the treatment been more deft and fanciful in gay Mozartian manner, the conditions of the performance would still have sat heavy and clouding upon the music.

And the Bach of the first and the last movements of the Concerto was usually the pedestrian Bach setting to paper, in the routine of the day, familiar eighteenth-century processes and periods. Only in the intermediate Largo came the expected flow of warmly musing, expanding and ascendant song. Like all else in the Concerto it gained by the limpid tone, the gently modulating and varying touch, the sense of line and accent, the regard for a part within an whole of the pianist, Mr. Simonds, instructor in music at Yale. Mr. d'Indy's school in Paris gave him the finer ear, the finer taste, the balanced freedoms and formalities essential with such music. Finally with the "Chaconne Gracieuse pour les Soupers du Roy"—Louis XIV in his old age—Lalande was stately and sonorous, inventive in his variations, supple and fanciful in his blended or contrasted instrumental voices, keeping a ceremonial music in character yet writing as scholar and musician as well. Even for ears easily satiated with eighteenth-century patterns and procedures these tones, gone to court, still keep pleasure.

* * *

The more, then, was the many-voiced orchestra of our own day good to hear when conductor and band set to his tone-poem. (The formalists will call it a 'Symphonic Suite'). The more stimulating seemed the play of incisive harmonies, and coloring timbres; the more interesting to follow was the course of motivs divided and interwoven, contrasted, diminished, amplified in the voice of our time; the more sympathetic moods and pictures of sea and shore made moods and pictures in tones in a fashion of which Mozart's Vienna, Bach's Leipzig or Lalande's Versailles would never have dreamed. They and their world were deaf to suggestion from landscape and seascape. Ours, looking upon them touches sensibility into beauty and eloquence. Mr. d'Indy uses a full modern orchestra in this 'Poèm des Rivages,' both expert and imaginative with its speech of many colors. Nowhere, perhaps, unless in pages of "St. Christopher" has he been so zealous and fanciful with the instruments of percussion. Throughout, he plies his characteristic harmonies thin-voiced, sharp-edged, often falling like a drop of acid upon the ear. Again return the Franckian or the Wagnerian formulas of his lifelong devotion—the ascents from tonal darkness into tonal light, the climax gathering and regathering upon the listening nerves, the motivs and the fragments of motivs, divided and distributed with unflagging throught and skill, yet sure to return, to blend, to sum and round unity of design and impression. By mental measure and meditation, by the processes and in the manners that he most prefers, according to the principles and procedures long since ingrained in him does Mr. d'Indy still make music.

In this particular tone-poem Mr. d'Indy has also written with an imagination, a warmth, a humanity not always stirring through him in these later years. By temperament, his eyes see, his heart stirs, his mind awakes and his spirit glows before mountains and so enkindled he wrote what some prefer to his other music, the tone-poem "Jour d'Eté a la Montagne," of his own Cévennes as from boyhood he had known them. And lo! the music bore images and emotion of general human understanding and appeal. The sea and the shores of the sea—his own Latin waters of the Mediterranean and the Adriatic—it now appears, may also stir him to music as warmly thought and felt, as wide-voiced and illuding. Naturally, Mr. d'Indy has no mind to the trite tone-picturing of mechanical "Ocean Symphonies" and all that specious kind. He knows the grey calm of even these southern seas; he has seen light lay quickening fingers upon them; he has seen them blaze in quivering air and sunshine. His spirit stirred as he looked, and the sight and the emotion speak from the first division of the "Poème des Rivages." Likewise he has seen the blue depths of the waters on a sunlit day from the cliffs of Mediterranean shore, and felt the glow of the sight within him. The blue may change, but the blue haunts—and Mr. d'Indy writes a second division curiously ingenious in a mingled changefulness and consistency, bright yet deep in the colorings of harmonies and timbres.

Sea, shore and sky may set the fancy awake as half-closed eyes watch light playing over them until they seem to flicker into a single hue. These optical, these spiritual fancies, transmuted into like fancies in tones fill a third division, Scherzo-like, fitful, glinting with instrumental quirks and quivers. To watch and know the sea is also to feel it strange, mysterious, unfathomable and so broods Mr. d'Indy through the fourth and over-long division of his Poem. In it he reads less the ocean than the human mind and heart before the might and the mystery of the waters. The magic has fled; the majesty endures. The fascination has faded. Who may read the secrets? Out of humanity some in old age harden. Into humanity, in these his final years Mr. d'Indy seems to enter. A new sympathy, broadening and deepening, touched here and there his symphony of the late war. It permeates his Poem of the Seas.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. DEC. 10

Friday afternoon, Dec. 28, in Symphony Hall, the ninth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting and a women's chorus assisting. It will be heard in Liszt's "Dante Symphony," revived after five years, Massenet's overture, "Phèdre," and Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture, "Night on Mount Triglav" are the other numbers of the programme.

TRANS. DEC. 10

NEXT SYMPHONY BILL

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra will be on a trip North. The Christmas week program will feature Liszt's "Choral Symphony." A chorus of women's voices will assist. Massenet's "Phedre" overture, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff" are also billed.

ADVTSR-DEC. 11

Musical Comment---Olin Downes

A Chat With Mr. d'Indy—His Defence of French Clarity of Thought and Sense of Proportion—Philharmonic Society—Braslau and Harvard Glee Club

Up to the present time there is only one composer we are willing to talk to just after a work of his has been performed. That is Mr. Vincent d'Indy. He does not tell you that he reads everything you write, nor does he take obvious pains to tell you that he doesn't care a hoot what you write. Nor does he say he didn't read it, but he is told that you wrote a very nice article about him. Mr. d'Indy really is not interested or self-conscious about what you write or what you think of his music. He is the most modest, the most honestly absorbed in his art of any composer we ever talked with.

Mr. d'Indy is now in his 70th year, tall, clear-eyed, animated in his conversation, delightfully affable, candid, and full of enthusiasm for ideas. He had been mobbed in the green room of Symphony Hall, following the first performance here of his new "Poeme des rivages." He sat down, willing and interested to talk about his art. "But you are too tired, Mr. d'Indy."

"No"—we are translating the sense of his French, "I'm not tired. I'm in the habit of working a great deal. I rise at 6 in Paris and I am at work before 8. I work until at least 8 in the evening. It is my custom."

High living and high thinking! This tells in his music. He lit a cigarette, and was ready to talk about anything.

"We are told by some musicians, Mr. d'Indy, that you are not really a representative of French art—that your art is too cerebral, too much influenced by the German symphonists, to be characteristic of the French national genius."

This amused him. He shrugged and smiled. "How can I tell? I have to write as I think and feel. But is not this true: Is it not true that critics are prone to make some sweeping generalization of a nation's art or a nation's conciousness, and after that fit the generalization rather than modify the generalization to conform to fact?"

"I find two qualities which are practically never absent in representative French art. They are clearness and proportion. Whether my music has these qualities is not for me to say, but certainly I love logic, and the architecture of music, certainly I feel that they are indispensable characteristics of the finest compositions.

"Have French musicians ever lost sight of these things? Seldom, indeed. We alone, of all the European nations, even of Russia, refused to bend to the yoke of the Italian operatic composers of the 17th and early 18th centuries. We were not seduced by the florid melodies of the descendants of Scarlatti. We were not fascinated to the complete temporary loss of our national genius by Italian virtuosity or even by the beautiful 'bel canto' of Italian song. We insisted on musical idioms of our own, typical not only of our spirit but intimately associated with our ideals of truthful dramatic expression. Over the rest of the world the Italian opera of the Rossini type spread its mantle. France alone had ideas and standards which she maintained in the face of every foreign influence.

"Therefore French artists have frequently been called chauvavists." They are so much worse than that. Of course Italy influenced France. Then Wagner—profoundly. But Wagner did not dominate French music. French music enriched itself through the genius of Wagner. His was a genius essentially Teutonic, genius extraordinarily lacking in the sense of symmetry conciseness, or proportion. But full of great things. Not the least interesting chapter in the history of French music is the chapter or rather chapters which will eventually be devoted to its reactions to the influence of Richard Wagner. I think that today most Frenchmen, like myself, revere his art. We have learned much from Wagner as we learned from the Russian Moussorgsky, from men of genius of many lands, but I think we have always contrived to remain ourselves, and in that I have perhaps the right, also, to say that I am a Frenchman!"

"There is of course, such a thing as chauvanism in art. It is harmful. The French have not been free from it, nor has any other nation. But national consciousness in art is essential. France has always possessed this. The time is coming, I believe, when in America a similar spirit will be felt. In the past your young musicians have studied composition in Leipsic; more lately, in Paris. It is very commendable to find out what other nationalities are doing in their art, but before you can create an art of your own you must listen to yourselves, not to others, and must bravely seek to fashion for yourself a form of expression which will be racial, sincere, and at the same time, artistically representative in its form and idiom."

Let us here digress for an instant from Mr. d'Indy's conversation and speak of his "Cours du Composition Musicale," an extraordinary document, an incredibly honest, naive, and profoundly religious work. To say "religious" in connection with a textbook on musical composition may seem to some very strange. It is not strange with Mr. d'Indy. Here are some paragraphs from his monumental work, as Englished by Mr. Philip Hale, and quoted in the programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are mediaeval in their faith. From volume I:

"That the pupil, called to deserve the titl eof artist, should never lose sight of his natural endowment, three virtues are necessary to arrive at the maximum that he has set out to attain, three virtues named in the text of an anthem for Maundy Thursday, the music of which is as admirable as the words are lofty: 'And now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.'"

"Yes, the artist should first of all have Faith, faith in God, faith in his art; for it is Faith that incites him to understand, and by this understanding to mount higher and higher on the ladder of being, towards his goal, which is God.

"Yes, the artist should practise Hope, for he expects nothing from the present; he knows that his mission is to serve, and to contribute by his work to the instruction and the life of the generations that will come after him.

"Yes, the artist should be inspired by sublime Charity, the greatest of the three; to love should be his aim, for the sole principle of all creation is great, divine, charitable Love."

And this: "Overcome by the Christian Faith, Pride, man's formidable enemy, seldom showed itself in the soul of an artist of the Middle Ages; but as religious belief grew weak, with the Spirit of the Reformation applying itself almost at the same time to all branches of human learning, we see pride reappear and watch its veritable Renaissance."

"And what, Mr. d'Indy," we asked, "is to be the cure for the artistic sterility of this age, when the great musicians seem to have gone, or not to have arrived?"

"That is too great a question," he answered, "for anyone in the age of which he speaks to answer. My belief, however, is that artistic sterility is caused today largely by the decay of religion in the world. The war has done a great deal of harm to men's minds. The aftermath of it is in some respects worse than the actual fighting—unemployment, profiteers, and much general misery. The artistic good of the war will come later. I think. Whether our modern society can shake off its shackles and become one more free of corrupt politics and finance, short-sighted selfishness and greed in financial arrangements, which now make the merest slaves of a large proportion of the population, is another question. After all, what have we to do with that? The artist has his Faith, his creative power. It is by such tokens that he lives. It is his mission to seek earnestly and eternally after Truth and Beauty. In his art lies his happiness and salvation.

"And what art, outside of music itself," we asked, "has influenced you the most in your development?"

It seemed that the terminology of the question did not satisfy him. "For there is only one Art," he said. "It has different manifestations, and all of these appeal to me—architecture, painting, poetry, the dance—these are only different aspects of the one Art. I canont remain indifferent to one of them. If we must be very precise, I will say that since music and architecture are very closely allied, architecture, after music, has perhaps the deepest appeal to me."

"Given the ability to invent, Mr. d'Indy, what is the second most necessary thing for a composer's equipment?"

"The judgement," he answered at once, "to choose the right material."

"That was a characteristic of the greatest masters," he continued. "A composer must have unlimited patience, determination, self-denial. Patience to wait for the right idea to come; determination to put down nothing which falls beneath the level of his ideals; self-denial, to refuse to go forward until the idea has been completely perfected for its final uses."

"As for me," he went on, "often I wait months for a thought to complete itself in my head. I have the first part, the nub of my musical sentence. It is incomplete. My brain refuses to complete it for me. The time comes, often quite suddenly, when the remainder of the idea declares itself. Then is the time to sit down and write."

is very easy for a young co especially if he have some color and impressionis

to do otherwise. But it is very dangerous. Bethink you how many, many composers, especially of late years, have fallen by the way-side. They have had placed in their hands the means of musical effect which they had neither the talent nor the technical skill to use wisely. Think of the vapid, spineless music now being put out by people who only know that a composer named Debussy has succeeded in writing strangely beautiful things, music without themes of pronounced contour, without apparently laborious development, at the same time music that has unity, cohension, strength as well as beauty. No wonder that this intoxicates a young talent.

"Perhaps you don't like Debussy?"

"I? On the contrary, he was the most extraordinary genius," said Mr. d'Indy, "a genius continually discovering fresh and untainted vistas of beauty. And he had heart, sentiment, emotion none the less warm and deep because it was expressed with such exquisite restraint and sensibility. But do not forget that he, too, was a master of structure."

We thereupon asked his opinion of Ravel. "A great composer," said Mr. d'Indy, "that of course goes without saying. Nevertheless, sec (dry). You can imagine Ravel doing anything, almost, except—writing the third act of 'Pelleas et Melisande.'"

POST-DEC-11

BOSTON SYMPHONY

There will be no symphony concert in Boston during the coming week. The orchestra's time will be occupied by a trip to Mantreal and other cities. Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of Christmas week, Dec. 23 and 24, at the ninth pair of regular concerts, Liszt's "Dante" symphony will be performed in commemoration of the birth of the Italian poet. In conformity with the poem, the symphony is divided into three parts—The Inferno, Purgatory and Paradise, which is described in the final Magnificat. A chorus of 70 female voices, trained by Mr. Monteux, will join forces with the orchestra. The other numbers will be Massenet's overture to "Phedre" and the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Mlada," which has been arranged in concert form by the composer. It is entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff."

HERALD - DEC. 11

Boston will profit by the experience of New York with the programme originally proposed by Mr. d'Indy for his visit as conductor to the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. Test of it with Mr. Damrosch's orchestra last Thursday proved it far too long; the audience was often restless; while one of the pupils' pieces, a tone poem, "For the Dead," by a certain Le Flem, was tedious. Accordingly Mr. d'Indy has wisely revised his programme for Boston. It now stands:

Serenade in D major for Two String Orchestras with Drums	Mozart
Chaconne Gracieuse	Lalande
Concerto in D major for Piano and Orchestra (The Piano-Part Played by B. T. Simonds)	Bach
Poème des Rivages	d'Indy

TRANS. DEC. 7.

Now as "Old Master" d'Indy Comes Again

Traits, Works and Faith in the Man and the Musician as a Devout Admirer Sees Them

(Translated from An Article in La Revue Musicale for March, 1921)

It is not of the musician that I would speak, but of the man. To be certain of the musician, that I admire and who stirs me, I have only to take my seat at the concert or in the theatre. But the man himself is the matter of discussion and it is a moral portrait that I should like to draw because in the case of Vincent d'Indy, more than often is the case in our time, the artist and the man are of a strict unity of character.

This unity is well known to the friends and adversaries of the man, unequal in number but alike in the ardor of their feelings. The first of our too rare meetings was more than twenty-five years ago. Few individualities have given me to such a degree the sensation of being "some one," that is to say, a homogeneous being, complete, referring all his intellectual and moral acts to a scrupulously thought-out and verified system. There was a great charm in the manner and the face of d'Indy, in the sombre fire of his eyes, his sceptical smile, his refined courtesy and his penetrating, yet gentle voice. The charm persists; if his hair has whitened, the eye still sparkles in the deep orbit, the greeting remains frank, genial and gay. Yet one quickly realizes the sort of mathematical rigor which emanates from this man; an untiring worker, possessed of all the methods for economizing the smallest fraction of time, an ascetic, harder upon himself than upon others, the nature of a scholar, a believer, an energetic leader, and, above all, a tender and passionate nature completely self-controlled.

Mind and Spirit

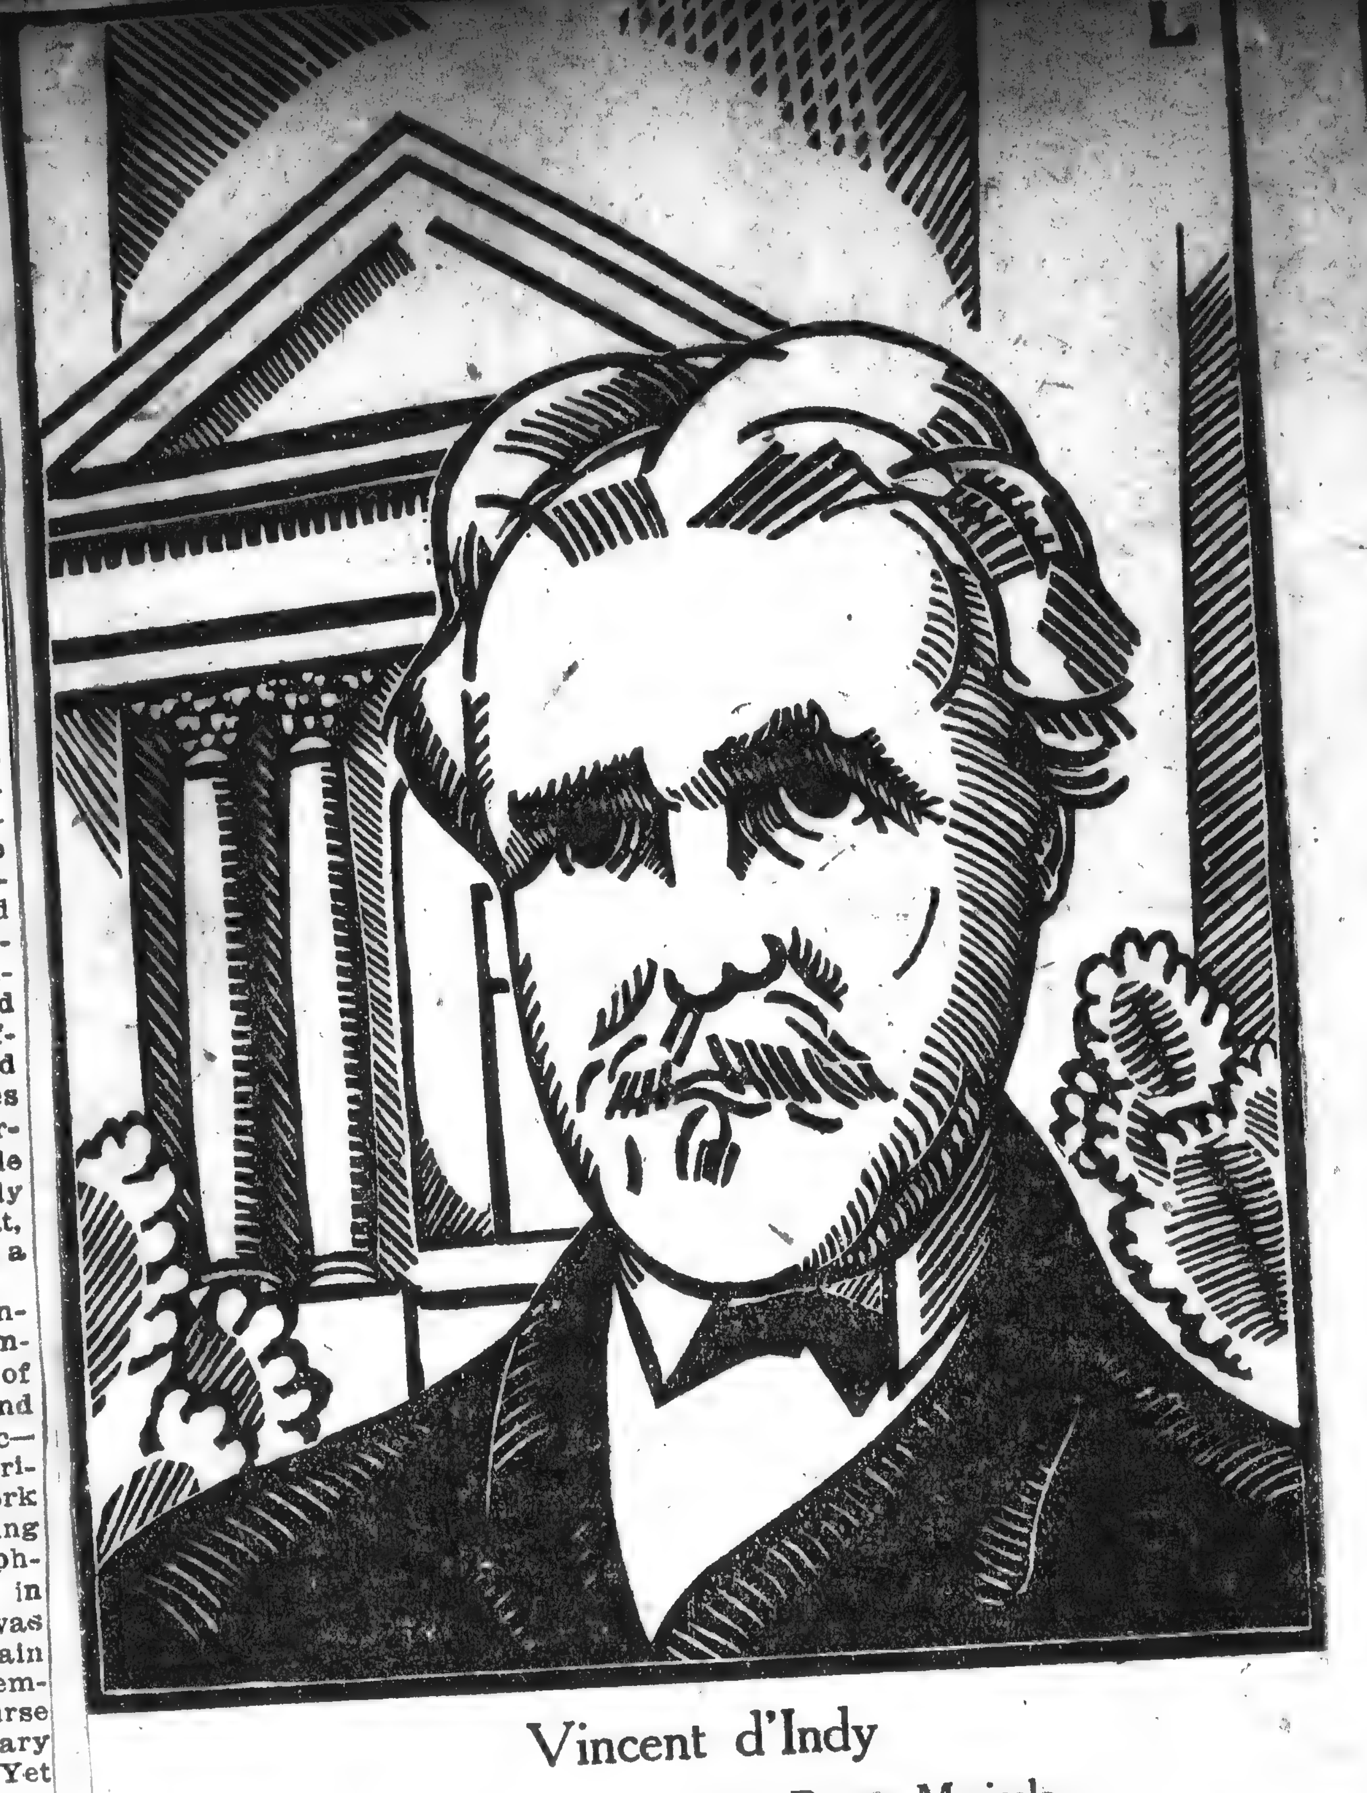
Of all my reasons for respecting Vincent d'Indy as a high type of humanity, the most apparent is, first, the authenticity of [illegible] cultivation. This musician is one [illegible] man, whom, in the arts as in the sciences, we can place on the plane of the great intellectuals. That he knows the last secrets of the art that he has chosen, the "Symphony on a Mountain Air"; the Second Symphony, "Wallenstein," "The Song of the Bell," "Fervaal," the "Legend of Saint Christopher," among others, attest to the entire musical world. But the genesis and the annals of music have no more secrets from him than the creative technique of his own compositions. Vincent d'Indy is an historian, a scholar, a synthetic critic, who ought to be ranked among the first of the rare critic essayists of our time. There is in his writings and his professional work the equivalent of the qualities which distinguished an André Michel, a Lecoq de Boisbaudran, a Fromentin, a Taine, or Baudelaire as a critic of art. I say the equivalent because I allude only to the quality and to the amount of the mental substance. When I opened the Treatise on Musical Composition by d'Indy, I was conscious at first only of the desire to assimilate what I could comprehend and to diminish some little of my ignorance of the technique of an art to which I owed profound and impassioned emotions. I had also some curiosity relative to the individuality of the author himself, whose face attracted me and whose compositions moved me. I finished my reading in a very different frame of mind. I do not know, and I do not know now, whether the theories which the book advances are musically irreproachable. I know of no one to decide the question and it has provoked lively controversy. But what I do know is, that, considered as a piece of writing, it is a magnificent monument.

To me, the clarity of form was constantly adequate, the style of reasonnig impeccable. There was a surprising gift of definition, notably that of the intellect and of the development of thought in music—all this a model of lucidity and an authoritative piece of anthology. In this work I found the very rare faculty of leading thought through the labyrinth of biographical notes and technical explanations in such a fashion that the main idea was never missed or effaced. Finally, I remain full of admiring astonishment in remembering that this treatise was only a course given by a professor, without any literary pretension, with no oratorical effect. Yet it constitutes a masterpieec of criticism and the intellectual and moral testament of a great artist, the complete revelation of his character and conscience. To prove that I am not basing my opinion on his musical qualities alone, I state that I derived the same mental pleasure from reading d'Indy's work that I obtained from Taine's "Intelligence," the "Value of Science" by Henri Poincaré, or of the study of the battle of Cannæ by Marshal de Schieffen; the pleasure of pure logic, the complete facility of a writer who thoroughly knows his subject. Had I never heard a note of d'Indy's music, I should rate him among the sovereign essayists, and I should consider him one of the most powerful coordinators of ideas in our time.

Faith and Fervor

But there is something else in this work which gives another motive for respecting Vincent d'Indy. There is that which often has excited polemics, sometimes to the point of insults that, hurled at such a man, harm only those who dare lance them. Here is the rounded affirmation, extremely resolute, straightforward, severe and brave, of a conscience, of a nature and a faith. They do not accord with the epoch, they are all three of a character which has been described as Gothic. The term does not completely express the matter but it will suffice. Vincent d'Indy is a man of meditative and militant religious faith. This Christian not only serves his art but conforms his entire life to his religious beliefs. I know there are some objections—and I could make some myself—to this attitude. It has led d'Indy, by logical necessity and not through individual irritation, to hold very strong opinions on Protestantism and Judaism in art, and has introduced into his work elements of polemics which are outside the field of music, belonging rather to politics and bringing, with the passions of the time, much grief. But these are the inevitable consequences of the classic and hierarchical temperament (which detractors call reactionary and antiquated) of a man of faith, who uses his legitimate authority and who is sufficiently disdainful of the glory and the profit of this world to retain only the pride of speaking his mind and presenting his work quite frankly. This type of man is rare enough today, and a being who is consistently "all of a piece" consoles me of many a Proteus. I am glad that the frankness of d'Indy stirs in the artistic sucess-hunters rancorous motives and even remorse. I am glad that they find him exacting and disagreeable, as only a profoundly honest man can be.

And I saw afterward that the theorician, the doctrinaire, the religious sectarian, the severe moralizer revealed by his acts and his speech the tenderness, the nobility and the beauty of a soul more tender than his intellect. His rigor weighs very little in the balance against the benefits he brings. With what dignity, what veiled emotion, he has spoken of his master, Franck, and with what a heart he served him. Here lies the charm, particularly to the strong and the sincere, which reveals d'Indy himself. He has done justice to the genius who counselled him; he has made for him, speaking as a composer and a historian, a large and splendid place as the heir of Beethoven; but more than that he has spoken as a son might speak, with great love. Despite the rigidity of mind of men of d'Indy's character, it is love, a grave and scrupulous love which controls them, not an instinctive emotion, but a feeling which acquires lasting intensity because it justifies itself at the tribunal of reason. This love results in the full satisfaction of a mind accustomed to method and discipline; it passes esteem and admiration. D'Indy loved his master because his master represented to him the living ideal of the highest form of accomplishment of the duty of art, and the highest form of disinterested nobility in the accomplishment of the duty of life. He has loved him as the artisans of earlier days loved the makers of masterpieces, as Melzi loved Leonardo. He has revered him as an exemplar, as a model without a blemish.



Vincent d'Indy

From a Drawing in La Revue Musicale

Duty and Devotion

To Franck, who surpassed him infinitely in candor and the sweetness of pure sentiment, d'Indy owed the course of his own moral truth. He has given us, in his pious veneration for Franck as much as in the original turn of his own mind, the third motive for respect—the seductive image of an illustrious artist, who, indifferent to all the joys and seductions of glory and never allowing himself to "usurp, laughing, the divine homage," devotes a large part of his time and effort for thirty years to teaching, relieving himself of none of the most boring of the pedagogue's cares, to give young minds of his store of knowledge, his respect for the legacy of the masters and for the light which issues from their tombs. Is he to be reproached then with having inculcated his faith with the imperious conviction of a pastor of souls? There could be no other way for this nature fortified in its dogmas by a half-century of production and profound study of the past. His discourse at the opening of the Schola Cantorum the sceptics somewhat irreverently call an avowal of faith. It is not my purpose to discuss the truth or the untruth of this. I see in it an intellectual testimony, one of the most important frontispieces that a school of art has been given in our time, the logical manifestation of a man who knows, and for whom the moral world and the intellectual are one and the same.

I am completely conquered by the accent of grandeur and, in the absolute sense of the term, of honesty. I believe that if this man, who lives in retirement has not hesitated, despite his preference for solitude, to break his native reserve to enter the field of polemics, he has attacked only insincerity. He has disavowed the faith which will not work And in all that he has written there are counsels of faith and the most fervent altruism.

Vincent d'Indy often reminds me of Ruskin. I should blush to cavil when I see, among all the surrounding vanities, a thinker and a poet of this breadth of intellect affirming to beginners that art is a religion; that the virtues of art are those of faith, charity and love; that disinterestedness and the ardent cultivation of masterpieces are the poles of their existence; that art reaches its highest estate socially and morally when it is the exercise of the beauty of conscience, much more than when it depends entirely on talent. I bow low before a teacher who sets his foot on such solid ground and in the voice of this doctrinaire, raised in the midst of the miseries of offical formulas or the disorder of fantastic innovations, I recognize the echo of the great voices that artistic humanity seldom hears. I salute this man, a creative spirit who leaves his own work to his mountain vacations and spends his night correcting the compositions of pupils, and his days directing courses, securing the production of forgotten works, remaining the cordial comrade of the unimportant workers because his conscience dictates this course to him, because he would pay his tithe. His pride of belief is only the reverse side of this humility. He believes. This word explains everything. He is homogeneous. He is one. He began by being for several years a drummer, a little apprentice in one corner of the orchestra. This cold and distant, almost Puritan, man, that certain people depict how badly they judge him! He is full of love and for him life consists of work done in joy and with liberty. Nobody, to me, appears freer than he. Free from serving for reputation's sake, free from the greed for money, free from manœuvrings with the press, he depends only on his own disciplined will, his respect for the dead and the contract he has made with himself. And he has never broken his word.

"The Old Master"

From this born teacher, the best lesson to be learned is his own life. There is his force, the secret of his prestige. Consider d'Indy's existence; there may be seen how an artist builds himself, guards himself, corrects himself, affirms himself. He is not troubled with deciding whether he is wrong or right on this point of technique, on that problem of casuistry. His apostacy has given immense service and can never be dissociated from him. He presents himself with the homogeneous character which has marked the life, the work and the example of a Mallarmé. That is his value. It is not necessary to adopt his views entirely. The essential is the important matter. In this article, where I have not wished to discuss music, I should like to make clear my desire to show Vincent d'Indy as a doer of deeds and a noble example of the highest humanity. The evolution of his work parallels that of his character, and it is the province of the musical critic to point out the phases of d'Indy's development in the domain of pure music and of dramatic composition, from the beginning of his work to the affirmation of his beliefs and of his art in "The Legend of Saint Christopher." This music-drama, which no one denies is one of the most distinguished in French art, is only one of the labors of this prodigiously active life, which is complete and unalloyed, where each category of duties has found its place as exactly as does an instrument in an orchestra.

D'Indy works himself as hard in his writings and his private life as in his compositions. His life is devoted to serving, but whether he teaches or creates, he achieves a portrait of himself. He is intensely himself and perhaps this mental serenity which tempers the vivacity of the eye and mitigates the severity of the smile, has been attained at the price of great internal conflicts which remain the only secret and reticence of this imperious goodness, now become the grace of an old master.

He is such in the full force of the term Vincent d'Indy is one of the very rare exalters of the soul who remain to us in the present-day order of thought, masterly entitled to the name, educator as is Bergson, as was Paul Adam, Rodin and Gustave Moreau. There, and not merely in the prestige of teaching technique, must be found the motive for the veneration which the young feel toward this spiritual heir of Franck, of the companion in arms of the chivalrous Charles Bordes, of the passionate promoter of the Schola Cantorum and the Société Nationale. There is a man and a great man in this assemblage of values, a Cartesian in logic, a Pascalian in mystic fervor, and keeping above all in his complexity, the severity and the healthy force, some trace of the naive simplicity of the master-workers of the Middle Ages. And it is this last trait which brings a singular sweetness to the constant and high austerity of his genius.

CAMILLE MAUCLAIR

D'Indy's New Tone-Poem

Some comment upon the recent performance in New York—of Mr. d'Indy's new tone-poem, "On the Shores of the Seas," and on two of the ancient pieces in which he will conduct here tomorrow and Saturday, has already appeared in this place, but Mr. d'Indy's own music is laid out according to so elaborate a plan that further analysis may serve to make hearing easier. In its division into four parts and in the nature of each of these, the Poem suggests a freely constructed symphony. No one of the composers of the day has shown a greater command of musical form or a stronger predilection for formal music than has Mr. d'Indy, and in scanning the pages of his latest score, the mastery of construction—more often than not a concession to established procedure—makes forcible impression. The Poem bears the opus number 77; the dates of composition are 1919-1921; while set over each of the four movements is the name of the particular place inspiring it. The first, "Tranquillity and Light," owes existence to Agay on the Mediterrean, and it is the shortest and simplest of the four. From a veiled and quiet opening the music gains in power, intensity and quickness of pace until it reaches a mighty climax and subsides. The resemblance to the opening section of the composer's "Summer Day on the Mountain" is striking. In both pieces d'Indy has chosen the brilliant key of B major to suggest the blaze of sunshine; while the general ordering of th music is much the same. There is co siderable development; but the most in dividual feature is a theme suggesti "human nature," as the composer puts i that is, summing up the human respon to the scene.

The ensuing movement, "The Joy of th Deep Blue," is a sea-picture of more con ventional type, even to the wave-like ar peggios of the opening; but, contrary to custom, these arpeggios appear in th treble, not in the bass. Against this un dulating in the wood-wind choirs, the firs violins and violas in unison proclaim a salient, propulsive melody in the key o E flat. A brief contrasting section, "Vi et Passionée," discloses a warm melody fo the clarinet, and the first theme return The key is now B major, and the melod is given out by the wood-wind again trills in the strings. Afterwards, for com pleteness, the clarinet melody reappears the centre-key, sung, like the theme of th beginning, by violins and violas. Mirama a little town on the island of Majorca o the coast of Spain in the Mediterran set the scene. There, according to Daniel Gregory Mason, d'Indy liked watch the sea, looking downward throu the trees.

The third part, "Green Horizons," ser the purpose of the Scherzo of a sympho The mood and matter are lively, and th is a hint of Italian dance-rhythms. Th are three Trios. The first has an expr sive melody in E major; the second is mysterious passage for strings in h monics, and, after another taste of Scherzo, the theme of the first Trio turns in G major, the central tonality classic form, yet modern content. Fr Falcanaro on the Adriatic the compo looked upon these verdant shores; and rious measures for bassoon, English ho oboe, and clarinet solos, in their high registers, depict this rarefied green. was on the coast of the Gulf of Gasco that d'Indy was prompted to the music meditation that flowers in the final di sion, "Mystery of the Ocean." As in first movement, there is here less need analysis. Beginning in solemn contemp tion, the music rises gradually and ine ably to sonorous and impressive proc mation.

In this "Poème des Rivages" d'Indy h again written as the poet of Nature, a for many this is his most engaging aspe By every token these sea-sketches are fr the hand that wrote the "Summer Day the Mountain." The two compositions h a technical kinship, and a like spirit awe and devotion called them forth. both are effects of atmosphere and desc tive touches a-plenty, yet in essence music is subjective rather than object while in the newer as well as in the ol piece, the structure is sounder, more log than is often the case in such attempt tonal delineation. The scoring of "Poème des Rivages" exhibits all of composer's familiar prejudices and devi There is little or no doubling of the ody by instruments of different charac wood-winds strings and brass have their separate office and do not mingle they often do in the music of Wagner Strauss. Once more the contrabass bone replaces the usual tuba and the tle trumpet in D is again given prominent place as melodic instrument. Lastly in addition to the customary voices, d'Indy calls for a quartet of saxophones, and in the second movement for a pianoforte and celesta.

W. S. S.

D'Indy's Ancients

The other numbers on Mr. d'Indy's programme, Lalande's Chaconne, Mozart's Nocturnal Serenade in D. major and Bach's Concerto for piano in the same key, in which Mr. Bruce Simonds plays the solo part, call for little anticipatory comment. The Chaconne, suggesting Rameau and Couperin, is from the music that Lalande wrote for the suppers of Louis XIV. The graceful opening section is scored for strings alone and later appears a quaintly charming passage for two oboes and bassoon. The music of Michel-Richard de Lalande, court composer to the Grand Monarch, is seldom encountered nowadays. Born in 1657 at Paris, he died there sixty-nine years later. Noted as a writer of church music he was also praised for his many ballets.

Mozart's Serenade was designed for two small bodies of strings, one of them consisting of first and second violins, viola and bass, the other of the usual string orchestra with kettledrums. In Mr. d'Indy's version the first group is represented by four solo instruments in the fashion of a "concerto grosso," the second falling to the full string band. There are three movements—Minuet, Adagio and Allegro—and throughout the music reveals the composer in his most beguiling

W. S. S.

There will be no Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday of next week, when the orchestra will be gone on a seven days' journey to Montreal and to cities in the State of New York. It will be heard again at home on Friday Saturday, Dec. 23 and 24. For these certs Mr. Monteux will revive Liszt's "Dante Symphony," a piece seldom and last played here in 1911 under Mr. Fiedler, in commemoration of the tenary of the composer's birth. The Magnificat in the final movement choir of seventy women will assist the orchestra. For second part of the programme Massenet's Overture to Racine's play, "Phèdre," and "Night on Mount Triglav," tone-picture orchestra arranged by Rimsky-Korsakoff from third act of his opera-ballet "Mlada." Presumably, it will be played for the first times in Boston.

TRANS. DEC

[29]

JOURNAL OCT 23 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is undertaking as large a travelling schedule as possible this year, which will include the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Baltimore, Washington and Richmond, and as far north as Montreal, besides the 48 regular concerts in Boston.

Pierre Monteux spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a symphony concert in which he introduced the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe in quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest which will probably figure on his programmes here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and to-morrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fourel, who has come frm Europe to lead the viola section. He is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartet, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartet was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the '80s.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence include Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America is shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of 15, this artist was praised by Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer. His teacher was Josef Joachim.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, first came to this country in 1912 and gave concerts, besides his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other pianist, Raymond Havens, is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Havens is a native of Providence, and his early training also took place in this city. He has given concerts in New York, other cities of the East, and in Europe.

JOURNAL OCT 30 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be interested in the organization's concert schedule for this season because of the unusual attention given to New England cities. More of these than ever before in a single season are included in the list, indicating an effort to establish the orchestra more completely as a New England, as well as Boston, institution.

In addition to its regular series of 48 concerts in Boston, nine in Cambridge and five in Providence, the orchestra will play in Fall River, New Bedford, Brockton, Springfield and Lynn in Massachusetts, in Hartford and New Haven, Conn., in Burlington and Middlebury, Vt., in Portland, Me., and in Manchester, N. H.

Standard Union OCT 30 1921 A
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The opening of the season of five Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music, which will take place next Friday evening, Nov. 4, at 8:15, will be doubly eventful in that Ferenc Vecsey, the celebrated Hungarian violinist, just arrived from Europe, will make his debut in this city as soloist with the orchestra in this, his second concert in America.

FROM OCT 30 1921 A
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The musical programme of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences is generally considered the mainstay of Brooklyn's musical life, and this tradition is fully maintained by the fine list of concerts and recitals that the institute offers for the current season. As in previous years, the backbone of the institute's programme will be found in orchestral music, although there are many attractive concerts and recitals by individual artists and musical organizations. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five Philharmonic concerts in the Opera House of the Academy on Friday evenings, Nov. 4, Dec. 2, Jan. 6, Feb. 3 and March 17. The appeal of these concerts will be increased by the presence of such notable assisting artists as Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Ignaz Friedman, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Dedetti, violoncello, and Emilia De Gogorza, baritone, in the order given. The New York Symphony Orchestra will give six Saturday matinee concerts in the Opera House, assisted by the following eminent artists: Nov. 5, Hulda Lashanska, soprano; Dec. 3, Paul Kochanski, violin; Jan. 7, Percy Grainger, piano; Jan. 21, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, pianists; Feb. 11, Erika Morini, violin, and March 11, Marguerite d'Alvarez, contralto. Mr. Damrosch will, from time to time, speak briefly the part which each instrument in [illegible] in the production of symphonic music and of some of the compositions to be played. Albert Coates, foremost orchestral leader of England, who conducts both the London Symphony and the Royal London Philharmonic orchestras, comes again this season to serve as guest conductor of the New York Symphony.

Concerts and recitals by prominent artists and chamber music organizations are found on the Institute's schedule almost every week of the winter.

FROM Newark, N. J.
OCT 3 0 1921

"When I gave up music for motion pictures, I felt I was venturing into an art that would develop a more universal appeal," said Maxwell Karger, "but for a time I was uncertain. I became convinced, however, one night years ago at Carnegie Hall in New York. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing in the big hall and 'Les Miserables' was being shown in pictures in the small hall on the right. In the foyer stood an announcer who kept shouting as the crowds came. 'Boston Symphony Orchestra on the left! Less miserables on the right!'"

ESTABLISHED 188 OCT 30 1921 D
From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Boston Symphony.

The following programs have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the opening of its 36th season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. For the Thursday evening concert, Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinee, the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, Cesar Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor (arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, the New England composer, who will play the organ part), numbers from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde"—the first and second ballets and the second entr'acte—and Berlioz' Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

TRIBUNE OCT 3 0 1921
Providence

BRILLIANT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON.

The present 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now well under way in Boston and promises to be one of the finest in its long and distinguished history, will include five concerts in Infantry Hall, Providence, on the following Tuesday evening: Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11. For this series, the sale of seats by subscription will open to-morrow.

Pierre Monteux, now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has been highly praised for the beauty of the ensemble under his direction, which is said to be in an even finer state of perfection than ever before. He has already been newly praised for the interest of his programs, both as regards the masterpieces of past times and the presentation of notable novelties.

The list of soloists scheduled for the series of five concerts in Providence, although not in every case familiar to this public, includes artists of the highest distinction, whose appearance in Providence should in each case prove an event in itself. A musical treat may be looked for in the advent of Bronislaus Huberman, the great European violinist, who will shortly visit this country. A protege, in his early youth, of Brahms, the composer, Patti, the singer, and Josef Joachim, the celebrated violin master, who was his teacher, he grew from a prodigy of amazing brilliance to a mature artist whom the public of Europe has praised in many ways above all other violinists.

Of the two pianists, Raymond Havens is as familiar to the Providence public as Wilhelm Bachaus is unfamiliar. The latter artist, however, bears as high a reputation among pianists in the capitals of Europe as does Huberman among the violinists. His concerts in this country in the season of 1912, which included appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are memorable in many ways. As it happens, Raymond Havens has not as yet played with the orchestra in Providence, his native city, although he has played here in concert and has played with notable success with the orchestra elsewhere. His fame as a concert pianist extends to New York and other cities of the East, and of Europe as well.

Of the two singers, Merle Alcock is as celebrated among American contraltos as is Helen Stanley among American sopranos. The former has sung with the orchestra several times elsewhere, and the latter, formerly a leading star of the Chicago Opera Company, has made a distinguished name for herself in recent seasons in concerts of her own and in appearances with orchestras.

NOV 30 1921
NEW HAVEN, CONN.

SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Great interest is manifested in the concert to be given tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both because this famous artistic possesion of New England has not visited New Haven in nine years, and because its present visit will be the first under its distinguished conductor, Pierre Monteux, although this French artist has formerly appeared here at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. The concert will be in Woolsey Hall, under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 3 1921 A

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, Ference Vecsey, the celebrated Hungarian violintst, just arrived from Europe, will make his debut in this city as soloist with the orchestra in this, his second concert in America. He will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major Pierre Monteux will open his third season in Brooklyn as conductor of the orchestra with the following numbers: Brahms' Third Symphony in F major, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

FROM NOV 4- 1921 X
Evening Globe
New York

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Notable Concert by Boston Orchestra—Easton With New York Symphony.

Pierre Monteux led last night the finest performances that I remember of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. I have heard symphonies by Beethoven led by most of the eminent conductors of our time, but out of the many there are three that memory has seen fit to treasure above the rest. There is this one of only last night; there is the Fifth, under Arturo Toscanini, nearly a year ago; there is the Seventh, under Karl Muck, in the autumn of 1914.

The performance in question of the "Eroica" opened the first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season. It was a performance in which the real Beethoven spoke through a medium of supremely beautiful orchestral playing. The tone, the balance, the richness, the power, the virtuosity of the orchestra were all in the great Boston tradition, incomparable. Mr. Monteux had the band absolutely in his control to do with as he pleased.

After so much Beethoven that has been prodded, lashed, tortured, analyzed, synthesized, all but hanged, drawn, and quartered, and boiled in oil, just because he who died in Vienna in the year 1827 didn't employ the orchestra of Strauss and Mahler, what a pleasure, and at last what a privilege, it was to hear the real Beethoven emerge again in the sublimity that is his, the sublimity he shares with Michelangelo, unsullied by the "improving" touch of any who would trick his proper grandeur in adornments not his own. And how infinitely greater is this, the real Beethoven, than any factitious monster elaborately paraded under the compelling ægis of the honored name!

The first movement was buoyant, lucid, mellow with that orchestral euphony which no other American band than the Boston has quite attained. The funeral march—so often drear, dull, a nuisance—held the listener as it drew near, passed, died away, bound in the spell of a pageantry noble as the dome of heaven that frames it. There were dramatic contrasts in the mighty lamentation, eloquent outbursts of a universal grief. And to be specific, what a wonder-worker was that tireless "demon drummer," as James Huneker loved to call him!

The scherzo passed at breathless speed, rising on fleet wings from the twilight of a silver pianissimo to the golden blare of noonday. The hunting horns of the trio rang as through Thessaly in a deathless call. It was then the audience awoke to the wonder of what it was hearing. After this scherzo it gave the conductor and his men the ovation they so richly merited, and Mr. Monteux appropriately signalled the band to rise and stand with him in response.

The finale opened in a heroic rush, and thereafter variation followed variation with a pulsing, irresistible vitality, and an Arabian-Night-like heaping of wonder on glittering wonder. Although it seems like a gross display of favoritism to single out any page for praise above another, it is not in flesh and blood and the iron and ink of a typewriter to refrain from mentioning by name the variation in the Hungarian manner, which was absolutely [illegible]

But then, so was every variation of the finale!

The whole thing was a case of an orchestra playing throughout in virtuoso fashion, and a conductor leading it with utter mastery. Mr. Monteux, with the wonderful band at his disposal, achieved in the "Eroica" a genuine re-creation of a masterpiece which so often in the actual performance has come to seem the sorriest kind of bore. Praice, I think, can hardly go further. When the last reiterated chord of the symphony had been released there was a second and more prolonged ovation for leader and band.

After an intermission the concert continued with Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," the "Clouds" and "Festivals" from Debussy's trio of orchestral nocturnes, and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." The pictorial and pleasing music of Rimsky-Korsakoff's marine and submarine orgy—with its apt allusion to Tannhäuser's Venusberg—Mr. Monteux has led many times for the Diaghilew Russian dancers, but never with such excellent results as last night, for though Diaghilew has had good orchestras he has never had a Boston Symphony.

As for the Debussy pieces, Pierre Monteux is the prophet and high priest of Debussy; it would be almost an impertinence to dwell on the superlative qualities of the performance of the two nocturnes on this occasion. Still, one may be pardoned for specifying the miraculous pianissimo of the kettledrums at the end, as if a faint, fine mist had drifted between earth and sky and enveloped the procession of the clouds in its transparent veil.

To conduct "Don Juan" in Carnegie Hall so soon after Richard Strauss himself had conducted it in the same room was not without the charm of daring. But Mr. Strauss in that particular piece, the first on the first programme of his return, seemed not yet wholly at home with his orchestra, nor was his orchestra, either, the Boston Symphony. The performance last night was more impassioned and more sensuous. The Don's last rakehelly carouse Mr. Monteux lifted to the topmost bacchanalian summit [illegible] the gray [illegible]

From OV 2 1921
Club Fellow
New York City

THE MUSICAL WORLD

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give its initial concert on Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, being the first of a series of five Thursday evening concerts. The afternoon series consists of five Saturdays, beginning November 5th.

The Boston Symphony concerts in New York have always comprised an important part of the Orchestra's development and its activities, and through thirty-five seasons of performances there it has taken its essential place in the musical life of the metropolis.

Each of the series of New York concerts offers full scope for Pierre Monteux's catholicity of taste in the selection of the great music of the past and for his intuitive appreciation of actual genius in new works, both American and foreign. Unhampered by considerations of soloists, he is enabled to make ideal symphonic programmes.

Mr. Monteux holds a reputation as an interpreter of the accepted masterpieces and as a fearless but discriminate champion of new music. His forward artistic outlook made famous the concerts which bore his name, and has, in his present post, found its best fruition. His reading of a standard symphony or more recent pictorial score bears no distortion of an obtrusive individuality, but rather authenticity, musicianly devotion, and a true perception of inner beauty.

From SUN
Address New York City
Date NOV 4- 1921 D

Boston Symphony Plays First Concert of Its Season Here

All Orchestras Now Present or Accounted For; Beethoven's 'Eroica' for a Start.

The last orchestra has been heard from. The Boston Symphony has spoken its first word here of the season. It began with one of its traditional Thursday evening concerts in Carnegie Hall last night. All our regularly expected orchestras, local or visitant, have now been present or accounted for—and the battle of the Beethoven is on. The Bostonians entered with nothing less heroic than the Third Symphony.

There was good greeting for Conductor Pierre Monteux and his men. At the end of the scherzo of the symphony, when M. Monteux called his players to their feet to answer a particularly prolonged applause, many of the famous band's Old Faithfuls were singled out: Longy, for instance; Carl Hampe, Wendler, Max Kunze, Stefan Neumann, Sand. And, too, Concertmaster Burgin in his second year. There are some new members, good importations by M. Monteux. The orchestra's tone remains generally lovely, rich; it has had forty-one years of mellowing. Its woodwinds are still excelling.

Perhaps the happiest portion of last night's programme was the playing of Rimsky-Korsakoff's submarine tone-picture, "Sadko." Here M. Monteux was on favorite ground, though there was as much delicacy fragrant through the more familiar two of Debussy's nocturnes which followed. The concert closed with Strauss's "Don Juan"—but Strauss himself conducted it only three nights before, and in more elastic fashion, with more brilliance. M. Monteux still lets his interpretations vacillate between mere gentleness and sheer burliness. However, the band's the thing—and it's back again. On Saturday afternoon it plays Brahms's third symphony, Schubert's "Rosamunde" incidentals, Cesar Franck and Berlioz.

And on the hearth the cold is fiercely
cruel.

The audience, though of good size, by no means filled the hall. But with its plaudits it threatened to raise the roof.

EVENING WORLD NOV 4- 1921 W
New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Its Thirty-Sixth Season at Carnegie Hall.

By Frank H. Warren.

That "bully band from Boston," as the late Mr. Huneker happily tagged the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened its thirty-sixth local season in Carnegie Hall last evening. The organization was greeted as an old friend as, indeed it is, for its personnel is virtually unchanged. Pierre Monteux is on his third season as conductor; three former members have returned to the ranks, and the only new face in the roster of 102 musicians is Georges Fourel who came from Europe to lead the viola section. M. Fourel has appeared with France's principal orchestras, and admits being a prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory.

Mr. Monteux, following a European summer of exploration, is said to have several novelties in his music cabinet, but last evening he was content to show such familiar friends as the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, the Debussy twins, "Clouds" and Festivals," and Richard St. Strauss's "Don Juan." In presenting the last number M. Monteux was bearding the lion in his den, for the composer himself had given us his own reading only last Monday.

Whether or not thoughts of Napoleon may have influenced the contents of the symphony—and Philip Hale's programme notes, less bulky than in the past—gives both sides of the contention—it was played as befits a hero. The orchestra was on its mettle, and Mr. Monteux counterbalanced his enthusiasm, attack and drive with discreet dips into pools of moderation, of color and of dynamics. The audience was not so large as the Boston men have enjoyed here in other days.

TELEGRAM NOV 4 192
New York City

Interesting Concerts by Two Orchestr

Once a fashionably orchestra playing to audiencees of brilliantly dressed women and distinguished men, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has now dropped to the plane of the local Philharmonic and Symphony societies. It plays to the general mass of music lovers. It is no longer an organization for the favored few who happen to [illegible] enough influence to obtain subscription seats. Last night the men from Boston came here for their first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. Pierre Monteux is the conductor, as he [illegible] for [illegible]

[30]

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
OCT 23 1921 A

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is undertaking as large a travelling schedule as possible this year, which will include the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York, and concerts in cities as far south as Baltimore, Washington and Richmond, and as far north as Montreal, besides the 48 regular concerts in Boston.

Pierre Monteux spent the summer in Europe in preparation for this, his third season. In Paris he conducted a symphony concert in which he introduced the tone poem of the late Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla-Khan," which was enthusiastically received by public and press. Mr. Monteux devoted a large part of his sojourn in Europe in quest of new works of genius from various countries, the finest of which will probably figure on his programmes here, although a just recognition of the music of to-day and to-morrow will give due place to the predominance of the standard works of the orchestral repertory.

The personnel of the orchestra remains substantially as in former seasons, with only one newcomer among the leaders of sections, and three other minor changes. The new virtuoso is Georges Fourel, who has come frm Europe to head the viola section. He is a prize graduate of the Paris Conservatory. He has played with the large orchestras of France, notably as viola soloist of the Lamoureux concerts.

Another event of interest is the new Burgin String Quartet, which is being organized by Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, together with the other leaders of the string sections, in the same way that the Kneisel Quartet was organized within the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the '80s.

The soloists who are to appear in each of the five concerts in Providence include Bronislaw Huberman, the great European violinist, whose visit to America, shortly expected, may prove one of the outstanding events of the musical season in this country. When a boy of 15, this artist was praised by Brahms, the composer, and Patti, the singer. His teacher was Josef Joachim.

There will be two piano soloists. The first of these, Wilhelm Bachaus, first came to this country in 1912 and gave concerts, besides his appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other pianist, Raymond Havens, is far more familiar to the Providence public, although he has never appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Havens is a native of Providence, and his early training also took place in this city. He has given concerts in New York, other cities of the East, and in Europe.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be interested in the organization's concert schedule for this season because of the unusual attention given to New England cities. More of these than ever before in a single season are included in the list, indicating an effort to establish the orchestra more completely as a New England, as well as Boston, institution.

In addition to its regular series of 48 concerts in Boston, nine in Cambridge and five in Providence, the orchestra will play in Fall River, New Bedford, Brockton, Springfield and Lynn in Massachusetts, in Hartford and New Haven, Conn., in Burlington and Middlebury, Vt., in Portland, Me., and in Manchester, N. H.

OCT 30 1921
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The opening of the season of five Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music, which will take place next Friday evening, Nov. 4, at 8:15, will be doubly eventful in that Ferenc Vecsey, the celebrated Hungarian violinist, just arrived from Europe, will make his debut in this city as soloist with the orchestra in this, his second concert in America.

FROM OCT 30 1921
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The musical programme of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences is generally considered the mainstay of Brooklyn's musical life, and this tradition is fully maintained by the fine list of concerts and recitals that the institute offers for the current season. As in previous years, the backbone of the institute's programme will be found in orchestral music, although there are many attractive concerts and recitals by individual artists and musical organizations. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five Philharmonic concerts in the Opera House of the Academy on Friday evenings, Nov. 4, Dec. 2, Jan. 6, Feb. 3 and March 17. The appeal of these concerts will be increased by the presence of such notable assisting artists as Ferenc Vecsey, violin; Ignaz Friedman, piano; Louise Homer, contralto; Jean Dedetti, violoncello, and Emilia De Gogorza, baritone, in the order given. The New York Symphony Orchestra will give six Saturday matinee concerts in the Opera House, assisted by the following eminent artists: Nov. 5, Hulda Lashanska, soprano; Dec. 3, Paul Kochanski, violin; Jan. 7, Percy Grainger, piano; Jan. 21, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, pianists; Feb. 11, Erika Morini, violin, and March 11, Marguerite D'Alvarez, contralto. Mr. Damrosch will, from time to time, speak briefly of the part which each instrument in an orchestra takes in the production of symphonic music and of some of the compositions to be played. Albert Coates, foremost orchestral leader of England, who conducts both the London Symphony and the Royal London Philharmonic orchestras, comes again this season to serve as guest conductor of the New York Symphony.

Concerts and recitals by prominent artists and chamber music organizations are found on the Institute's schedule almost every week of the winter.

FROM

"When I gave up music for motion pictures, I felt I was venturing into an art that would develop a more universal appeal," said Maxwell Karger, "but for a time I was uncertain. I became convinced, however, one night years ago at Carnegie Hall in New York. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing in the big hall and 'Les Miserables' was being shown in pictures in the small hall on the right. In the foyer stood an announcer who kept shouting as the crowds came. 'Boston Symphony Orchestra on the left! Less miserables on the right!'"

ESTABLISHED 1881 OCT 30 1921
From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Boston Symphony.

The following programs have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, now in his third season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the opening of its 36th season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. For the Thursday evening concert, Beethoven's Third Symphony "Eroica," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." For the Saturday matinee, the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major, Cesar Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor (arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, the New England composer, who will play the organ part), numbers from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde"—the first and second ballets and the second entr'acte—and Berlioz' Overture, "The Roman Carnival."

TRIBUNE
Providence

BRILLIANT BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASON.

The present 41st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is now well under way in Boston and promises to be one of the finest in its long and distinguished history, will include five concerts in Infantry Hall, Providence, on the following Tuesday evening: Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11. For this series, the sale of seats by subscription will open to-morrow.

Pierre Monteux, now entering upon his third season as conductor of the orchestra, has been highly praised for the beauty of the ensemble under his direction, which is said to be in an even finer state of perfection than ever before. He has already been newly praised for the interest of his programs, both as regards the masterpieces of past times and the presentation of notable novelties.

The list of soloists scheduled for the series of five concerts in Providence, although not in every case familiar to this public, includes artists of the highest distinction, whose appearance in Providence should in each case prove an event in itself. A musical treat may be looked for in the advent of Bronislaus Huberman, the great European violinist, who will shortly visit this country. A protege, in his early youth, of Brahms, the composer, Patti, the singer, and Josef Joachim, the celebrated violin master, who was his teacher, he grew from a prodigy of amazing brilliance to a mature artist whom the public of Europe has praised in many ways above all other violinists.

Of the two pianists, Raymond Havens is as familiar to the Providence public as Wilhelm Bachaus is unfamiliar. The latter artist, however, bears as high a reputation among pianists in the capitals of Europe as does Huberman among the violinists. His concerts in this country in the season of 1912, which included appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are memorable in many ways. As it happens, Raymond Havens has not as yet played with the orchestra in Providence, his native city, although he has played here in concert and has played with notable success with the orchestra elsewhere. His fame as a concert pianist extends to New York and other cities of the East, and of Europe as well.

Of the two singers, Merle Alcock is as celebrated among American contraltos as is Helen Stanley among American sopranos. The former has sung with the orchestra several times elsewhere, and the latter, formerly a leading star of the Chicago Opera Company, has made a distinguished name for herself in recent seasons in concerts of her own and in appearances with orchestras.

FROM 30 1921
HAVEN, CONN.
30

SYMPHONY TONIGHT

Great interest is manifested in the concert to be given tonight by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, both because this famous artistic possesion of New England has not visited New Haven in nine years, and because its present visit will be the first under its distinguished conductor, Pierre Monteux, although this French artist has formerly appeared here at the head of Diaghileff's Ballet Russe. The concert will be in Woolsey Hall, under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 3 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the opening of the season of five Boston Symphony concerts at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, Ference Vecsey, the celebrated Hungarian violinist, just arrived from Europe, will make his debut in this city as soloist with the orchestra in this, his second concert in America. He will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major. Pierre Monteux will open his third season in Brooklyn as conductor of the orchestra with the following numbers: Brahms' Third Symphony in F major, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

FROM NOV 4 1921
Evening Globe
New York

MUSIC
By PITTS SANBORN.

Notable Concert by Boston Orchestra—Easton With New York Symphony.

Pierre Monteux led last night the finest performances that I remember of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. I have heard symphonies by Beethoven led by most of the eminent conductors of our time, but out of the many there are three that memory has seen fit to treasure above the rest. There is this one of only last night; there is the Fifth, under Arturo Toscanini, nearly a year ago; there is the Seventh, under Karl Muck, in the autumn of 1914.

The performance in question of the "Eroica" opened the first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season. It was a performance in which the real Beethoven spoke through a medium of supremely beautiful orchestral playing. The tone, the balance, the richness, the power, the virtuosity of the orchestra were all in the great Boston tradition, incomparable. Mr. Monteux had the band absolutely in his control to do with as he pleased.

After so much Beethoven that has been prodded, lashed, tortured, analyzed, synthesized, all but hanged, drawn, and quartered, and boiled in oil, just because he who died in Vienna in the year 1827 didn't employ the orchestra of Strauss and Mahler, what a pleasure, and at last what a privilege, it was to hear the real Beethoven emerge again in the sublimity that is his, the sublimity he shares with Michelangelo, unsullied by the "improving" touch of any who would trick his proper grandeur in adornments not his own. And how infinitely greater is this, the real Beethoven, than any factitious monster elaborately paraded under the compelling ægis of the honored name!

The first movement was buoyant, lucid, mellow with that orchestral euphony which no other American band than the Boston has quite attained. The funeral march—so often drear, dull, a nuisance—held the listener as it drew near, passed, died away, bound in the spell of a pageantry noble as the dome of heaven that frames it. There were dramatic contrasts in the mighty lamentation, eloquent outbursts of a universal grief. And to be specific, what a wonder-worker was that tireless "demon drummer," as James Huneker loved to call him!

The scherzo passed at breathless speed, rising on fleet wings from the twilight of a silver pianissimo to the golden blare of noonday. The hunting horns of the trio rang as through Thessaly in a deathless call. . . . It was then the audience awoke to the wonder of what it was hearing. After this scherzo it gave the conductor and his men the ovation they so richly merited, and Mr. Monteux appropriately signalled the band to rise and stand with him in response.

The finale opened in a heroic rush, and thereafter variation followed variation with a pulsing, irresistible vitality, and an Arabian-Night-like heaping of wonder on glittering wonder. Although it seems like a gross display of favoritism to single out any page for praise above another, it is not in flesh and blood and the iron and ink of a typewriter to refrain from mentioning by name the variation in the Hungarian manner, which was absolutely intoxicating.

But then, so was every variation of the finale!

The whole thing was a case of an orchestra playing throughout in virtuoso fashion, and a conductor leading it with utter mastery. Mr. Monteux, with the wonderful band at his disposal, achieved in the "Eroica" a genuine re-creation of a masterpiece which so often in the actual performance has come to seem the sorriest kind of bore. Praice, I think, can hardly go further. When the last reiterated chord of the symphony had been released there was a second and more prolonged ovation for leader and band.

After an intermission the concert continued with Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture "Sadko," the "Clouds" and "Festivals" from Debussy's trio of orchestral nocturnes, and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." The pictorial and pleasing music of Rimsky-Korsakoff's marine and submarine orgy—with its apt allusion to Tannhäuser's Venusberg—Mr. Monteux has led many times for the Diaghilew Russian dancers, but never with such excellent results as last night, for though Diaghilew has had good orchestras he has never had a Boston Symphony.

As for the Debussy pieces, Pierre Monteux is the prophet and high priest of Debussy; it would be almost an impertinence to dwell on the superlative qualities of the performance of the two nocturnes on this occasion. Still, one may be pardoned for specifying the miraculous pianissimo of the kettledrums at the end, as if a faint, fine mist had drifted between earth and sky and enveloped the procession of the clouds in its transparent veil.

To conduct "Don Juan" in Carnegie Hall so soon after Richard Strauss himself had conducted it in the same room was not without the charm of daring. But Mr. Strauss in that particular piece, the first on the first programme of his return, seemed not yet wholly at home with his orchestra, nor was his orchestra, either, the Boston Symphony. The performance last night was more impassioned and more sensuous. The Don's last rakehelly carouse Mr. Monteux lifted to the topmast bacchanalian summit . . . . [illegible] down into the gray, irrepara-

---

From NOV 2 1921
Club Fellow
New York City

THE MUSICAL WORLD

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will give its initial concert on Thursday evening, at Carnegie Hall, being the first of a series of five Thursday evening concerts. The afternoon series consists of five Saturdays, beginning November 5th.

The Boston Symphony concerts in New York have always comprised an important part of the Orchestra's development and its activities, and through thirty-five seasons of performances there it has taken its essential place in the musical life of the metropolis.

Each of the series of New York concerts offers full scope for Pierre Monteux's catholicity of taste in the selection of the great music of the past and for his intuitive appreciation of actual genius in new works, both American and foreign. Unhampered by considerations of soloists, he is enabled to make ideal symphonic programmes.

Mr. Monteux holds a reputation as an interpreter of the accepted masterpieces and as a fearless but discriminate champion of new music. His forward artistic outlook made famous the concerts which bore his name, and has, in his present post, found its best fruition. His reading of a standard symphony or more recent pictorial score bears no distortion of an obtrusive individuality, but rather authenticity, musicianly devotion, and a true perception of inner beauty.

From SUN

Address New York City

Date NOV 4 1921 D

Boston Symphony Plays First Concert of Its Season Here

All Orchestras Now Present or Accounted For; Beethoven's 'Eroica' for a Start.

The last orchestra has been heard from. The Boston Symphony has spoken its first word here of the season. It began with one of its traditional Thursday evening concerts in Carnegie Hall last night. All our regularly expected orchestras, local or visitant, have now been present or accounted for—and the battle of the Beethoven is on. The Bostonians entered with nothing less heroic than the Third Symphony.

There was good greeting for Conductor Pierre Monteux and his men. At the end of the scherzo of the symphony, when M. Monteux called his players to their feet to answer a particularly prolonged applause, many of the famous band's Old Faithfuls were singled out: Longy, for instance; Carl Hampe, Wendler, Max Kunze, Stefan Neumann, Sand. And, too, Concertmaster Burgin in his second year. There are some new members, good importations by M. Monteux. The orchestra's tone remains generally lovely, rich; it has had forty-one years of mellowing. Its woodwinds are still excelling.

Perhaps the happiest portion of last night's programme was the playing of Rimsky-Korsakoff's submarine tone-picture, "Sadko." Here M. Monteux was on favorite ground, though there was as much delicacy fragrant through the more familiar two of Debussy's nocturnes which followed. The concert closed with Strauss's "Don Juan"—but Strauss himself conducted it only three nights before, and in more elastic fashion, with more brilliance. M. Monteux still lets his interpretations vacillate between mere gentleness and sheer burliness. However, the band's the thing—and it's back again. On Saturday afternoon it plays Brahms's third symphony, Schubert's "Rosamunde" incidentals, Cesar Franck and Berlioz.

And on the hearth the cold is fiercely
cruel.

The audience, though of good size, by no means filled the hall. But with its plaudits it threatened to raise the roof.

EVENING WORLD NOV 4 1921 R
New York City

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Its Thirty-Sixth Season at Carnegie Hall.

By Frank H. Warren.

That "bully band from Boston," as the late Mr. Huneker happily tagged the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened its thirty-sixth local season in Carnegie Hall last evening. The organization was greeted as an old friend as, indeed it is, for its personnel is virtually unchanged. Pierre Monteux is on his third season as conductor; three former members have returned to the ranks, and the only new face in the roster of 102 musicians is Georges Fourel who came from Europe to lead the viola section. M. Fourel has appeared with France's principal orchestras, and admits being a prize virtuoso of the Paris Conservatory.

Mr. Monteux, following a European summer of exploration, is said to have several novelties in his music cabinet, but last evening he was content to show such familiar friends as the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, the Debussy twins, "Clouds" and Festivals," and Richard St. Strauss's "Don Juan." In presenting the last number M. Monteux was bearding the lion in his den, for the composer himself had given us his own reading only last Monday.

Whether or not thoughts of Napoleon may have influenced the contents of the symphony—and Philip Hale's programme notes, less bulky than in the past—gives both sides of the contention—it was played as befits a hero. The orchestra was on its mettle, and Mr. Monteux counterbalanced his enthusiasm, attack and drive with discreet dips into pools of moderation, of color and of dynamics. The audience was not so large as the Boston men have enjoyed here in other days.

TELEGRAM NOV 4 192
New York City

Interesting Concerts by Two Orchestras

Once a fashionably orchestra playing to audiences of brilliantly dressed women and distinguished men, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has now dropped to the plane of the local Philharmonic and Symphony societies. It plays to the general mass of music lovers. It is no longer an organization for the favored few who happen to have enough influence to obtain subscription seats. Last night the men from Boston came here for their first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall. Pierre Monteux is the conductor, as he has been for the past three seasons. The orchestra is an excellent body of musi-
The principal offering last ni to do otherwise. But it is very

's "Eroica" symphony, which performance noted more for its than for its virility. Mr.
teux is becoming a very interesting hoven conductor. Naturally he has French temperament, as he was n and trained in France. But he is ducting classic symphonies of all ools with less of a national flavor d more in the cosmopolitan manner in here.

In addition to the symphony the orchestra was heard in Rimsky-Korsakov's tone poem, "Sadko," in Debussy's "Nocturnes" and Richard Strauss' "Don Juan."

EVE. POST NOV 4 1921 K
NEW YORK CITY

Pierre Monteux did not bring anything new to Carnegie Hall for the season's first concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He began with the "Eroica," which, I heard from an expert, was played most vigorously and with uncommonly strong dynamic contrasts, especially in the funeral march. The piece following: Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone-picture "Sadko," a juvenile and rather feeble effort, was played impressively, and so was Strauss's "Don Juan," although this suffered naturally in contrast with Strauss's own interpretation in the same hall on Monday. Both orchestra and conductor were heard to best advantage in Debussy's nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals." The first of these is uninspired; the second is unusually muscular and manly for this ladylike and never rude composer.

FROM NOV 4 1921
EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

BOSTON BAND IN FIRST LOCAL CONCERT

Damrosch Orchestra and Four Recitalists Heard in Other Music of the Day.

Ordinarily, Pierre Monteux can be depended upon for the exceptional in interest, so far as his programmes are concerned, when he comes to New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but for the opening of its season last night in Carnegie Hall he was scarcely up to form. Neither New York audiences nor, one imagines, conductors themselves would suffer any catastrophic hardship were it to be forgotten for a couple of years that Beethoven wrote the "Eroica" and the C minor symphonies. But most of the batoniers have some sort of self-conscious notion that they must begin their concert series with either one or the other, whereas their itching idea of dignity would be just as well served with the beautiful and foolishly neglected Second and Eighth symphonies and audiences would be entranced because they would be almost discovering for the first time, many of them, some new and wonderous music of the colossus of their worship.

It was the C minor symphony that Josef Stransky picked for the opening of the Philharmonic Orchestra season, while Walter Damrosch played it yesterday afternoon, so it had to be the "Eroica," one supposes, that Mr. Monteux was driven to for his first concert here. It is perhaps the oftenest played music in the whole symphonic repertoire. It is so well known that even the average citizen, who never reads the amusingly contradictory but probably effulgently enlightening screeds the music reviewers write about everything under the baton except the "Eroica" symphony, realizes somewhere in his inwards that it isn't jazz and wasn't touched off by Jerome Kern one evening over three cigarettes. It takes a master, therefore, with something joyously profound and also something electric in his make-up to play it any more. And Mr. Monteux never drips any bounding tears from his baton nor does he ever strike sparks with it. So it was just the "Eroica" played for the fourth or fifth hundredth time last night.

The Beauty of "Sadko."

Afterward Mr. Monteux reached at least one piece that hasn't the edges eternally worn from it, namely Rimsky-Korsakov's "tone picture," "Sadko," the original fantasia which this greatest Russian of them all later drew upon for his opera on the same subject—an opera that some day or other, after it becomes a hundred years or so old and we all are dead, some future Gatti-Casazzi may discover to be better music than "Pagliacci," and will put on at the Metropolitan. "Sadko" is so beautifully simple a perfection in the color and movement of the fabric of its fabulous tale that at times it has the same effect on you that the first sight of a Monet landscape has. The sea, but the sea that washes Oriental shores, the sea that glimmers with reflected minarets, flows through the music as only Rimsky can make it flow. It is the sea of Eastern romance, and the tale is of its depths and of what strange and ear-filling things befall Sadko, the gusli player, therein.

Rich and glamorous music this was, but Mr Monteux all but spoilt it with performance that was not only unimaginative, but also inexpert, clod-

held two

---

of the three orchestral nocturnes of Debussy—"Nuages" and "Fetes"; but these have now become a little overplayed and their allure, too, will seem to acquire a bit of tarnish if they are heard too often. Why are they being continually brought forward to the neglect of the three symphonic sketches and the "Images"? The conclusion of Mr. Monteux's evening was given over to Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," which he himself played the other evening with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Boston band has few new faces (there have been only four shifts in the personnel), and there is little change apparent in the way it plays; its tone is still generally crude, especially the brass, and it appears to be as yet incapable of any of the finer and more minute effects one nowadays expects of an orchestra.

---

rom
EAGLE NOV 4 1921D
Brooklyn, New York

TWO ORCHESTRAS

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is like the harp in Tara's halls, a good instrument that waits only the hand of a master-conductor. In last evening's concert in Carnegie Hall, first of this year's series, the band proved itself potentially the finest organization in America, but Mr. Monteux is still short of the magnetism and imagination to draw from it a fullness of revelation.

The Beethoven "Eroica" lacked transparency. There were contrasts in its sounding; contrasts of chiaroscuro no more. This music should be flooded with light, the sort of light which once was the glory of Boston's string sections. Mr. Monteux does not discover for a contemporary orchestra the balance which is of Beethoven. Dr. Muck used to, but the Muck markings are no longer observed. Beethoven's orchestration must either be allotted to its original small choir of instruments, or else be quantitatively rescored. The most successful of Beethoven interpreters have never failed to observe the rule.

In addition the program brought readings of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," two of the Debussy "Nocturnes," and the Strauss "Don Juan." There ought to be righteous innovation in our readings of the tone-poems, now that the composer is here to disclose the secret. As Mr. Stokowski has said, "It is an excellent thing for Strauss to come here at this time; he will teach us younger men how to conduct his works." Which suggests the prophecy that in the future the Philadelphia Orchestra will give us our best performances of such seemingly recondite works as the "Also sprach Zarathustra."

FROM

PIERRE MONTEUX

Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra soon to be heard here.

ESTABLISHED 1861
FROM
Providence

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Smphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts here in Infantry Hall on the following Tuesday evenings, Nov. 15 Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11, with Merle Alcock, contralto; Helen Stanley, soprano; Wilhelm Bacchus and Raymond Havens, piano, and Bronislaw Huberman, violin, as soloists, had a brilliant opening of the New York season in Carnegie Hall, last Thursday evening. Public and press welcomed this famous orchestra in a way which augurs one of the finest seasons it has ever had.

So great has been the demand for symphony concerts in Boston that practically all seats have been taken in advance by subscription for the 48 regular concerts in Symphony Hall there. To satisfy those disappointed in obtaining seats, and to introduce the beauties of symphony concerts to a new public, a series of five extra concerts has been arranged, to be given at Symphony Hall on five Monday evenings through the season by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, at popular prices. Although but recently announced, the response to this new project has been extraordinarily large.

From
EAGLE NOV 5 1921D
Brooklyn, New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Brooklyn Concert Introduces Vecsey, a Great Violinist.

The new Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux opened last night at the Academy of Music in the presence of a great audience which occupied almost every seat save a few in the boxes. Both program and performance were worthy of the occasion. The program contained three great late Nineteenth Century composers in the order of their greatness—Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss. Strauss, of course, is very much of a Twentieth Century composer, but Mr. Monteux's selection last night was his early "Don Juan," first played in 1889, so the symphonic poem is only six years younger than the Brahms symphony and ten years younger than the great Tschaikowsky concerto, "There were giants in those days."

But this music, attractive as it proved, is all familiar. The new note of the evening was the introduction to Brooklyn of Ferenc Vecsey, the violinist. He played the great Tschaikowsky concerto, which, because of its difficulty, waited for ten years for a hearing in this country, until the brave Maud Powell learned and played it. It has become increasingly familiar to our concert rooms with the flood of new violinists, but too often it has been played as a high technical achievement, the wonder of the audience being aroused that the performer could play it at all. There was none of that with Vecsey. With his broad tone and magic fingers the difficulties simply faded from your mind, while the pathos and at times the piercing sweetness of the music flooded the auditorium. This is indeed a great violinist who stands at the top of Parnassus just next to Kreisler. Indeed he sounds very like the Kreisler of ten or a dozen years ago, lacking, as yet, that touch of the supernal, "that light that never was on sea or land," which has marked Kreisler's playing since the tragedy of war.

But in the interpretation of Tschaikowsky Vecsey, great as he is, did not work alone. The concerto is not wholly, or, indeed, chiefly, for the solo instrument. The orchestral part is vital and the playing of it by this unmatched band was a thing to revel in and marvel at. Mr. Monteux maintained a perfect balance of tone, and the blending of orchestra and soloist was a source of constant delight. It was such a performance as one hears rarely and cherishes in the memory.

The beauty of the tone of this now fully restored band was shown in its fullness in the Brahms symphony, the Third, less familiar than the Second or First. It used to be the fashion to decry Brahms as "dry," but the tenderness and beauty of this symphony was finely brought out last night. Perhaps no one would have moved to call it "Eroica"—one of the names early applied to it—from Monteux's reading but of its charm there could be no question.

The picturesque "Don Juan" at the close provided a happy contrast to the heart-searching concerto of Tschaikowsky. Its richness, its masses of tone, its vivid contrasts and the skill and variety of its orchestration were well calculated to send an audience home happy, an aim always emphasized in the program making of Theodore Thomas, a master in that field, who has never been surpassed.

From
JOURNAL NOV 5 1921
Syracuse, N. Y.

Critics in general speak well of the concert given during the week at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Tribute is paid to the brilliant and powerful work of the conductor, Mr. Monteux. The program included Beethoven's "Erioca" symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; the first two of Debussy's "Nocturnes" ("Nuages" and "Fetes") and Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" the same that the composer had presented earlier in the week.

---

om CITIZEN
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y. NOV 5 19
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large and Fashionable Audience at Academy Last Night.

Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss were the three composers upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Pierre Monteux conducting and Ference Vecsey the soloist) at its first concert of Brooklyn's annual series of five given last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under the joint auspices, as hertofore, of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The compositions heard were the F major symphony of Brahms (his third), the violin concerto of Tschaikowsky and Strauss' "Don Juan" tone-poem.

Mr. Vecsey, his first appearance with orchestra in America, easily surmounted the technical difficulties of the exceedingly intricate Tschaikowsky concerto.

The audience was large and socially prominent, its applause hearty and at the same time decorous.

FROM
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony

Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Strauss were the three composers upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conducting, and Ferenc Vecsey the soloist, at its first concert of Brooklyn's annual series of five, given last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under the joint auspices, as heretofore, of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The compositions heard were the F major symphony of Brahms (his third), the violin concerto of Tschaikowsky and Strauss' "Don Juan" tone-poem.

Mr. Monteux is to be again congratulated for giving comprehensive and fully satisfactory readings of the Brahms and Strauss scores, also an unusually fine orchestral accompaniment as background against the solo violin voice of the Tschaikowsky concerto. The Boston Orchestra has improved in tonal coloring and in the matter of gradations of tone quantity. Amongst the personnel could be noted those fine veteran players, Georges Longy and Carl Hampe, for twenty-four and twenty-nine years first oboe and first trombone of the famous organization which they still serve. Other familiar faces of long acquaintance to Boston Orchestra patrons were again those of Messrs. Wendler, Sand, Kunze, Neumann and Holy, respectively, at first rack of French horn, clarinet, bass, tympani and harp. Richard Burgin reappears in his second season as concertmaster; Jean Bedetti and the veteran Alwin Schroeder share first position of celli; Georges Fourel is a newcomer as leader in the viola group, and Messrs. Laurent, Mager, Laus and Thillois return to their fourth season of first flute, trumpet, bassoon and second fiddles. In passing, it is interesting to note that this orchestra is to-day the only large body of non-union musicians in the United States, a fact that does not deteriorate one whit its super-excellence in brilliant virtuosity.

A special feature in the performance of the symphony was the remarkable contrasts in dynamics, the "pp" and "ff" being noticeable extremes in softness and loudness. Of course this symphony reveals Brahms in his cheerful, lighter moments, not as profound as the Brahms of C minor or as rich in harmonic construction as in the D major symphonies. The finale, however, shows the master in his true colors, thematically and contrapuntally the mighty master. The Andante was beautifully played, with rare significance as to inner voice movements.

The Strauss "Don Juan" was read with passionate verve and intense realism, a younger love-hero than the matured one felt in Dr. Strauss' own reading of the score last Monday evening in Manhattan.

Mr. Vecsey, his first appearance with orchestra in America, easily surmounted the technical difficulties of the exceedingly intricate Tschaikowsky concerto. His tone has not all the warmth and tone color one might desire, but his playing was never sentimentally exaggerated. He gave a masterful interpretation of the work and at all times held it in the hollow of his hand. Nor did he descend with full weight upon the vibrant G string, over-accentuating its richness as do the full brood of Auer Russian hatchlings in this concerto particularly.

The audience was large and socially prominent, its applause hearty and at the same time decorous.

ESTABLISHED 1881 TIMES
rom
~~OST~~ NOV 5 1921
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN EXTRA CONCERTS

The pending appearance of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra in this city will be one of a schedule of unusual size. The unprecedented sale of subscription seats for the twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts in Symphony hall, Boston, left practically no reserved seats still available for these concerts, and therefore, in response to a very evident popular demand, an extra series of five Boston Symphony concerts by the full orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, has been arranged, to be given in Symphony hall on five Monday evenings—November 28, January 16, February 13, March 13, and April 10. The soloists at these concerts will be Alfred Mirovitch and John Powell, pianists, Estelle Liebling, soprano, Richard Burgin, who is the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, who is the first 'cellist. These concerts, together with the regular concerts, the two pension fund concerts and three young people's concerts, will make a record total of fifty-eight concerts in Boston. That there is a public for the additional concerts is proven by the fact that a large portion of the seats have been taken by several organizations, in advance of the public sale, which will soon open. The season's schedule for the Boston Symphony orchestra, including eighty-three concerts in New England, fifteen concerts in Greater New York, and single concerts in other cities, will make a total of 105 concerts, which is as large a number as the orchestra could practically undertake.

---

n HERALD
ess New York City

Impressive Organ Chorale Played by Boston Symphony

Walter Goodrich's Newly Devised Music of Cesar Franck Pleases Hearers.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was very peaceful. The list of compositions was Brahms's F major symphony, three numbers of Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, Cesar Franck's B minor organ chorale, arranged for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich, who played the organ part, and Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" overture. "The too, too famous F major," as Brahms called it in a letter to Herzogenberg, comes around every season. It is always welcome, but it suffers severely from readings. That of M. Monteux, heard with patient attention yesterday, recalled the comment made in a German newspaper after Brahms had conducted the Hamburg Philharmonic in a performance of it.

"Brahms's interpretation of his works frequently differs so inconceivably in delicate ryhthmic and harmonic accents from anything to which one is accustomed that the apprehension of his intentions could only be entirely possible to another man possessed of exactly similar sound susceptibility or inspired by the power of divination."

Conductors who achieve delicacy of rhythmic and harmonic accent, whether equal to Brahms's or not, are extremely rare. Those who are inspired by the power of divination are still rarer. Just now we are learning how different the delicacy and finesse of one Strauss are from those of his self-praclaimed prophets. Doubtless the expounders of Brahms are mostly about as near to the true Brahms. At any rate, they succeed in making their performances sound so. M. Monteux was excessively vigorous in his interpretation of the first movement. After that he entered a domain of blissful repose from which all emotional disturbances were banished.

Mr. Goodrich's newly devised version of Cesar Franck's B minor organ chorale proved to be well made. It is an orchestral composition in which the organ plays an obbligato rather than a solo part. The closing pages are particularly impressive. But the purpose of such a transcription seems a trifle uncertain, unless it be to afford opportunities for organists to emerge from the obscurity of the free church recital at 4 P. M. into the glory of the orchestral concert hall. The performance of the composition was admirable.

[3]

to do otherwise. But it is very

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, which had a performance noted more for its refinement than for its virility. Mr. Monteux is becoming a very interesting Beethoven conductor. Naturally he has the French temperament, as he was born and trained in France. But he is conducting classic symphonies of all schools with less of a national flavor and more in the cosmopolitan manner in vogue here.

In addition to the symphony the orchestra was heard in Rimsky-Korsakov's tone poem, "Sadko," in Debussy's "Nocturnes" and Richard Strauss' "Don Juan."

EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

Pierre Monteux did not bring anything new to Carnegie Hall for the season's first concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He began with the "Eroica," which, I heard from an expert, was played most vigorously and with uncommonly strong dynamic contrasts, especially in the funeral march. The piece following: Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone-picture "Sadko," a juvenile and rather feeble effort, was played impressively, and so was Strauss's "Don Juan," although this suffered naturally in contrast with Strauss's own interpretation in the same hall on Monday. Both orchestra and conductor were heard to best advantage in Debussy's nocturnes: "Clouds" and "Festivals." The first of these is uninspired; the second is unusually muscular and manly for this ladylike and never rude composer.

FROM
EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

BOSTON BAND IN FIRST LOCAL CONCERT

Damrosch Orchestra and Four Recitalists Heard in Other Music of the Day.

Ordinarily, Pierre Monteux can be depended upon for the exceptional in interest, so far as his programmes are concerned, when he comes to New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but for the opening of its season last night in Carnegie Hall he was scarcely up to form. Neither New York audiences nor, one imagines, conductors themselves would suffer any catastrophic hardship were it to be forgotten for a couple of years that Beethoven wrote the "Eroica" and the C minor symphonies. But most of the batoniers have some sort of self-conscious notion that they must begin their concert series with either one or the other, whereas their itching idea of dignity would be just as well served with the beautiful and foolishly neglected Second and Eighth symphonies and audiences would be entranced because they would be almost discovering for the first time, many of them, some new and wonderous music of the colossus of their worship.

It was the C minor symphony that Josef Stransky picked for the opening of the Philharmonic Orchestra season, while Walter Damrosch played it yesterday afternoon, so it had to be the "Eroica," one supposes, that Mr. Monteux was driven to for his first concert here. It is perhaps the oftenest played music in the whole symphonic repertoire. It is so well known that even the average citizen, who never reads the amusingly contradictory but probably effulgently enlightening screeds the music reviewers write about everything under the baton except the "Eroica" symphony, realizes somewhere in his inwards that it isn't jazz and wasn't touched off by Jerome Kern one evening over three cigarettes. It takes a master, therefore, with something joyously profound and also something electric in his make-up to play it any more. And Mr. Monteux never drips any bounding tears from his baton nor does he ever strike sparks with it. So it was just the "Eroica" played for the fourth or fifth hundredth time last night.

The Beauty of "Sadko."

Afterward Mr. Monteux reached at least one piece that hasn't the edges eternally worn from it, namely Rimsky-Korsakoy's "tone picture," "Sadko," the original fantasia which this greatest Russian of them all later drew upon for his opera on the same subject—an opera that some day or other, after it becomes a hundred years or so old and we all are dead, some future Gatti-Casazzi may discover to be better music than "Pagliacci," and will put on at the Metropolitan. "Sadko" is so beautifully simple a perfection in the color and movement of the fabric of its fabulous tale that at times it has the same effect on you that the first sight of a Monet landscape has. The sea, but the sea that washes Oriental shores, the sea that glimmers with reflected minarets, flows through the music as only Rimsky can make it flow. It is the sea of Eastern romance, and the tale is of its depths and of what strange and ear-filling things befall Sadko, the gusli player, therein.

Rich and glamurous music this was, but Mr Monteux all but spoilt it with a performance that was not only unimaginative, but also inexpert, clodhoppery. [illegible] the programm held two

---

we can place on the

of the these orchestral nocturnes of Debussy—"Nuages" and "Fetes"; but these have now become a little overplayed and their allure, too, will seem to acquire a bit of tarnish if they are heard too often. Why are they being continually brought forward to the neglect of the three symphonic sketches and the "Images"? The conclusion of Mr. Monteux's evening was given over to Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," which he himself played the other evening with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

The Boston band has few new faces (there have been only four shifts in the personnel), and there is little change apparent in the way it plays; its tone is still generally crude, especially the brass, and it appears to be as yet incapable of any of the finer and more minute effects one nowadays expects of an orchestra.

---

rom
EAGLE NOV 4 1921D
Brooklyn, New York

TWO ORCHESTRAS

By WILLIAM B. MURRAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is like the harp in Tara's halls, a good instrument that waits only the hand of a master-conductor. In last evening's concert in Carnegie Hall, first of this year's series, the band proved itself potentially the finest organization in America, but Mr. Monteux is still short of the magnetism and imagination to draw from it a fullness of revelation.

The Beethoven "Eroica" lacked transparency. There were contrasts in its sounding; contrasts of chiaroscuro, no more. This music should be flooded with light, the sort of light which once was the glory of Boston's string sections. Mr. Monteux does not discover for a contemporary orchestra the balance which is of Beethoven. Dr. Muck used to, but the Muck markings are no longer observed. Beethoven's orchestration must either be allotted to its original small choir of instruments, or else be quantitatively rescored. The most successful of Beethoven interpreters have never failed to observe the rule.

In addition the program brought readings of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sadko," two of the Debussy "Nocturnes," and the Strauss "Don Juan." There ought to be righteous innovation in our readings of the tone-poems, now that the composer is here to disclose the secret. As Mr. Stokowski has said, "It is an excellent thing for Strauss to come here at this time; he will teach us younger men how to conduct his works." Which suggests the prophecy that in the future the Philadelphia Orchestra will give us our best performances of such seemingly recondite works as the "Also sprach Zarathustra."

ROM

PIERRE MONTEUX

Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra soon to be heard here.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Smphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts here in Infantry Hall on the following Tuesday evenings, Nov. 15 Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11, with Merle Alcock, contralto; Helen Stanley, soprano; Wilhelm Bacchus and Raymond Havens, piano, and Bronislaw Huberman, violin, as soloists, had a brilliant opening of the New York season in Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening. Public and press welcomed this famous orchestra in a way which augurs one of the finest seasons it has ever had.

So great has been the demand for Symphony concerts in Boston that practically all seats have been taken in advance by subscription for the 48 regular concerts in Symphony Hall there. To satisfy those disappointed in obtaining seats, and to introduce the beauties of symphony concerts to a new public, a series of five extra concerts has been arranged, to be given at Symphony Hall on five Monday evenings through the season by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, at popular prices. Although but recently announced, the response to this new project has been extraordinarily large.

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its First Brooklyn Concert Introduces Vecsey, a Great Violinist.

The new Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux opened last night at the Academy of Music in the presence of a great audience which occupied almost every seat save a few in the boxes. Both program and performance were worthy of the occasion. The program contained three great late Nineteenth Century composers in the order of their greatness—Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss. Strauss, of course, is very much of a Twentieth Century composer, but Mr. Monteux's selection last night was his early "Don Juan," first played in 1889, so the symphonic poem is only six years younger than the Brahms symphony and ten years younger than the great Tschaikowsky concerto. "There were giants in those days."

But this music, attractive as it proved, is all familiar. The new note of the evening was the introduction to Brooklyn of Ferenc Vecsey, the violinist. He played the great Tschaikowsky concerto, which, because of its difficulty, waited for ten years for a hearing in this country, until the brave Maud Powell learned and played it. It has become increasingly familiar to our concert rooms with the flood of new violinists, but too often it has been played as a high technical achievement, the wonder of the audience being aroused that the performer could play it at all. There was none of that with Vecsey. With his broad tone and magic fingers the difficulties simply faded from your mind, while the pathos and at times the piercing sweetness of the music flooded the auditorium. This is indeed a great violinist who stands at the top of Parnassus just next to Kreisler. Indeed he sounds very like the Kreisler of ten or a dozen years ago, lacking, as yet, that touch of the supernal, "that light that never was on sea or land," which has marked Kreisler's playing since the tragedy of war.

But in the interpretation of Tschaikowsky Vecsey, great as he is, did not work alone. The concerto is not wholly, or, indeed, chiefly, for the solo instrument. The orchestral part is vital and the playing of it by this unmatched band was a thing to revel in and marvel at. Mr. Monteux maintained a perfect balance of tone, and the blending of orchestra and soloist was a source of constant delight. It was such a performance as one hears rarely and cherishes in the memory.

The beauty of the tone of this now fully restored band was shown in its fullness in the Brahms symphony, the Third, less familiar than the Second or First. It used to be the fashion to decry Brahms as "dry," but the tenderness and beauty of this symphony was finely brought out last night. Perhaps no one would have moved to call it "Eroica"—one of the names early applied to it—from Monteux's reading but of its charm there could be no question.

The picturesque "Don Juan" at the close provided a happy contrast to the heart-searching concerto of Tschaikowsky. Its richness, its masses of tone, its vivid contrasts and the skill and variety of its orchestration were well calculated to send an audience home happy, an aim always emphasized in the program making of Theodore Thomas, a master in that field, who has never been surpassed.

From
JOURNAL NOV 5 1921
Syracuse, N. Y.

Critics in general speak well of the concert given during the week at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Tribute is paid to the brilliant and powerful work of the conductor, Mr. Monteux. The program included Beethoven's "Erioca" symphony; Rimsky-Korsakoff's tone picture, "Sadko"; the first two of Debussy's "Nocturnes" ("Nuages" and "Fetes") and Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" the same that the composer had presented earlier in the week.

---

om CITIZEN
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

te.........

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large and Fashionable Audience at Academy Last Night.

Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss were the three composers upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Pierre Monteuv conducting and Ference Vecsey the soloist) at its first concert of Brooklyn's annual series of five given last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under the joint auspices, as hertofore, of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The compositions heard were the F major symphony of Brahms (his third), the violin concerto of Tschaikowsky and Strauss' "Don Juan" tone-poem.

Mr. Vecsey, his first appearance with orchestra in America, easily surmounted the technical difficulties of the exceedingly intricate Tschaikowsky concerto.

The audience was large and socially prominent, its applause hearty and at the same time decorous.

FROM
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony

Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Strauss were the three composers upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conducting, and Ferenc Vecsey the soloist, at its first concert of Brooklyn's annual series of five, given last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under the joint auspices, as heretofore, of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The compositions heard were the F major symphony of Brahms (his third), the violin concerto of Tschaikowsky and Strauss' "Don Juan" tone-poem.

Mr. Monteux is to be again congratulated for giving comprehensive and fully satisfactory readings of the Brahms and Strauss scores, also an unusually fine orchestral accompaniment as background against the solo violin voice of the Tschaikowsky concerto. The Boston Orchestra has improved in tonal coloring and in the matter of gradations of tone quantity. Amongst the personnel could be noted those fine veteran players, Georges Longy and Carl Hampe, for twenty-four and twenty-nine years first oboe and first trombone of the famous organization which they still serve. Other familiar faces of long acquaintance to Boston Orchestra patrons were again those of Messrs. Wendler, Sand, Kunze, Neumann and Holy, respectively, at first rack of French horn, clarinet, bass, tympani and harp. Richard Burgin reappears in his second season as concertmaster; Jean Bedetti and the veteran Alwin Schroeder share first position of celli; Georges Fourel is a newcomer as leader in the viola group, and Messrs. Laurent, Mager, Laus and Thillois return to their fourth season of first flute, trumpet, bassoon and second fiddles. In passing, it is interesting to note that this orchestra is to-day the only large body of non-union musicians in the United States, a fact that does not deteriorate one whit its super-excellence in brilliant virtuosity.

A special feature in the performance of the symphony was the remarkable contrasts in dynamics, the "pp" and "ff" being noticeable extremes in softness and loudness. Of course this symphony reveals Brahms in his cheerful, lighter moments, not as profound as the Brahms of C minor or as rich in harmonic construction as in the D major symphonies. The finale, however, shows the master in his true colors, thematically and contrapuntally the mighty master. The Andante was beautifully played, with rare significance as to inner voice movements.

The Strauss "Don Juan" was read with passionate verve and intense realism, a younger love-hero than the matured one felt in Dr. Strauss' own reading of the score last Monday evening in Manhattan.

Mr. Vecsey, his first appearance with orchestra in America, easily surmounted the technical difficulties of the exceedingly intricate Tschaikowsky concerto. His tone has not all the warmth and tone color one might desire, but his playing was never sentimentally exaggerated. He gave a masterful interpretation of the work and at all times held it in the hollow of his hand. Nor did he descend with full weight upon the vibrant G string, over-accentuating its richness as do the full brood of Auer Russian hatchlings in this concerto particularly.

The audience was large and socially prominent, its applause hearty and at the same time decorous.

STABLISHED 1881
rom
OST NOV 5 1921
Hartford, Conn.

TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN EXTRA CONCERTS

The pending appearance of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra in this city will be one of a schedule of unusual size. The unprecedented sale of subscription seats for the twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts in Symphony hall, Boston, left practically no reserved seats still available for these concerts, and therefore, in response to a very evident popular demand, an extra series of five Boston Symphony concerts by the full orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, has been arranged, to be given in Symphony hall on five Monday evenings—November 28, January 16, February 13, March 13, and April 10. The soloists at these concerts will be Alfred Mirovitch and John Powell, pianists, Estelle Liebling, soprano. Richard Burgin, who is the concertmaster of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, who is the first 'cellist. These concerts, together with the regular concerts, the two pension fund concerts and three young people's concerts, will make a record total of fifty-eight concerts in Boston. That there is a public for the additional concerts is proven by the fact that a large portion of the seats have been taken by several organizations, in advance of the public sale, which will soon open. The season's schedule for the Boston Symphony orchestra, including eighty-three concerts in New England, fifteen concerts in Greater New York, and single concerts in other cities, will make a total of 105 concerts, which is as large a number as the orchestra could practically undertake.

---

n HERALD
ress New York City

Impressive Organ Chorale Played by Boston Symphony

Walter Goodrich's Newly Devised Music of Cesar Franck Pleases Hearers.

The first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was very peaceful. The list of compositions was Brahms's F major symphony, three numbers of Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, Casar Franck's B minor organ chorale, arranged for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich, who played the organ part, and Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" overture. "The too, too famous F major," as Brahms called it in a letter to Herzogenberg, comes around every season. It is always welcome, but it suffers severely from readings. That of M. Monteux, heard with patient attention yesterday, recalled the comment made in a German newspaper after Brahms had conducted the Hamburg Philharmonic in a performance of it.

"Brahms's interpretation of his works frequently differs so inconceivably in delicate ryhthmic and harmonic accents from anything to which one is accustomed that the apprehension of his intentions could only be entirely possible to another man possessed of exactly similar sound susceptibility or inspired by the power of divination."

Conductors who achieve delicacy of rhythmic and harmonic accent, whether equal to Brahms's or not, are extremely rare. Those who are inspired by the power of divination are still rarer. Just now we are learning how different the delicacy and finesse of one Strauss are from those of his self-proclaimed prophets. Doubtless the expounders of Brahms are mostly about as near to the true Brahms. At any rate, they succeed in making their performances sound so. M. Monteux was excessively vigorous in his interpretation of the first movement. After that he entered a domain of blissful repose from which all emotional disturbances were banished.

Mr. Goodrich's newly devised version of Cesar Franck's B minor organ chorale proved to be well made. It is an orchestral composition in which the organ plays an obbligato rather than a solo part. The closing pages are particularly impressive. But the purpose of such a transcription seems a trifle uncertain, unless it be to afford opportunities for organists to emerge from the obscurity of the free church recital at 4 P. M. into the glory of the orchestral concert hall. The performance of the composition was admirable.

FROM NOV 6 1921

Morning Telegraph
New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS BRAHMS

Pierre Monteaux Gives Excellent Reading of Third Symphony. Organ Cholale Presented.

For lovers of the conservative and delicate style of music there was a rare treat yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first matinee of its New York series. The symphony was Brahms's Number Three in F major. Pierre Monteux conducted the work in a manner that brought out all the beauty of its finely-chiseled score, keeping his men well under hand and not missing one chance for expression where it would help to make the phrases perfectly clear.

Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" seemed rather a let-down after the serious work preceding it, but its charming tunes rang pleasantly in the ear.

The solo part in Cesar Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 was taken by Wallace Goodrich, who arranged the selection for organ and orchestra. This proved very interesting, Franck's virile organ chords mingling perfectly with the main themes as played by the orchestra.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture ended the program, the Boston musicians responding to its notes with fire and dash.

World NOV 6 1921
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES ORGAN-ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Monteux's Programme Is Cleverly Selected and He Conducted in Masterly Way.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon gave the first public performance of an arrangement for organ and orchestra made by Wallace Goodrich of Massachusetts for Cesar Franck's organ chorale No. 2, in B minor. The organ played below and through the orchestra in great surges, to which the orchestral voices gave a complex coloring; and in the solo passages the organ raised Franck's kindly, compassionate melody against rolls of thunder, softened and rounded as if by distance—like a merciful Judgment Day. The general effect of the Goodrich arrangement, however, was more magisterial than masterly.

The concert opened with Brahms's great symphony No. 3 in F major, opus 90, which expresses in four movements a complete cycle of aesthetic experience. In the first movement, beautiful impressions arise and escape until every sense seems to have been visited and stirred and left sublimely content, unmarred by the shadow of a philosophical speculation. The second movement might well be an approbation by the mind, on considering the pleasure which has just preceded—a devout approbation. The third movement turns the intelligence outward from its senses and its approval of them, and explores in lonely fashion among tenuous, mystic possibilities. And finally, the fourth movement deserts the third as a futile undertaking and returns to the tangible things, ceremonies, majestic pageants, gayety, power, rivalry and sensuous pleasure.

Pierre Monteux, who arranged his programme as excellently as he conducted it, followed the Brahms symphony with Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," as a recreation. The ballet music was so descriptive and so well played that the eyes alone seemed to be occupied, and the ears were rested by the time the Franck chorale was undertaken. The concert closed with Berlioz's resounding overture to "The Roman Carnival."

TIMES 1921
NEW YORK CITY

PLAY BRAHMS SYMPHONY.

Boston Orchestra Also Regales With Schubert at Last Concert.

Brahms's third symphony gave joy to the Brahmins at yesterday's matinee in Carnegie Hall, with which the Boston Orchestra completed its first visit of the season to New York. Since architecture is frozen music, this Viennese work of 1883 should be near twin to the Metropolitan Opera House, yet its fresh force wears better than brick and terra cotta; it was Brahms's fifty-year milestone called by Richter his "Eroica," though Hanslick qualified its proud strength as "without any warlike flavor."

Philip Hale, the Boston program annotator, recalled hearing Brahms lead the work in Berlin, "almost as incompetent a conductor as Joachim," while as soloist also "his pianoforte playing in 1884, on that occasion, was muddy and noisy." Thus the idols are not fallen, but set up for a new day, when Brahms's music yet grows in Olympic calm.

Wallace Goodrich furnished a chief incident of the matinee, playing with the orchestra his arrangement of the second organ chorale, in B minor, of Cesar Franck, for the first time here. Deemed by the adapter "more orchestral than organ-like in its musical contents," the expanded harmony was still of a noble order, befitting a "Swan Song" of Franck.

Mr. Monteux for good measure gave Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival." There was cordial [illegible]

---

from NOV 6 1921

TELEGRAM
New York City

Brahms' third symphony was featured yesterday afternoon at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston organisation, is leaning heavily toward the classics. His Thursday programme contained Beethoven's third symphony. Now comes the Brahms work. It was an interesting programme, well played.

Another new pianist, Marie Hertenstein, was heard yesterday afternoon at the Town Hall. She has temperament and force. Her most pretentious offering was the Brahms variations and Fugue on a Theme, by Handel. Her playing lacked clarity, but it had vitality.

FROM NOV 6 1921

TRIBUNE
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Orchestra Pleases

The program of the Boston Orchestra's second performance of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon included Brahms's Symphony No. 3 in F major, Opus 90; incidental music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor, and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was not characterized by any great degree of depth, but he was wholly fortunate in his treatment of Schubert's charming music, which was beautifully played by the orchestra. The organ chorale, a work cast in the familiar Franckian mould of wistful beauty and uplifting serenity, skillfully orchestrated and as admirably played by Wallace Goodrich, was a feature of the concert.

TRIBUNE NOV 6 1921
Providence

THE COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES.

The coming series of five Boston Symphony concerts, which are to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11, in this the 41st season of this famous orchestra, will be a part of a general schedule of unusual size. So great has been the demand for the concerts in Boston that virtually all seats have been taken in advance, by subscription, for the two series of 48 regular concerts in Symphony Hall there, and five extra concerts are to be given, also in Symphony hall, the home of the orchestra, on Monday evenings throughout the season, at popular prices. This step will be an entirely new departure, nothing like it ever having been done before by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Together with the three Young People's Concerts and two Pension Fund Concerts, the season in Boston will make a total of 58 concerts. The traveling schedule for the orchestra will include 23 concerts in the various cities of New England, a larger number than ever before in this part of the country, and, together with the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York and single concerts in other cities, will make a total of 105 concerts. The opening of the season in Carnegie Hall, New York, last Thursday evening, was in every way successful and auspicious of one of the finest seasons the orchestra has ever had.

The soloists for the five Providence concerts will be Wilhelm Bachaus and Raymond Havens, piano; Merle Alcock, contralto, Helen Stanley, soprano, and Bronislaw Huberman, violin.

...

TRIBUNE NOV 6 1921
Providence

The Rhode Island State Federation of Musical Clubs announces a limited number of students' seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The rules governing these seats are the same as last season. Teachers of music wishing to secure seats for their students must apply either in person or write to the committee, Miss Mary Cull, 12 Andrews building, Greene street; Miss Virginia B. Anderson, Broadway and Bell street, 9 to 10 a. m.

FROM NOV 6 1921 A

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Music In Manhattan

Pierre Monteux, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, yesterday afternoon, repeated the Brahms F major symphony (heard at the Brooklyn concert last Friday night). Other numbers were Schubert's "Rosamunde," incidental music: Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, and Cesar Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2, arranged for organ and orchestra. Mr. Monteux was in "good form," with his band in unity, balanced to a hair in niceties of dynamics and nuance.

From NOV 5 1921

TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting and Ferenc Vecsey as soloist, gave its first concert of Brooklyn's annual series of five in the opera house of the Academy of Music Friday night. Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss were the three composers on the program.

The F major (third) Symphony of Brahms, the violin concerto of Tschaikowsky and Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," were the compositions heard.

Among the familiar faces in the Boston Orchestra this year are George Longy and Carl Hampe and the Messrs. Wendler, Sand, Kunze, Neumann and Holy. Richard Burgin reappears in his second season as concert master; Jean Bedetti and the veteran, Alwin Schroeder, share first position of 'celli; Georges Fourel is a newcomer in the group, and Messrs. Laurent, Mager, Laus and Trillois return to their fourth season of first flute, trumpet, bassoon and second fiddles.

A remarkable contrast in dynamics was a feature of the symphony, the "pp" and "ff" being noticeable extremes in softness and loudness. The Strauss "Don Juan" was read with passionate verve and intense realism. Mr. Vessey easily surmounted the technical difficulties of the intricate Tschaikowsky concerto. All in all it can be said that the Boston Orchestra has improved in tonal coloring and in the matter of graduations and tone quality.

Established 1881
FROM NOV 7 1921 X

Evening Globe
New York

Other Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another notable concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. A feature of the programme was the B minor organ chorale of César Franck, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who played the organ part. Also on the programme were Brahms's third symphony, three selections from Schubert's incidental music to Wilhelmine von Chezy's "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's "Roman [illegible]al" overture.

FROM Journal Courier
NOV 12 1921
NEW HAVEN, CONN

"A Poem of Youth" Will Be Played

A brilliant and engrossing program will make memorable the coming concert by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place in Woolsey hall on Wednesday evening, Nov. 30. There is keen anticipation of this event in that it will be the first visit to New Haven of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in nine years, and its first visit here under its splendid present conductor, Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Monteux will open this concert with Beethoven's masterful third symphony, known as the "Eroica" which was also the opening number at the first Boston Symphony concert of the present season in Carnegie hall, New York, a week ago Thursday, which, by the brilliance of its performance and the beauty of its interpretation, aroused immediate and prolonged response. It is well known how Beethoven inscribed the name of Napoleon at the head of the score, as personifying his hopes in the freedom of the world, and how he later crossed out the name in anger upon hearing that the general had abused his power. There will be interest in the new work of David Stanley Smith, head of the Music School of Yale University, which is entitled, "A Poem of Youth," and will be played at this concert. It was given its first public performance at the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony hall, Boston, yesterday, and was generously applauded as one of the finest scores yet produced by a native composer. The music of France will be represented by Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds and Festivals". The splendid closing number will be the tone poem "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, the most celebrated composer of our time, who is now visiting this country.

---

from NOV 13 1921

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Works of composers of different nationalities, ages and temperaments will be on the programme of the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Providence next Tuesday evening at 8:15 in Infantry Hall.

Beethoven, German composer of the early 19th century, will be represented in his Third Symphony known as "Eroica," that work which is enhanced by its connection with the name of Napoleon Bonaparte. The composer originally inscribed the name of the conqueror over the score, believing this General to be the champion of human freedom, but later crossed it out in anger when he was disillusioned by Napoleon's abuse of his power, the story has it.

[illegible]

overflowing with [illegible] swift and breathless [illegible] give funeral march—these parts of the symphony are regarded as among the supreme achievements of music," writes one critic of the composition.

"The Roman Carnival," the overture of the French composer, Berlioz, will follow the German symphony. Interest will attach to "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, in view of the fact that that German composer is now in this country.

Other living composers besides Strauss to be represented are the Italian, Zandonai and Debussy. Miss Helen Stanley, who is the soloist for the concert, will sing an aria from the opera "Conchita" by the former, and the aria of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodique." She will be accompanied, of course, by the orchestra.

• • •

The programme which Rene Viau will give this afternoon in the Elks' audito-

Helen Stanley
Soprano Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Night.

REGISTER NOV 12 1921
New Haven

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY SMITH'S A POEM OF YOUTH

A splendid program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be played by this internationally famous organization when its full forces of 101 musicians assemble in New Haven for a concert in Woolsey hall on Wednesday evening, November 30. This will be a musical event of additional interest in that this orchestra has not visited New Haven for nine years.

The principal number will be the great masterpiece of Beethoven—the third symphony, known as the "Eroica." The circumstances of its composition is well known—how the great composer inscribed this work to Napoleon, believing him the liberator of mankind, and later, finding that the European general was abusing his power, destroyed the dedication in anger. When this symphony was conducted by Pierre Monteux at the opening of the present season of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Carnegie hall, New York, a week ago Thursday, the brilliance of the performance and the beauty of the interpretation was immediately recognized.

The French school will be represented on the program by Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the music of our own country by the new work of David Stanley Smith, head of the School of Music of Yale university, entitled: "A Poem of Youth." When this score was given in its first public performance at the symphony concerts in Symphony hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, it was applauded as one of the foremost musical achievements of this country. The brilliant closing number will be the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Straus, the most celebrated composer of our day, who s now making a short visit to the United States.

Established 1881
FROM OCT 13 1921 Y

Cornell Alumni News
Ithaca N.Y.

On December 16 the Boston Symph
Orchestra of one hundred players, dire
by Pierre Monteux, will be heard.
is the forty-first season of the Bos
Orchestra, and the third season of Monteux's conductorship. "The tr
tionally illustrious ensemble has de oped, under his guidance, the utmost
finement of balance, tone, and shading

V 15 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON OPENS TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Concert, which will begin the season's series of five concerts in Providence, will take place in Infantry Hall tonight at 8:15. This will be the 169th concert by this famous New England Orchestra in Providence.

Much is expected of the orchestra this year, in that the initial concerts in Boston and the opening of the season in New York, which took place a week ago last Thursday, have brought the highest praise upon the quality of the ensemble under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, who is now in his third season as conductor of the orchestra.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which also started the New York season.

As soloist at this conrert, Madame Helen Stanley, the prima donna soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, who is also a notable concert singer, will be heard in arias by Debussy and Zandonai. The remaining orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the tone poem, "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, considered the greatest composer living, who is now touring this country.

FROM NOV 16 1921 A

TRIBUNE
Providence

ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Large Audience Enthuses Over Program Offered by Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened its Providence season of 1921-22 with the first of a series of five concerts in Infantry Hall, last evening. A very large audience gave enthusiastic greeting to the famous conductor and the 100 players who form the personnel of the orchestra. Miss Helen Stanley, formerly prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, was the soloist and the program follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Erocia," op. 55, Allegro con brio; Marcia funebre; Adagio assi; Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio; Finale; Allegro molto. Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9; Debussy, Aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue;" Zandonai, aria, "Conchita;" Strauss, "Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau) op. 20.

The large body of splendidly trained musicians which now form the Boston Symphony Orchestra are practically the same as in the past decade, save that under the superb training of Mr. Monteux they have reached a degree of musical perfection which is the envy of all orchestras throughout the country and is the Boston Symphony's alone. In this sense the program offered last evening was impressive and brilliant and not only did the orchestra play with familiar richness and power of tone with large sweep, emphasis and contrast, but it played also—at opportune moments during the concert—with keen sense of isolated voices and individualized choirs.

The Beethoven Symphony, Nov. 3, "Eroica," which opened the program, is a massive work and was magnificently played by the orchestra. As is well known it was written with a definite aim, the glorification of Napoleon Bonaparte, and in the balance of the parts and the antiphonal choirs the performance of the great work was full of grandeur and inspiration for the listener.

In the second movement of the Symphony the funeral march featured the departure from the traditional slow movement while the third movement, the Scherzo, brought forth gay and sprightly effects of instrumentation. The finale of the Symphony is not as impressive as are the preceding movements, yet it abounds in interesting musical detail which was thrillingly and vigorously brought out by Mr. Monteux.

The Symphony was followed by the somewhat unfamiliar "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz in which the orchestra brought out its sparkling melodic beauty and delightful rhythm in masterly style. The soprano soloist of the evening, Helen Stanley, created a decided sensation by the unquestioned beauty of her voice, dramatic style and charming stage presence. In her Debussy Aria she sang with intense dramatic feeling and was four times recalled at its close. She scored a great vocal success also in the aria "Conchita" by Zandonai. "A Voice That Satisfies!" was the verdict of many discriminating people in the audience. The Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" by the orchestra brought the concert to a brilliant close.

[32]

FROM NOV

Morning Telegraph
New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS BRAHMS

Pierre Monteaux Gives Excellent Reading of Third Symphony. Organ Cholale Presented.

For lovers of the conservative and delicate style of music there was a rare treat yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first matinee of its New York series. The symphony was Brahms's Number Three in F major Pierre Monteux conducted the work in a manner that brought out all the beauty of its finely-chiseled score, keeping his men well under hand and not missing one chance for expression where it would help to make the phrases perfectly clear.

Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" seemed rather a let-down after the serious work preceding it, but its charming tunes rang pleasantly in the ear.

The solo part in Cesar Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 was taken by Wallace Goodrich, who arranged the selection for organ and orchestra. This proved very interesting, Franck's virile organ chords mingling perfectly with the main themes as played by the orchestra.

Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture ended the program, the Boston musicians responding to its notes with fire and dash.

World
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES ORGAN-ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Monteux's Programme Is Cleverly Selected and He Conducted in Masterly Way.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon gave the first public performance of an arrangement for organ and orchestra made by Wallace Goodrich of Massachusetts for Cesar Franck's organ chorale No. 2, in B minor. The organ played below and through the orchestra in great surges, to which the orchestral voices gave a complex coloring; and in the solo passages the organ raised Franck's kindly, compassionate melody against rolls of thunder, softened and rounded as if by distance—like a merciful Judgment Day. The general effect of the Goodrich arrangement, however, was more magisteral than masterly.

The concert opened with Brahms's great symphony No. 3 in F major, opus 90, which expresses in four movements a complete cycle of aesthetic experience. In the first movement, beautiful impressions arise and escape until every sense seems to have been visited and stirred and left sublimely content, unmarred by the shadow of a philosophical speculation. The second movement might well be an approbation by the mind, on considering the pleasure which has just preceded—a devout approbation. The third movement turns the intelligence outward from its senses and its approval of them, and explores in lonely fashion among tenuous, mystic possibilities. And finally, the fourth movement deserts the third as a futile undertaking and returns to the tangible things, ceremonies, majestic pageants, gayety, power, rivalry and sensuous pleasure.

Pierre Monteux, who arranged his programme as excellently as he conducted it, followed the Brahms symphony with Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," as a recreation. The ballet music was so descriptive and so well played that the eyes alone seemed to be occupied, and the ears were rested by the time the Franck chorale was undertaken. The concert closed with Berlioz's resounding overture to "The Roman Carnival."

TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

PLAY BRAHMS SYMPHONY.

Boston Orchestra Also Regales With Schubert at Last Concert.

Brahms's third symphony gave joy to the Brahmins at yesterday's matinee in Carnegie Hall, with which the Boston Orchestra completed its first visit of the season to New York. Since architecture is frozen music, this Viennese work of 1883 should be near twin to the Metropolitan Opera House, yet its fresh force wears better than brick and terra cotta; it was Brahms's fifty-year milestone called by Richter his "Eroica," though Hanslick qualified its proud strength as "without any warlike flavor."

Philip Hale, the Boston program annotator, recalled hearing Brahms lead the work in Berlin, "almost as incompetent a conductor as Joachim," while as soloist also "his pianoforte playing in 1884, on that occasion, was muddy and noisy." Thus the idols are not fallen, but set up for a new day, when Brahms's music yet grows in Olympic calm.

Wallace Goodrich furnished a chief incident of the matinee, playing with the orchestra his arrangement of the second organ chorale, in B minor, of Cesar Franck, for the first time here. Deemed by the adapter "more orchestral than organ-like in its musical contents," the expanded harmony was still of a noble order, befitting a "Swan Song" of Franck.

Mr. Monteux for good measure gave Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival." There was cordial applause for the conductor, orchestra and soloist.

NOV 8 1921

From TELEGRAM
New York City

Brahms' third symphony was featured yesterday afternoon at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston organization, is leaning heavily toward the classics. His Thursday programme contained Beethoven's third symphony. Now comes the Brahms work. It was an interesting programme well played.

Another new pianist, Marie Hertenstein, was heard yesterday afternoon at the Town Hall. She has temperament and force. Her most pretentious offering was the Brahms variations and Fugue on a Theme, by Handel. Her playing lacked clarity, but it had vitality.

FROM
TRIBUNE
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Orchestra Pleases

The program of the Boston Orchestra's second performance of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon included Brahms's Symphony No. 3 in F major, Opus 90; incidental music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor, and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was not characterized by any great degree of depth, but he was wholly fortunate in his treatment of Schubert's charming music, which was beautifully played by the orchestra. The organ chorale, a work cast in the familiar Franckian mould of wistful beauty and uplifting serenity, skillfully orchestrated and as admirably played by Wallace Goodrich, was a feature of the concert.

TRIBUNE
Providence

THE COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES.

The coming series of five Boston Symphony concerts, which are to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 24, Feb. 28 and April 11, in this the 41st season of this famous orchestra, will be a part of a general schedule of unusual size. So great has been the demand for the concerts in Boston that virtually all seats have been taken in advance, by subscription, for the two series of 48 regular concerts in Symphony Hall there, and five extra concerts are to be given, also in Symphony hall, the home of the orchestra, on Monday evenings throughout the season, at popular prices. This step will be an entirely new departure, nothing like it ever having been done before by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Together with the three Young People's Concerts and two Pension Fund Concerts, the season in Boston will make a total of 58 concerts. The traveling schedule for the orchestra will include 23 concerts in the various cities of New England, a larger number than ever before in this part of the country, and, together with the usual 15 concerts in Greater New York and single concerts in other cities, will make a total of 105 concerts. The opening of the season in Carnegie Hall, New York, last Thursday evening, was in every way successful and auspicious of one of the finest seasons the orchestra has ever had.

The soloists for the five Providence concerts will be Wilhelm Bachaus and Raymond Havens, piano; Merle Alcock, contralto, Helen Stanley, soprano, and Bronislaw Huberman, violin.

* * *

TRIBUNE
Providence

* * *

The Rhode Island State Federation of Musical Clubs announces a limited number of students' seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. The rules governing these seats are the same as last season. Teachers of music wishing to secure seats for their students must apply either in person or write to the committee, Miss Mary Cull, 12 Andrews building, Greene street; Miss Virginia B. Anderson, Broadway and Bell street, 9 to 10 a. m.

FROM
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Music In Manhattan

Pierre Monteux, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, yesterday afternoon, repeated the Brahms F major symphony (heard at the Brooklyn concert last Friday night). Other numbers were Schubert's "Rosamunde," incidental music; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, and Cesar Franck's Organ Chorale No. 2, arranged for organ and orchestra. Mr. Monteux was in "good form," with his band in unity, balanced to a hair in niceties of dynamics and nuance.

From
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting and Ferenc Vecsey as soloist, gave its first concert of Brooklyn's annual series of five in the opera house of the Academy of Music Friday night. Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Strauss were the three composers on the program.

The F major (third) Symphony of Brahms, the violin concerto of Tschaikowsky and Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," were the compositions heard.

Among the familiar faces in the Boston Orchestra this year are George Longy and Carl Hampe and the Messrs. Wendler, Sand, Kunzze, Neumann and Holy. Richard Burgin reappears in his second season as concert master; Jean Bedetti and the veteran, Alwin Schroeder, share first position of 'celli; Georges Fourel is a newcomer in the group, and Messrs. Laurent, Mager, Laus and Trillois return to their fourth season of first flute, trumpet, bassoon and second fiddles.

A remarkable contrast in dynamics was a feature of the symphony, the "pp" and "ff" being noticeable extremes in softness and loudness. The Strauss "Don Juan" was read with passionate verve and intense realism. Mr. Vessey easily surmounted the technical difficulties of the intricate Tschaikowsky concerto. All in all it can be said that the Boston Orchestra has improved in tonal coloring and in the matter of graduations and tone quality.

Established 1881
FROM
Evening Globe
New York

Other Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another notable concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. A feature of the programme was the B minor organ chorale of César Franck, arranged for orchestra and organ by Wallace Goodrich, who played the organ part. Also an the programme were Brahms's third symphony, three selections from Schubert's incidental music to Wilhelmine von Chezy's "Rosamunde," and Berlioz's "Roman [illegible]cal" overture.

"A Poem of Youth" Will Be Played

A brilliant and engrossing program will make memorable the coming concert by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra which will take place in Woolsey hall on Wednesday evening, Nov. 30. There is keen anticipation of this event in that it will be the first visit to New Haven of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in nine years, and its first visit here under its splendid present conductor, Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Monteux will open this concert with Beethoven's masterful third symphony, known as the "Eroica", which was also the opening number at the first Boston Symphony concert of the present season in Carnegie hall, New York, a week ago Thursday, which, by the brilliance of its performance and the beauty of its interpretation, aroused immediate and prolonged response. It is well known how Beethoven inscribed the name of Napoleon at the head of the score, as personifying his hopes in the freedom of the world, and how he later crossed out the name in anger upon hearing that the general had abused his power. There will be interest in the new work of David Stanley Smith, head of the Music School of Yale University, which is entitled, "A Poem of Youth," and will be played at this concert. It was given its first public performance at the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony hall, Boston, yesterday, and was generously applauded as one of the finest scores yet produced by a native composer. The music of France will be represented by Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds and Festivals". The splendid closing number will be the tone poem "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, the most celebrated composer of our time, who is now visiting this country.

From
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Works of composers of different nationalities, ages and temperaments will be on the programme of the first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Providence next Tuesday evening at 8:15 in Infantry Hall.

Beethoven, German composer of the early 19th century, will be represented in his Third Symphony known as "Eroica," that work which is enhanced by its connection with the name of Napoleon Bonaparte. The composer originally inscribed the name of the conqueror over the score, believing this General to be the champion of human freedom, but later crossed it out in anger when he was disillusioned by Napoleon's abuse of his power, the story has it.

"The martial first movement and finale, overflowing with rhythm and vitality, the swift and breathless scherzo, the impressive funeral march—these parts of the symphony are regarded as among the supreme achievements of music," writes one critic of the composition.

"The Roman Carnival," the overture of the French composer, Berlioz, will follow the German symphony. Interest will attach to "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, in view of the fact that that German composer is now in this country.

Other living composers besides Strauss to be represented are the Italian, Zandonai and Debussy. Miss Helen Stanley, who is the soloist for the concert, will sing an aria from the opera "Conchita" by the former, and the aria of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodique." She will be accompanied, of course, by the orchestra.

* * *

The programme which Rene Viau will give this afternoon in the Elks' audito-

Helen Stanley
Soprano Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall Tuesday Night.

REGISTER
New Haven

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY SMITH'S A POEM OF YOUTH

A splendid program has been compiled by Pierre Monteux, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be played by this internationally famous organization when its full forces of 101 musicians assemble in New Haven for a concert in Woolsey hall on Wednesday evening, November 30. This will be a musical event of additional interest in that this orchestra has not visited New Haven for nine years.

The principal number will be the great masterpiece of Beethoven—the third symphony, known as the "Eroica." The circumstances of its composition is well known—how the great composer inscribed this work to Napoleon, believing him the liberator of mankind, and later, finding that the European general was abusing his power, destroyed the dedication in anger. When this symphony was conducted by Pierre Monteux at the opening of the present season of Boston Symphony orchestra concerts in Carnegie hall, New York, a week ago Thursday, the brilliance of the performance and the beauty of the interpretation was immediately recognized.

The French school will be represented on the program by Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the music of our own country by the new work of David Stanley Smith, head of the School of Music of Yale university, entitled: "A Poem of Youth." When this score was given in its first public performance at the symphony concerts in Symphony hall, Boston, last Friday and Saturday, it was applauded as one of the foremost musical achievements of this country. The brilliant closing number will be the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Straus, the most celebrated composer of our day, who s now making a short visit to the United States.

Established 1881
FROM

On December 16 the Boston Symph
Orchestra of one hundred players, dire
by Pierre Monteux, will be heard.
is the forty-first season of the Bos
Orchestra, and the third season of Monteux's conductorship. "The tra tionally illustrious ensemble has de oped, under his guidance, the utmost
finement of balance, tone, and shading

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON OPENS TONIGHT

The Boston Symphony Concert, which will begin the season's series of five concerts in Providence, will take place in Infantry Hall tonight at 8:15. This will be the 169th concert by this famous New England Orchestra in Providence.

Much is expected of the orchestra this year, in that the initial concerts in Boston and the opening of the season in New York, which took place a week ago last Thursday, have brought the highest praise upon the quality of the ensemble under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, who is now in his third season as conductor of the orchestra.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which also started the New York season.

As soloist at this conrert, Madame Helen Stanley, the prima donna soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, who is also a notable concert singer, will be heard in arias by Debussy and Zandonai. The remaining orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the tone poem, "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, considered the greatest composer living, who is now touring this country.

FROM
TRIBUNE
Providence

ORCHESTRA OPENS SEASON HERE

Large Audience Enthuses Over Program Offered by Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, opened its Providence season of 1921-22 with the first of a series of five concerts in Infantry Hall, last evening. A very large audience gave enthusiastic greeting to the famous conductor and the 100 players who form the personnel of the orchestra. Miss Helen Stanley, formerly prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, was the soloist and the program follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Erocia," op. 55, Allegro con brio; Marcia funebre; Adagio assi; Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio; Finale: Allegro molto. Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9; Debussy, aria of Lia from 'L'Enfant Prodigue;' Zandonai, aria, "Conchita;" Strauss, "Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau) op. 20.

The large body of splendidly trained musicians which now form the Boston Symphony Orchestra are practically the same as in the past decade, save that under the superb training of Mr. Monteux they have reached a degree of musical perfection which is the envy of all orchestras throughout the country and is the Boston Symphony's alone. In this sense the program offered last evening was impressive and brilliant and not only did the orchestra play with familiar richness and power of tone with large sweep, emphasis and contrast, but it played also—at opportune moments during the concert—with keen sense of isolated voices and individualized choirs.

The Beethoven Symphony, Nov. 3, "Eroica," which opened the program, is a massive work and was magnificently played by the orchestra. As is well known it was written with a definite aim, the glorification of Napoleon Bonaparte, and in the balance of the parts and the antiphonal choirs the performance of the great work was full of grandeur and inspiration for the listener.

In the second movement of the Symphony the funeral march featured the departure from the traditional slow movement while the third movement, the Scherzo, brought forth gay and sprightly effects of instrumentation. The finale of the Symphony is not as impressive as are the preceding movements, yet it abounds in interesting musical detail which was thrillingly and vigorously brought out by Mr. Monteux.

The Symphony was followed by the somewhat unfamiliar "Roman Carnival" by Berlioz in which the orchestra brought out its sparkling melodic beauty and delightful rythm in masterly style. The soprano soloist of the evening, Helen Stanley, created a decided sensation by the unquestioned beauty of her voice, dramatic style and charming stage presence. In her Debussy Aria she sang with intense dramatic feeling and was four times recalled at its close. She scored a great vocal success also in the aria "Conchita" by Zandonai. "A Voice That Satisfies!" was the verdict of many discriminating people in the audience. The Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" by the orchestra brought the concert to a brilliant close.

to do otherwise. But it is very

FROM

Evening Globe
New York

At the second pair of concerts in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 1, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 3, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes: For the Thursday concert the second symphony of Sibelius, Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," Schönberg's string sextet, "Transcendent Night," and Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3; for the Saturday matinée, the symphony of César Franck, the "Tragic" overture of Brahms, Liadoff's suite, which includes "Baba-Jaga," "The Enchanted Lake," and "Kikimora," and Ravel's suite from his ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," consisting of "Daybreak - Pantomine - General Dance."

SUN

ss New York City

The Symphonies.

At the second pair of concerts in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 1, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 3, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programme: For the Thursday concert the Second Symphony of Sibelius, Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," Schonberg's string sextet, "Transcendent Night" and Beethoven's overture to Leonore No. 3. For the Saturday matinee the symphony of Cesar Franck, the Tragic Overture of Brahms, Liadoff's suite, which includes "Baba-Jaga," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Kikimora" and Ravel's suite from his ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," consisting of the numbers "Daybreak, Pantomime, General Dance."

ESTABLISHED 1881

FROM

Providence R I

A recital of songs by Merle Alcock, contralto, under the auspices of the Chaminade Club, and for the furtherance of its scholarship fund, is scheduled for Monday evening, Nov. 21, at Infantry Hall. Mrs. Alcocks's previous appearance here with the Boston Symphony made her many friends who are anticipating her forthcoming appearance.

ESTABLISHED 1881

FROM

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A splendid and engrossing programme has been compiled by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the concert to be given in New Haven, in Woolsey Hall, on Wednesday evening, November 30, which will be the first appearance of New England's great orchestra in this city for nine seasons.

The first number will be the masterful Third Symphony of Beethoven, known as the "Eroica." It is now a matter of history how the composer originally inscribed the name of Napoleon Bonaparte over the score, believing this general to be the coming liberator of humanity, and how, disillusioned by Napoleon's abuse of his power the composer crossed out the name in anger. The volcanic energy of the first movement, the impressiveness of the funeral march, the swift and breatehless character of the scherzo, and the martial sweep of the triumphant finale these are looked upon as among the supreme achievements in the art of music.

BILLBOARD

ess: Cincinnati, Oh

BOSTON SYMPHONY

To Present New Series of "Pop" Concerts

A great interest is being manifested in the new series of "Pop" concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. These concerts will take place on the Monday evenings of November 28, January 16, February 13, March 13 and April 10. The series will have all the advantages of the regular concerts and they will be given by the full symphony orchestra, with Pierre Monteaux as conductor, and the programs will consist of the finest orchestra music. A soloist will be presented at each one of these concerts, and they will be Alfred Mirovitch, celebrated Russian pianist; John Powell, American pianist; Estelle Liebling, soprano; Richard Durgin, concertmaster of the orchestra, who will be heard in a violin concerto, and Jean Bedetti, well-known

---

NEW YORK NEWS

ESTABLISHED 1881

M

NOV 20 1921

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS THE SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Providence season last evening in Infantry Hall, playing the following programme: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55; Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9; Debussy, air of Lia (L'enfant Prodigue); Zandonai aria, "Conchita;" Richard Strauss, "Don Juan," tone poem. Mme. Helen Stanley, soprano, was the assisting artist.

Perhaps M. Monteux, a bit disheartened by the failure of any of the novelties thus far produced during the Boston season to strike fire, hesitates to tempt fate further with them. At any rate, it will be observed that the programme contained nothing that might be classed as strikingly novel, unless one except, Zandonai's air, sung by Mme. Stanley. None the less, it was good to hear again Beethoven's symphony, tried and true, though it has been through many seasons. There are those that will contend that it and its idiom are outmoded, that it might well be displaced by works in more modern idiom. Perhaps. But still the "Eroica" contains many fine, stirring pages, pages that may still compel and charm.

Of the orchestra itself it is a pleasure to speak. Barring M. Fourel, newly called to the head of the viola section, the personnel remains unchanged from last season. By so much does the orchestra profit. From season to season—almost from concert to concert even—one notes the steady progress of the band to finer and finer achievements. M. Monteux, through trying times, has been patient, tactful, indefatigable of purpose, till today the Boston Symphony under his direction is once more the plastic instrument, responsive to his slightest wish—sonorous, suave, delicate, as the composer bids—in short, again risen, or nearly so, to the former finish, the former glory, which of old made it the most illustrious of orchestras, and from which it inevitably descended during the troublous years of war.

Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" worked its familiar spell.

Mme. Stanley, erstwhile of the Chicago Opera Company, was heard here for the first time. She sang for the most part agreeably, if not greatly, two arias—the air of the mother from Debussy's operatic cantata, the poignancy of which she brought out admirably, and an unfamiliar aria from Zandonai's equally little known "Conchita." At times an unpleasant edge besets her upper tones and the impression remains that her musical intelligence outruns her vocal resource.

A brilliant reading of Strauss' "Don Juan" closed the programme.

A large audience heard the concert and by every token of applause and attention bespoke its thorough enjoyment.

J. H. B.

From
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season will take place in the Academy of Music Friday evening, December 2. Pierre Moneaux, conductor of the Orchestra, will begin a notable program with the Fourth Symphony in F-minor by Tschaikowsky, which is paired with the "Pathetic" Symphony as the finest creative achievement of the Russian master.

A very celebrated soloist will be heard at this concert—Ignaz Friedman, the pianist, who, first coming to this country last winter, was generally considered the most important new pianist of the season in America. A native of Poland, Friedman studied a number of years with Leschitizky, and from the outset of his professional career made a particular impression by his masterful playing of the music of Chopin and Liszt, whose entire works for piano he has edited. According to all accounts, one of his most splendid achievements is his interpretation of Liszt's E-flat pianoforte concerto which he will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this concert. The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be Brahm's Trazis Overture and the Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes the following numbers, Daybreak; Pantomime, General Dance.

REGISTER

New Haven

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT WEDNESDAY, NOV. 30

The pending concert to be given by the famous Boston Symphony orchestra in Woolsey hall on Wednesday evening Nov. 20, will be the first visit to New Haven by this noted organiaztion of New England in nine seasons

A number of interest to many to be played at this concert is "A Poem of Youth," by David Stanley Smith, head of the Music School of Yale university, which had its first public performance at the regular Boston Symphony concert at Symphony hall, Boston, last week. Skillfully depitcing the vitality and ebullience of youth and its romantic dreamings, this music met with immediate response by the audience, which compelled the composer who was present, to rise and repeatedly acknowledge the applause.

The most notable number upon the program which Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the orchestra has compiled for New Haven is the Third Symphony of Beethoven, known as the "Eroica," which is said to have been inspired by the genius of Napoleon Bonaparte before the great master of music was disillusioned by the news of his abuse of power. The martal first movement and finale, overflowing with rhythmic energy, the swift and breathless scherzo, with its trio for the horns, the impressive funeral march—these parts of the symphony are regarded as among the supreme achievements in the art of music. The remaining numbers will be two nocturnes—Clouds and Festivals—by Debussy who is considered the formeost composer of the most modern French school of music, and the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, the great German composer, who is visiting this country.

FROM

Morning Telegraph
New York

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 1, and Saturday afternoon, December 3, with Pierre Monteux conducting. For the Thursday concert the Second Symphony of Sibelius, the Finnish composer; Weingartner's orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." Shonberg's Sextette for strings, "Verklaerte Nacht," and Beethoven's overture to Leonore No. 3. For the Saturday matinee, the Symphony of Cesar Franck, Brahm's Tragic Overture, Liadoff's Suite, "Baba Jaga," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Kikimora" and the Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes "Daybreak, Pantomime and General Dance."

---

om SUN

dress New York City

te

For the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, December 1, and Saturday afternoon, December 3, Pierre Monteux has made the following programmes: For the Thursday concert, the dramatic Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major, which has not been heard for a considerable time in New York; Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's rondo, "Invitation to the Dance"; the arrangement of Arnold Schonberg for string orchestra of his "Verklarte Nacht," and Beethoven's Third Leonore Overture. For the Saturday concert, Cesar Frank's Symphony, the "Tragic Overture" of Brahms, three pieces based on folk legends by Liadoff, "Baba-Yaga," the "Enchanted Lake" and "Kikimora," and Maurice Ravels Second Suite from his Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," including Daybreak, Pantomime and General Dance.

FROM NOV 26 1921

COMMERCIAL
New York

Boston Symphony Concerts at Carnegie

For the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux announces the following programs. For Thursday, Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major; Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," the arrangement of Arnold Schonberg for string orchestra of his "Verklarte Nacht," and Beethoven's Third Lenore Overture. For Saturday, Cesar Franck's Symphony, the "Tragic Overture" of Brahms; three pieces based on folk legends by Liadoff, "Baba-Yaga," "The Enchanted Lake," and "Kikimora," and Maurice Ravel's Second Suite from his Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," including "Daybreak," Pantomime" and "General Dance."

EVENING JOURNAL

NOV 26 1921

New York City

The Orchestral Concerts.

All the local and visiting orchestras the town listens to during the Winter are scheduled for concerts next week. The visit of Vincent d'Indy, the eminent French composer and conductor, to this country is for the purpose of himself presenting some of his own music as a guest director of the New York Symphony Orchestra, which he will conduct on Thursday afternoon and the following Friday evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme he has chosen consists of his latest work, "On the Shores of the Seas;" Paul Le Flem's "To the Dead;" one of Albert Roussel's ... -titled "Evoccations" and some old French pieces retouched by Mr. d'Indy, as well as a serenade by Mozart.

The Symphony Orchestra, at one of its regular concerts to-morrow afternoon in Aeolian Hall, will be directed by Walter Damrosch, as usual, who will introduce a "Fantaisie Espagnole" by Lord Berners, the English modernist. The chief work to be presented will be Vassili Kalinnikov's First Symphony. Paul Kochanski will be the soloist in a concerto by the Pole, Miecyslaw Karlowicz.

Arnold Schoenberg's "Five Orchestral Pieces," new to New York, will be the novelty of Leopold Stokowski's programme at the next concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday evening. Otherwise there will be played Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture and an excerpt from Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

The next concerts of the Boston Orchestra take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the first the principal number will be Sibelius's Second Symphony, and at the second the Cesar Franck Symphony.

EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

At the second pair of concerts in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 1, and Saturday afternoon, December 3, Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes: For the Thursday concert the Second Symphony of Sibelius, Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," Schönberg's string sextet, "Transcendent Night," and Beethoven's overture to Leonore No. 3. For the Saturday matinée the symphony of Cesar Franck, the tragic overture of Brahms, Liadoff's suite, which includes "Baba-Jaga," "The Enchanted Lake," and "Kikimora," and Ravel's suite from his ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," consisting of the numbers: "Daybreak — Pantomime — General Dance."

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A splendid programme, headed by Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3, will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first visit to New Haven under its present illustrious conductor, Pierre Monteux, which will take place next Wednesday evening, November 30, in Woolsey Hall at 8:15.

Beethoven's masterful symphony was inspired by the composer's hopes that Napoleon Bonapart e was the coming liberator of mankind and, after his disgrace and death, dedicated to "the memory of a great man." When it was first performed, a hundred years ago, the public was astounded by the bold and riotous innovations of this martial and revolutionary music and even now when the methods of harmony and rhythm have become so intricate the radical daring of the great master of music is in this work keenly felt.

The remaining three numbers will represent leading achievements in the modern French, German and American schools of music, respectively. "A Poem of Youth" by David Stanley Smith, head of the Music Department of Yale, which had its first public performance by this Orchestra in Boston recently, will be heard at this concert. Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," which orchestral achievement are considered to be scarcely excelled in their particular field, are performed with extraordinary eloquence by the great Orchestra under its French leader, who was a close friend of Debussy and a collaborator in the first production of his works. "Don Juan," one of the most popular and magnificent of the tone poems by Richard Strauss, who is now visiting America, will conclude the concert.

FROM NOV 27 1921

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, which many rank above his "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux at the second concert of the Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Dec. 2. This work is particularly admired for its stirring theme of fate as announced by the brass choir, for the Scherzo in "pizzicato," which is still regarded as a complete innovation in musical effectiveness, and the splendid last movement, which exalts a simple Russian folk tune to the highest symphonic eloquence. A very celebrated pianist will appear as soloist at this concert, Ignaz Friedman, the Polish artist who has been named the worthy successor of his compatriots, Paderewski, dePachmann and Hofmann.

With the arrival in this country of Vincent d'Indy, the distinguished French composer, there will probably be considerable interest in the music which he has brought with him for production when he will make his only New York appearance as guest conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra at the pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, Dec. 1 and 2. On this occasion, are previously announced, d'Indy's latest symphonic poem, "On the Shores of the Seas," will be given its world premier. Mr. d'Indy will also conduct the first programme in America of Paul LeFlem's symphonic poem, "To the Dead," and an extract from the Symphonic Suite, Evocations, "The Gods In the Shadows of the Caves," by Albert Roussel.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

NOV 27 1921

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

At the second Boston Symphony concert to be given in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky. There will also be played at this concert Brahms' "Tragic" Overture and the Suite of orchestral excerpts from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

The soloist at this concert will be Ignaz Friedman, Polish pianist, who first came to America last January and was received with so much approbation and enthusiasm in the number of concerts which he then gave. Born in Cracow, in the country which produced Paderewski, DePachmann and Hofmann, this virtuoso studied for a term of years with Leschitizky and soon won for himself an enviable reputation by his playing of the romantic pianoforte music of Chopin and Liszt, whose entire works he has notably edited. His interpretation of Liszt's E-flat concerto, which he will play with the orchestra on this occasion, is said to be one of the very finest since the composer himself played it.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

NOV 27

Boston Symphony.

For the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present season, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Pierre Monteux has made the following programs: For the Thursday concert, the dramatic Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major, which has not been heard for a considerable time in New York; Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's rondo, "Invitation to the Dance," the arrangement of Arnold Schonberg for string orchestra of his "Verklarte Nacht," and Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture. For the Saturday concert, Cesar Franck's symphony, "The Tragic Overture" of Brahms, three pieces based on folk legends by Liadoff, "Baba-Yaga," "The Enchanted Lake" and "Kikimora," and Maurice Ravel's Second Suite from his Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," including "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance."

IGNAZ FRIEDMAN, SOLOIST
BOSTON SYMPHONY,
ACADEMY FRIDAY

From 11/27 – '21,
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRIEDMAN WITH THE BOSTON

Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, at the second concert of the Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening, December 2. Brahms' nobly beautiful tragic overture will also be on the program, and the brilliant closing number will be the Suite from Maurice Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe." Ignaz Friedman, the Polish pianist, will be the soloist.

REGISTER
New Haven

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A splendid programme, headed by Beethaven's "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3, will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first visit to New Haven under its present illustrious conductor, Pierre Monteux, which will take place next Wednesday evening, November 30, in Woolsey hall at 8:15.

Beethoven's masterful symphony was inspired by the composer's hopes that Napoleon Bonaparte was the coming liberator of mankind and, after his disgrace and death, dedicated to "the memory of a great man." When it was first performed, a hundred years ago, the public was astounded by the bold and riotous innovations of this martial and revolutionary music and even now, when the methods of harmony and rhythm have become so intricate, the radical daring of the great master of music is in this work keenly felt.

FROM
Evening Globe
New York

For the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the present seaso to be given in Carnegie Hall nex Thursday evening and Saturday afte noon, Pierre Monteux has made th following programmes: For th Thursday concert, the second symphony of Sibelius in D major, which has not been heard for a considerable time in New York, Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's rondo, "Invitation to the Dance," the arrangement of Arnold Sconberg for string orchestra of his "Verklärte Nécht," and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. For the Saturday concert, César Franck's symphony, the "Tragic Overture" of Brahms, three pieces based on folk legends by Liadoff—"Baba-Yaga," the "Enchanted Lake," and "Kikimora"—and Maurice Ravel's second suite from his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," including "Daybreak," "Pantomime," and "General Dance."

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Many Changes Noted Since Its Last Appearance Here.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was welcomed to this city after a lapse of many years, by a brilliant audience which filled Woolsey hall last evening. There is a new conductor, Pierre Monteux, and many changes in the personnel of the orchestra since its last appearance here, but it was a pleasure to see some familiar faces, among them our old friend Alwin Schroeder of Kneisel quartet fame.

The symphony was the "Eroica," for which Beethoven spent years in gathering the material and which has been aptly called a mighty drama and the corner stone of modern symphonic music. In it Beethoven shows his genius and greatness. The first movement is a wonderful piece of orchestral writing, the "Marcia Funebre" makes a strong appeal, the Scherzo is Shakesperian in spirit, mingling jest and melancholy and the finale abounds in interesting elements expressed as only a master can.

The symphony was fine in vigor, rhythmic force and instrumental eloqunce but it was not always in the true spirit of Beethoven. The "Funeral March" was taken very slowly and somewhat over elaborated. The scherzo was fine in its vivacious spirit and the finale brilliant. It was generously applauded and Mr. Monteux was recalled.

The novelty was Prof. David Stanley Smith's "Poem of Youth," written during the summer of 1920, and first played by the orchestra in Boston on November 11 of this year. The composer states that there was no program in his mind and the title has no further significance than that of calling attention to the mood of the work, that of good cheer, manly vigor and freshness. In structure and material it shows maturity and the technical skill of the composer. It is a well knit score in which the orchestral colors are from a varied palette with the brush of a skilled hand. It was played with a splendid grasp of its mood and the color of its instrumentation.

After Mr. Monteux had acknowledged the insistent applause he motioned to the composer who rose from his seat in the balcony and received a genuine ovation.

Two "Nocturnes" of Debussy were layed with fine delineation, the su- erb instrumentation of the "Festi- al" making a vivid impression.

---

The concert closed with Strauss' "Don Juan." He is a past master in command of orchestral resource, and the complex score was played with splendid vigor, sonority and richness of tonal color. It made a fitting finale to a fine concert and emphasized the wish that the Boston orchestra may be heard again this season.

T. M. P.

SUN
ss New York City
DEC 2 1921

The Boston Symphony.

In the programme notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra relating to last night's concert at Carnegie Hall, Paul Rosenfeld is quoted as saying that in the second symphony of Jean Sibelius "the orchestra is handled individually, sparingly and with perfect point." Sparingly is, however, hardly a word to be applied to the energy of the composer, and the audience looked decidedly tired before the endless austerities, the stifled outbursts and weary wanderings of the Finn were accomplished.

Weingartner's orchestration of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" cheered things up considerably, although Mr. Monteux was perhaps more true to the Paris boulevards in his reading than to the swaying lures of central Europe. Next came Schonberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," arranged for string orchestra, to show how smooth and mellifluous the mad Austrian of Tuesday night's "Orchesterstucke" had been at thirty. Less smooth was the string tone, however, but well disposed to bring out the strange sweetness of the poem.

Finally the Leonore Overture was intoned for the twelfth time this year, to the infinite pleasure of the distinctly small audience.

Established 1881
FROM 192
Evening Globe
New York

Other Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was applauded last evening in Carnegie Hall after it rendering of the Schoenberg sextet "Radiant Night" Op. 4. Conductor Monteux was forced to make many answering bows. Sibelius's second symphony and Weingartner's orchestral dance to Weber's "Invitation" were also on an excellent programme which closed with the benediction of Beethoven's third "Leonore."

An audienc greeted

TELEGRAM DEC 2 - 1921 L
New York City

Coming for its second pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symhony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, played a programme last night which included Sibelius' second symphony and Schonberg's "Verklarte Night."

Established 1881
FROM
TRIBUNE
NEW YORK CITY

Boston Orchestra Plays 'Verklaerte Nacht' Here

Schonberg's Composition Is Rendered by Symphony Musicians at Carnegie Hall

Schonberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" for string orchestra, first heard here last winter from the National Symphony under Mengelberg, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Hall. Its hears, especially those who had shuddered at his "Five Pieces for Orchestra" two days before, must have wondered: "Can this be Schonberg?" for there seemed to be nothing in common between the "Five Pieces" and the "Verklaerte Nacht," composed nine years before, in which noise and cacophony were replaced by a tranquil, melodious vein, melancholy at the beginning and rhapsodic at the end, not unlike a mild Richard Strauss. Under Mr. Monteux it seemed rather long drawn out and almost too tranquil, lacking in high lights, but there were periods of remarkable beauty, especially the Strauss-like passage for solo violin, well executed by Mr. Burgin, and an eloquent cose that brought ong appause. The performance of the string choir was good, athough it has not yet reached the absolute purity of tone of pre-war days.

Sibelius's Second Symphony, in D major, began the program. It is more outspoken than his fifth symphony, but has the distinctive Sibelius atmosphere, suggesting the minor, though in a major key, with definite and melodious themes. It was done full justice by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, with a dramatic climax ending the Finale, which, like most of Sibelius's works, recalls only Sibelius. In a lighter vein the orchestra played Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and ended with Beethoven's 3d "Leonore" overture.

---

om HERALD
dress New York City
ate DEC 2 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

Sibelius, Schoenberg and Beethoven on Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme was attractively made up. It comprised the second symphony of Sibelius in D major, Weingartner's arrangement of the "Invitation to the Dance," Schoenberg's arrangement for string orchestra of his "Verklaerte Nacht" sextet and the "Leonore" overture No. 3 of Beethoven.

The Sibelius symphony, which the Boston men first played here many years ago, is perhaps not so often heard, not so often as indeed it deserves to be. The score is a fine one, though of a too sombre and tragic mood to suit popular taste. At the close of his reading of the symphony Mr. Monteux was long applauded.

The Weingartner setting of Weber's Dance is a good piece of orchestration, bound to please and greatly when as brilliantly played as it was last night. The beautiful Schoenberg sextet was a feature of the evening and brought to mind regret that its composer had not kept on writing this kind of music instead of the stuff heard in the hall the other night.

TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

SCHOENBERG'S SEXTET WINS

Musical Cubist's "Radiant Night," by Boston Symphony, Applauded.

That a musical cubist should be jeered and applauded in the same week in New York is the paradox of Schoenberg. Two days aogo the Philadelphians had brought his "Five Orchestra Pieces" to be taken less seriousy here than in their home town. Last night the Boston Symphony men came to Carnegie Hall, bearing the composer's more youthful "Radiant Night" sextet, Op. 4, which Mengelberg and the National players had given last year, and which had been first heard as chamber music. Whatever the value in its various magnitudes of string constellations, the work was beautifully played last evening, and it was enthusiastically received. Conductor Monteux was recalled and, with his orchestra, applauded.

Sibelius's second symphony also was received with great favor, while Weingartner's orchestral dance to Weber's "Invitation" was much liked, as always it is. After Schoenberg, the concert closed with the benediction of Beethoven's third "Leonore."

Established 1881
ROM
Morning Telegraph
New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS SIBELIUS

Pierre Monteux Conducts Orchestra in Interesting and Varied Program.

RUSSIAN 'CELLIST IN DEBUT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave its second concert of its New York series at Carnegie Hall. The program was calculated to please the large and fashionable audience. It was both varied and interesting.

The Symphony in D Major, No. 2, by Jean Sibelius, served to show the wonderful virtuoso quality of the Boston organization. The pastoral nature of the work offered many opportunities for the wood wind, and the players were alive to every chance.

The Von Weber number, "Invitation to the Dance," illustrated the tonal balance and vitality of an old favorite that never fails to arouse enthusiasm with its rhythm and pretty tunes.

"Verklaerte Nacht" ("Radiant Night"), by Arnold Schonberg, tells the story of a woman who falls in love with her husband after she had detested him and had allowed herself to accept the embraces of another man. The music attempts to picture the dramatic scene of her confession and forgiveness. Although the score hardly succeeded in depicting the story, it pleased with its dramatic climaxes and atmosphere.

The familiar "Leonore Overture" No. 3, by Beethoven, closed the program.

Mr. Monteux gave a studious and colorful reading to the score.

Dr. Joseph Press, a Russian 'cellist, made his American debut last night at Aeolian Hall. Dr. Press was formerly head of 'cello playing at the Petrogard Conservatory of Music, and has been identified with the creation of the Trio Russe, a well-known organization of Eastern Europe.

Dr. Press exhibited an astounding mastery of technique, achieving with ease the difficult score chosen for his first appearance. In the smoother portions his tone was full and mellow, imparting a satisfying element of tunefulness.

The program was made up of selections by Eccles, Bach, Tschaikowsky, Ariosti, Chopin, Kaempf and Klengel. Of these the Bach numbers, for 'cello alone, and Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" pleased most.

World Dec 2
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS SCHOENBERG

Another of Schoenberg's works for orchestra was played in Carnegie Hall last night, but this one dates from a period ten years earlier than the "Five Pieces" which outraged the listeners there on Tuesday. Last night it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra that played, and the work by Schoenberg was "Verklaerte Nacht," and Pierre Monteux had a more pleasant task than Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra with the "Five Pieces." He executed it with great sincerity.

The symphony was Sibelius's Second in D major, which is accurately described in the programme notes as "full of home sounds (Sibelius was born in Finland), of cattle and 'sactars' of timbered houses and sparse nature, and through it there glances a pale evanescent sunlight, and through it there sounds the burden of a lowly tragedy."

Monteux conducted it as if he were displaying it with a craftsman's attention, rather than playing it as something to be felt—perhaps he too felt that it was filled with Finnish descriptions and that the feeling had been left entirely to be supplied by Finnish hearers. Other nationalities might simply look at the descriptions and pass on.

Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's Rondo "Invitation to the Dance," followed the symphony, and the house as if in relief after Sibelius, applauded the Weber much more than it is usually applauded. The programme closed with a performance of Beethoven's Third Overture to "Leonore," which carried the audience safely above dissatisfaction.

AMERICAN
New York City

AN unusually large and fashionable audience attended last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The programme contained four numbers, all of which are more or less familiar to the regular concert patron.

The symphony was Sibelius's Second in D major, cleverly conceived, coherently arranged, and frankly acknowledging its debt to that limitless source—folksong. Its performance was notable for excellent ensemble, beautiful tone and interesting accentuation.

Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" (Radiant Night) proved less cruel to the ears than his "Impressions," recently performed in the same hall by the Philadelphians. The pen of the composer was, in 1905, dipped in more honey and less gall than is the case of the result of his later period.

Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and the third "Leonore" overture by Beethoven were the other selections.

TIMES.
NEW YORK CITY

TWO ORCHESTRAS PLAY.

Boston Symphony Gives Franck Masterpiece—The Philharmonic.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra took its leave until New Year's in a matinée of exceptional enjoyment for its large audience at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Cesar Franck's symphony, concerning which "plastic, perfectly beautiful" masterpiece of modern art Philip Hale's notes quoted an interesting appreciation by Vincent d'Indy, was enthusiastically applauded. Mr. Monteux added, besides Brahms's "Tragic" overture, the matinée sweets of Liadoff's so-called folktales, "Baba Yaga," "Kikimora" and "Enchanted Lake," and Ravel's "Dawn," "Pantomime" and "Danse Generale" from his ballet of "Daphnis and Chloe."

The Philharmonic Orchestra last evening gave its second popular Saturday night concert in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Stransky's program comprising the "New World" symphony of Dvorak and four Wagner selections. There were the farewell and magic fire from "The Valkyrie," prize song from "The Master Singers" and overtures to "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser."

Morning Telegraph DEC 19
New York

10

ORCHESTRAS PLAY TWO SYMPHONIES

Boston Band Gives Franck's Symphony in D Minor—Philharmonic Offers Dvorak's "New World."

PHYLLIDA ASHLEY'S RECITAL

Pianist Selects Program of Interest. Chopin, Debussy, MacDowell and Schelling Represented.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its second matinee concert at Carnegie Hall, offered a program which afforded much pleasure to lovers of modern music. Not one of the pieces had been composed before 1880. Pierre Monteux conducted

Berlin, Vienna, and Budapest. Wherever he has visited he has won praise, but nowhere has he more fully deserved the praise than at the St. Denis theatre last night. It was a night that music lovers will remember for many days. When the final note had died away, that silence which hel swa[illegible] immediately previous to a cas cade of applause, was always notic able, as is only in evidence when audience is yet drinking in the beau of the music. The orchestra is co posed of musicians, experienc leavened with youth, which perh accounts for the fire and verve into the work where demanded.
discipline is such as can only be tained by masters deferring to a ter mind, the whole going to mak orchestra of which words alone poor praise.

Md. d'Indy's performance me merit in the applause of the aud his contribution being his own position, and a Bach piano co in D Major, in which he had t of the strings. Despite the app the audience he would give no

It was a memorable night, large audience which gathere theatre were reluctant to dep
the programme had closed,
the most worthy tribute the chestra and its leader could
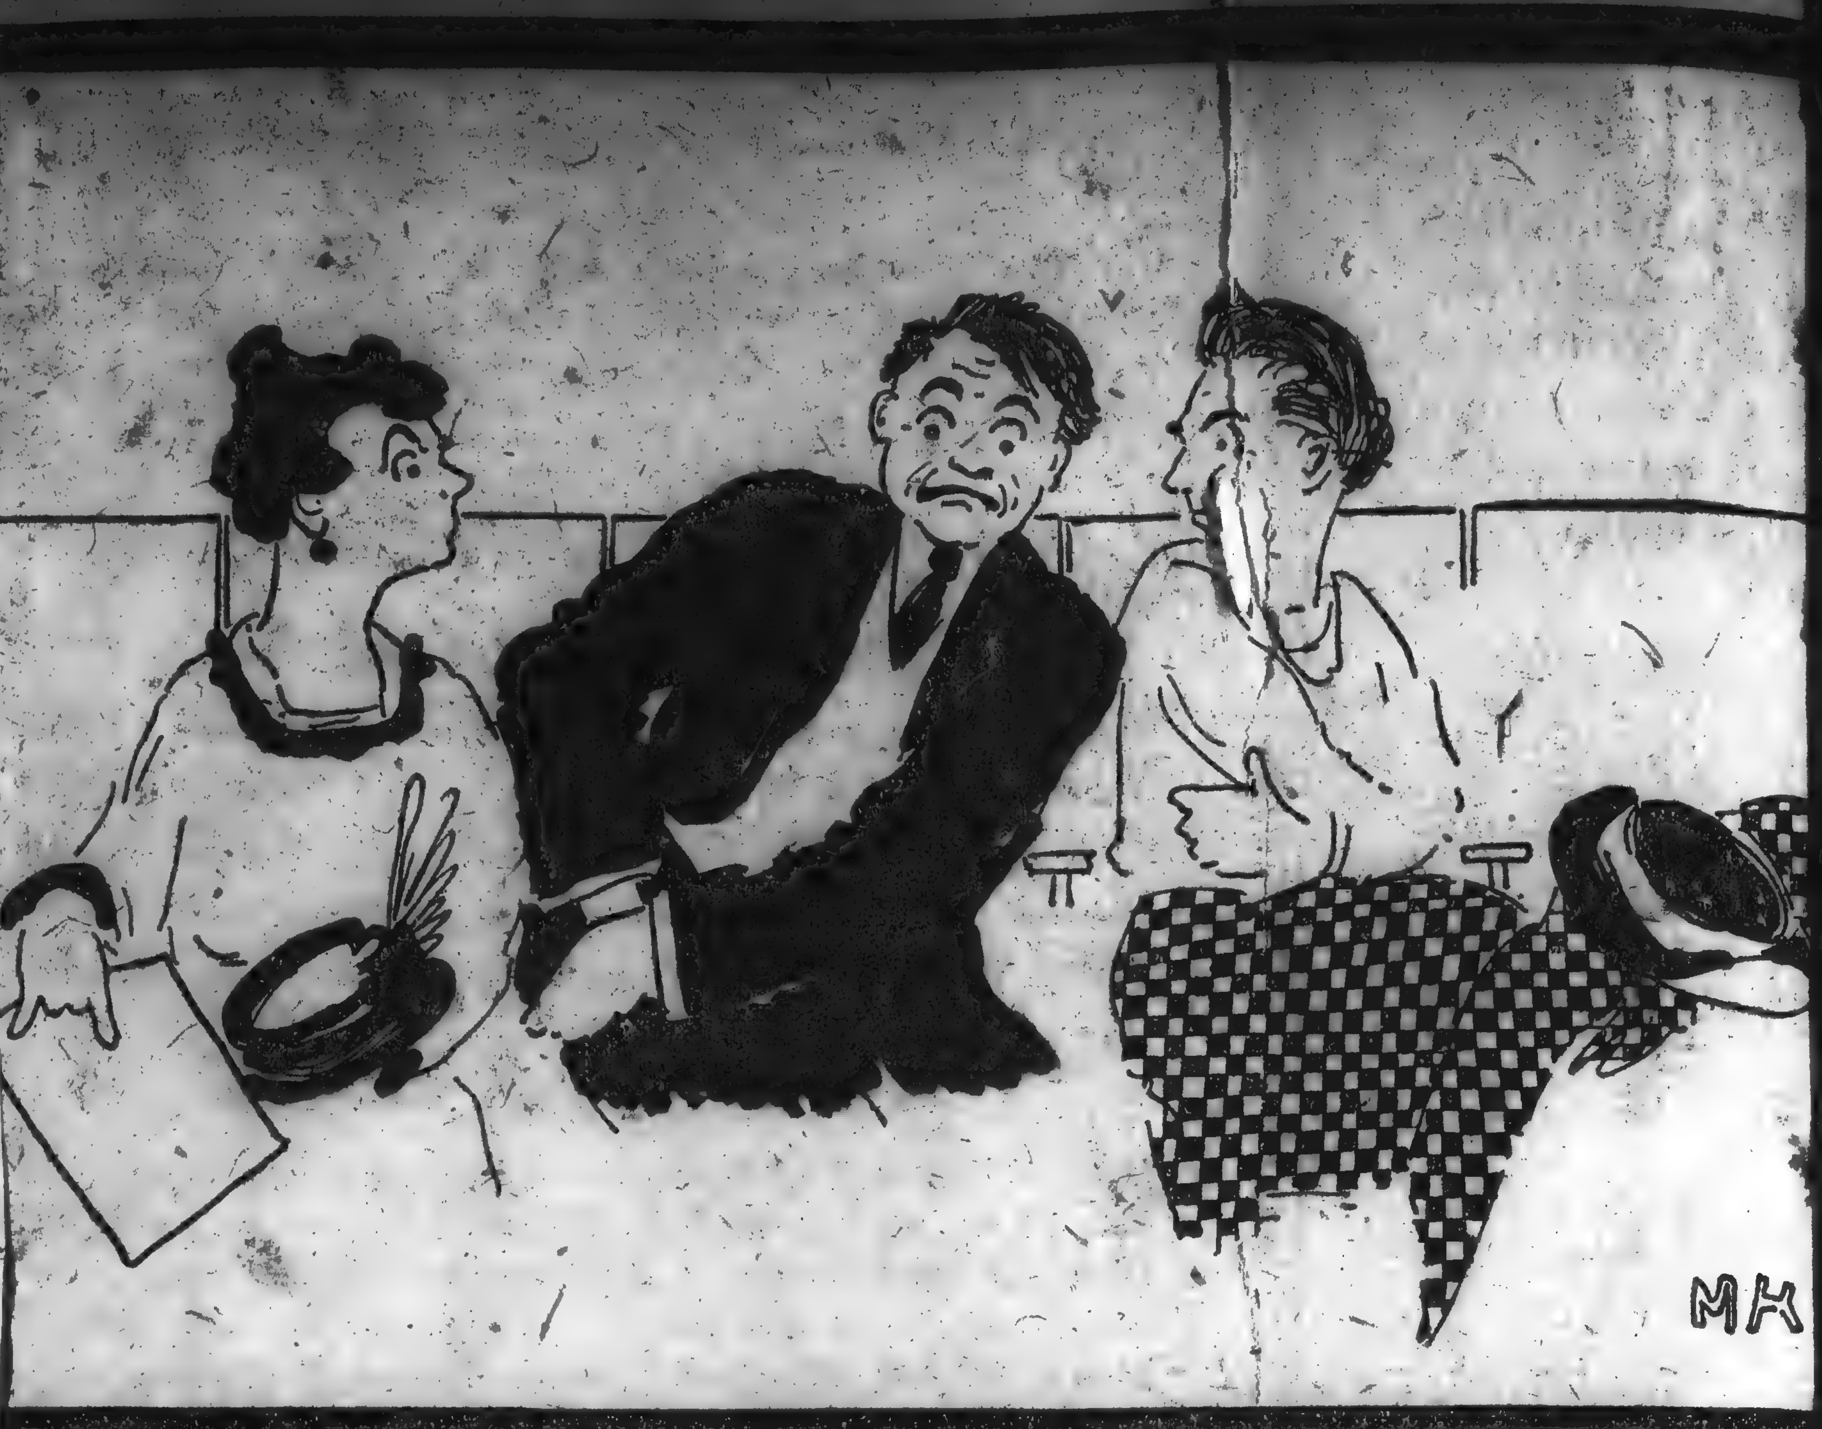
"PI

MBTRL-HRALD-DEC.13

Predicaments of the Concert-Hall



The Searcher

While the Orchestra Is Playing the Slow Movement of the Symphony

Burlington, Vt., Daily
News, Dec. 14, 1921.

Boston Symphony Charms Audience At University Gym.

Never did New England's most famous musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, receive a more enthusiastic reception than that accorded it by the capacity audience at the University Gymnasium last night. Music lovers of Burlington and a large tributary territory sat spell-bound and breathless while Conductor Pierre Monteux led the orchestra of 101 musicians—every one an artist—through a program which was a severe test for both conductor and his orchestra.

The Beethoven symphony, "Eroica," brought out in full the wonderful tonal beauty or the orchestra and the precise and assured reading of the conductor.

Then came the delightful Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanisa Themes," replete with delicate embroidery on haunting themes with playful passages for the capable string ensemble. The second number with its dancing variations and rocking accompaniment was a pure delight. The fandango which concluded the number was suggestive of a Spanish scene painted by a Russian master of tone coloring. The rendition of the number left nothing to be desired.

The Schubert music made a strong appeal and the work of the orchestra was again above criticism.

The final number was well chosen as the climax of this concert which was an epochal musical event for Burlington. Wagner's "Rienzi" overture carried an inspiration which, as interpreted by the Boston Symphony, inspires men to great deeds and high achievements. Here the brasses came forth from hiding and asserted their dominance over string and wood wind instruments which seemed to add to their glory under the matchless handling of Wagner's genius. The musicians themselves seemed to feel last night the inspiration of the Wagner overture and rendered the score with an abandon and spirit that was thrilling to audience which rose en massa at the final chord and recalled conductor Monteux again and again.

Appreciative thanks are due to Arthur Dow for bringing to local music lovers the rare treat afforded by last evening's musical feast.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Provides Satisfying Musical Feast

When Beethoven's 3rd Symphony, the "Eroica," was published in 1806 it bore this warning note. "Since the symphony is longer than an ordinary symphony it should be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert . . . If it be performed too late there is the danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain." The ancient rule was heeded last night in the program presented by that marvelous orchestra, the Boston Symphony, whose musical virtues number almost as many as its musicians. Though there is disagreement as to whether the much discussed and baffling "Eroica" with its funeral march followed by a lively Scherzo and a buoyant finale, depicts a particular man, Napoleon, or, as Richard Wagner preferred to believe "full-fledged man" in general on this one point, there is almost unanimity—that it is a masterly portrayal of heroic emotions. The Boston Symphony's impressive performance of this great tone-epic is the most forceful answer conceivable to the dissenting Strairnsky's recent assertion that Beethoven created no music though he had greatness in his soul, which he expressed in notes that said nothing to the ear. The [illegible] reading given the "Eroica" was a three-fold revelation, manifesting the excellencies of the composition, orchestra and conductor. The work gripped the attention with its vivid delineations and its masterful harmonies, the stages of the tempering of fiery, youthful emotion by deep suffering into a forceful healthy activity were almost visualized as the sweeping climaxes were evoked, only to give way to milder passages of lyric beauty until the triumphant outcome was reached. The instrument by means of which Mr. Monteux sounded this conflict of feelings is superb from every point of view. There is admirable balance of tone and perfection of ensemble. The tone of the string choir is of surpassing beauty and the quality of the wind sections is unusually fine. Through the surety, precision and pliancy of the great symphonic body Mr. Monteux could produce at will any mood and manner. Salient features of the readings of Mr. Monteux are poetic imagination and ever-vigilant attention to the meticulous adjustment of artistic proportions. Unstinted admiration for the work of Mr. Monteux and his men was expressed by the applause of the capacity audience even to the point of urging that the no-encore rule be broken.

For fine phrasing, for bold rhythmic impulse, for wheedling graces, for an abandon that was never once permitted, with all its fire, to become blurred or chaotic the performance of the spirited beauties of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" can hardly be too much commended. The "Caprice" afforded good opportunity in incidental solo work for brilliant cadenza playing by the concertmaster, the flutist and several other of the musicians. To Tschaikowsky's characterisation of the composition as a "colossal masterpiece of instrumentation" might well be added a commendation of the Boston Symphony's rendition of it as a colossal masterpiece of interpretation and execution.

Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" shimmered in loveliness. Its manifold subtleties of grace and charm presented a moment of outstanding lyric beauty. The artistic treatment of the melodic content of these numbers distinguished on the score of delicacy and refinement, enraptured all hearers. Splendid contrasts and color shadings illumined the Wagnerian excerpt, the "Rienzi" overture, and the audience was demonstrative in its appreciation of the brilliant reading given the work as well as of the dynamic resources employed.

The feeling of good cheer, inherent in the holiday season was appreciably intensified by the keen enjoyment of the satisfying musical feast provided through Mr. Dow's management.

BURLNGTN.F.PRES.613

GREAT OVATION GIVEN ORCHESTRA

Epochal Concert by Boston Symphony Players and Monteux

VINCENT D'INDY

Veteran French Composer's Illuminating Reading of Bach Concerto

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Pierre Monteux, conductor; Vincent d'Indy, piano soloist; St. Denis Theatre. program: Eroica Symphony, Beethoven. Piano Concerto, No. 12, Bach. Two Nocturnes, "Nuages," "Fetes," Debussy. Symphonic Variations, "Istar," d'Indy. Hungarian March, "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz.

A word that is much misused by press agents in describing the receptions given performers under their especial care, the word "ovation," may fittingly be called into play in writing about the reception given the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteaux and Mr. d'Indy last night. The occasion was indeed a festal, even an epochal, one. There was an orchestra that is universally accepted as one of the best in the world, an orchestra that Paderewski used to speak about as being superior to all others; there was a program made up of representative classical and modern music, there was a conductor of particular distinction and there was one of the greatest composers of the day playing a solo. Add to these factors the attendance of an immense audience, in which were noticed leading local teachers and many critical non-professional musicians, and it will be seen that none of the essentials that go into the construction of a perfect concert were lacking. The ovation was a natural, practically an inevitable, result; and it was an ovation in which orchestra, conductor and soloist all had their important share, an ovation that rose to a climax of cheering that did not die away till the enthusiasts felt they had paid their debt of thanks in full.

WONDERFUL TONE.

In the orchestra itself were found features, in combination, that, singly, have been admired in other first-rank orchestras visiting Montreal in the last few years. The tonal strength of the New York Symphony, the firm steadiness of the New York Philharmonic, the suavity and much of the finesse of the Scala band were all there, fused into a beautiful, symetrical, powerful and deeply expressive whole. It is doubtful if Mr. Toscanini's brasses were smoother, or his wood-wind sweeter, (when sweetness of tone enhanced the meaning of any particular passage) than the tone that Mr. Monteaux called forth from the wind sections of his orchestra; and certainly even Mr. Toscanini did not give us a more ethereal pianissimo than Mr. Monteux evoked from strings and wind alike in the Scherzo of the Symphony—probably no conductor could have bettered it. Technically, of course, the orchestra says the last word.

CONSERVED ENERGY.

People talked last year about Mr. Toscanini being a 'human dynamo.'' So is Mr. Monteux. His individuality is so strong that he apparently does not have to put forth any special effort to communicate his ideas; it is rather a question of conserving energy and expending it so that it will produce a maximum of effect with a minimum of outlay. Never was a gesture wasted last night; "every little movement had a meaning all its own;" and through this economy there was accumulated a force that when released (but never once unleashed from a dominent control) had an electrifying effect upon the audience. It seems almost as if a deaf man could have understood the music from watching Mr. Monteux direct it.

INTERPRETATIONS.

Varying opinions will doubtless be heard about Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the symphony, differences of opinion will all spring from the basis of whether the finely spiritual French viewpoint is as correct as the more obviously "profound" and philosophi[illegible] one. It always seems to me that [illegible] is as much strength in [illegible] delicacy as there is in the [illegible] of some [illegible] opposed by nature to the Bach school and out of sympathy with French ideals. Certainly there was abundant strength, though not the noisy and ostentatious kind in the first movement of the symphony; the Funeral March was kept high above the slough of sentimentalism, deeply affecting as it was from begining to end; the Scherzo grew, out of a gossamer shimmer, into a Shakespearean-like festival of fairy brightness; and the Finale was impeccably clear in the polyphonic parts and impressively developed throughout. In the French music, Mr. Monteux was, naturally, in the most comfortable circumstances; there no one could dispute him or challenge his authority; and there all his refinement, all his love of brilliance and all his skill in tone painting were given happiest exercise.

D'INDY AS PIANIST.

Modestly, with the air of a professor explaining something to a class, did Mr. d'Indy come forward and play the concerto from copy; and respectfully, almost with an air of reverence, did the audience hold itself in readiness to catch the turn of every phrase. What a wonderful performance it was! How illuminating and uplifting! It seemed as if nothing more could be said after it, as if the completeness of music as an art had been revealed. It was immensely instructive, too, in an historical way; for while the violins of various sizes that were used in the accompaniment are the same as the violins that Bach wrote for, the piano as we know it did not exist in his time; and curiously, and owing without doubt to Mr. d'Indy's clear intention to reproduce as nearly as possible the spirit in which the music was composed, it was the piano that sounded ancient and classical and the accompaniment that seemed modern. It was expected that Mr. d'Indy's reading of this would be scholarly, penetrating and informative; and the fulfillment of this expectation was lit with the light of the pianist's individual interpretative genius. The serenity of mood, so characteristic of Bach, was kept inviolate; nothing small, limited or tainted with anxiety could find place where the only concsiousness was of bigness, goodness and a secure contentment. When again will we be privileged to hear a great composer, who is also a brilliant pianist, acting as interpreter, and with the bearing of a disciple, to one of the greatest composers, perhaps absolutely the greatest yet known to the world? This alone would have made the concert unique.

"ISTAR" VARIATIONS.

Montreal audiences have not had many opportunities to hear Mr. d'Indy's music; and the performance of the "Istar" reversed variations was therefore all the more welcome. The marvel of this score is that the legend which is the basis of it, the story of the woman who went through seven gates leading to the "land of No-Return," and was stripped of jewels and raiment at each gate till she finally passed in revealed in her utter beauty, has been purged of the grossness that a less highly-atuned mind than Mr. d'Indy's might have rejoiced to find in it. And all the flame and radiance of the music, all the swiftly-changing temper and play of color, all the significance of the theme that is finally stated without adornment or accompaniment of any kind, was faithfully reflected in Mr. Monteux's reproduction of it.—P. K.

MONTRL-STAR
DEC.13

[35]

A THU
As the Worl
Just an in observed at cert at Sym
AN OLD
An old wo leaf,
Sat hunch
balcon Silent as a fancie
With magi
Expression
winte
Heedless

When the
She resum
That she
quave

HERA

Concert

SYMPHON
and tomorro
Haydn Societ

Friday at 2
ton Sympho
gram, "Da
"Night on
"Mlada," Ri
ture to "Ph
women's vo will assist i symphony.

LO

Ch

At the concerts,
Hall next urday eve
Monteux
versary Dante, by proportion work is lowing th
edy on movement
the second
a "Magni
sis of Bea
a chorus with the
has been
Mr. Monte

The oth
gramme
Rimsky-K
by the c ance and Triglaff,"
"Phedre."

POS

CH

At th
phony
Saturda serve t of Dan proport divided scheme it is entitle torio,'
in wh reach voices
The
ourpo

The act arran perfo
Moun
ture

H

SYM

At t week F
600th
Dante
Symph
voices
Rimsk
arrang seist's be hea

AP

TRIBU

M
Soprano, Sol
Orches
Season
Evening

...in, Berlin, Vienna, and Budapest. Wherever he has visited he has won praise, but nowhere has he more fully deserved the praise than at the St. Denis theatre last night. It was a night that music lovers will remember for many days. When the final note had died away, that silence which hel sway immediately previous to a cas cade of applause, was always notic able, as is only in evidence when a audience is yet drinking in the beau of the music. The orchestra is com posed of musicians, experienc leavened with youth, which perha accounts for the fire and verve into the work where demanded. discipline is such as can only be tained by masters deferring to a m ter mind, the whole going to mak orchestra of which words alone poor praise.

Md. d'Indy's performance me merit in the applause of the aud his contribution being his own position, and a Bach piano co in D Major, in which he had t of the strings. Despite the app the audience he would give no

It was a memorable night, large audience which gathere theatre were reluctant to dep the programme had closed, the most worthy tribute tha chestra and its leader could

"PI

MNTRL-HRALD-DEC 13-

Burlington, Vt., Daily News, Dec. 14, 1921.

Boston Symphony Charms Audience At University Gym.

Never did New England's most famous musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, receive a more enthusiastic reception than that accorded it by the capacity audience at the University Gymnasium last night. Music lovers of Burlington and a large tributary territory sat spell-bound and breathless while Conductor Pierre Monteux led the orchestra of 101 musicians—every one an artist—through a program which was a severe test for both conductor and his orchestra.

The Beethoven symphony, "Eroica," brought out in full the wonderful tonal beauty or the orchestra and the precise and assured reading of the conductor.

Then came the delightful Rimsky-Korsakoff "Caprice on Spanish Themes," replete with delicate embroidery on haunting themes with playful passages for the capable string ensemble. The second number with its dancing variations and rocking accompaniment was a pure delight. The fandango which concluded the number was suggestive of a Spanish scene painted by a Russian master of tone coloring. The rendition of the number left nothing to be desired.

The Schubert music made a strong appeal and the work of the orchestra was again above criticism.

The final number was well chosen as the climax of this concert which was an epochal musical event for Burlington. Wagner's "Rienzi" overture carried an inspiration which, as interpreted by the Boston Symphony, inspires men to great deeds and high achievements. Here the brasses came forth from hiding and asserted their dominance over string and wood wind instruments which seemed to add to their glory under the matchless handling of Wagner's genius. The musicians themselves seemed to feel last night the inspiration of the Wagner overture and rendered the score with an abandon and spirit that was thrilling to audience which rose en massa at the final chord and recalled conductor Monteux again and again.

Appreciative thanks are due to Arthur Dow for bringing to local music lovers the rare treat afforded by last evening's musical feast.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Provides Satisfying Musical Feast

When Beethoven's 3rd Symphony, the "Eroica," was published in 1806 it bore this warning note. "Since the symphony is longer than an ordinary symphony it should be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert . . . If it be performed too late there is the danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain." The ancient rule was heeded last night in the program presented by that marvelous orchestra, the Boston Symphony, whose musical virtues number almost as many as its musicians. Though there is disagreement as to whether the much discussed and baffling "Eroica" with its funeral march followed by a lively Scherzo and a buoyant finale, depicts a particular man, Napoleon, or, as Richard Wagner preferred to believe "full-fledged man" in general on this one point, there is almost unanimity—that it is a masterly portrayal of heroic emotions. The Boston Symphony's impressive performance of this great tone-epic is the most forceful answer conceivable to the dissenting Strairnsky's recent assertion that Beethoven created no music though he had greatness in his soul, which he expressed in notes that said nothing to the ear. The inspired reading given the "Eroica" was a three-fold revelation, manifesting the excellencies of the composition, orchestra and conductor. The work gripped the attention with its vivid delineations and its masterful harmonies, the stages of the tempering of fiery, youthful emotion by deep suffering into a forceful healthy activity were almost visualized as the sweeping climaxes were evoked, only to give way to milder passages of lyric beauty until the triumphant outcome was reached. The instrument by means of which Mr. Monteux sounded this conflict of feelings is superb from every point of view. There is admirable balance of tone and perfection of ensemble. The tone of the string choir is of surpassing beauty and the quality of the wind sections is unusually fine. Through the surety, precision and pliancy of the great symphonic body Mr. Monteux could produce at will any mood and manner. Salient features of the readings of Mr. Monteux are poetic imagination and ever-vigilant attention to the meticulous adjustment of artistic proportions. Unstinted admiration for the work of Mr. Monteux and his men was expressed by the applause of the capacity audience even to the point of urging that the no-encore rule be broken.

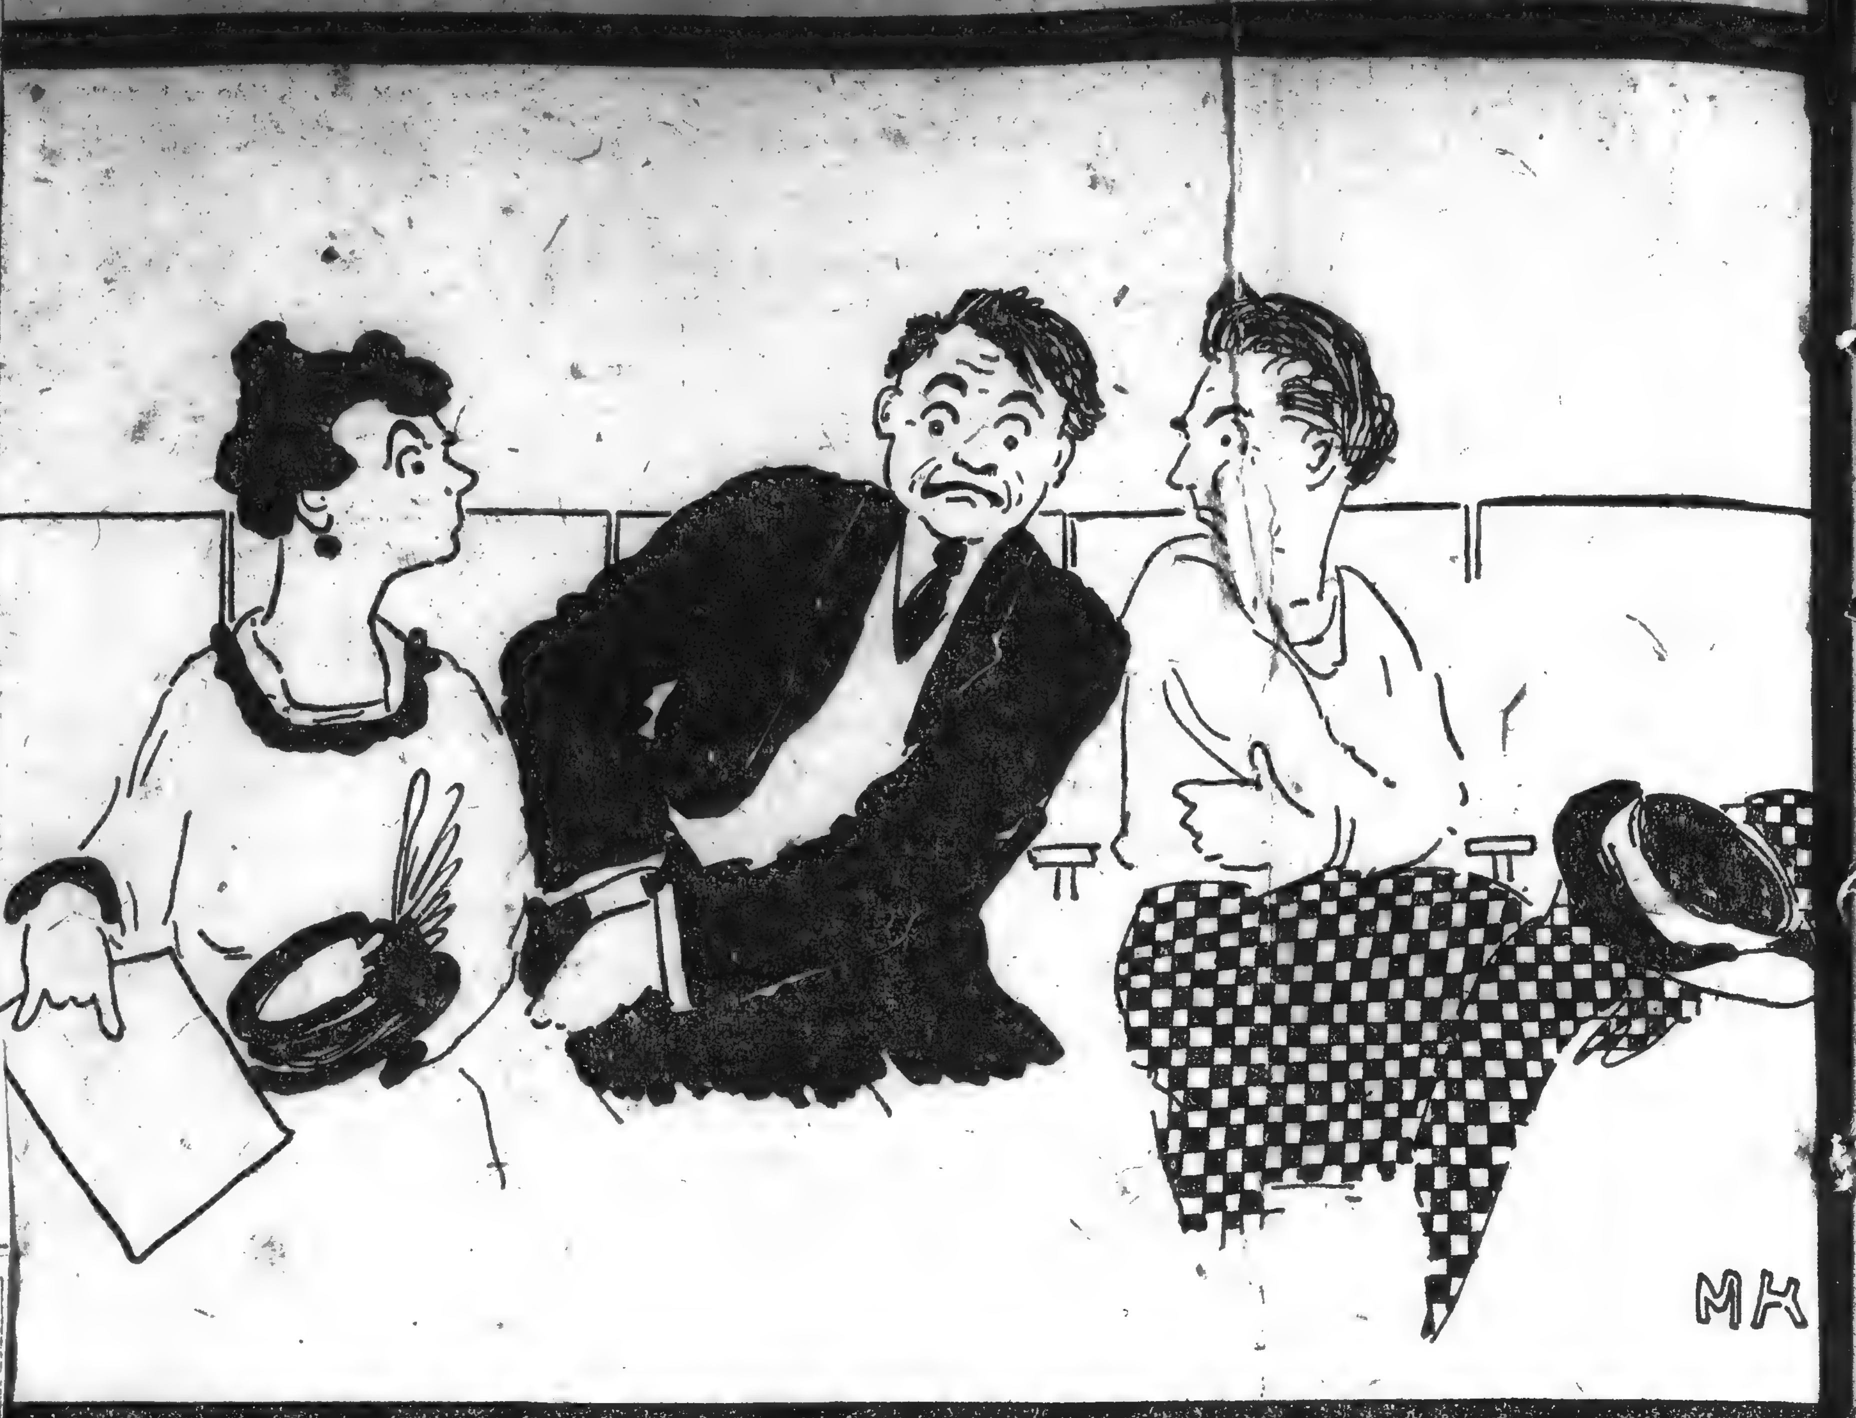
For fine phrasing, for bold rhythmic impulse, for wheedling graces, for an abandon that was never once permitted, with all its fire, to become blurred or chaotic the performance of the spirited beauties of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" can hardly be too much commended. The "Caprice" afforded good opportunity in incidental solo work for brilliant cadenza playing by the concertmaster, the flutist and several other of the musicians. To Tschaikowsky's characterization of the composition as a "colossal masterpiece of instrumentation" might well be added a commendation of the Boston Symphony's rendition of it as a colossal masterpiece of interpretation and execution.

Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" shimmered in loveliness. Its manifold subtleties of grace and charm presented a moment of outstanding lyric beauty. The artistic treatment of the melodic content of these numbers distinguished on the score of delicacy and refinement, enraptured all hearers. Splendid contrasts and color shadings illumined the Wagnerian excerpt, the "Rienzi" overture, and the audience was demonstrative in its appreciation of the brilliant reading given the work as well as of the dynamic resources employed.

The feeling of good cheer, inherent in the holiday season was appreciably intensified by the keen enjoyment of the satisfying musical feast provided through Mr. Dow's management.

BURLNGTN. F.PRESS. 613

Predicaments of the Concert-Hall



The Searcher

While the Orchestra Is Playing the Slow Movement of the Symphony

---

GREAT OVATION GIVEN ORCHESTRA

Epochal Concert by Boston Symphony Players and Monteux

VINCENT D'INDY

Veteran French Composer's Illuminating Reading of Bach Concerto

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Pierre Monteux, conductor; Vincent d'Indy, piano soloist; St. Denis Theatre, program: Eroica Symphony, Beethoven. Piano Concerto, No. 12, Bach. Two Nocturnes, "Nuages," "Fetes," Debussy. Symphonic Variations, "Istar," d'Indy. Hungarian March, "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz.

A word that is much misused by press agents in describing the receptions given performers under their especial care, the word "ovation," may fittingly be called into play in writing about the reception given the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteaux and Mr. d'Indy last night. The occasion was indeed a festal, even an epochal, one. There was an orchestra that is universally accepted as one of the best in the world, an orchestra that Paderewski used to speak about as being superior to all others, there was a program made up of representative classical and modern music, there was a conductor of particular distinction and there was one of the greatest composers of the day playing a solo. Add to these factors the attendance of an immense audience, in which were noticed leading local teachers and many critical non-professional musicians, and it will be seen that none of the essentials that go into the construction of a perfect concert were lacking. The ovation was a natural, practically an inevitable, result; and it was an ovation in which orchestra, conductor and soloist all had their important share, an ovation that rose to a climax of cheering that did not die away till the enthusiasts felt they had paid their debt of thanks in full.

WONDERFUL TONE.

In the orchestra itself were found features, in combination, that, singly, have been admired in other first-rank orchestras visiting Montreal in the last few years. The tonal strength of the New York Symphony, the firm steadiness of the New York Philharmonic, the suavity and much of the finesse of the Scala band were all there, fused into a beautiful, symetrical, powerful and deeply expressive whole. It is doubtful if Mr. Toscanini's brasses were smoother, or his wood-wind sweeter, (when sweetness of tone enhanced the meaning of any particular passage) than the tone that Mr. Monteaux called forth from the wind sections of his orchestra; and certainly even Mr. Toscanini did not give us a more ethereal pianissimo than Mr. Monteux evoked from strings and wind alike in the Scherzo of the Symphony—probably no conductor could have bettered it. Technically, of course, the orchestra says the last word.

CONSERVED ENERGY.

People talked last year about Mr. Toscanini being a 'human dynamo.' So is Mr. Monteux. His individuality is so strong that he apparently does not have to put forth any special effort to communicate his ideas; it is rather a question of conserving energy and expending it so that it will produce a maximum of effect with a minimum of outlay. Never was a gesture wasted last night; "every little movement had a meaning all its own," and through this economy there was accumulated a force that when released (but never once unleashed from a dominent control) had an electrifying effect upon the audience. It seems almost as if a deaf man could have understood the music from watching Mr. Monteux direct it.

INTERPRETATIONS.

Varying opinions will doubtless be heard about Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the symphony, differences of opinion will all spring from the basis of whether the finely spiritual French viewpoint is as correct as the more obviously "profound" and philosophi... one. It always seems to me that ... is as much strength in the ...h delicacy as there is in the ...der concepts of some musicians opposed by nature to the French school and out of sympathy with French ideals. Certainly there was abundant strength, though not the noisy and ostentatious kind in the first movement of the symphony; the Funeral March was kept high above the slough of sentimentalism, deeply affecting as it was from begining to end; the Scherzo grew, out of a gossamer shimmer, into a Sakespearean-like festival of fairy brightness; and the Finale was impeccably clear in the polyphonic parts and impressively developed throughout. In the French music, Mr. Monteux was, naturally, in the most comfortable circumstances; there no one could dispute him or challenge his authority; and there all his refinement, all his love of brilliance and all his skill in tone painting were given happiest exercise.

D'INDY AS PIANIST.

Modestly, with the air of a professor explaining something to a class, did Mr. d'Indy come forward and play the concerto from copy; and respectfully, almost with an air of reverence, did the audience hold itself in readiness to catch the turn of every phrase. What a wonderful performance it was! How illuminating and uplifting! It seemed as if nothing more could be said after it, as if the completeness of music as an art had been revealed. It was immensely instructive, too, in an historical way; for while the violins of various sizes that were used in the accompaniment are the same as the violins that Bach wrote for, the piano as we know it did not exist in his time; and curiously, and owing without doubt to Mr. d'Indy's clear intention to reproduce as nearly as possible the spirit in which the music was composed, it was the piano that sounded ancient and classical and the accompaniment that seemed modern. It was expected that Mr. d'Indy's reading of this would be scholarly, penetrating and informative; and the fulfillment of this expectation was lit with the light of the pianist's individual interpretative genius. The serenity of mood, so characteristic of Bach, was kept inviolate; nothing small, limited or tainted with anxiety could find place where the only concsiousness was of bigness, goodness and a secure contentment. When again will we be privileged to hear a great composer, who is also a brilliant pianist, acting as interpreter, and with the bearing of a disciple, to one of the greatest composers; perhaps absolutely the greatest yet known to the world? This alone would have made the concert unique.

"ISTAR" VARIATIONS.

Montreal audiences have not had many opportunities to hear Mr. d'Indy's music; and the performance of the "Istar" reversed variations was therefore all the more welcome. The marvel of this score is that the legend which is the basis of it, the story of the woman who went through seven gates leading to the "land of No-Return," and was stripped of jewels and raiment at each gate till she finally passed in revealed in her utter beauty, has been purged of the grossness that a less highly-atuned mind than Mr. d'Indy's might have rejoiced to find in it. And all the flame and radiance of the music, all the swiftly-changing temper and play of color, all the significance of the theme that is finally stated without adornment or accompaniment of any kind, was faithfully reflected in Mr. Monteux's reproduction of it.—P. K.

MONTRL-STAR DEC. 13

[35]

A THU
As the Worl
Just an in observed at cert at Sym
AN OLD
An old wor
leaf,
Sat hunche
balcon
Silent as a fancie
With magi
Expression
winte
Heedless c

When the
She resum
That she quaver

HERA

Concert a

SYMPHON
and tomorro
Haydn Societ

Friday at 2
ton Sympho
gram. "Da
"Night on
"Mlada," Ri
ture to "Ph
women's vo
will assist i symphony.

LO

Ch

At the concerts,
Hall next
urday eve
Monteux
versary c
Dante, b proportion work is d lowing th
edy on movement
the second
a "Magni
sis of Bea
a chorus
with the
has been
Mr. Monte

The oth
gramme
Rimsky-K
by the c ance and Triglaff,"
"Phedre."

POS

CH

At th
phony
Saturda
serve th
of Dan
proport divided scheme
it is entitle torio,"
in wh reach voices
The
purpo

The act arran perfo
Moun
ture "

HE

SYM

At t week F
600th
Dante
Symph
voices
Rimsk
arrang sellet's be hea

ADV

TRIBU

M
Soprano Sol
Orches
Season
Evening

A THUMB-NAIL SKETCH

As the World Wags:

Just an interesting bit of "still life" observed at the Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall.

AN OLD WOMAN AT SYMPHONY

An old woman, wrinkled as a withered leaf,
Sat hunched in a seat in the second balcony,
Silent as a gnome while the music wove fancies
With magic thread into her imagination.
Expressionless she was, and old as winter,
Heedless of the gusts of music.

When the music was over
She resumed munching an apple
That she had held suspended in her quavering hand.

JAMES QUINCY.

HERALD-DEC. 15.

Concert and Recital Programs For the Current Week

SYMPHONY HALL—Today at 3:30 and tomorrow at 8, the Handel and Haydn Society in "The Messiah."

Friday at 2:30, and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, ninth program. "Dante" Symphony, Liszt; "Night on Mount Triklaff," from "Mlada," Rimsky-Korsakoff, and overture to "Phedre," Massenet. Chorus of women's voices, trained by Mr Monteux, will assist in the last movement of the symphony.

GLOBE-DEC. 18.

Choral Symphony Concert

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 23 ond 24, Pierre Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of the poet, Dante, by performing Liszt's large-proportioned "Dante" Symphony. This work is divided into three parts, following the scheme of the divine comedy on which it is based, the first movement being entitled "Inferno," the second, "Purgatorio," and the third a "Magnificat," in which the apotheosis of Beatrice is reached by means of a chorus of women's voices joining with the full orchestra. The chorus has been trained for this purpose by Mr. Monteux.

The other numbers on this programme will be the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer for concert performance and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," and Massenet's Overture to "Phedre."

POST-DEC. 18.

CHORAL SYMPHONY

At the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of Dante, by performing Liszt's large proportioned "Dante" Symphony. It is divided into three parts, following the scheme of the divine comedy on which it is based, the first movement being entitled "Inferno," the second, "Purgatorio," and the third a "Magnificat," in which the apotheosis of Beatrice is reached by means of a chorus of female voices joining with the full orchestra. The chorus has been trained for this purpose by Mr. Monteux.

The other pieces will be the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer for concert performance and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," and Massenet's overture to "Phedre."

HERALD-DEC. 18

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

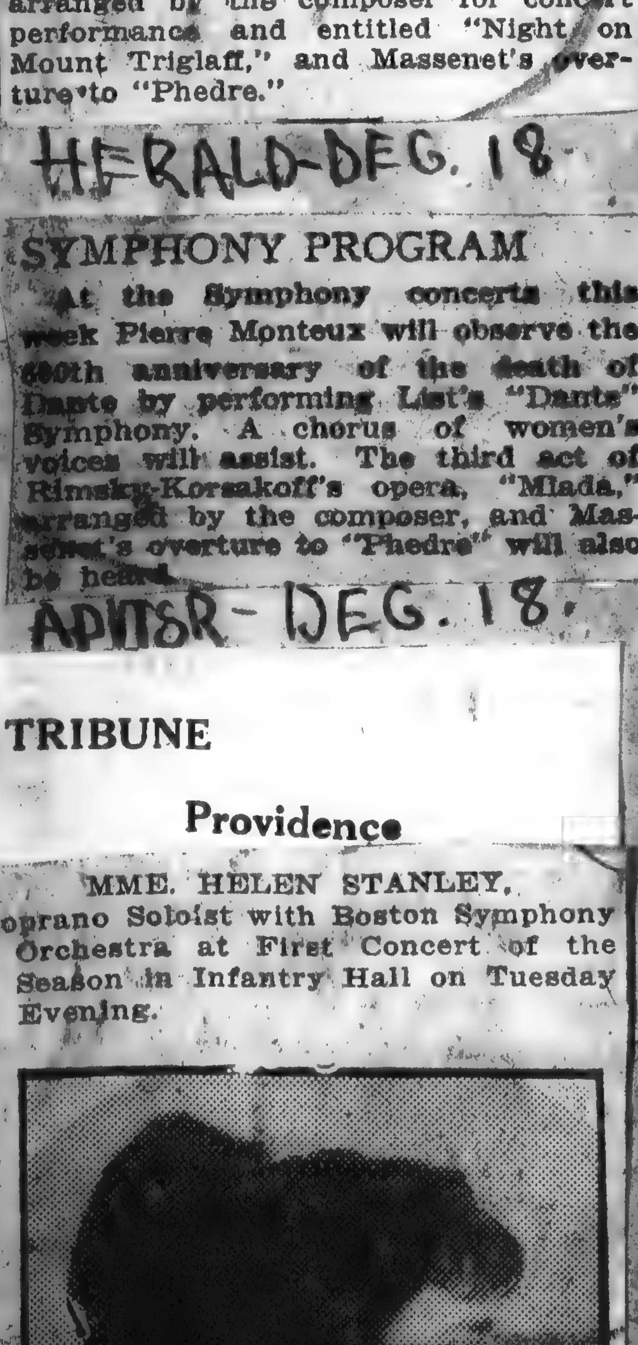
At the Symphony concerts this week Pierre Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of Dante by performing List's "Dante" Symphony. A chorus of women's voices will assist. The third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Mlada," arranged by the composer, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre" will also be heard.

ADVTSR-DEC. 18.

TRIBUNE

Providence

MME. HELEN STANLEY, Soprano Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at First Concert of the Season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening.



By Wald Stud

The Ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux, Its Leader.
(Wald Studio)

HERALD-DEC 18.

TRIBUNE

Providence

By N. B. Pettis.

The past week has been a busy one in local musical circles with the meetings of various musical clubs and several concerts of distinction and the week to come promises even more of interest, a fact which evidences the steady growth of Providence as one of the musical centres of New England.

At the opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in Providence, which will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 15, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct a program of unusual interest and brilliance. The symphony will be the Third of Beethoven, "the Eroica," which was given at the opening of the Boston Symphony season at Carnegie Hall, New York, a week ago last Thursday, and which on that occasion, by the beauty of its performance and interpretation, met with highly enthusiastic response. The circumstances of its composition is well known—how the great composer inscribed this work to Napoleon, believing him the liberator of mankind, and later, finding that the European general was abusing his power, destroyed the dedication in anger. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Berlioz's most popular work, his overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the noted tone poem, "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, the great composer, who is now making a short visit to this country.

The soloist on this occasion will be Madame Helen Stanley, dramatic soprano, who several seasons ago was acclaimed as the prima donna and principal star of the Chicago Opera Company. Since that time she has devoted her career entirely to the concert stage, and her appearances with orchestra and in recitals of her own in the larger cities of this country have revealed to even finer advantage the beauties of her voice and artistry. She will sing with the great orchestra on this occasion an aria from the opera "Conchita" by the living Italian composer, Zandonai, and the Aria of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

FROM

TRIBUNE

Providence

OPENING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON TO-NIGHT.

The Boston Symphony concert, which will begin the season's series of five concerts in Providence, will take place in Infantry Hall to-night at 8:15. This will be the 169th concert by this famous New England orchestra in Providence.

Much is expected of the orchestra this year, in that the initial concerts in Boston and the opening of the season in New York, which took place a week ago last Thursday, have brought the highest praise upon the quality of the ensemble under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, who is now in his third season as conductor of the orchestra.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which also started the New York season.

As soloist at this concert, Madame Helen Stanley, the prima donna soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, who is also a notable concert singer, will be heard in arias by Debussy and Zandonai. The remaining orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the tone poem, "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, considered the greatest composer living, who is now touring this country.

OURNAL

Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN ITS SEASON HERE TO-NIGHT

Beethoven's "Eroica" to be Monteux's Chief Offering.

The season of Boston Symphony concerts in Providence will open in Infantry Hall to-night at 8:15 o'clock. Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor, will begin with Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," which was also the opening number at the orchestra's first New York concert a week ago last Thursday.

As soloist, Helen Stanley, formerly prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, will be heard in arias by Debussy and Zandonai. The remaining orchestra numbers will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss. This will be the 169th concert given in Providence by the orchestra.

The 100 musicians who comprise the personnel of the orchestra are virtually the same as in former seasons. The policy of the orchestra has always been to make the minimum number of changes. It is thought to be by long association and practice that the strings have been trained into the perfection of ensemble and beauty of tone that have been praised highly everywhere.

Indeed the only newcomer is Georges Fourel, who came over from France in September to lead the golden-toned viola section. This virtuoso is considered a valuable addition to the organization.

A THUMB-NAIL SKETCH

As the World Wags:

Just an interesting bit of "still life" observed at the Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall.

AN OLD WOMAN AT SYMPHONY

An old woman, wrinkled as a withered leaf,
Sat hunched in a seat in the second balcony,
Silent as a gnome while the music wove fancies
With magic thread into her imagination.
Expressionless she was, and old as winter,
Heedless of the gusts of music.

When the music was over
She resumed munching an apple
That she had held suspended in her quavering hand.

JAMES QUINCY.

HERALD-DEC. 15.

Concert and Recital Programs For the Current Week

SYMPHONY HALL—Today at 3:30 and tomorrow at 8, the Handel and Haydn Society in "The Messiah."

Friday at 2:30, and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, ninth program. "Dante" Symphony, Liszt; "Night on Mount Triklaff," from "Mlada," Rimsky-Korsakoff, and overture to "Phedre," Massenet. Chorus of women's voices, trained by Mr Monteux, will assist in the last movement of the symphony.

GLOBE-DEC. 18.

Choral Symphony Concert

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 23 ond 24, Pierre Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of the poet, Dante, by performing Liszt's large-proportioned "Dante" Symphony. This work is divided into three parts, following the scheme of the divine comedy on which it is based, the first movement being entitled "Inferno," the second, "Purgatorio," and the third a "Magnificat," in which the apotheosis of Beatrice is reached by means of a chorus of women's voices joining with the full orchestra. The chorus has been trained for this purpose by Mr. Monteux.

The other numbers on this programme will be the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer for concert performance and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," and Massenet's Overture to "Phedre."

POST-DEC. 18.

CHORAL SYMPHONY

At the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of Dante, by performing Liszt's large proportioned "Dante" Symphony. It is divided into three parts, following the scheme of the divine comedy on which it is based, the first movement being entitled "Inferno," the second, "Purgatorio," and the third a "Magnificat," in which the apotheosis of Beatrice is reached by means of a chorus of female voices joining with the full orchestra. The chorus has been trained for this purpose by Mr. Monteux.

The other pieces will be the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer for concert performance and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," and Massenet's overture to "Phedre."

HERALD-DEC. 18

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

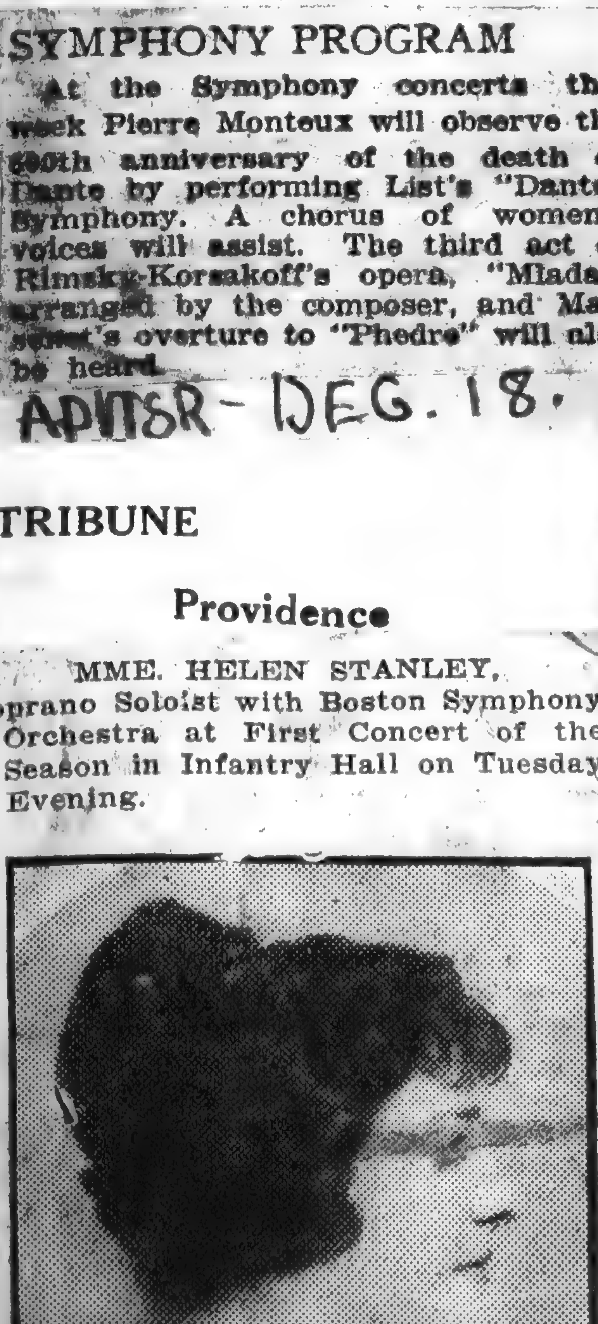
At the Symphony concerts this week Pierre Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of Dante by performing List's "Dante" Symphony. A chorus of women's voices will assist. The third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Mlada," arranged by the composer, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre" will also be heard.

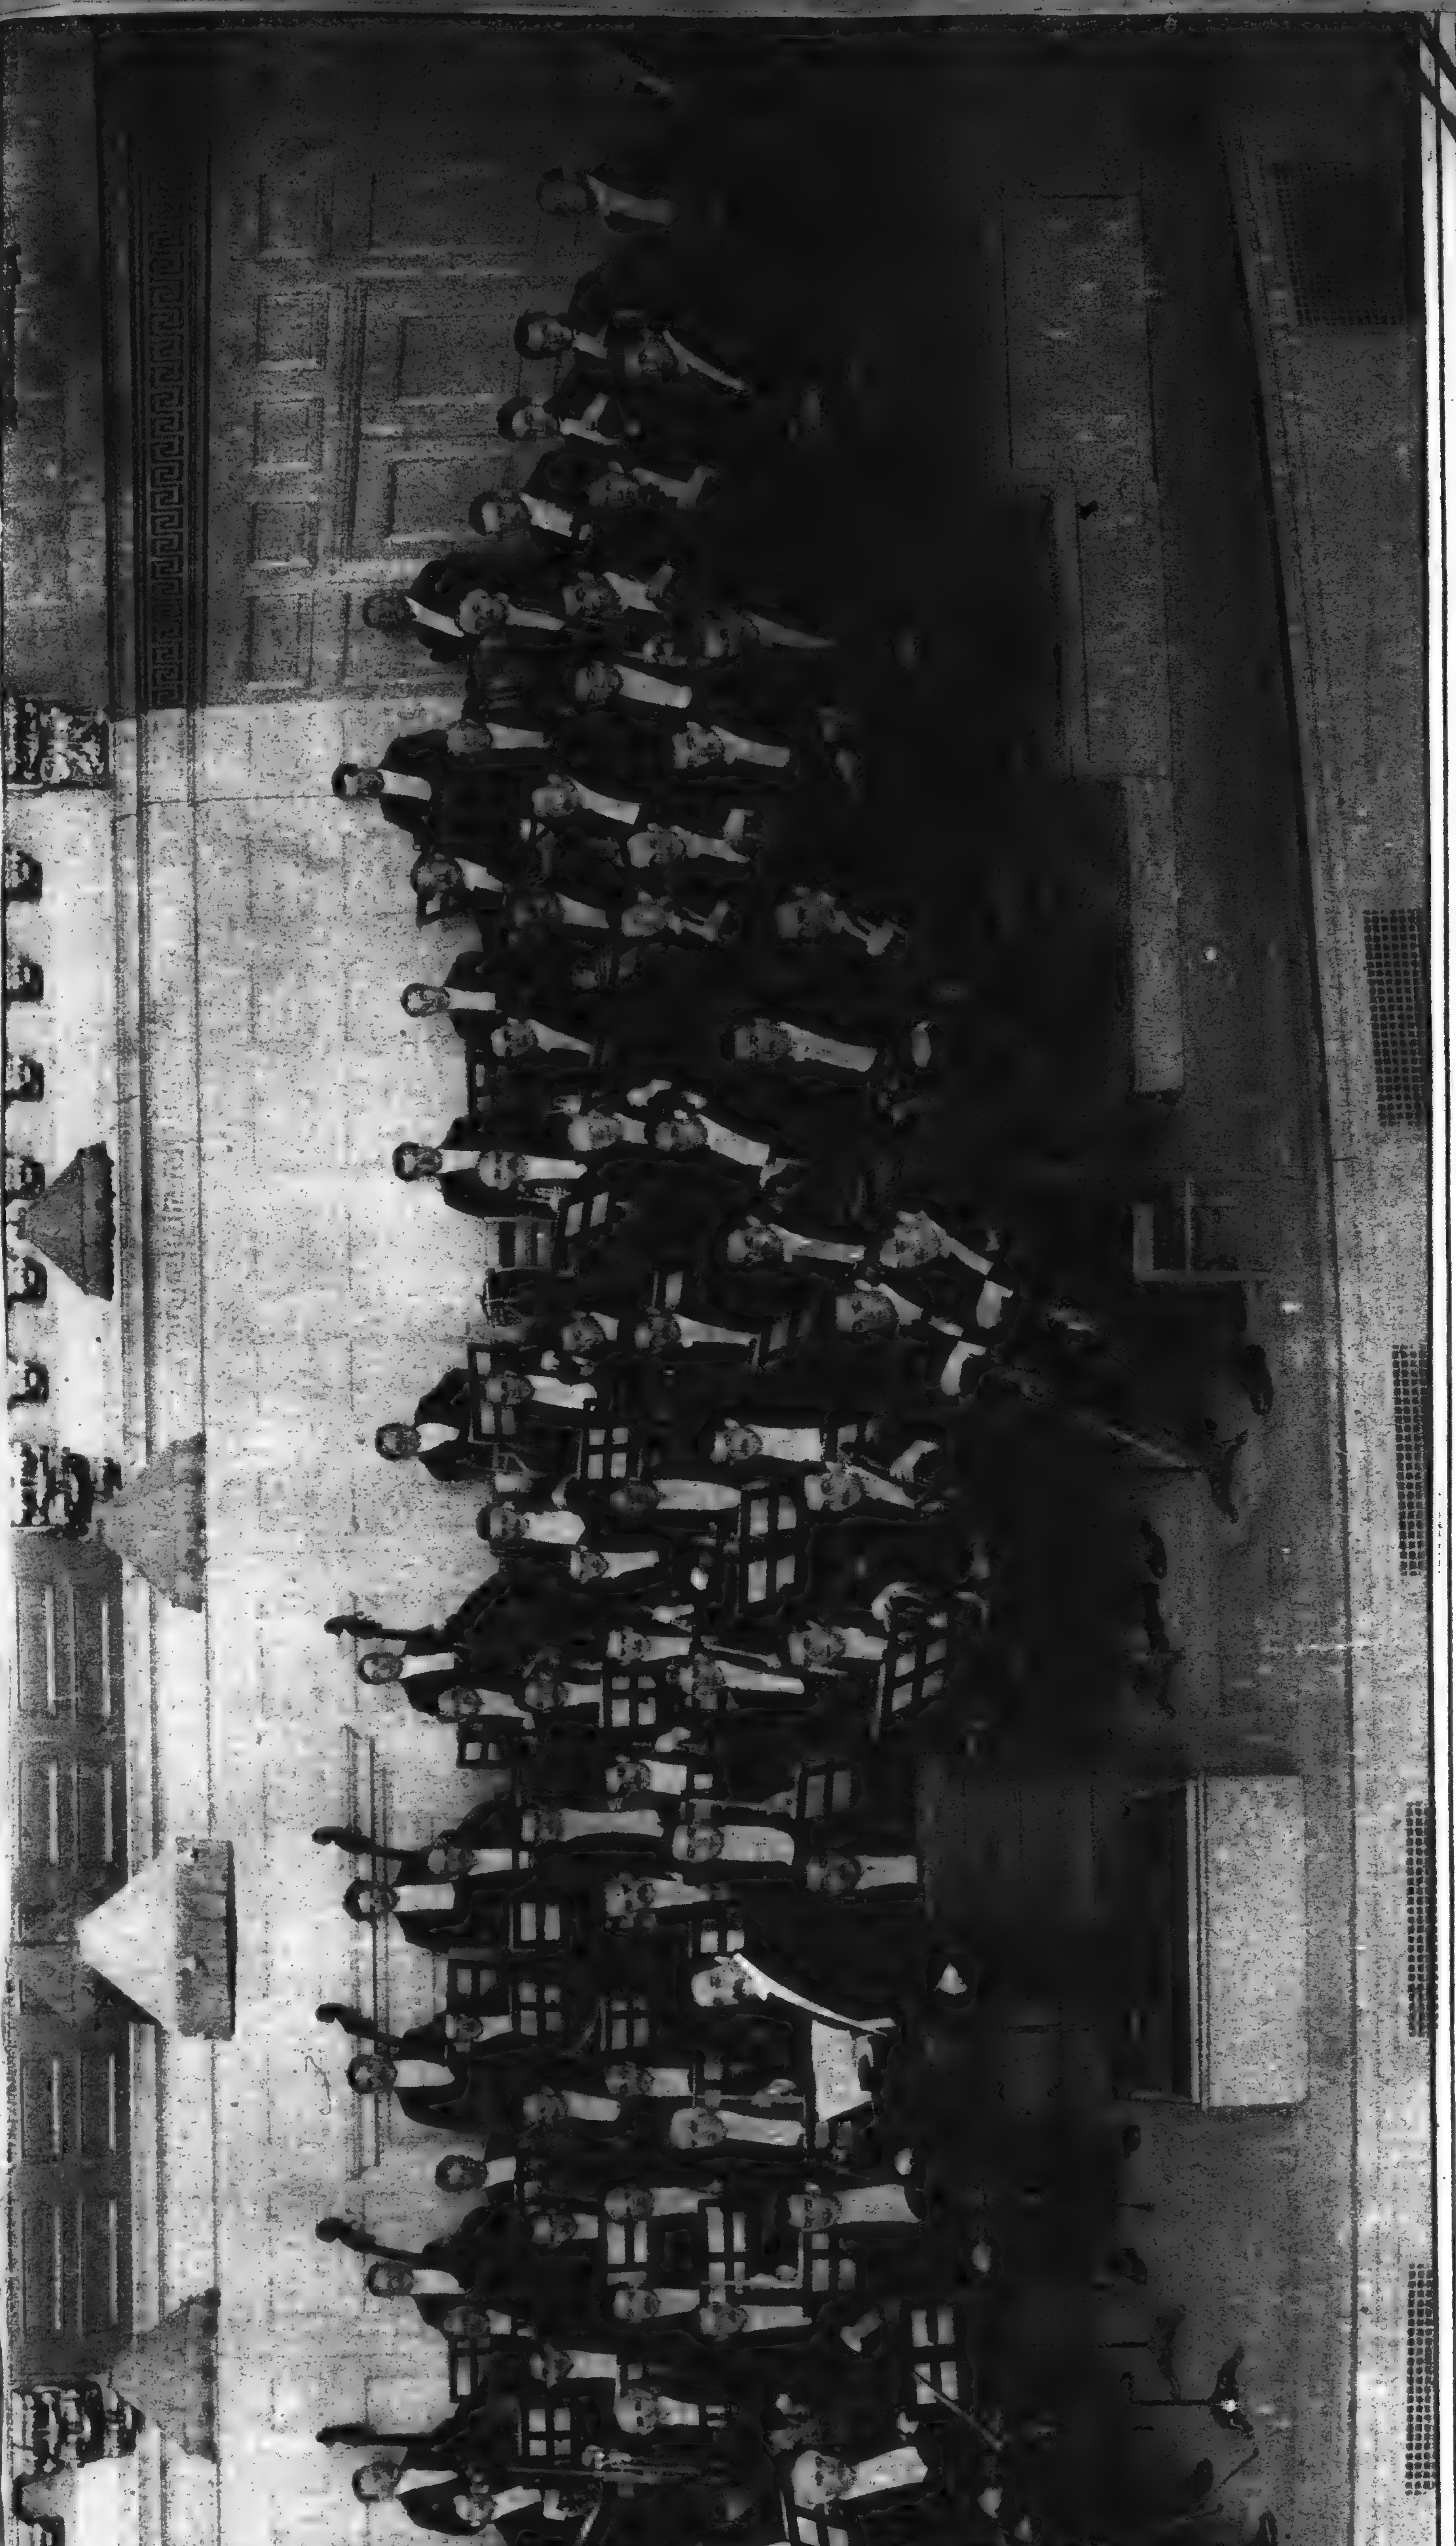
ADVTSR-DEC. 18.

TRIBUNE

Providence

MME. HELEN STANLEY, Soprano Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at First Concert of the Season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening.





The Ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux, Its Leader.

(Waid Studio)

HERALD-DEC 18

TRIBUNE

Providence

By N. B. Pettis.

The past week has been a busy one in local musical circles with the meetings of various musical clubs and several concerts of distinction and the week to come promises even more of interest, a fact which evidences the steady growth of Providence as one of the musical centres of New England.

At the opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in Providence, which will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 15, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct a program of unusual interest and brilliance. The symphony will be the Third of Beethoven, "the Eroica," which was given at the opening of the Boston Symphony season at Carnegie Hall, New York, a week ago last Thursday, and which on that occasion, by the beauty of its performance and interpretation, met with highly enthusiastic response. The circumstances of its composition is well known—how the great composer inscribed this work to Napoleon, believing him the liberator of mankind, and later, finding that the European general was abusing his power, destroyed the dedication in anger. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Berlioz's most popular work, his overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the noted tone poem, "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, the great composer, who is now making a short visit to this country.

The soloist on this occasion will be Madame Helen Stanley, dramatic soprano, who several seasons ago was acclaimed as the prima donna and principal star of the Chicago Opera Company. Since that time she has devoted her career entirely to the concert stage, and her appearances with orchestra and in recitals of her own in the larger cities of this country have revealed to even finer advantage the beauties of her voice and artistry. She will sing with the great orchestra on this occasion an aria from the opera "Conchita" by the living Italian composer, Zandonai, and the Aria of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

FROM

TRIBUNE

Providence

OPENING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON TO-NIGHT.

The Boston Symphony concert, which will begin the season's series of five concerts in Providence, will take place in Infantry Hall to-night at 8:15. This will be the 169th concert by this famous New England orchestra in Providence.

Much is expected of the orchestra this year, in that the initial concerts in Boston and the opening of the season in New York, which took place a week ago last Thursday, have brought the highest praise upon the quality of the ensemble under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, who is now in his third season as conductor of the orchestra.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which also started the New York season.

As soloist at this concert, Madame Helen Stanley, the prima donna soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, who is also a notable concert singer, will be heard in arias by Debussy and Zandonai. The remaining orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the tone poem, "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, considered the greatest composer living, who is now touring this country.

OURNAL

Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN ITS SEASON HERE TO-NIGHT

Beethoven's "Eroica" to be Monteux's Chief Offering.

The season of Boston Symphony concerts in Providence will open in Infantry Hall to-night at 8:15 o'clock. Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor, will begin with Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," which was also the opening number at the orchestra's first New York concert a week ago last Thursday.

As soloist, Helen Stanley, formerly prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, will be heard in arias by Debussy and Zandonai. The remaining orchestra numbers will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss. This will be the 169th concert given in Providence by the orchestra.

The 100 musicians who comprise the personnel of the orchestra are virtually the same as in former seasons. The policy of the orchestra has always been to make the minimum number of changes. It is thought to be by long association and practice that the strings have been trained into the perfection of ensemble and beauty of tone that have been praised highly everywhere.

Indeed the only newcomer is Georges Fourel, who came over from France in September to lead the golden-toned viola section. This virtuoso is considered a valuable addition to the organization.

A THUMB-NAIL SKETCH

As the World Wags:

Just an interesting bit of "still life" observed at the Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall.

AN OLD WOMAN AT SYMPHONY

An old woman, wrinkled as a withered leaf,
Sat hunched in a seat in the second balcony,
Silent as a gnome while the music wove fancies
With magic thread into her imagination.
Expressionless she was, and old as winter,
Heedless of the gusts of music.

When the music was over
She resumed munching an apple
That she had held suspended in her quavering hand.

JAMES QUINCY.

HERALD-DEC. 15

Concert and Recital Programs For the Current Week

SYMPHONY HALL—Today at 3:30 and tomorrow at 8, the Handel and Haydn Society in "The Messiah."

Friday at 2:30, and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, ninth program, "Dante" Symphony, Liszt; "Night on Mount Triklaff," from "Mlada," Rimsky-Korsakoff, and overture to "Phedre," Massenet. Chorus of women's voices, trained by Mr Monteux, will assist in the last movement of the symphony.

GLOBE-DEC. 18.

Choral Symphony Concert

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 23 ond 24, Pierre Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of the poet, Dante, by performing Liszt's large-proportioned "Dante" Symphony. This work is divided into three parts, following the scheme of the divine comedy on which it is based, the first movement being entitled "Inferno," the second, "Purgatorio," and the third a "Magnificat," in which the apotheosis of Beatrice is reached by means of a chorus of women's voices joining with the full orchestra. The chorus has been trained for this purpose by Mr. Monteux.

The other numbers on this programme will be the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer for concert performance and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," and Massenet's Overture to "Phedre."

POST-DEC. 18.

CHORAL SYMPHONY

At the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of Dante, by performing Liszt's large proportioned "Dante" Symphony. It is divided into three parts, following the scheme of the divine comedy on which it is based, the first movement being entitled "Inferno," the second, "Purgatorio," and the third a "Magnificat," in which the apotheosis of Beatrice is reached by means of a chorus of female voices joining with the full orchestra. The chorus has been trained for this purpose by Mr. Monteux.

The other pieces will be the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer for concert performance and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," and Massenet's overture to "Phedre."

HERALD-DEC 18

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts this week Pierre Monteux will observe the 600th anniversary of the death of Dante by performing List's "Dante" Symphony. A chorus of women's voices will assist. The third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Mlada," arranged by the composer, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre" will also be heard.

ADVTSR-DEC. 18.

Fench
athy with here was not the n the first ny; the gh above
n, deeply beginning out of a Shake-fairy was imonic parts through-
Mr. Mont-
most come no one nge his s refine-e and all ere given professor lass, did and play respect-everence,

in readi-
y phrase.
ance it
d uplift-ng more the com-had been instrucway; for sizes that ment are at Bach know it curioust to Mr. reproduce spirit in ed, it was ient and ment that ected that would be informathis ex-
ht of the rpretative hood, so kept innited or nd place s was of ure con-we be composer,
t, acting bearing greatest,
tely the rld? This concert

not had ar Mr.
rformance variations welcome.
that the
of it, the t through "land of ipped or te till she her utter the gross-ned mind
ve rejoiced flame and he swiftly-
f color, all me that is rnment or
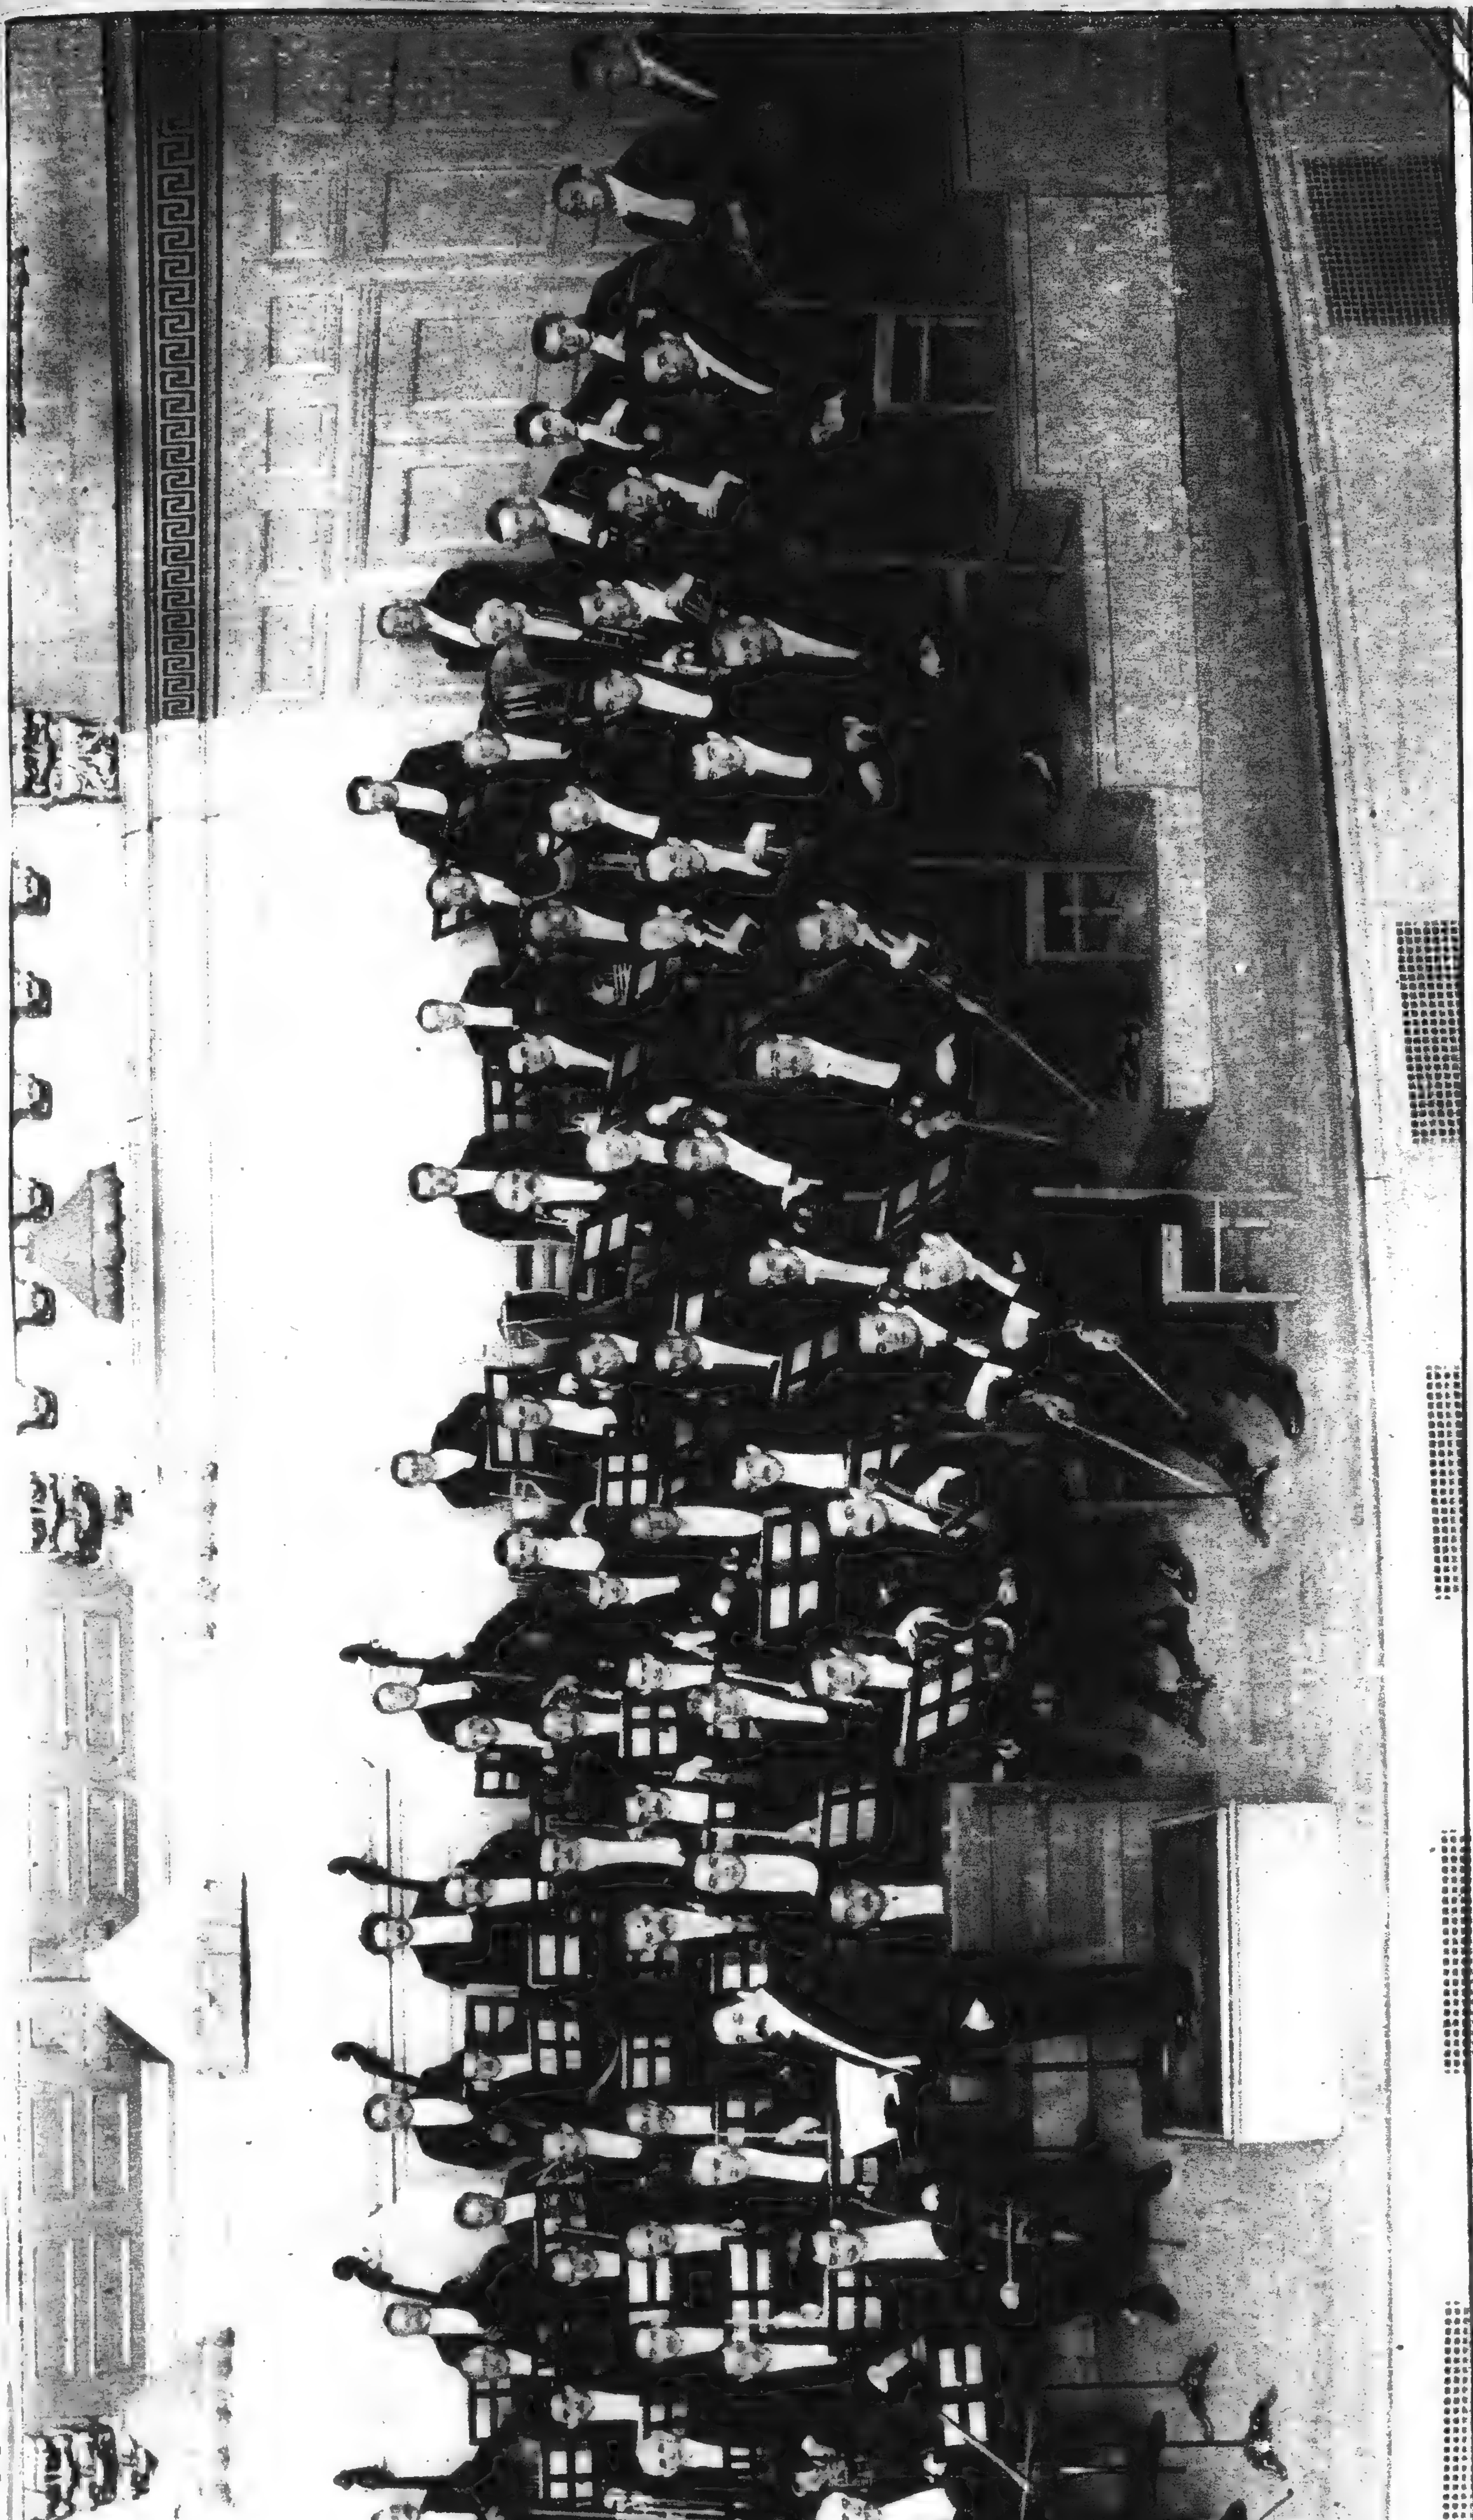
, was faith-
teux's re-

TRIBUNE

Providence

MME. HELEN STANLEY,
Soprano Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra at First Concert of the Season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday Evening.



By Waid Studio

The Ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux, Its Leader.
(Waid Studio)

HERALD-DEC 18

TRIBUNE

Providence

By N. B. Pettis.

The past week has been a busy one in local musical circles with the meetings of various musical clubs and several concerts of distinction and the week to come promises even more of interest, a fact which evidences the steady growth of Providence as one of the musical centres of New England.

At the opening of the season of Boston Symphony concerts in Providence, which will take place in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 15, at 8:15, Pierre Monteux will conduct a program of unusual interest and brilliance. The symphony will be the Third of Beethoven, "the Eroica," which was given at the opening of the Boston Symphony season at Carnegie Hall, New York, a week ago last Thursday, and which on that occasion, by the beauty of its performance and interpretation, met with highly enthusiastic response. The circumstances of its composition is well known—how the great composer inscribed this work to Napoleon, believing him the liberator of mankind, and later, finding that the European general was abusing his power, destroyed the dedication in anger. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Berlioz's most popular work, his overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the noted tone poem, "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, the great composer, who is now making a short visit to this country.

The soloist on this occasion will be Madame Helen Stanley, dramatic soprano, who several seasons ago was acclaimed as the prima donna and principal star of the Chicago Opera Company. Since that time she has devoted her career entirely to the concert stage, and her appearances with orchestra and in recitals of her own in the larger cities of this country have revealed to even finer advantage the beauties of her voice and artistry. She will sing with the great orchestra on this occasion an aria from the opera "Conchita" by the living Italian composer, Zandonai, and the Aria of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

FROM

TRIBUNE

Providence

OPENING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON TO-NIGHT.

The Boston Symphony concert, which will begin the season's series of five concerts in Providence, will take place in Infantry Hall to-night at 8:15. This will be the 169th concert by this famous New England orchestra in Providence.

Much is expected of the orchestra this year, in that the initial concerts in Boston and the opening of the season in New York, which took place a week ago last Thursday, have brought the highest praise upon the quality of the ensemble under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, who is now in his third season as conductor of the orchestra.

The first number will be Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which also started the New York season.

As soloist at this concert, Madame Helen Stanley, the prima donna soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, who is also a notable concert singer, will be heard in arias by Debussy and Zandonai. The remaining orchestral numbers will be Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," and the tone poem, "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, considered the greatest composer living, who is now touring this country.

OURNAL

Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN ITS SEASON HERE TO-NIGHT

Beethoven's "Eroica" to be Monteux's Chief Offering.

The season of Boston Symphony concerts in Providence will open in Infantry Hall to-night at 8:15 o'clock. Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor, will open with Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," which was also the opening number at the orchestra's first New York concert a week ago last Thursday. As soloist, Helen Stanley, formerly prima donna of the Chicago Opera Company, will be heard in arias by Debussy and Zandonai. The remaining orchestra numbers will be Berlioz's overture "The Roman Carnival," and the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss. This will be the 169th concert given in Providence by the orchestra.

The 100 musicians who comprise the personnel of the orchestra are virtually the same as in former seasons. The policy of the orchestra has always been to make the minimum number of changes. It is thought to be by long association and practice that the strings have been trained into the perfection of ensemble and beauty of tone that have been praised highly everywhere.

Indeed the only newcomer is Georges Fourel, who came over from France in September to lead the golden-toned viola section. This virtuoso is considered a valuable addition to the organization.

RNAL
ovidence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Famous Musical Organization Opens Forty-first Season at Infantry Hall.

ENSEMBLE WORK FEATURES

Disturbance to Artistic Balance Caused by Troubles of Last Few Seasons Apparently Overcome Now

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 41st season in this city last evening in Infantry Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted and the assisting soloist was Helen Stanley, soprano.

Fresh, vigorous and inspired by that influence which comes of continued association together under the baton of an able and magnetic leader, the men played with the spirit and splendidly balanced ensemble which has characterized their performances here in former seasons. The organization of about 100 players is virtually the same in personnel as last year. Mr. G. Fourel, leader of the violin section, is the only newcomer.

M. Morteux provided the following programme:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," op. 55.......................... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
Overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9...... Berlioz
Aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Pordigue"..Debussy
Aria, "Conchita".......................... Zandonai
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), op. 20........................ Strauss

To those who have been regular attendants at Boston Symphony concerts for the past 10 years or more, the orchestra's present state of artistic excellence is undoubtedly a source of great satisfaction. The troubles and trials which beset the orchestra a few years ago, and at one time seriously threatened its very existence, caused a reorganization in personnel. This disturbance in artistic make-up might naturally be expected to lead to less finished performances. If, for a brief period, such an effect was actually produced, there is no inkling of it in the orchestra's playing to-day. On the contrary, the new blood injected into the orchestral veins brought renewed health and vigor to the organization. M. Monteaux's splendid ability is shown in the results he has accomplished since he assumed the orchestra's leadership.

In the upbuilding of a magnificent spirit of co-operation among the men his success has been complete. His broad musicianship and great ability as interpreter are now, under the more favorable conditions, brought about by finely trained, loyal players, seen in clearer light than ever before. The Beethoven symphony No. 3, "Eroica," is commonly supposed to be based in form and content on the composer's admiration for Napoleon Bonaparte. Whatever the source of Beethoven's inspiration, the symphony remains a monument to his genius. Its pages are filled with tremendous orchestral effects and M. Monteux made its performance one of brilliance and granduer. The opening allegro was played with breadth and power. The funeral march is long and is the only movement of the symphony which can be said to show traces of dullness. Here, passages of great beauty and solemnity alternate with those of lesser interest.

The Echerzo, gay and sprightly, was played with fine unanimity in the strings. The finale is one of Beethoven's characteristic brilliant, sustained efforts. Thematic material is used in ingenious fashion with the color and richness of Beethoven at his best. This movement M. Monteaux brought to a vigorous and impressive close.

The Berling "Roman Carnival," originally intended as an overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini," is a collection of descriptive musical episodes relating to the action in the opera. It is bright and sparkling music for the most part and filled with many catchy effects of rhythm.

Helen Stanley, soprano soloist, sang her Debussy aria with dramatic feeling. Her voice shows point and power, and she made an excellent impression with her audience. After the Zandonai aria, "Conchita," which was sung with abandon, Miss Stanley was recalled several times.

Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," is based on Nicholas Lenan's poem of that name. The hero is represented as a man eternally pursuing women. Failing to discover his ideal, he finally becomes a prey of despair. Strauss has built in this tone poem the massive musical effects which are chacteristic of his orchestral works. A master of the technique of polyphonic writing, he revels in kaleidescopic changes of harmony. Volume and brilliance hold sway in the progress of this work. It was played in inspiring style by M. Monteux and his men and brought an interesting concert to a close.

A. F. P.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

SCHOENBERG'S figures in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Thursday night in Carnegie, when his "Verklaerte Nacht" for strings will be heard, with Sibelius's Second Symphony, Weber and Beethoven. At the Saturday afternoon concert the Cesar Franck Symphony, Brahms, Ravel and three folk legends by Liadoff.

From
AMERICAN
New York City

V 27 1921

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY will play the following programme in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening: Symphony No. 2, by Sibelius; "Invitation to the Dance," by Weber-Weingartner; "Transcendent Night," by Schoenberg; overture, "Leonore No. 3," by Beethoven. At the Saturday afternoon concert the orchestra will present Symphony, by Franck; tragic overture, by Brahms; suite, by Liadcw, and suite from "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel.

* * *

World
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, will play Cesar Franck's Symphony, Brahms's Tragic Overture, three pieces by Liadoff based on Russian folk legends, 'Raba-Yaga, the Enchanted Lake and Kikimora," and then Ravel's Second Suite from his ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," including Daybreak, Pantomime and the General Dance.

World
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, will play Sibelius's Second Symphony in D major, Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's Rondo "Invitation to the Dance," Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of his "Verklaerte Nacht" for string orchestra, and Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture.

From
TIMES
New York City

Played by American Orc

Frederick Stock announced for performance by the Chicago Orchestra last week R. Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," that was heard in New York for the first time last Spring under Albert Coates.

The "Poem of Youth," Op. 47, for orchestra, by David Stanley Smith, Professor of Music at Yale, was given its first performance last week in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony Orchestra also played for the first time in Boston Hué's symphonic poem, "Emotions."

The Philadelphia Orchestra recently gave the first performance in America of a "Polish Rhapsody," by Gregor Fitelberg, ranked as one of the young Polish composers, though he is 42 years old. Louis Bailly played for the first time in Philadelphia Bloch's suite for viola and orchestra.

The Minneapolis Orchestra recently presented Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for piano and orchestra, with the composer at the piano.

TIMES
New York City

Pierre Monteux has announced for the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, the second symphony of Sibelius, Weingartner's orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," Schoenberg's sextet for strings. "Verklaerte Nacht" and Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3.

---

m HERALD
dress New York City
te..............................

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programmes for its second pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall are: Thursday evening, Sibelius, Symphony No. 2; Weber, Invitation to the Dance," Weingartner's arrangement; Schoenberg, "Verklaerte Nacht," string orchestra; Beethoven, "Leonore" Overture No. 3. Saturday afternoon, Franck, Symphony, D minor; Brahms, "Tragis" overture; Liadov, "Baba-Yaga," "The Enchanted Lake," "Kikimora"; Ravel, Suite No. 2, from "Daphnis and Chloe."

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 27 1921 A

Ignatz Freedman, eminent pianist, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, next Friday evening. He will be heard in Liszt's concerto in E flat, which he will play with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. Other orchestral numbers will be the tragic overture of Brahm's and Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

TIMES
New York City
1921

The Boston Symphony's matinee in Carnegie Hall on Saturday will present the symphony of Cesar Franck, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liadoff's "Baba Jaga," "Enchanted Lake," and "Kikimora," and a suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," including "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance."

REGISTER OV 27 1921
New Haven

FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WEDNESDAY

Next Wednesday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15, in Woolsey hall, the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in New Haven for the first time under its present leader, Pierre Monteux.

This concert would be a memorable occasion if only because of Beethoven's great Third Symphony, "Eroica," the performance of which is generally considered to be the most eloquent achievement of the orchestra this season.

Fired by the liberating ideals of the French revolution, Beethoven foresaw its hero in Napoleon Bonaparte and inscribed the name of the general at the head of his score. When the news reached Vienna in 1804 that his hero had proclaimed himself emperor, the master seized the title page with the inscription and destroyed it, exclaiming to his friend Ries, "After all, then, he is nothing but an ordinary mortal! He will trample all the rights of men under foot to indulge his ambition, and become a greater tyrant than anyone." When he heard of Napoleon's death at St. Helena, he said, "I have already composed the proper music for that catastrophe," probably referring to its beautiful funeral march, and the final title stands "To the memory of a great man." This masterpiece surprised the world as one of the most startlingly bold innovations in the history of music, and to the splendid way in which Beethoven broke all former laws of composition its present greatness is still attributable.

The remaining numbers will be the new work of David Stanley Smith, "A Poem of Youth," which had its first public performance recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston; Debussy's Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," of which Pierre Monteux is the inspired and authoritative interpreter, par excellence, having been a close friend of the composer, and finally, Richary Strauss' tone poem, "Don Joan."

FROM REGISTER
New Haven

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT WOOLSEY FEATURE TONIGHT

The interest is doubly keen in the pending concert which will be given tonight in Woolsey hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in that this will be the first visit of this illustrious organization of New England to this city in nine years, and in that it will be its first visit under its present eminent conductor, Pierre Monteux. Pierre Monteux is not a stranger to Nw Haven, however, for he appeared here formerly at the head of Diaghieleff's Ballet Russe. The concert will take place at 8:15 o'clock sharp.

At the head of the program stands Beethovens noble eloquent and impressive 'Eroica' Symphony, No. 3, which contains probably the most impressive funeral march ever written, and some passages of martial energy scarcly excelled before or since. This symphony has figured notably on former programs of the illustrious orchestra in New York, Boston and elsewhere this season.

The music of our own day, and of our own country, will be represented by the performance of a new piece by David Stanley Smith, Yale university. "A Poem of Youth," which was so much liked when performed at a recent concert in Boston by this orchestra that the composer, being present, was compelled to bow his acknowledgements.

The remaining numbers will consist of two foremost works of the modern French and German schools respectively—Webussy's Two Nocturnes and the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss.

Debussy's Two Nocturnes are interpreted by Pierre Monteux with special authority and insight since the conductor and the late eminen composer of France collaborated i the former performance in Paris. Probably no tone poem of Richar Strauss, the celebrated composer, now in America, has more amazing brilliance and enduring popularity tha his "Don Juan," which will close th concert. The concert is scheduled a 15 o'clock.

REGISTER
DEC. 1.
New Haven

BOSTON SYMPHONY UP TO STANDARD OF FORMER YEARS

It has been nearly a decade since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played in New Haven and last evening the seating capacity of Woolsey hall was well taxed, the enthusiastic audience showing its evident approval of the event.

Ten years ago it might be said that the Boston Symphony set the standard by which other orchestras were measured.

During this time many changes have been made in its membership, not only among its conductors but the players as well. However many an old faithful was singled out:—Longy oboe Hampe-trombone; Wendler horn; Kunze, bass; Stefan-Newman, tympani, and the new concert master, Richard Burgin. Notwithstanding all these removals and importations, this famous old organization ranks among the finest in the land.

The program surely was one of diversity. Beethoven's heroic, third symphony gave Pierre Montreux great opportunity to demonstrate his marvelous control of his band of 100 players.

Interest naturally centered in David Stanley Smith's recent work, "A Poem of Youth." This creation just teems with originality, especially in the matter of combining certain instruments. There are solos for violin (played by Concert Master Burgin) effective parts for muted-strings and harps and strong leads for clarinets and bassoons.

The "Poem," written in the freest of form, glistens with dramatic climaxes and unique and unusual orchestral effects. The finale certainly is an original conception. After its finish, the composer rose to acknowledge the applause.

Delightful numbers were the Nocturnes by Debussy given with admirable coloring and charm. It was obvious these gave real pleasure to the audience and were the gems of the evening.

"Don Juan," one of the earler works of Richard Strauss concluded the excellent program. The composer himself being in this country now includes the gorgeous work frequently.

It is recognized as one of the great modern master pieces. Certainly M. Monteux gave t not only a broad but brilliant reading.

E. A. L.

From
JOURNAL,
Syracuse, N. Y.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits Syracuse to give a concert in the State Armory on Dec. 17, it will be heard in a program notable for its beauty and of the highest interest. Cesar Franck's great masterpiece, his symphony in D minor for the 100 players, will be the opening number. This work, which is generally regarded on account of its noble eloquence, as the foremost achievement of the modern French school of music, is said to be one of the finest interpretations of Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra. The most modern work to be heard at this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," a splendid example of the Russian school of music, which is unexcelled anywhere in its gorgeous colorings and pictorial magnificence. The movements of this work are "Two Alboradas," "variations," "scene and gypsy song" and "fandango of the Asturias."

Beethoven will be represented by his ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," from which the overture an fifth ballet, adagio, will be played. Th latter number features the followin virtuoso of the orchestra in so parts, Jean Bedetti, 'cello; G. Lauren flute; Albert Sand, clarinet; Abd Laus, bassoon; Alfred Holy, ha The brilliant closing number wil Wagner's Overture to "Tannhäuse

---

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Music in Manhattan

Mr. Monteux's Boston Symphon Orchestra programme, heard at Carnegie Hall, Manhatan, last night, included the D major (No. 2) symphony of Sibelius, Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation the Dance," Schonberg's "Transcendent Night" and Beethoven's "Lenore" (No. 3, op. 72) overture.

A Noteworthy Musical Event

Any notable musical event like the appearance of America's greatest orchestra in Burlington has three sides, the artistic, the patriotic and the human interest. At such a time we are moved by our love of music, by our love of habitat and by our love of personality. When Paderewski came to this city, we were almost as anxious to see the man with our own eyes as we were to enjoy the marvelous melody of the phenomenal Polish pianist, and we were naturally and confessedly proud that our region could command the presence of such a world-wide celebrity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are to appear at the University gymnasium on Tuesday, December 13 at 8:15 sharp plus, are not only a wonderful musical organization with their 101 instruments, but they also include some striking personalities. The conductor is the famous French leader, Pierre Monteux, and he has been able during the three years of his conducting the orchestra to give it a place in American musical organizations without a peer. So too, Burgin, the concert master is a famous musician, having been a fellow pupil of Heifitz, and having won an enviable place for himself in the esteem of the American music-loving public. Both individually and ensemble the orchestra are as distinctive as they are distinguished.

It appeals to the local pride of Burlington and Vermont to have America's leading symphony orchestra feel the organization will be appreciated in this region. Attempts to arrange a concert for them here have been in progress for several years. One time, about two years ago, a date was selected for their appearance, but circumstances prevented the materialization of the concert. It is significant that they play two nights in Montreal preceding their appearance in Burlington.

From an artistic point of view it is interesting to note the increasing popular appreciation of orchestral music. Orchestration produces some of the grandest results in music. It is easy for the connoisseur to note the bugle and rattle of musketry and the roar of great guns in a musical reproduction of a battle, but it is not so easy to interpret the deeper symbolism which is just as perfect as the receding rattle of a running horse's hoofs in the simple dying drum beat. Joy and grief and the whole gamut of emotions are faithfully reproduced. People are more and more coming to realize the artistry of this interpretive melody and to enjoy it accordingly. No other conclusion is warranted in view of the way in which people are flocking to symphony orchestra concerts as never before. No one can claim to be musical and miss an opportunity of this kind to feed the aesthetic sense and the love of the beautiful.

BURL. TIMES DE

FROM

"The Peoples Foru

THE MASTER AND MODERN ORCHES

To the Editor of the Forum:

Sir:—Your able musical critic in writ the Boston Symphony Orchestra's inter tion of Beethoven last evening was incli the opinion that it was not always in "with the true spirit of Beethoven." sume he refers not alone to metronom tail and dynamic shading but generally entire spiritual contents. His remark up the ever recurring question, much de and never settled, whether it is permissi rendering the older so-called classic mu give it a more modern expression?

As everyone knows Beethoven wrote very limited orchestra both in size and nique. None of the splendid possibilit the orchestra of today were open to him sibly in his dreams—and yet—if he could heard that very eloquent interpretation "Eroica" last evening is it not fairly pro that he might have exclaimed in deli wonder "A recreation! I never knew was so much in it!"

Shakespeare has been re-created over over again by commentator and actor. not given to the great artist of universa peal to know the full force of that ap This awaits the masters of interpretation. cannot keep the expression of a great within the walls of some set form, it is fo escaping. Like the architects of the old c drals "they builded better than they knew

ALAN McGREGO

New Haven, Dec. 1, 1921.

[37]

RNAL

ovidence, R. I.

NOV 16 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Famous Musical Organization Opens Forty-first Season at Infantry Hall.

ENSEMBLE WORK FEATURES

Disturbance to Artistic Balance Caused by Troubles of Last Few Seasons Apparently Overcome Now

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 41st season in this city last evening in Infantry Hall. Pierre Monteux conducted and the assisting soloist was Helen Stanley, soprano.

Fresh, vigorous and inspired by that influence which comes of continued association together under the baton of an able and magnetic leader, the men played with the spirit and splendidly balanced ensemble which has characterized their performances here in former seasons. The organization of about 100 players is virtually the same in personnel as last year. Mr. G. Fourel, leader of the violin section, is the only newcomer.

M. Morteux provided the following programme:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," op. 55 .... Beethoven
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Overture, "The Roman Carnival," op. 9 .... Berlioz
Aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Pordigue" .. Debussy
Aria, "Conchita" .... Zandonai
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), op. 20 .... Strauss

To those who have been regular attendants at Boston Symphony concerts for the past 10 years or more, the orchestra's present state of artistic excellence is undoubtedly a source of great satisfaction. The troubles and trials which beset the orchestra a few years ago, and at one time seriously threatened its very existence, caused a reorganization in personnel. This disturbance in artistic make-up might naturally be expected to lead to less finished performances. If, for a brief period, such an effect was actually produced, there is no inkling of it in the orchestra's playing to-day. On the contrary, the new blood injected into the orchestral veins brought renewed health and vigor to the organization. M. Monteaux's splendid ability is shown in the results he has accomplished since he assumed the orchestra's leadership.

In the upbuilding of a magnificent spirit of co-operation among the men his success has been complete. His broad musicianship and great ability as interpreter are now, under the more favorable conditions, brought about by finely trained, loyal players, seen in clearer light than ever before. The Beethoven symphony No. 3, "Eroica," is commonly supposed to be based in form and content on the composer's admiration for Napoleon Bonaparte. Whatever the source of Beethoven's inspiration, the symphony remains a monument to his genius. Its pages are filled with tremendous orchestral effects and M. Monteux made its performance one of brilliance and granduer. The opening allegro was played with breadth and power. The funeral march is long and is the only movement of the symphony which can be said to show traces of dullness. Here, passages of great beauty and solemnity alternate with those of lesser interest.

The Echerzo, gay and sprightly, was played with fine unanimity in the strings. The finale is one of Beethoven's characteristic brilliant, sustained efforts. Thematic material is used in ingenious fashion with the color and richness of Beethoven at his best. This movement M. Monteaux brought to a vigorous and impressive close.

The Berling "Roman Carnival," originally intended as an overture to the oper "Benvenuto Cellini," is a collection c descriptive musical episodes relating to th action in the opera. It is bright a sparkling music for the most part a filled with many catchy effects of rhythi

Helen Stanley, soprano soloist, sang her Debussy aria with dramatic feeling. Her voice shows point and power, and she made an excellent impression with her audience. After the Zandonal aria, "Conchita," which was sung with abandon, Miss Stanley was recalled several times.

Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," is based on Nicholas Lenan's poem of that name. The hero is represented as a man eternally pursuing women. Failing to discover his ideal, he finally becomes a prey of despair. Strauss has built in this tone poem the massive musical effects which are chacteristic of his orchestral works. A master of the technique of polyphonic writing, he revels in kaleidecscopic changes of harmony. Volume and brilliance hold sway in the progress of this work. It was played in inspiring style by M. Monteux and his men and brought an interesting concert to a close.

A. F. P.

EVENING MAIL

New York City

SCHOENBERG'S figures in the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert Thursday night in Carnegie, when his "Verklaerte Nacht" for strings will be heard, with Sibelius's Second Symphony, Weber and Beethoven. At the Saturday afternoon concert the Cesar Franck Symphony, Brahms, Ravel and three folk legends by Liadoff.

From

AMERICAN

New York City

1921

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY will play the following programme in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening: Symphony No. 2, by Sibelius; "Invitation to the Dance," by Weber-Weingartner; "Transcendent Night," by Schoenberg; overture, "Leonore No. 3," by Beethoven. At the Saturday afternoon concert the orchestra will present Symphony, by Franck; tragic overture, by Brahms; suite, by Liadow, and suite from "Daphnis et Chloe," by Ravel.

* * *

World

New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, will play Cesar Franck's Symphony, Brahms's Tragic Overture, three pieces by Liadoff based on Russian folk legends, "Raba-Yaga, the Enchanted Lake and Kikimora," and then Ravel's Second Suite from his ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," including Daybreak, Pantomime and the General Dance.

World

New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, will play Sibelius's Second Symphony in D major, Weingartner's orchestral arrangement of Weber's Rondo "Invitation to the Dance," Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement of his "Verklaerte Nacht" for string orchestra, and Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture.

From

TIMES

New York City

Played by American Orc

Frederick Stock announced for performance by the Chicago Orchestra last week R. Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," that was heard in New York for the first time last Spring under Albert Coates.

The "Poem of Youth," Op. 47, for orchestra, by David Stanley Smith, Professor of Music at Yale, was given its first performance last week in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony Orchestra also played for the first time in Boston Hue's symphonic poem, "Emotions."

The Philadelphia Orchestra recently gave the first performance in America of a "Polish Rhapsody," by Gregor Fitelberg, ranked as one of the young Polish composers, though he is 42 years old. Louis Bailly played for the first time in Philadelphia Bloch's suite for viola and orchestra.

The Minneapolis Orchestra recently presented Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for piano and orchestra, with the composer at the piano.

TIMES

New York City

Pierre Monteux has announced for the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, the second symphony of Sibelius, Weingartner's orchestral version of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," Schoenberg's sextet for strings. "Verklaerte Nacht" and Beethoven's overture "Leonore," No. 3.

---

m HERALD

dress New York City

te..........

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's programmes for its second pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall are: Thursday evening, Sibelius, Symphony No. 2; Weber, Invitation to the Dance," Weingartner's arrangement; Schoenberg, "Verklaerte Nacht," string orchestra; Beethoven, "Leonore" Overture No. 3. Saturday afternoon, Franck, Symphony, D minor; Brahms, "Tragis" overture; Liadov, "Baba-Yaga," "The Enchanted Lake," "Kikimora"; Ravel, Suite No. 2, from "Daphnis and Chloe."

CITIZEN

ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 27 1921

Ignatz Freedman, eminent pianist, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, next Friday evening. He will be heard in Liszt's concerto in E-flat, which he will play with the orchestra. Pierre Monteux will open the programme with Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. Other orchestral numbers will be the tragic overture of Brahm's and Ravel's second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe"

TIMES

New York City

The Boston Symphony's matinee in Carnegie Hall on Saturday will present the symphony of Cesar Franck, Brahms's "Tragic" overture, Liadoff's "Baba Jaga," "Enchanted Lake," and "Kikimora," and a suite from Ravel's ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," including "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance."

REGISTER OV 27 1921

New Haven

FAMOUS BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WEDNESDAY

Next Wednesday evening, Nov. 30, at 8:15, in Woolsey hall, the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra will give a concert in New Haven for the first time under its present leader, Pierre Monteux.

This concert would be a memorable occasion if only because of Beethoven's great Third Symphony, "Eroica," the performance of which is generally considered to be the most eloquent achievement of the orchestra this season.

Fired by the liberating ideals of the French revolution, Beethoven foresaw its hero in Napoleon Bonaparte and inscribed the name of the general at the head of his score. When the news reached Vienna in 1804 that his hero had proclaimed himself emperor, the master seized the title page with the inscription and destroyed it, exclaiming to his friend Ries, "After all, then, he is nothing but an ordinary mortal! He will trample all the rights of men under foot to indulge his ambition, and become a greater tyrant than anyone." When he heard of Napoleon's death at St. Helena, he said, "I have already composed the proper music for that catastrophe," probably referring to its beautiful funeral march, and the final title stands "To the memory of a great man." This masterpiece surprised the world as one of the most startlingly bold innovations in the history of music, and to the splendid way in which Beethoven broke all former laws of composition its present greatness is still attributable.

The remaining numbers will be the new work of David Stanley Smith, "A Poem of Youth," which had its first public performance recently by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston; Debussy's Nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals," of which Pierre Monteux is the inspired and authoritati, interpreter, par excellence, havin been a close friend of the composer and finally, Richary Strauss' tone poem, "Don Joan."

FROM

REGISTER

New Haven

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT WOOLSEY FEATURE TONIGHT

The interest is doubly keen in the pending concert which will be given tonight in Woolsey hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in that this will be the first visit of this illustrious organization of New England to this city in nine years, and in that it will be its first visit under its present eminent conductor, Pierre Monteux. Pierre Monteux is not a stranger to Nw Haven, however, for he appeared here formerly at the head of Diaghieleff's Ballet Russe. The concert will take place at 8:15 o'clock sharp.

At the head of the program stands Beethovens noble eloquent and impressive "Eroica' Symphony, No. 3, which contains probably the most impressive funeral march ever written, and some passages of martial energy scarcly excelled before or since. This symphony has figured notably on former programs of the illustrious orchestra in New York, Boston and elsewhere this season.

The music of our own day, and of our own country, will be represented by the performance of a new piece by David Stanley Smith, Yale university, "A Poem of Youth," which was so much liked when performed at a recent concert in Boston by this orchestra that the composer being present, was compelled to bow his acknowledgements.

The remaining numbers will consist of two foremost works of the modern French and German schools respectively—Webussy's Two Nocturnes and the tone poem, "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss.

Debussy's Two Nocturnes are interpreted by Pierre Monteux with special authority and insight since the conductor [illegible] the late eminen composer of France collaborated i the former performance in Paris Probably no tone poem of Richar Strauss, the celebrated composer, now in America, has more amazing brilliance and enduring popularity tha his "Don Juan," which will close th concert. The concert is scheduled a 8:15 o'clock.

[37]

REGISTER

DEC. 1.

New Haven

BOSTON SYMPHONY UP TO STANDARD OF FORMER YEARS

It has been nearly a decade since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played in New Haven and last evening the seating capacity of Woolsey hall was well taxed, the enthusiastic audience showing its evident approval of the event.

Ten years ago it might be said that the Boston Symphony set the standard by which other orchestras were measured.

During this time many changes have been made in its membership, not only among its conductors but the players as well. However many an old faithful was singled out:—Longy oboe Hampe-trombone; Wendler horn; Kunze, bass; Stefan-Newman, tympani, and the new concert master, Richard Burgin. Notwithstanding all these removals and importations, this famous old organization ranks among the finest in the land.

The program surely was one of diversity. Beethoven's heroic, third symphony gave Pierre Montreux great opportunity to demonstrate his marvelous control of his band of 100 players.

Interest naturally centered in David Stanley Smith's recent work, "A Poem of Youth." This creation just teems with originality, especially in the matter of combining certain instruments. There are solos for violin (played by Concert Master Burgin) effective parts for muted-strings and harps and strong leads for clarinets and bassoons.

The "Poem," written in the freest of form, glistens with dramatic climaxes and unique and unusual orchestral effects. The finale certainly is an original conception. After its finish, the composer rose to acknowledge the applause.

Delightful numbers were the Nocturnes by Debussy given with admirable coloring and charm. It was obvious these gave real pleasure to the audience and were the gems of the evening.

"Don Juan," one of the earler works of Richard Strauss concluded the excellent program. The composer himself being in this country now includes the gorgeous work frequently. It is recognized as one of the great modern master pieces. Certainly M. Monteux gave t not only a broad but brilliant reading.

E. A. L.

From

JOURNAL,

Syracuse, N. Y.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra visits Syracuse to give a concert in the State Armory on Dec. 17, it will be heard in a program notable for its beauty and of the highest interest. Cesar Franck's great masterpiece, his symphony in D minor for the 100 players, will be the opening number. This work, which is generally regarded on account of its noble eloquence, as the foremost achievement of the modern French school of music, is said to be one of the finest interpretations of Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra. The most modern work to be heard at this concert will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," a splendid example of the Russian school of music, which is unexcelled anywhere in its gorgeous colorings and pictorial magnificence. The movements of this work are "Two Alboradas," "variations," "scene and gypsy song" and "fandango of the Asturias."

Beethoven will be represented by his ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," from which the overture an fifth ballet, adagio, will be played. Th latter number features the followin virtuoso of the orchestra in so parts, Jean Bedetti, 'cello; G. Lauren Albert Sand, clarinet; Abd flute; Alfred Holy, ha Laus, bassoon; The brilliant closing number wil Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser

---

Standard Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Music in Manhattan

Mr. Monteux's Boston Symphon Orchestra programme, heard at Carnegie Hall, Manhatan, last night, included the D major (No. 2) symphony of Sibelius, Weingartner's arrangement of Weber's "Invitation the Dance," Schonberg's "Transcendent Night" and Beethoven's "Leonore" (No. 3, op. 72) overture.

A Noteworthy Musical Event

Any notable musical event like the appearance of America's greatest orchestra in Burlington has three sides, the artistic, the patriotic and the human interest. At such a time we are moved by our love of music, by our love of habitat and by our love of personality. When Paderewski came to this city, we were almost as anxious to see the man with our own eyes as we were to enjoy the marvelous melody of the phenomenal Polish pianist, and we were naturally and confessedly proud that our region could command the presence of such a world-wide celebrity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are to appear at the University gymnasium on Tuesday, December 13 at 8:15 sharp plus, are not only a wonderful musical organization with their 101 instruments, but they also include some striking personalities. The conductor is the famous French leader, Pierre Monteux, and he has been able during the three years of his conducting the orchestra to give it a place in American musical organizations without a peer. So too, Burgin, the concert master is a famous musician, having been a fellow pupil of Heifitz, and having won an enviable place for himself in the esteem of the American music-loving public. Both individually and ensemble the orchestra are as distinctive as they are distinguished.

It appeals to the local pride of Burlington and Vermont to have America's leading symphony orchestra feel the organization will be appreciated in this region. Attempts to arrange a concert for them here have been in progress for several years. One time, about two years ago, a date was selected for their appearance, but circumstances prevented the materialization of the concert. It is significant that they play two nights in Montreal preceding their appearance in Burlington.

From an artistic point of view it is interesting to note the increasing popular appreciation of orchestral music. Orchestration produces some of the grandest results in music. It is easy for the connoisseur to note the bugle and rattle of musketry and the roar of great guns in a musical reproduction of a battle, but it is not so easy to interpret the deeper symbolism which is just as perfect as the receding rattle of a running horse's hoofs in the simple dying drum beat. Joy and grief and the whole gamut of emotions are faithfully reproduced. People are more and more coming to realize the artistry of this interpretive melody and to enjoy it accordingly. No other conclusion is warranted in view of the way in which people are flocking to symphony orchestra concerts as never before. No one can claim to be musical and miss an opportunity of this kind to feed the aesthetic sense and the love of the beautiful.

BURL. JAMES PE

FROM

"The Peoples Foru

THE MASTER AND MODERN ORCHES

To the Editor of the Forum:

Sir:—Your able musical critic in writ the Boston Symphony Orchestra's inter tation of Beethoven last evening was incli the opinion that it was not always in "with the true spirit of Beethoven." sume he refers not alone to metronom tail and dynamic shading but generally entire spiritual contents. His remark up the ever recurring question, much de and never settled, whether it is permissi rendering the older so-called classic mu give it a more modern expression?

As everyone knows Beethoven wrote very limited orchestra both in size and nique. None of the splendid possibilit the orchestra of today were open to him sibly in his dreams—and yet—if he could heard that very eloquent interpretation "Eroica" last evening is it not fairly pro that he might have exclaimed in deli wonder "A recreation! I never knew was so much in it!"

Shakespeare has been re-created over over again by commentator and actor. not given to the great artist of universa peal to know the full force of that ap This awaits the masters of interpretation. cannot keep the expression of a great within the walls of some set form, it is fo escaping. Like the architects of the old c drals "they builded better than they knew

ALAN McGREGO

New Haven, Dec. 1, 1921.

[38]

Symphony Conductor to Play Masterpieces

Pierre Montaux

Pierre Montaux, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a concert in Kalurah Temple, Thursday night, December 15, has made a program for this occasion which will be memorable by its beauty and engrossing by its variety.

The opening number will be Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, considered one of the supreme achievements in all music, which, as eloquently performed at the beginning of the present season of New Engand great orchestra in Boston, and at the pening of the New York season in Caregie Hall recently, met with a response of he highest enthusiasm. This music, inpired by the liberating ideals of the rench Revolution, abounds in martial engy and rhythmic outbursts which break l of the rules of composition of its time and, even in our day of intricate scoring, is impressive by its radical boldness.

One of the most magnificent examples of the modern Russian school of music is Himsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, which will be played at this concert, consisting of two Alboradas, Variations, Scene and Gypsy Song, and Fandango of the Austrians. This music is scarcely rivalled in pictorial skill and gorgeous colorings, which are partly created by important solos from the virtuosi of the orchestra.

The remaining numbers will be Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," consisting of two ballets and the second entr'acte, which has many measures of supreme lyric beauty and charm. The brilliant closing number will be Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi".

BINGHAMTON. PRESS. DEC. 1

FROM

Standard Union

Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is liberal to the point of prodigality in the matter of his programmes for the Brooklyn concerts, given under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The season's second of these was given last night at the Academy of Music, before an audience large in numbers and social prominence. The evening's offering included Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Brahm's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet. Mr. Ignaz Friedman was soloist in the Liszt number.

The Russian composer, Strawinsky, in recent interview, has spoken of the wane of Tschaikowsky's music in Bolshevik Russia to-day. But in the United States it is still going strong. New York symphony programmes hold his name perhaps with greater frequency than that of any other composer. This statement may invite correction. At any rate, orchestral conductors hereabouts make bid for distinction on the strength of their Tschaikowsky readings. Mr. Monteux's reading of F minor Symphony last night was more notable for the clarity of intelligence than for the urge of sympathetic feeling. Though a concededly superior master of Russian ballet music, the distinguished French conductor did not put the purple into the music of this symphony score. There were dramatic high lights brought to point, and a beautiful treatment of the stinging shower of pizzicato in the scherzo—and yet, withal, one missed the keynote of a great interpretation. There was much applause, nevertheless, and a "rising" acknowledgment on the part of the players.

The best work of the evening was that of Mr. Monteux in the Ravel orchestral fragments. The conductor, be it recalled, led the premierre representation of the ballet itself in Paris during the summer of 1912. Mr. Monteux is a specialist in this type of music.

Of Mr. Friedman's Liszt concerto playing it gives pleasure to write in admiration—but likewise with certain reservations. Mr. Friedman is justly recognized as a superman among pianists. His technique covers every phase of pianism, and as a virtuoso in this respect he may indeed outrank any other. Last evening he brought to bear all of his resources upon the playing of Liszt's bejewelled music. There was finesse, inner refinement, ~~delicate~~ subtleties. And yet the realization persisted that his enormous knowledge outcircles heart impulse. His is not a warm personality. Big in technical mastery, there is dificiency of imagination in Mr. Friedman's playing, a lack of poetry, a shortage of the real thing in the art of musical expression.

From

EAGLE

Brooklyn, New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ignatz Friedman Soloist at Second Brooklyn Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a fine audience at the Academy last night in spite of the rain. It was not one of Mr. Monteux's best programs, but no program which contains a Tschaikowsky symphony can be uninteresting or unimportant. Mr. Monteux's performance of the brilliant Fourth in the great Russian's list was by far the finest thing of the evening. His treatment of the tricky third movement was sparkling, almost dazzling in the skill with which the orchestra reveled in those delicate and gossamer fancies. The contrasting last movement, reflecting the rough humor and enjoyment of a peasant merry making, was given with superb spirit and gorgeous tone, and both leader and band deserved the fervent recall which followed. But please keep Philip Hale's program notes for this symphony out of Washington. If Mr. Volstead should read that the third movement was the dream of a man "slightly intoxicated," as its composer wrote, he would straightway issue a ukase to suppress the symphony, on the ground that it made intoxication so fascinating as to be a serious menace to the enforcement of his dry law.

The "Tragic Overture" of Brahms made a noble and classically calm contrast to the occasionally riotous orchestration of Tschaikowsky.

The rest of the program was more or less negligible. Ignatz Friedman played the Liszt Concerto in E flat major and gave a fine example of the pianism which Liszt imposed upon the Nineteenth Century. It was excellent Liszt, but why Liszt at all in a modern concert? His concertos have been done to death for a generation until today they sound not merely old-fashioned but commonplace.

The concert closed with fragments from "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel, which Mr. Monteux used to lead for the Ballet Russe. This music alone evokes a yague picture of a sylvan classic grove. It cries aloud for the illumination of the dance and the stage scene; among other reasons so that the listener, with his attention fixed upon the dancer might imagine that he had not heard aright some of the queer sounds which assail the ear only too forcibly when there is nothing to distract one's mind. At the January concert Louise Horner will sing and the house is already sold out.

CITIZEN

ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

The second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season was given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening. Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, began a notable programme with the Fourth Symphon in F Minor, by Tschaikowsky, which is paired with the 'Pathetic' symphony as the finest creative achievement of the Russian master.

A celebrated soloist was heard at this concert—Ignaz Friedman, the pianist, who, first coming to this country last winter, was general considered the most important new pianist of the season in America. One of his most splendid achievements is his interpretation of Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto which he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The remaining purely orchestral numbers were Brahms' Tragic Overture and the suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes the following numbers—Daybreak, pantomime, general dance.

TIMES,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS ENJOYED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season Friday evening at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and consequently there was an elect and attentive audience. The program, conducted by M. Pierre Monteux, included Brahm's Tragic" Overture, Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto, Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet. The soloist in the Liszt number was Ignatz Friedman.

The most appreciated moments were the orchestral fragments from the Ravel number, especially notable in richness of color and tone. The interpretation of the Tschaikowsky symphony revealed M. Monteux as a thorough master of its difficult technique, but the piece's warmth of expression seemed sacrificed in some instances for this quality. The Liszt composition was given an acceptable classic interpretation, and was well received by devotees of that school. Mr. Friedman, like M. Monteux, impressed with super-skill of technique and a voidness of poetic expression.

FROM

TRIBUNE

NEW YORK CITY

Orchestral Music In Two Concerts Is Of Pictorial Sort

Suggestion Made That Cinema Might Have Aided Two Programs That Were Given in Carnegie Hall

By H. E. Krehbiel

The two orchestral concerts given in Carnegie Hall yesterday were largely occupied with pictorial music —not picturesque music, but music, the effect of which might have been intensified had it been accompanied by the scenes which were in the minds of the composers when it was written. Charades and action were suggested by the three pieces by Liadoff in the afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra, and also by the fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and spectacle at least by the finale from "Die Walküre," which was one of the numbers of Mr. Stransky's evening program.

Dramatic action, even if only pantomime, is, of course, excluded from our notions of what a concert should be, but we are not so certain that pictures need be, now that the photo-play is becoming an art-form worthy of serious consideration. A suggestion of this kind was made in a review of a concert by the Boston orchestra when some music by Stravinsky was played a season or two ago, but was not generally accepted as having been offered in earnest. Nevertheless it was, and the wish that it might be tried as an experiment, at least, came back to mind yesterday while we were listening to Liadoff's music.

The music was agreeable to the ear and stimulating to the fancy as it was, but it would have been much more so if the senses had been helped by pictures. The titles "Kikimora" and "Baba-Yaga" were sufficiently illuminative to persons familiar with the folktales of Russia; but the Russian Grimm and Anderson is yet to come, and meanwhile music like that of Liadoff, fascinating and suggestive as it is, must yet remain enigmatic to the vast majority of our concertgoers.

So, in all seriousness, we say that we wish we might have seen the old witch, with her body thin as a straw, her head no bigger than a thimble, listening to that primeval cat which has so many tales to tell, spinning and reeling her yarn and weaving wicked plots as well as her silken dresses. We have heard her before and also Baba-Yaga, who, if we are not mistaken, also flies through the air in a druggist's mortar with a pestle as a propeller and a broom, causing consternation among the stars and planets, in one of Rimsky-Korsakoff's pieces; but we should much like to see the precious pair. Ought not Mr. Eastman to take this to heart?

There was also an enchanted lake in Liadoff's music which must have appeared as a wonderfully charming vision to the mind of the composer. In a manner it found a companion picture in the slow movement of Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," with which Mr. Stransky opened the concert of the Philharmonic Society—though the latter conjured up the mood which we fancy might be evoked by a nocturnal picture of our own Western prairies. There is a suggestion of animated nature in both, but quiet loveliness lies on both with a benediction.

Mr. Monteux gave his audience also Franck's D minor symphony and Brahms's "Tragic" overture, a work instinct with the spirit of Attic story, and Mr. Stransky after the symphony stirred the pulses of his audience with excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Die Walküre," "Die Meistersinger" and "Tannhäuser"—music which refuses to pay the customary toll to familiarity.

FROM

Evening Globe

New York

Other Music.

Pierre Monteux conducted César Franck's symphony as the chief number of the programme performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Also on the list were Brahms's "Tragic" overture, three pieces by Liadoff, and a suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." In Aeolian Hall Saturday afternoon Ignaz Friedman, playing here for the first time this season, again showed himself most astonishing technician

---

From DEC

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

One of the masterpieces of the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, will be played at the second concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday, Dec. 20, in Infantry Hall. Many critics rank this composition above the "Pathetique" symphony in importance. "The splendor of the first movement, with its penetrating theme of fate, which enters again at the close of the symphony, and the lyric beauty of the slow movement are especially noted," says one writer, who characterizes the effectiveness of the scherzo, in which the string orchestra plays pizzicato throughout, never using their bows, as a "landmark in orchestral effect." The finale glorifies a simple Russian folk theme.

The concert will open with the tragic Overture of Brahms, one of the finest works of this master, which, despite its brevity, is ranked as high as any of his four symphonies.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the soloist at this concert, will play with the orchestra, Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A-minor. When the Norwegian composer showed this manuscript score to the master, Liszt, the virtuoso astonished him by playing its highly difficult pages fluently and impressively at sight. Having finished the work, he rose from the piano and grasped Grieg warmly by the hand, expressing his opinion that this was a masterpiece.

Bachaus, German pianist, appeared several years ago as soloist with the Boston Symphony when he came to the United States from his own country. Since then he has toured Europe repeatedly and comes here this season after a series of concerts in South America. His present itinerary of America will include appearances with several orchestras, besides recitals in New York and other cities.

SAINT-SAENS' TRIBUTE BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

In honor of the memory of Camille Saint-Saens, the celebrated French composer who died last Friday, the Adagio from his great "Organ" Symphony in C minor will be added to the program which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program otherwise remains as originally announced, including Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, with a chorus of women's voices; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mt Triglaff," an arrangement in concert form of Act III of the opera-ballet "Mlada," and Massenet's overture to "Phedre."

GLOBE-DEC. 22.

SAINT-SAENS' NUMBER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

In honor of the memory of Camille Saint-Saens, the celebrated French composer, who died last Friday, the Adagio from his great "Organ" Symphony in C minor will be added to the programme, which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme otherwise remains as originally announced, including Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, which Pierre Monteux is reviving in observance of the 600th anniversary of the death of the Italian poet, and in which a chorus of women's voices, trained by the conductor, will join forces with the orchestra. The remaining numbers are RimskyKorsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," an arrangement in concert form of Act III of the opera-ballet "Midda," and Massenet's overture to "Phedre."

POST - DEC. 22

SYMPHONY TO PLAY SAINT-SAENS NUMBER

Adagio from "Organ" Symphony Is Added to the Program

In honor of the memory of Camille Saint-Saens, the celebrated French composer who died last Friday, the Adagio from his great "Organ" Symphony in C minor will be added to the program which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program otherwise remains as originally announced, including Liszt's "Dante" Symphony which Pierre Monteux is reviving in observance of the 600th anniversary of the death of the Italian poet and in which a chorus of women's voices, trained by the conductor, will join forces with the orchestra. The remaining numbers are Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," an arrangement in concert form of act III of the Opera-Ballet "Mlada," and Massenet's Overture to "Phedre."

HERALD-DEC. 22.

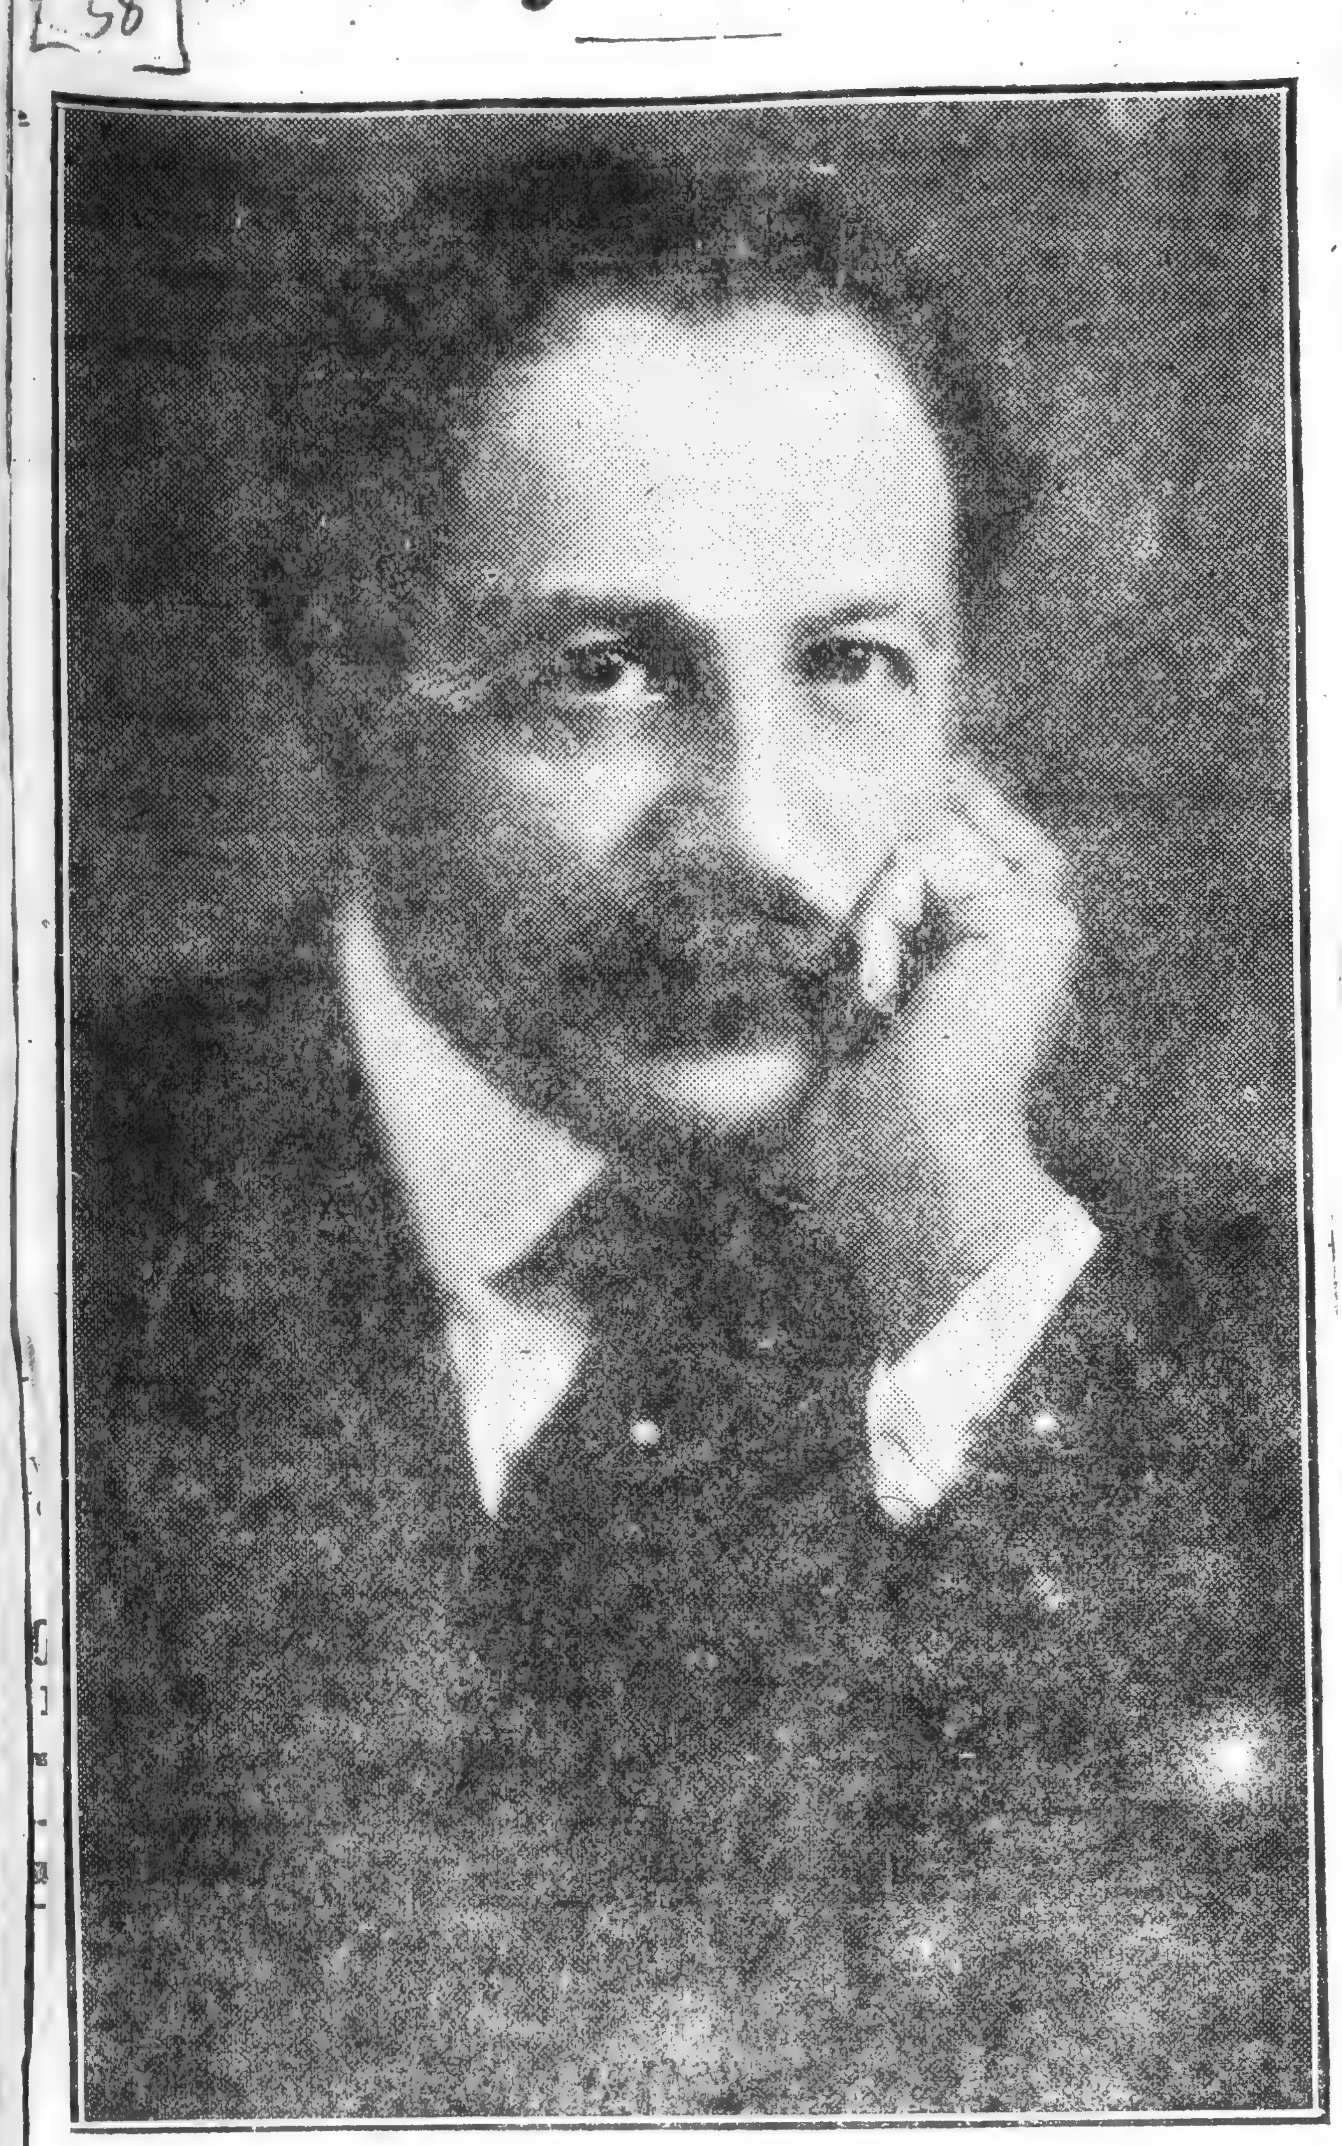
A Novel Piece by Rimsky-Korsakov to Be Heard Tomorrow—His "Symphonic Picture" from an Act of His Opera, "Mlada" —Fifteen Pianists Play Together in New York to Relieve Moszkowski—Programmes in Prospect

WITH the thirteen operas of Rimsky-Korsakov audiences in the United States have but slight acquaintance. The Metropolitan has in its repertory "The Golden Cockerel," which it once brought even to this operatically benighted city, and this season it purposes mounting "The Snow Maiden." For the other eleven there is little present prospect of performance in America, and it is doubtful whether most of the operatic public would know more than one or two of them by name. Here and there fragments of these pieces have made way to the concert halls, and at the Symphony Concerts of this week Mr. Monteux will play an arrangement, made by the composer, of the entire third act of his "Mlada." As the opera itself had a curious history, and as there is in English no more comprehensive treatment than that by Mrs. Newmarch in her book, "The Russian Opera," her account of the composition, content and fate of "Mlada" may be reprinted:

In 1889 Rimsky-Korsakov began a fourth opera, the history of which is connected with the cooperative tendency that distinguished the national school of musicians. The composition of collective works was, I believe, one of Balakirev's early ideals; the Paraphrases, a set of variations on a childish theme, dedicated to Liszt, by Borodin, Cui, Liadov and Rimsky-Korsakov, and the Quartet in honor of Balaiev are examples of this spirit of combination. In 1872 Gedenov, then director of the Opera, proposed that Borodin, Musorgsky, Cui and Rimsky-Korsakov should each undertake one act of a ballet from a plot of his own providing, entitled "Mlada." The music was written, but lack of funds prevented the enterprise from being carried out, and each composer utilized the material left on his hands in his own way. Rimsky-Korsakov incorporated his share with the fantastic scenes of "A Night in May." In 1889, however, he took up the subject once more, and his own "Mlada" was completed by the autumn of the same year. Produced at the Maryinsky Theatre in October, 1892, it failed to win the success it undoubtedly deserved. . . . The subject is taken from the history of the Baltic Slavs in the ninth century; but although in this work he returns to an historical episode, the composer does not go back to the declamatory style of "The Maid of Pskov." Cheshikin considers that "Mlada" is highly effective from the theatrical point of view. Moreover, the old Slavonic character of the music is cleverly maintained throughout, the ordinary minor scale being replaced by the "natural minor" (the Æolian Mode). The scenes representing the ancient pagan customs of the Slavs are highly picturesque and, except on the grounds of expensive setting, it is difficult to understand why this work should have passed out of the repertory of the Russian Opera.

On the flyleaf of the score of this concertized third act, which bears the title "A Night on Mount Triglaff" there appears in Russian, French and German a synopsis of the action which, literally translated, reads as follows:

Symphony Conductor to Play Masterpieces



Pierre Montaux

Pierre Montaux, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give a concert in Kalurah Temple, Thursday night, December 15, has made a program for this occasion which will be memorable by its beauty and engrossing by its variety.

The opening number will be Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, considered one of the supreme achievements in all music, which, as eloquently performed at the beginning of the present season of New Engand great orchestra in Boston, and at the pening of the New York season in Caregie Hall recently, met with a response of he highest enthusiasm. This music, inpired by the liberating ideals of the rench Revolution, abounds in martial engy and rhythmic outbursts which break l of the rules of composition of its time and, even in our day of intricate scoring, is impressive by its radical boldness.

One of the most magnificent examples of the modern Russian school of music is Rimsky-Korsakoff's Caprice on Spanish Themes, which will be played at this concert, consisting of two Alboradas, Variations, Scene and Gypsy Song, and Fandango of the Austrians. This music is scarcely rivalled in pictorial skill and gorgeous colorings, which are partly created by important soles from the virtuosi of the orchestra.

The remaining numbers will be Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," consisting of two ballets and the second entr'acte, which has many measures of supreme lyric beauty and charm. The brilliant closing number will be Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi".

BINGHAMTON. PRESS. DEC. 1

FROM
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is liberal to the point of prodigality in the matter of his programmes for the Brooklyn concerts, given under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences. The season's second of these was given last night at the Academy of Music, before an audience large in numbers and social prominence. The evening's offering included Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, Brahm's "Tragic" overture, Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet. Mr. Ignaz Friedman was soloist in the Liszt number.

The Russian composer, Strawinsky, in recent interview, has spoken of the wane of Tschaikowsky's music in Bolshevik Russia to-day. But in the United States it is still going strong. New York symphony programmes hold his name perhaps with greater frequency than that of any other composer. This statement may invite correction. At any rate, orchestral conductors hereabouts make bid for distinction on the strength of their Tschaikowsky readings. Mr. Monteux's reading of F minor Symphony last night was more notable for the clarity of intelligence than for the urge of sympathetic feeling. Though a concededly superior master of Russian ballet music, the distinguished French conductor did not put the purple into the music of this symphony score. There were dramatic high lights brought to point, and a beautiful treatment of the stinging shower of pizzicato in the scherzo—and yet, withal, one missed the keynote of a great interpretation. There was much applause, nevertheless, and a "rising" acknowledgment on the part of the players.

The best work of the evening was that of Mr. Monteux in the Ravel orchestral fragments. The conductor, be it recalled, led the premierre representation of the ballet itself in Paris during the summer of 1912. Mr. Monteux is a specialist in this type of music.

Of Mr. Friedman's Liszt concerto playing it gives pleasure to write in admiration—but likewise with certain reservations. Mr. Friedman is justly recognized as a superman among pianists. His technique covers every phase of pianism, and as a virtuoso in this respect he may indeed outrank any other. Last evening he brought to bear all of his resources upon the playing of Liszt's bejewelled music. There was finesse, inner refinement, delicate subtleties. And yet the realization persisted that his enormous knowledge outcircles heart impulse. His is not a warm personality. Big in technical mastery, there is dificiency of imagination in Mr. Friedman's playing, a lack of poetry, a shortage of the real thing in the art of musical expression.

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Ignatz Friedman Soloist at Second Brooklyn Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had a fine audience at the Academy last night in spite of the rain. It was not one of Mr. Monteux's best programs, but no program which contains a Tschaikowsky symphony can be uninteresting or unimportant. Mr. Monteux's performance of the brilliant Fourth in the great Russian's list was by far the finest thing of the evening. His treatment of the tricky third movement was sparkling, almost dazzling in the skill with which the orchestra reveled in those delicate and gossamer fancies. The contrasting last movement, reflecting the rough humor and enjoyment of a peasant merry making, was given with superb spirit and gorgeous tone, and both leader and band deserved the fervent recall which followed. But please keep Philip Hale's program notes for this symphony out of Washington. If Mr. Volstead should read that the third movement was the dream of a man "slightly intoxicated," as its composer wrote, he would straightway issue a ukase to suppress the symphony, on the ground that it made intoxication so fascinating as to be a serious menace to the enforcement of his dry law.

The "Tragic Overture" of Brahms made a noble and classically calm contrast to the occasionally riotous orchestration of Tschaikowsky.

The rest of the program was more or less negligible. Ignatz Friedman played the Liszt Concerto in E flat major and gave a fine example of the pianism which Liszt imposed upon the Nineteenth Century. It was excellent Liszt, but why Liszt at all in a modern concert? His concertos have been done to death for a generation until today they sound not merely old-fashioned but commonplace.

The concert closed with fragments from "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel, which Mr. Monteux used to lead for the Ballet Russe. This music alone evokes a vague picture of a sylvan classic grove. It cries aloud for the illumination of the dance and the stage scene; among other reasons so that the listener, with his attention fixed upon the dancer might imagine that he had not heard aright some of the queer sounds which assail the ear only too forcibly when there is nothing to distract one's mind. At the January concert Louise Horner will sing and the house is already sold out.

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

The second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season was given in the Academy of Music, Friday evening. Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, began a notable programme with the Fourth Symphon in F Minor, by Tschaikowsky, which is paired with the 'Pathetic' symphony as the finest creative achievement of the Russian master.

A celebrated soloist was heard at this concert—Ignaz Friedman, the pianist, who, first coming to this country last winter, was general considered the most important new pianist of the season in America. One of his most splendid achievements is his interpretation of Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto which he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The remaining purely orchestral numbers were Brahms' Tragic Overture and the suite from Ravel's ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which includes the following numbers—Daybreak, pantomime, general dance.

TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM IS ENJOYED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the season Friday evening at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and consequently there was an elect and attentive audience. The program, conducted by M. Pierre Monteux, included Brahm's Tragic" Overture, Liszt's E flat pianoforte concerto, Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet. The soloist in the Liszt number was Ignatz Friedman.

The most appreciated moments were the orchestral fragments from the Ravel number, especially notable in richness of color and tone. The interpretation of the Tschaikowsky symphony revealed M. Monteux as a thorough master of its difficult technique, but the piece's warmth of expression seemed sacrificed in some instances for this quality. The Liszt composition was given an acceptable classic interpretation, and was well received by devotees of that school. Mr. Friedman, like M. Monteux, impressed with super-skill of technique and a voidness of poetic expression.

FROM
TRIBUNE
NEW YORK CITY

Orchestral Music In Two Concerts Is Of Pictorial Sort

Suggestion Made That Cinema Might Have Aided Two Programs That Were Given in Carnegie Hall

By H. E. Krehbiel

The two orchestral concerts given in Carnegie Hall yesterday were largely occupied with pictorial music—not picturesque music, but music, the effect of which might have been intensified had it been accompanied by the scenes which were in the minds of the composers when it was written. Charades and action were suggested by the three pieces by Liadoff in the afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra, and also by the fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," and spectacle at least by the finale from "Die Walküre," which was one of the numbers of Mr. Stransky's evening program.

Dramatic action, even if only pantomime, is, of course, excluded from our notions of what a concert should be, but we are not so certain that pictures need be, now that the photo-play is becoming an art-form worthy of serious consideration. A suggestion of this kind was made in a review of a concert by the Boston orchestra when some music by Stravinsky was played a season or two ago, but was not generally accepted as having been offered in earnest. Nevertheless it was, and the wish that it might be tried as an experiment, at least, came back to mind yesterday while we were listening to Liadoff's music.

The music was agreeable to the ear and stimulating to the fancy as it was, but it would have been much more so if the senses had been helped by pictures. The titles "Kikimora" and "Baba-Yaga" were sufficiently illuminative to persons familiar with the folktales of Russia; but the Russian Grimm and Anderson is yet to come, and meanwhile music like that of Liadoff, fascinating and suggestive as it is, must yet remain enigmatic to the vast majority of our concertgoers.

So, in all seriousness, we say that we wish we might have seen the old witch, with her body thin as a straw, her head no bigger than a thimble, listening to that primeval cat which has so many tales to tell, spinning and reeling her yarn and weaving wicked plots as well as her silken dresses. We have heard her before and also Baba-Yaga, who, if we are not mistaken, also flies through the air in a druggist's mortar with a pestle as a propeller and a broom, causing consternation among the stars and planets, in one of Rimsky-Korsakoff's pieces; but we should much like to see the precious pair. Ought not Mr. Eastman to take this to heart?

There was also an enchanted lake in Liadoff's music which must have appeared as a wonderfully charming vision to the mind of the composer. In a manner it found a companion picture in the slow movement of Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," with which Mr. Stransky opened the concert of the Philharmonic Society—though the latter conjured up the mood which we fancy might be evoked by a nocturnal picture of our own Western prairies. There is a suggestion of animated nature in both, but quiet loveliness lies on both with a benediction.

Mr. Monteux gave his audience also Franck's D minor symphony and Brahms's "Tragic" overture, a work instinct with the spirit of Attic story, and Mr. Stransky after the symphony stirred the pulses of his audience with excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Die Walküre," "Die Meistersinger" and "Tannhäuser"—music which refuses to pay the customary toll to familiarity.

FROM
Evening Globe
New York

Other Music.

Pierre Monteux conducted César Franck's symphony as the chief number of the programme performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Also on the list were Brahms's "Tragic" overture, three pieces by Liadoff, and a suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." In Aeolian Hall Saturday afternoon Ignaz Friedman, playing here for the first time this season, again showed himself most astonishing technician

---

From
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

One of the masterpieces of the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, will be played at the second concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday, Dec. 20, in Infantry Hall. Many critics rank this composition above the "Pathetique" symphony in importance. "The splendor of the first movement, with its penetrating theme of fate, which enters again at the close of the symphony, and the lyric beauty of the slow movement are especially noted," says one writer, who characterizes the effectiveness of the scherzo, in which the string orchestra plays pizzicato throughout, never using their bows, as a "landmark in orchestral effect." The finale glorifies a simple Russian folk theme.

The concert will open with the tragic Overture of Brahms, one of the finest works of this master, which, despite its brevity, is ranked as high as any of his four symphonies.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the soloist at this concert, will play with the orchestra, Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A-minor. When the Norwegian composer showed this manuscript score to the master, Liszt, the virtuoso astonished him by playing its highly difficult pages fluently and impressively at sight. Having finished the work, he rose from the piano and grasped Grieg warmly by the hand, expressing his opinion that this was a masterpiece.

Bachaus, German pianist, appeared several years ago as soloist with the Boston Symphony when he came to the United States from his own country. Since then he has toured Europe repeatedly and comes here this season after a series of concerts in South America. His present itinerary of America will include appearances with several orchestras, besides recitals in New York and other cities.

SAINT-SAENS' TRIBUTE BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

In honor of the memory of Camille Saint-Saens, the celebrated French composer who died last Friday, the Adagio from his great "Organ" Symphony in C minor will be added to the program which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program otherwise remains as originally announced, including Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, with a chorus of women's voices; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mt Triglaff," an arrangement in concert form of Act III of the opera-ballet "Mlada," and Massenet's overture to "Phedre."

GLOBE-DEC. 22.

SAINT-SAENS' NUMBER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

In honor of the memory of Camille Saint-Saens, the celebrated French composer, who died last Friday, the Adagio from his great "Organ" Symphony in C minor will be added to the programme, which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The programme otherwise remains as originally announced, including Liszt's "Dante" Symphony, which Pierre Monteux is reviving in observance of the 600th anniversary of the death of the Italian poet, and in which a chorus of women's voices, trained by the conductor, will join forces with the orchestra. The remaining numbers are RimskyKorsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," an arrangement in concert form of Act III of the opera-ballet "Mlda," and Massenet's overture to "Phedre."

DEC. 22

SYMPHONY TO PLAY SAINT-SAENS NUMBER

Adagio from "Organ" Symphony Is Added to the Program

In honor of the memory of Camille Saint-Saens, the celebrated French composer who died last Friday, the Adagio from his great "Organ" Symphony in C minor will be added to the program which is to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

The program otherwise remains as originally announced, including Liszt's "Dante" Symphony which Pierre Monteux is reviving in observance of the 600th anniversary of the death of the Italian poet and in which a chorus of women's voices, trained by the conductor, will join forces with the orchestra. The remaining numbers are Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," an arrangement in concert form of act III of the Opera-Ballet "Mlada," and Massenet's Overture to "Phedre."

HERALD-DEC.22.

A Novel Piece by Rimsky-Korsakov to Be Heard Tomorrow—His "Symphonic Picture" from an Act of His Opera, "Mlada"—Fifteen Pianists Play Together in New York to Relieve Moszkowski—Programmes in Prospect

WITH the thirteen operas of Rimsky-Korsakov audiences in the United States have but slight acquaintance. The Metropolitan has in its repertory "The Golden Cockerel," which it once brought even to this operatically benighted city, and this season it purposes mounting "The Snow Maiden." For the other eleven there is little present prospect of performance in America, and it is doubtful whether most of the operatic public would know more than one or two of them by name. Here and there fragments of these pieces have made way to the concert halls, and at the Symphony Concerts of this week Mr. Monteux will play an arrangement, made by the composer, of the entire third act of his "Mlada." As the opera itself had a curious history, and as there is in English no more comprehensive treatment than that by Mrs. Newmarch in her book, "The Russian Opera," her account of the composition, content and fate of "Mlada" may be reprinted.

In 1889 Rimsky-Korsakov began a fourth opera, the history of which is connected with the coöperative tendency that distinguished the national school of musicians. The composition of collective works was, I believe, one of Balakirev's early ideals; the Paraphrases, a set of variations on a childish theme, dedicated to Liszt, by Borodin, Cui, Liadov and Rimsky-Korsakov, and the Quartet in honor of Balaiev are examples of this spirit of combination. In 1872 Gedenov, then director of the Opera, proposed that Borodin, Musorgsky, Cui and Rimsky-Korsakov should each undertake one act of a ballet from a plot of his own providing, entitled "Mlada." The music was written, but lack of funds prevented the enterprise from being carried out, and each composer utilized the material left on his hands in his own way. Rimsky-Korsakov incorporated his share with the fantastic scenes of "A Night in May." In 1889, however, he took up the subject once more, and his own "Mlada" was completed by the autumn of the same year. Produced at the Maryinsky Theatre in October, 1892, it failed to win the success it undoubtedly deserved. The subject is taken from the history of the Baltic Slavs in the ninth century; but although in this work he returns to an historical episode, the composer does not go back to the declamatory style of "The Maid of Pskov." Cheshikin considers that "Mlada" is highly effective from the theatrical point of view. Moreover, the old Slavonic character of the music is cleverly maintained throughout, the ordinary minor scale being replaced by the "natural minor" (the Æolian Mode). The scenes representing the ancient pagan customs of the Slavs are highly picturesque and, except on the grounds of expensive setting, it is difficult to understand why this work should have passed out of the repertory of the Russian Opera.

On the flyleaf of the score of this concertized third act, which bears the title "A Night on Mount Triglav," there appears in Russian, French and German a synopsis of the action which, literally translated, reads as follows:

THE HARVARD CRIMSON SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1921.

—Waid Photo.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Which has given concerts in Sanders Theatre for forty years. Among the soloists who will appear with the orchestra during the remainder of the present series are Mr. Paul Kochanski, Miss Myra Hess, Miss Nina Koshetz, Mr. Richard Burgin, and Mr. Alexander Siloti. Mr. Pierre Monteux is again serv-as conductor.

---

translated, reads as

The scene lies obscured by heavy clouds. Darkness. Little by little the clouds break away and at last completely disappear. Shooting stars. A clear and moonless night. A gorge in the mountain of Triglav. Dim floating shadows, the souls of the dead, gather and begin a fantastic dance (the Kolo). The full moon rises, lighting up the gorge; by its rays may be seen the shade of the princess Mlada, motioning to Jaromir to follow her. Lightly she glides above the rocks and precipices. Jaromir follows her. The spectres cease their dance. Jaromir, in a transport of passion, tries to draw close to Mlada. The ghost of Mlada vanishes. Jaromir pursues her. The moon grows red. Subterranean thunder. Overcome by terror the shadows flee. All sorts of nocturnal birds fly across the scene. From all the caverns and crevasses emerge evil genii, demons, spectres and sorcerers; serpents and toads crawl forth. The play and the dancing of the spirits of darkness. From the midst of this unholy dance Chernobog, in the shape of a he-goat, rises with his train. He evokes the shades of Jaromir and Cleopatra, the Egyptian Queen. Impenetrable darkness. On a rich couch of purple lies the queen Cleopatra, surrounded by dancers and slaves. Dance of the slaves, the dancing girls and Cleopatra. Passionately she tries to draw Jaromir to her; he resists; the shade of Mlada hides her face in her hands and weeps. The crowing of the cock. Suddenly all fades away. Deep night, broken by subterranean thunder. Calm. The clouds gradually disperse. The first light of dawn. The wooded slope of Triglav. Jaromir rests quietly. Nature awakes. The leaves murmur and the birds twitter. A ray of the rising sun falls on Jaromir. Broad day.

The symphonic pieces of Rimsky-Korsakov, as, for example, "Scheherazade," "The Spanish Caprice," and "Sadko," exhibit a signal modesty in orchestral requirements. Many hued as is his palette in these notable compositions, except for a lavish employment of percussive instruments, his orchestra, as such things go in these days, is small. But in this "symphonic picture" from "Mlada" he throws aside his accustomed reticence. His score calls for four flutes (two interchangeable with piccolos and one with an alto-flute); three clarinets (one alternating with a small clarinet in E-flat); three bassoons; six horns; three trumpets; three trombones and tuba; four kettle-drums; xlyophone; triangle; tambourine; Basque drum; bass drum; cymbals; tam-tam; three harps; an organ (ad libitum) and the customary strings. Moreover, in the apparition of Cleopatra the original score calls for a stage-band that shall contain such rare and curious instruments as two Flutes of Pan and eight lyres, besides a tiny kettle-drum tuned to the D-flat above middle C. Piccolos and harps, respectively, may replace the Flutes of Pan and the lyres, as no doubt they will in the performance tomorrow, while the considerable parts for chorus will then be omitted.

Beginning vaguely, mysteriously, with arpeggios for muted strings, a gradual brightening of the tonal color leads to a "Ronde Fantastique." As the moon appears over the summit of the mountain, the full orchestra glows resplendently with Wagnerian sonorities. In the ensuing episode between Mlada and Jaromir the music turns amorous, but the appearance of Chernobog and his minions brings the "Ronde Infernale" that would seem to out-Berlioz Berlioz. As this diabolical din subsides the opening mood returns, to be broken by more deviltry. The succeeding apparition of Cleopatra is first accompanied by gently swaying chords in strings and harps, over which wind instruments intone languorous, highly embellished melodies of Oriental cast. Then follows the graceful, intoxicatingly rhythmic dance of the slaves. Again come the opening arpeggios, that lead in turn to a Siegfried-like depiction of forest sounds. Finally a mighty crescendo brings a glowing A major chord that would suggest the first blaze of the morning sun.

W. S. S.

TRANS. DEC. 22

A miscellany of no less than seven pieces fills Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—a Symphony in D Major by Mozart, first revived here in Dr. Muck's day; the overture of Rossini to his opera, "L'Italiana in Alghieri," heard a few years in resurrection at the Metropolitan; a Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra by Mr. Chadwick, recent work played "for the first times at these concerts"; and three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," ballet by the rising de Falla, played seemingly for the first times in America. As assisting singer Mme. Homer will be heard in a cantata of Bach for solo voice, and an air from Mozart's opera, "Titus." De Falla's dances promise lively interest, and Rossini—in an overture—is indeed newcomer to the Symphony Concerts. Yet much can be made, as Mr. Toscanini proved, of this Italian operatic music of a century ago.

As memorial piece to Camille Saint-Saëns, the composer, who died on Friday last, the slow movement from his Symphony in C minor for Orchestra and Organ has been added to the programme for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

TRANS DEC. 22

TRIBUTE TO COMPOSER

By FRED J. McISAAC.

In memory of Saint-Saens, the great French composer, who died a few days ago at a great age, the Adagio from his third symphony was performed yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert. Saint-Saens, author of "Samson and Delilah" and many operatic and symphonic works of the greatest merit, never wrote a more noble and dignified piece of music than this, and it was a worthy memorial.

The concert began with Massenet's "Phedre" Overture, a little known composition which dates from 1874 when Jules Massenet was comparatively a young man. It is a powerful and inspiring work, rich in melody and full of big orchestral ideas. Monteux conducted it with majestic effect.

Rimsky Korsakoff wrote a ballet-opera called "Mlada," which has never been done in America. The third act, in concert form, a scene on an enchanted mountain top, was played yesterday for the first time at the Boston concerts.

To properly appreciate the music it would be necessary to see the action, the ghosts, the demons, the wild dances, the furious conflicts of mortal and fiends. One can perform a Wagner music drama in concert with little loss, so slow moving and so lacking in color are the scenes on a Wagner stage. But Rimsky-Korsakoff was writing for a marvelous ballet, the Diaghileff ballet as we know it, perhaps. Without the action the piece is just a gigantic, writhing, glistening, whirling mass of color and foam, with little form and no meaning.

You can admire the mighty genius of the man; even Richard Strauss cannot surpass him in getting weird and unusual effects from familiar instruments. The work required the use of many additional orchestral instruments, and all were needed. At the end in which songs of birds were imitated in many fantastic manners, the audience was apparently little moved. Yet it was the finest piece of conducting I have ever heard from Monteux. The big List Symphony, "Divine Comedy," with its chorus of female voices, awakened real enthusiasm and was superbly performed.

A[illegible]R-DEC-2[illegible]

RUSSIAN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Gorgeous "Night" Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

In remembrance of Camille Saint-Saens, who died in Algiers, the city he always loved, on the 16th of this month, the programme of the concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall contained the Adagio from his Third Symphony, with organ. The applause that followed this performance was out of place, but every one was impressed by the dignity, the clarity, the noble repose of the music. Nor is it out of place to remark that Mr. Monteux was largely responsible for this effect of a work which has been frequently heard here.

AIDED BY CHORUS

The remainder of the programme consisted of Massenet's overture to "Phedre"; of act three of the opera ballet called, "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Night on Mount Triglav," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, heard here for the first time, and, in celebration of the Dante tercentenary, Liszt's "Dante" symphony, with chorus of women's voices for the final intoning of the "Magnificat."

With the best will in the world, we find it hard to enthuse over this celebrated symphony of Liszt. Certainly it does not compare in originality with the "Faust" symphony. Certainly, in spite of thoughtful and excellent intentions, Liszt the virtuoso, Liszt the inventor of octave passages for the piano, the Liszt who, in default of any other ideas, works and over-works sequences of what the harmonists call "diminished sevenths" is frequently in evidence.

Voices Fail to Relieve Dulness

There is a moment in the first movement, "Inferno," the moment that follows the episode supposed to describe the love of Francesca da Rimini, when the orchestra does jibe, mock, and snarl like the hosts of hell, and there is in the music of Francesca da Rimini a certain Italian grace of line which is a relief and a refreshment from the sound and fury, signifying nothing, of much of this music. The "Purgatorio" is, perhaps, Dantesque. The finale, for us, is dull.

The chorus does not relieve the dulness, though the voices of a chorus specially selected and trained for this performance by Mr. Townsend performed excellently, and the vocal quality was a grateful contrast in its color to the sounds of the instruments. But Dante's poem has too much of the abstract for a composer to successfully make warm, living music of it.

Glory of the Concert

The glory of the concert was the gorgeously colored music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, as arranged by him, from the stage spectacle, for concert use. Certain astonishing things happen in this piece which explain many things about the daring young Russian, Igor Strawinsky. Mr. Strawinsky's ballet, "The Bird of Fire," has made a prodiguous impression on the modern musical world. The fact that Strawinsky, in "The Bird of Fire," and Rimsky-Korsakoff, in the "Night of Mount Triglav" use the same theme, to describe the appearance of the Immortal Katschei, spirit of evil, may very possibly be explained by the supposition that a popular theme in Russian folk-music, associated with Katschei in Russian legend, is employed by both composers. But examine a little farther into the two compositions and it will be seen that they have a marked similarity of orchestral style. The instrumentation of the Katschei theme, as well as the theme itself, is closely related. All of which points to the conclusion that one should not too hastily praise the young Russians today, until one is thoroughly familiar, as no musical audiences in America are familiar, with all of the works of the older men. We are still unfamiliar with much of Rimsky-Korsakoff and his contemporaries. They were the fathers of modern Russian music, and while there are thin places in the score of "Mount Triglav," as a whole it is a marvelous achievement of imagination and color—especially the strange scene in which Cleopatra in the ballet appears to the dreaming Yaromir. Part of this music has been used by Mme. Pavlowa in Boston and in the ballet, "Cleopatra" danced by the Ballet Russe. Great was Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff, and great, too, was Mr. Monteux, his prophet.

POST, DEC. 24

Music gathered off the beaten track marks this week's Symphony program. Conductor Monteux showed experience and ingenuity in selecting works that would pique the interest of tired holiday shoppers.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Massenet's "Phedre" overture, a characteristic composition, well-written and stamped with Parisian feeling for the classic drama, is the opening number. It was so long on the library shelf that it had all the effect of a brand-new novelty. Such a novelty is the brilliant, highly colored music from the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada"—pungent, dynamic music, such as Mr. Monteux interprets with particular verve. This Russian suite was all around the most striking offering of all.

Two memorial works also impressed the matinee audience yesterday. One was the adagio from the third symphony by Saint-Saens, the French composer who died the other day; while the other was Liszt's "Dante" symphony, revived as an observance of the great Italian poet's 600th anniversary. A chorus of women singers trained by Mr. Monteux shared in the honors of the "Dante" performance. The same program will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-DEC. 24

SYMPHONY HONORS GREAT COMPOSER

The only novelty on yesterday's Symphony program was Rimsky Korsakoff's arrangement for concert performance of the third act from the opera-ballet "Mlada," entitled "Night on Mt Triglaff," but Massenet's "Phedre" overture, unheard at these concerts since 1891, and Liszt's not too familiar "Dante" symphony were probably new to many of the subscribers. The slow movement from Saint-Saens' C-minor symphony was played in memory of the composer, who died at Algiers a week ago, aged 86.

Mr Monteux and the orchestra were at their best in the opening chords of Massenet's overture, which demand a crisp sonority produced by absolutely precise attacks from every player. They gave a brilliant performance of the whole piece, which is tawdry, banal romanticism on an imaginative level far below that of Racine's tragedy.

The Saint-Saens adagio was beautifully played, with the mournful grace and dignity befitting the occasion. One wondered, however, whether it was judicious of the audience to applaud a number given "in memoriam."

"Night on Mount Triglaff" requires a huge orchestra with many unusual instruments, contrary to Rimsky Korsakoff's usual custom. It is less clear cut and less concise than his other symphonic pieces, probably because written with a view to the action that accompanied it in the opera house. There is not enough musical coherence between the various scenes to make the piece seem an organic unit when heard in the concert hall, though the witches' sabbath and the evocation of Cleopatra are in themselves strangely impressive. The stage thunder in the orchestra is far more realistic than that in such familiar pieces as Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

Mr Monteux is usually at his best in such pieces as this one, but yesterday was an exception. There were many halting and inept moments in the performance, due probably more to insufficient rehearsal than to any failure on his part to comprehend Rimsky Korsakoff's intentions.

The "Dante" symphony is hardly the successful effort Liszt thought it when he dedicated it to his friend Wagner. The composer of the Second Hungarian Rhapsody was scarcely more fitted to grasp the epic content of the Divine Comedy than was the concoctor of the meditation from "Thais" to feel the tragic force of Phaedra's sufferings. The music would not stand what has been proposed as an acid test for orchestral music, transcription for string quartet. It shows no melodic invention, little power to develop a musical idea, and not a tithe of Rimsky Korsakoff's skill in orchestration. The performance was workmanlike. A chorus of women, trained by Mr Monteux gave capable assistance in the finale.

GLOBE DEC. 4

[39]

THE HARVARD CRIMSON SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1921.

—Waid Photo.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Which has given concerts in Sanders Theatre for forty years. Among the soloists who will appear with the orchestra during the remainder of the present series are Mr. Paul Kochanski, Miss Myra Hess, Miss Nina Koshetz, Mr. Richard Burgin, and Mr. Alexander Siloti. Mr. Pierre Monteux is again serving as conductor.

---

anslated, reads as

The scene lies obscured by heavy clouds. Darkness. Little by little the clouds break away and at last completely disappear. Shooting stars. A clear and moonless night. A gorge in the mountain of Triglav. Dim floating shadows, the souls of the dead, gather and begin a fantastic dance (the Kolo). The full moon rises, lighting up the gorge; by its rays may be seen the shade of the princess Mlada, motioning to Jaromir to follow her. Lightly she glides above the rocks and precipices. Jaromir follows her. The spectres cease their dance. Jaromir, in a transport of passion, tries to draw close to Mlada. The ghost of Mlada vanishes. Jaromir pursues her. The moon grows red. Subterranean thunder. Overcome by terror the shadows flee. All sorts of nocturnal birds fly across the scene. From all the caverns and crevasses emerge evil genii, demons, spectres and sorcerers; serpents and toads crawl forth. The play and the dancing of the spirits of darkness. From the midst of this unholy dance Chernobog, in the shape of a he-goat, rises with his train. He evokes the shades of Jaromir and Cleopatra, the Egyptian Queen. Impenetrable darkness. On a rich couch of purple lies the queen Cleopatra, surrounded by dancers and slaves. Dance of the slaves, the dancing girls and Cleopatra. Passionately she tries to draw Jaromir to her; he resists; the shade of Mlada hides her face in her hands and weeps. The crowing of the cock. Suddenly all fades away. Deep night, broken by subterranean thunder. Calm. The clouds gradually disperse. The first light of dawn. The wooded slope of Triglav. Jaromir rests quietly. Nature awakes. The leaves murmur and the birds twitter. A ray of the rising sun falls on Jaromir. Broad day.

The symphonic pieces of Rimsky-Korsakov, as, for example, "Scheherazade," "The Spanish Caprice," and "Sadko," exhibit a signal modesty in orchestral requirements. Many hued as is his palette in these notable compositions, except for a lavish employment of percussive instruments, his orchestra, as such things go in these days, is small. But in this "symphonic picture" from "Mlada" he throws aside his accustomed reticence. His score calls for four flutes (two interchangeable with piccolos and one with an alto-flute); three clarinets (one alternating with a small clarinet in E-flat); three bassoos; six horns; three trumpets; three trombones and tuba; four kettle-drums; xlyophone; triangle; tambourine; Basque drum; bass drum; cymbals; tam-tam; three harps; an organ (ad libitum) and the customary strings. Moreover, in the apparition of Cleopatra the original score calls for a stage-band that shall contain such rare and curious instruments as two Flutes of Pan and eight lyres, besides a tiny kettle-drum tuned to the D-flat above middle C. Piccolos and harps, respectively, may replace the Flutes of Pan and the lyres, as no doubt they will in the performance tomorrow, while the considerable parts for chorus will then be omitted.

Beginning vaguely, mysteriously, with arpeggios for muted strings, a gradual brightening of the tonal color leads to a "Ronde Fantastique." As the moon appears over the summit of the mountain, the full orchestra glows resplendently with Wagnerian sonorities. In the ensuing episode between Mlada and Jaromir the music turns amorous, but the appearance of Chernobog and his minions brings the "Ronde Infernale" that would seem to out-Berlioz Berlioz. As this diabolical din subsides the opening mood returns, to be broken by more deviltry. The succeeding apparition of Cleopatra is first accompanied by gently swaying chords in strings and harps, over which wind instruments intone languorous, highly embellished melodies of Oriental cast. Then follows the graceful, intoxicatingly rhythmic dance of the slaves. Again come the opening arpeggios, that lead in turn to a Siegfried-like depiction of forest sounds. Finally a mighty crescendo brings a glowing A major chord that would suggest the first blaze of the morning sun.

W. S. S.

TRANS. DEC. 22.

A miscellany of no less than seven pieces fills Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—a Symphony in D Major by Mozart, first revived here in Dr. Muck's day; the overture of Rossini to his opera, "L'Italiana in Alghieri," heard a few years in resurrection at the Metropolitan; a Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra by Mr. Chadwick, recent work played "for the first times at these concerts"; and three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," ballet by the rising de Falla, played seemingly for the first times in America. As assisting singer Mme. Homer will be heard in a cantata of Bach for solo voice, and an air from Mozart's opera, "Titus." De Falla's dances promise lively interest, and Rossini—in an overture— is indeed newcomer to the Symphony Concerts. Yet much can be made, as Mr. Toscanini proved, of this Italian operatic music of a century ago.

As memorial piece to Camille Saint-Saëns, the composer, who died on Friday last, the slow movement from his Symphony in C minor for Orchestra and Organ has been added to the programme for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

TRANS DEC. 22

TRIBUTE TO COMPOSER

By FRED J. McISAAC.

In memory of Saint-Saens, the great French composer, who died a few days ago at a great age, the Adagio from his third symphony was performed yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert. Saint-Saens, author of "Samson and Delilah" and many operatic and symphonic works of the greatest merit, never wrote a more noble and dignified piece of music than this, and it was a worthy memorial.

The concert began with Massenet's "Phedre" Overture, a little known composition which dates from 1874 when Jules Massenet was comparatively a young man. It is a powerful and inspiring work, rich in melody and full of big orchestral ideas. Monteux conducted it with majestic effect.

Rimsky Korsakoff wrote a ballet-opera called "Mlada," which has never been done in America. The third act, in concert form, a scene on an enchanted mountain top, was played yesterday for the first time at the Boston concerts.

To properly appreciate the music it would be necessary to see the action, the ghosts, the demons, the wild dances, the furious conflicts of mortal and fiends. One can perform a Wagner music drama in concert with little loss, so slow moving and so lacking in color are the scenes on a Wagner stage. But Rimsky-Korsakoff was writing for a marvelous ballet, the Diaghileff ballet as we know it, perhaps. Without the action the piece is just a gigantic, writhing, glistening, whirling mass of color and foam, with little form and no meaning.

You can admire the mighty genius of the man; even Richard Strauss cannot surpass him in getting weird and unusual effects from familiar instruments. The work required the use of many additional orchestral instruments, and all were needed. At the end in which songs of birds were imitated in many fantastic manners, the audience was apparently little moved. Yet it was the finest piece of conducting I have ever heard from Monteux. The big List Symphony, "Divine Comedy," with its chorus of female voices, awakened real enthusiasm and was superbly performed.

AMER-DEC. 24

RUSSIAN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Gorgeous "Night" Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

In remembrance of Camille Saint-Saens, who died in Algiers, the city he always loved, on the 16th of this month, the programme of the concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall contained the Adagio from his Third Symphony, with organ. The applause that followed this performance was out of place, but every one was impressed by the dignity, the clarity, the noble repose of the music. Nor is it out of place to remark that Mr. Monteux was largely responsible for this effect of a work which has been frequently heard here.

AIDED BY CHORUS

The remainder of the programme consisted of Massenet's overture to "Phedre"; of act three of the opera ballet called, "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Night on Mount Triglav," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, heard here for the first time, and, in celebration of the Dante tercentenary, Liszt's "Dante" symphony, with chorus of women's voices for the final intoning of the "Magnificat."

With the best will in the world, we find it hard to enthuse over this celebrated symphony of Liszt. Certainly it does not compare in originality with the "Faust" symphony. Certainly, in spite of thoughtful and excellent intentions, Liszt the virtuoso, Liszt the inventor of octave passages for the piano, the Liszt who, in default of any other ideas, works and over-works sequences of what the harmonists call "diminished sevenths" is frequently in evidence.

Voices Fail to Relieve Dulness

There is a moment in the first movement, "Inferno," the moment that follows the episode supposed to describe the love of Francesca da Rimini, when the orchestra does jibe, mock, and snarl like the hosts of hell, and there is in the music of Francesca da Rimini a certain Italian grace of line which is a relief and a refreshment from the sound and fury, signifying nothing, of much of this music. The "Purgatorio" is, perhaps, Dantesque. The finale, for us, is dull.

The chorus does not relieve the dulness, though the voices of a chorus specially selected and trained for this performance by Mr. Townsend performed excellently, and the vocal quality was a grateful contrast in its color to the sounds of the instruments. But Dante's poem has too much of the abstract for a composer to successfully make warm, living music of it.

Glory of the Concert

The glory of the concert was the gorgeously colored music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, as arranged by him, from the stage spectacle, for concert use. Certain astonishing things happen in this piece which explain many things about the daring young Russian, Igor Strawinsky. Mr. Strawinsky's ballet, "The Bird of Fire," has made a prodigious impression on the modern musical world. The fact that Strawinsky, in "The Bird of Fire," and Rimsky-Korsakoff, in the "Night of Mount Triglav" use the same theme to describe the appearance of the Immortal Katschei, spirit of evil, may very possibly be explained by the supposition that a popular theme in Russian folk-music, associated with Katschei in Russian legend, is employed by both composers. But examine a little farther into the two compositions and it will be seen that they have a marked similarity of orchestral style. The instrumentation of the Katschei theme, as well as the theme itself, is closely related. All of which points to the conclusion that one should not too hastily praise the young Russians today, until one is thoroughly familiar, as no musical audiences in America are familiar, with all of the works of the older men. We are still unfamiliar with much of Rimsky-Korsakoff and his contemporaries. They were the fathers of modern Russian music, and while there are thin places in the score of "Mount Triglav," as a whole it is a marvelous achievement of imagination and color—especially the strange scene in which Cleopatra in the ballet appears to the dreaming Yaromir. Part of this music has been used by Mme. Pavlowa in Boston and in the ballet, "Cleopatra" danced by the Ballet Russe. Great was Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff, and great, too, was Mr. Monteux, his prophet.

POST. DEC. 24

Music gathered off the beaten track marks this week's Symphony program. Conductor Monteux showed experience and ingenuity in selecting works that would pique the interest of tired holiday shoppers.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Massenet's "Phedre" overture, a characteristic composition, well-written and stamped with Parisian feeling for the classic drama, is the opening number. It was so long on the library shelf that it had all the effect of a brand-new novelty. Such a novelty is the brilliant, highly colored music from the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada"—pungent, dynamic music, such as Mr. Monteux interprets with particular verve. This Russian suite was all around the most striking offering of all.

Two memorial works also impressed the matinee audience yesterday. One was the adagio from the third symphony by Saint-Saens, the French composer who died the other day; while the other was Liszt's "Dante" symphony, revived as an observance of the great Italian poet's 600th anniversary. A chorus of women singers trained by Mr. Monteux shared in the honors of the "Dante" performance. The same program will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-DEC. 24

SYMPHONY HONORS GREAT COMPOSER

The only novelty on yesterday's Symphony program was Rimsky Korsakoff's arrangement for concert performance of the third act from the opera-ballet "Mlada," entitled "Night on Mt Triglaff," but Massenet's "Phedre" overture, unheard at these concerts since 1891, and Liszt's not too familiar "Dante" symphony were probably new to many of the subscribers. The slow movement from Saint-Saens' C-minor symphony was played in memory of the composer, who died at Algiers a week ago, aged 86.

Mr Monteux and the orchestra were at their best in the opening chords of Massenet's overture, which demand a crisp sonority produced by absolutely precise attacks from every player. They gave a brilliant performance of the whole piece, which is tawdry, banal romanticism on an imaginative level far below that of Racine's tragedy.

The Saint-Saens adagio was beautifully played, with the mournful grace and dignity befitting the occasion. One wondered, however, whether it was judicious of the audience to applaud a number given "in memoriam."

"Night on Mount Triglaff" requires a huge orchestra with many unusual instruments, contrary to Rimsky Korsakoff's usual custom. It is less clear cut and less concise than his other symphonic pieces, probably because written with a view to the action that accompanied it in the opera house. There is not enough musical coherence between the various scenes to make the piece seem an organic unit when heard in the concert hall, though the witches' sabbath and the evocation of Cleopatra are in themselves strangely impressive. The stage thunder in the orchestra is far more realistic than that in such familiar pieces as Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

Mr Monteux is usually at his best in such pieces as this one, but yesterday was an exception. There were many halting and inept moments in the performance, due probably more to insufficient rehearsal than to any failure on his part to comprehend Rimsky Kersakoff's intentions.

The "Dante" symphony is hardly the successful effort Liszt thought it when he dedicated it to his friend Wagner. The composer of the Second Hungarian Rhapsody was scarcely more fitted to grasp the epic content of the Divine Comedy than was the concoctor of the meditation from "Thais" to feel the tragic force of Phaedra's sufferings. The music would not stand what has been proposed as an acid test for orchestral music, transcription for string quartet. It shows no melodic invention, little power to develop a musical idea, and not a tithe of Rimsky Korsakoff's skill in orchestration. The performance was workmanlike. A chorus of women, trained by Mr Monteux gave capable assistance in the finale.

GLOBE DEC

[39]

THE HARVARD CRIMSON SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1921.

—Waid Photo.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Which has given concerts in Sanders Theatre for forty years. Among the soloists who will appear with the orchestra during the remainder of the present series are Mr. Paul Kochanski, Miss Myra Hess, Miss Nina Koshetz, Mr. Richard Burgin, and Mr. Alexander Siloti. Mr. Pierre Monteux is again serv- as conductor.

---

translated, reads as follows:

The scene lies obscured by heavy clouds. Darkness. Little by little the clouds break away and at last completely disappear. Shooting stars. A clear and moonless night. A gorge in the mountain of Triglav. Dim floating shadows, the souls of the dead, gather and begin a fantastic dance (the Kolo). The full moon rises, lighting up the gorge; by its rays may be seen the shade of the princess Mlada, motioning to Jaromir to follow her. Lightly she glides above the rocks and precipices. Jaromir follows her. The spectres cease their dance. Jaromir, in a transport of passion, tries to draw close to Mlada. The ghost of Mlada vanishes. Jaromir pursues her. The moon grows red. Subterranean thunder. Overcome by terror the shadows flee. All sorts of nocturnal birds fly across the scene. From all the caverns and crevasses emerge evil genii, demons, spectres and sorcerers; serpents and toads crawl forth. The play and the dancing of the spirits of darkness. From the midst of this unholy dance Chernobog, in the shape of a he-goat, rises with his train. He evokes the shades of Jaromir and Cleopatra, the Egyptian Queen. Impenetrable darkness. On a rich couch of purple lies the queen Cleopatra, surrounded by dancers and slaves. Dance of the slaves, the dancing girls and Cleopatra. Passionately she tries to draw Jaromir to her; he resists; the shade of Mlada hides her face in her hands and weeps. The crowing of the cock. Suddenly all fades away. Deep night, broken by subterranean thunder. Calm. The clouds gradually disperse. The first light of dawn. The wooded slope of Triglav. Jaromir rests quietly. Nature awakes. The leaves murmur and the birds twitter. A ray of the rising sun falls on Jaromir. Broad day.

The symphonic pieces of Rimsky-Korsakov, as, for example, "Scheherazade," "The Spanish Caprice" and "Sadko," exhibit a signal modesty in orchestral requirements. Many hued as is his palette in these notable compositions, except for a lavish employment of percussive instruments, his orchestra, as such things go in these days, is small. But in this "symphonic picture" from "Mlada" he throws aside his accustomed reticence. His score calls for four flutes (two interchangeable with piccolos and one with an alto-flute); three clarinets (one alternating with a small clarinet in E-flat); three bassoos; six horns; three trumpets; three trombones and tuba; four kettle-drums; xlyophone; triangle; tambourine; Basque drum; bass drum; cymbals; tam-tam; three harps; an organ (ad libitum) and the customary strings. Moreover, in the apparition of Cleopatra the original score calls for a stage-band that shall contain such rare and curious instruments as two Flutes of Pan and eight lyres, besides a tiny kettle-drum tuned to the D-flat above middle C. Piccolos and harps, respectively, may replace the Flutes of Pan and the lyres, as no doubt they will in the performance tomorrow, while the considerable parts for chorus will then be omitted.

Beginning vaguely, mysteriously, with arpeggios for muted strings, a gradual brightening of the tonal color leads to a "Ronde Fantastique." As the moon appears over the summit of the mountain, the full orchestra glows resplendently with Wagnerian sonorities. In the ensuing episode between Mlada and Jaromir the music turns amorous, but the appearance of Chernobog and his minions brings the "Ronde Infernale" that would seem to out-Berlioz Berlioz. As this diabolical din subsides the opening mood returns, to be broken by more deviltry. The succeeding apparition of Cleopatra is first accompanied by gently swaying chords in strings and harps, over which wind instruments intone languorous, highly embellished melodies of Oriental cast. Then follows the graceful, intoxicatingly rhythmic dance of the slaves. Again come the opening arpeggios, that lead in turn to a Siegfried-like depiction of forest sounds. Finally a mighty crescendo brings a glowing A major chord that would suggest the first blaze of the morning sun.

W. S. S.

TRANS.

A miscellany of no less than seven pieces fills Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next week—a Symphony in D Major by Mozart, first revived here in Dr. Muck's day; the overture of Rossini to his opera, "L'Italiana in Alghieri," heard a few years in resurrection at the Metropolitan; a Theme,' Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra by Mr. Chadwick, recent work played "for the first times at these concerts"; and three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," ballet by the rising de Falla, played seemingly for the first times in America. As assisting singer Mme. Homer will be heard in a cantata of Bach for solo voice, and an air from Mozart's opera, "Titus." De Falla's dances promise lively interest, and Rossini—in an overture— is indeed newcomer to the Symphony Concerts. Yet much can be made, as Mr. Toscanini proved, of this Italian operatic music of a century ago.

As memorial piece to Camille Saint-Saëns, the composer, who died on Friday last, the slow movement from his Symphony in C minor for Orchestra and Organ has been added to the programme for the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

TRANS.

TRIBUTE TO COMPOSER

By FRED J. McISAAC.

In memory of Saint-Saens, the great French composer, who died a few days ago at a great age, the Adagio from his third symphony was performed yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert. Saint-Saens, author of "Samson and Delilah" and many operatic and symphonic works of the greatest merit, never wrote a more noble and dignified piece of music than this, and it was a worthy memorial.

The concert began with Massenet's "Phedre" Overture, a little known composition which dates from 1874 when Jules Massenet was comparatively a young man. It is a powerful and inspiring work, rich in melody and full of big orchestral ideas. Monteux conducted it with majestic effect.

Rimsky Korsakoff wrote a ballet-opera called "Mlada," which has never been done in America. The third act, in concert form, a scene on an enchanted mountain top, was played yesterday for the first time at the Boston concerts.

To properly appreciate the music it would be necessary to see the action, the ghosts, the demons, the wild dances, the furious conflicts of mortal and fiends. One can perform a Wagner music drama in concert with little loss, so slow moving and so lacking in color are the scenes on a Wagner stage. But Rimsky-Korsakoff was writing for a marvelous ballet, the Diaghileff ballet as we know it, perhaps. Without the action the piece is just a gigantic, writhing, glistening, whirling mass of color and foam, with little form and no meaning.

You can admire the mighty genius of the man; even Richard Strauss cannot surpass him in getting weird and unusual effects from familiar instruments. The work required the use of many additional orchestral instruments, and all were needed. At the end in which songs of birds were imitated in many fantastic manners, the audience was apparently little moved. Yet it was the finest piece of conducting I have ever heard from Monteux. The big List Symphony, "Divine Comedy," with its chorus of female voices, awakened real enthusiasm and was superbly performed.

AMER-DEC-24

RUSSIAN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Rimsky-Korsakoff's Gorgeous "Night" Played

BY OLIN DOWNES

In remembrance of Camille Saint-Saens, who died in Algiers, the city he always loved, on the 16th of this month, the programme of the concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall contained the Adagio from his Third Symphony, with organ. The applause that followed this performance was out of place, but every one was impressed by the dignity, the clarity, the noble repose of the music. Nor is it out of place to remark that Mr. Monteux was largely responsible for this effect of a work which has been frequently heard here.

AIDED BY CHORUS

The remainder of the programme consisted of Massenet's overture to "Phedre"; of act three of the opera ballet called, "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Night on Mount Triglav," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, heard here for the first time, and, in celebration of the Dante tercentenary, Liszt's "Dante" symphony, with chorus of women's voices for the final intoning of the "Magnificat."

With the best will in the world, we find it hard to enthuse over this celebrated symphony of Liszt. Certainly it does not compare in originality with the "Faust" symphony. Certainly, in spite of thoughtful and excellent intentions, Liszt the virtuoso, Liszt the inventor of octave passages for the piano, the Liszt who, in default of any other ideas, works and over-works sequences of what the harmonists call "diminished sevenths" is frequently in evidence.

Voices Fail to Relieve Dulness

There is a moment in the first movement, "Inferno," the moment that follows the episode supposed to describe the love of Francesca da Rimini, when the orchestra does jibe, mock, and snarl like the hosts of hell, and there is in the music of Francesca da Rimini a certain Italian grace of line which is a relief and a refreshment from the sound and fury, signifying nothing, of much of this music. The "Purgatorio" is, perhaps, Dantesque. The finale, for us, is dull.

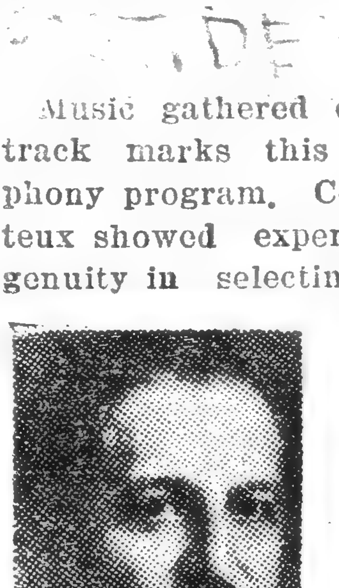
The chorus does not relieve the dulness, though the voices of a chorus specially selected and trained for this performance by Mr. Townsend performed excellently, and the vocal quality was a grateful contrast in its color to the sounds of the instruments. But Dante's poem has too much of the abstract for a composer to successfully make warm, living music of it.

Glory of the Concert

The glory of the concert was the gorgeously colored music of Rimsky-Korsakoff, as arranged by him, from the stage spectacle, for concert use. Certain astonishing things happen in this piece which explain many things about the daring young Russian, Igor Strawinsky. Mr. Strawinsky's ballet, "The Bird of Fire," has made a prodigious impression on the modern musical world. The fact that Strawinsky, in "The Bird of Fire," and Rimsky-Korsakoff, in the "Night of Mount Triglav" use the same theme to describe the appearance of the Immortal Katschei, spirit of evil, may very possibly be explained by the supposition that a popular theme in Russian folk-music, associated with Katschei in Russian legend, is employed by both composers. But examine a little farther into the two compositions and it will be seen that they have a marked similarity of orchestral style. The instrumentation of the Katschei theme, as well as the theme itself, is closely related. All of which points to the conclusion that one should not too hastily praise the young Russians today, until one is thoroughly familiar, as no musical audiences in America are familiar, with all of the works of the older men. We are still unfamiliar with much of Rimsky-Korsakoff and his contemporaries. They were the fathers of modern Russian music, and while there are thin places in the score of "Mount Triglav," as a whole it is a marvelous achievement of imagination and color—especially the strange scene in which Cleopatra in the ballet appears to the dreaming Yaromir. Part of this music has been used by Mme. Pavlowa in Boston and in the ballet, "Cleopatra" danced by the Ballet Russe. Great was Nicholas Rimsky-Korsakoff, and great, too, was Mr. Monteux, his prophet.

DEC 24

Music gathered off the beaten track marks this week's Symphony program. Conductor Monteux showed experience and ingenuity in selecting works that would pique the interest of tired holiday shoppers.



PIERRE MONTEUX

Massenet's "Phedre" overture, a characteristic composition, well-written and stamped with Parisian feeling for the classic drama, is the opening number. It was so long on the library shelf that it had all the effect of a brand-new novelty. Such a novelty is the brilliant, highly colored music from the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada"—pungent, dynamic music, such as Mr. Monteux interprets with particular verve. This Russian suite was all around the most striking offering of all.

Two memorial works also impressed the matinee audience yesterday. One was the adagio from the third symphony by Saint-Saens, the French composer who died the other day; while the other was Liszt's "Dante" symphony, revived as an observance of the great Italian poet's 600th anniversary. A chorus of women singers trained by Mr. Monteux shared in the honors of the "Dante" performance. The same program will be repeated tonight.

ADVSR-DEC.24

SYMPHONY HONORS GREAT COMPOSER

The only novelty on yesterday's Symphony program was Rimsky Korsakoff's arrangement for concert performance of the third act from the opera-ballet "Mlada," entitled "Night on Mt Triglaff," but Massenet's "Phedre" overture, unheard at these concerts since 1891, and Liszt's not too familiar "Dante" symphony were probably new to many of the subscribers. The slow movement from Saint-Saens' C-minor symphony was played in memory of the composer, who died at Algiers a week ago, aged 86.

Mr Monteux and the orchestra were at their best in the opening chords of Massenet's overture, which demand a crisp sonority produced by absolutely precise attacks from every player. They gave a brilliant performance of the whole piece, which is tawdry, banal romanticism on an imaginative level far below that of Racine's tragedy.

The Saint-Saens adagio was beautifully played, with the mournful grace and dignity befitting the occasion. One wondered, however, whether it was judicious of the audience to applaud a number given "in memoriam."

"Night on Mount Triglaff" requires a huge orchestra with many unusual instruments, contrary to Rimsky Korsakoff's usual custom. It is less clear cut and less concise than his other symphonic pieces, probably because written with a view to the action that accompanied it in the opera house. There is not enough musical coherence between the various scenes to make the piece seem an organic unit when heard in the concert hall, though the witches' sabbath and the evocation of Cleopatra are in themselves strangely impressive. The stage thunder in the orchestra is far more realistic than that in such familiar pieces as Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

Mr Monteux is usually at his best in such pieces as this one, but yesterday was an exception. There were many halting and inept moments in the performance, due probably more to insufficient rehearsal than to any failure on his part to comprehend Rimsky Kersakoff's intentions.

The "Dante" symphony is hardly the successful effort Liszt thought it when he dedicated it to his friend Wagner. The composer of the Second Hungarian Rhapsody was scarcely more fitted to grasp the epic content of the Divine Comedy than was the concoctor of the meditation from "Thais" to feel the tragic force of Phaedra's sufferings. The music would not stand what has been proposed as an acid test for orchestral music, transcription for string quartet. It shows no melodic invention, little power to develop a musical idea, and not a tithe of Rimsky Korsakoff's skill in orchestration. The performance was workmanlike. A chorus of women, trained by Mr. Monteux gave capable assistance in the finale.

GLOBE-DE

Prob Jan 28, 1927
B#5 Dec. 12, 1881
Ruby – Dec 23, 1921
Feb 14, 1908

SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON

Friday Afternoon, December 18, at 2:30 o'clock

Saturday Evening, December 19, at 8:15 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

NINTH PROGRAMME

Corelli. . . . . Sarabande, Gigue and Badinerie
(Arranged for String Orchestra by Ettore Pinelli)

[redacted] . . . . [redacted]

[redacted]

INTERMISSION

Brahms . . . . Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73

I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Allegretto grazioso; quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

Haydn. . . . . Concerto for Violoncello in D

I. Allegro moderato
II. Adagio
III. Allegro

Soloist

GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON

TENTH PROGRAMME

Thursday Afternoon, December 24, at 2:30 o'clock

Saturday Evening, December 26, at 8:15 o'clock

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

PROGRAMME

Prokofieff................Classical Symphony, Op. 25

I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotta: non troppo allegro
IV. Finale: molto vivace

Beethoven................Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67

I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. (Allegro: Trio
IV. (Allegro

INTERMISSION

Rimsky-Korsakov..........."Night on Mount Triglav," Act III of the Opera-Ballet "Mlada," arranged in concert form

Rimsky-Korsakov..........."Capriccio Espagnol," Op. 34

Alborada - Variations - Alborada - Scene and Gypsy Song - Fandango of the Asturias

NINTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Adagio by Saint-Saens Added to Program in Memory of Composer

FIRST PERFORMANCE OF 'MLADA' SELECTION

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Massenet, Overture to "Phedre"; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Night on Mount Triglaff" (act 3 of "Mlada") —first time at these concerts; Liszt, "Dante" Symphony.

The Adagio from Saint-Saens's symphony with organ, added to this program, was played in memory of the composer, who died at Algiers on the 16th. No selection from his many works could have been more appropriate. The peculiar serenity and dignity of this Adagio made it a fitting tribute; more fitting to Saint-Saens's character than any wailing lamentation or mighty funeral march.

Massenet's overture is intensely theatrical, as feverish as the heroine in the legend. Whether it expresses the mood of Racine's tragedy is another question, for surely Racine in exposition and in dialogue was not feverish in the modern manner. His stately lines are to many cold. It takes a Frenchman familiar with the history of the classic stage and a reverer of the classic outline and spirit in art to appreciate him fully. Massenet's overture, however, might well have been a prelude to a performance in which Rachel played the heroine, for Rachel, according to report, was consumed with a raging fire. Mr. Monteux gave the overture a superbly dramatic reading.

Although Rimsky-Korsakov arranged the third act of his "Mlada" for concert use, the expediency of playing this music in a Symphony concert may well be doubted, even if curiosity is thus gratified and the ear tickled or surprised by the extraordinary instrumentation. A description of what is doing on the stage—a witches' Sabbat—is printed for insertion in a program book, but the hearer, if he attempts to identify the lovers, Yaromir and Mlada, the Black God disguised as a he-goat, the apparition of the voluptuous and tempting Cleopatra, spectral shapes and perturbations of nature, will hardly be able to concentrate his attention on the music. Perhaps this would not greatly matter; for there are few purely musical ideas in this score. The music is necessarily of the theatre, decorative, emphasizing, explanatory if you will. The more salient features might embellish a treatise on instrumentation with an accompanying text, showing the possible use of little clarinets, piccolos, etc. Or, if the music must be played the scenes for which it was written should be thrown on a screen, a panoramic moving picture, carefully timed with the orchestral measures. The performance was brilliant, but the music itself left no marked impression.

Liszt took his Inferno and Purgatorio in music very seriously as became a future abbe; but his "Dante" symphony is not to be compared for imagination and poetic beauty with his symphony of Faust. His "Inferno" is a stage hell; his "Purgatorio," with its endless repetitions of unmeaning little phrases, its "affected simplicity, is, indeed, a "Purgatory" to the hearer, who waits patiently for the Magnificat and at times in his boredom would gladly go back to the "Inferno," as Don Juan in the play was weary of heaven because it contained so many middle-class Englishmen. Yet by this Inferno one is reminded of Hazlitt's description of a parliamentary orator who launched platitudes with the jury of a thunderbolt. On the other hand the opening measures of "Purgatorio" have a calm beauty, a mood that is curiously like that of the first measures in Rimsky's "Night on Mount Trigloff." In this symphony as in other works of Liszt the Russians and Wagner are detected helping themselves with both hands. Mr. Monteux had carefully prepared the orchestra and the female chorus, but even the flames of the "Inferno" left one cold. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Rosini, overture to L'Italiania in Algeri"; Mozart, Symphony in D (K. 385); Chadwick, Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra; De Falla, three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" (first time in America). Mme. Homer will sing a secular cantata by Bach and the Rondo with Recitative from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito."

HERALD-DEC. 24

[40

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MUSIC OF PICTURE, MUSIC FOR MEMORIAL

Saint-Saens Fittingly Recalled, but Not Too Fittingly Applauded — Massenet Resurrected After Thirty Years—Again the High Lights and Low Lights of Liszt's "Dante Symphony"—From Rimsky-Korsakov Revelation

MEMORIAL pieces are dubious ventures at a Symphony Concert. A miscellaneous audience will hear them as so much music. If they please in themselves and in performance, the usual applause ensues; while some have been known to wonder why the conductor returns no answering bow. Doubtless a whole memorial concert, with a bust of the dead and honored composer set on the stage duly wreathed, with an expansive summary of his life and works filling the programme-book, would sufficiently remind hearers of the purpose and the mood of the occasion. After Wagner's death in 1883, Mr. Henschel risked such an adventure. No conductor at Symphony Hall has since repeated it; possibly no composer, departing this life in those forty years, has warranted it. The only memorial concerts, like those for Liszt and Schumann in Mr. Fiedler's day, have marked a centennial anniversary, and were, presumably, occasions for rejoicing in what orators call "our heritage." Hence the more plaudits the better—even for the commonplaces that illustrious composers, like the rest of us, have also left behind.

The memorial piece, however, has kept place—singularly in Mr. Higginson's time when he bade the orchestra so recall the friends of which death had bereft him; more appositely to the scope and purposes of symphony concerts, when a dead composer was to be mourned in honor. Two months ago Mr. Monteux so commemorated Humperdinck, recently gone away, with the Prelude to his opera, "Hansel and Gretel." So yesterday, he laid wreath on Saint-Saëns's tomb with the slow movement from his Symphony in C minor. Either composer deserved such record and regret; but in the music of neither was the appropriate piece easy to find. Perhaps, the measures of the children's prayer suited the Prelude of Humperdinck's folk-opera to such purpose. Moreover, by "Hansel and Gretel" and nought else will present and future generations remember. Certainly, too, the fragment from Saint-Saëns's Symphony—above all else that casual retrospect of his music summons—was fitting memorial piece. It is serene and grave of progress; the musical line expands gently and little adorned; no passion of longing or of woe tinges the measures; Virgil-like, they sound no more than "the tears of things.'

As the music was played yesterday, conductor and orchestra seemed to be carving a relief, in Grecian purity and continence, upon some marble tomb holding the dust of Saint-Saëns beneath his loved Mediterranean skies. . . . Yet at the end the audience applauded as roundly as though this Adagio were appointed or inserted number in the routine of the day; while Mr. Monteux aited with unresponsive back for the clapping to subside. The custom of the country—and an innocent custom. For, had each comer been asked at the door whether Saint-Saëns were still alive—an old man carved in yellowed ivory—or dead within the week, how many might have answered truly?

As ironic chance would have it, Massenet and Saint-Saëns companioned each other in the order of the day, though little was the love lost between them when both flourished in Paris. For the first time in thirty years, Massenet's overture to Racine's tragedy of "Phèdre" was replayed by the Symphony Orchestra. Written for a concert nearly fifty years ago, it was finally tacked to a revival of the play at the Odéon and yesterday Mr. Monteux made its rhetoric of the theatre sound clear and high. The chords at the beginning thundered ominously; hollow gaped the intervals between; the tumult of the end might have been raised by the avenging sea-monster, churning tonal no less than watery waves. Racine chiselled his verses; they carve longing and woe, deceit, retribution, with the finest of needles. With still step Fate stalks the play; inevitable blows fall still. Yet Massenet saw only the sights, heard only the sounds, plied only the strokes of the theatre—and waited for its applause.

Once Massenet forbore, caught the voice of Racine the tragedy and the legend, remembered, perhaps, Bernhardt's flutings of amorous fire. The quiver of desire that even in those early days he could summon and intensify in tones, trembles through the measures for clarinet and oboe. Dread and pity perceptibly color them. The ear hears, the eye sees the Bernhardt, who used to speak so out of Phædra, and in tones no less fraught with music. But no Bernhardt, no Racine, inspired the subsequent pages of love avowed. Only the everlasting "Je t'aime, je t'adore" of the commonplace French theatre bred—and killed—Massenet's melodramatic platitudes. The music of Phædra and Hippolytus—play of Euripides, play of Racine, legend, poetry, tragedy—has yet to be heard. It is possible to wonder what Pizzetti set down, when he clothed d'Annunzio's "Fedra" with music.

Liszt, friend as well as admirer of Saint-Saëns—for so wide was the span of his life—more fittingly companioned him. Yet it was the Liszt of the "Dante Symphony," revived, as now seems the custom of the Symphony Concerts, at intervals of five years, and yesterday lucid, coherent, graphic and luminous at the hands of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra. Moments come, short or long, when the music penetrates the listening imagination and stirs it to vision. So sounds the hollow clang, the stark and emptied reverberance, of the measures of the gates of Hell and hope abandoned. So stills the orchestra, so broods the English horn upon happiness in misery recalled, when Francesca and Paolo are about to pass, fires and winds and pangs forgotten in the deeper pleasure and pain of love quenchless. (Yet not so deep and dismal cut the tones as the words.) Of such again, is the music singing their passion—of ghosts embraced, remembering. So also comes the tone-picturing the calm, the radiance everlasting. Ear and imagination bathe in the still, lucent flood.

On the other hand as often as not, Liszt is no more than rumbling and clattering and shrieking in the cellar of the theatre, when he sets his orchestra to the infernal din. He heard it maybe; his music hardly makes every ear hear with him. He would write sardonically, rackingly. Not here, but in the measures of Mephistopheles in the "Faust Symphony" has he fulfilled his will. Padded pages of a troubled Purgatory precede the Magnificat, and that canticle—pure-voiced and artful as were the women-singers with it yesterday—rises to no beauty celestial. Better the hidden choir that Liszt desired if the voices are to ascend and sway bodiless, in ineffable aspiration.

Primarily, however, the music itself falls short; for instants, it even plods. Once like inspiration came to Liszt—at the end of the 'Faust Symphony.' Neither in this Magnificat nor in the "sacred works" of his later years does it return. The "Faust Symphony" he wrote with pen of fire, sharp and sure. Mind, imagination, heart and soul were aflame with the theme and the utterance. Into it went his whole musical being, many-sided. Therein he expressed and drained himself—into a masterpiece. He willed the "Symphony to the 'Divine Comedy' of Dante." With labor he wrote much within it. He would be infernal, he would be celestial—and often he is theatre-bound. The rare pages where genius stirred, the great theme, perpetuate the music.

The intruder, of whom Saint-Saëns knew little, whom he might have mistrusted, was Rimsky-Korsakov in a piece little known to western concert halls— the " symphonic picture" of "Night on the Mount Triglav," drawn from the third act of his opera, "Mlada," discarding human voices. Essentially, it is music of the stage, to join with settings, lights, action, pictorial figures, in the working of illusion. Intrinsically, it is music developed less within and from itself than by suggestion from all these factors and in accord with them. The expert and too scholastic ear dwells upon the play through it of harmonic and instrumental color, of modulation, rhythm, transition. Not often, so far as we in America know his music, has Rimsky-Korsakov, risen to such invention, range, skill, with these expressive means or used them with such delineative and illuding imagination. The curtains of Petrograd and Moscow may shut the stage; but through the music—even in drab Symphony Hall—the inner eye sees, glows, feasts.

Figures of flesh and blood might thicken and stay this tone-picturing of teetering ghosts and shades, spectral lovers in fantasmal darkness. Grotesque spirits of evil would but delude the eye, while their music snaps and snivels, curls, tweaks, rasps upon the ear. The evocation of Cleopatra is drenched in the sensuous rhythms, modulations, melodies, colors, of oriental music as only Rimsky has written it—with occidental means. It caresses, drugs, cloys. Here are gums and spices, perfumes and rich wines, stuffs and jewels, that the body and the joys of the body may yet more and in magic lure. . . . Then a dawn escaping the usual tonal platitudes a-quiver with light and sound out of still shadow quickening. . . . Some day we in America may know more of Rimsky's operas. These fragments do but hint at the passing wonders of them.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. DEC. 24

A MISCELLANY of no less than seven pieces fills Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—a Symphony in D Major (K. 385) by Mozart, first revived here in Dr. Muck's day; the overture of Rossini to his opera, "L'Italiana in Alger," heard a few years ago in resurrection at the Metropolitan; a Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra by Mr. Chadwick, familiar work played once before "at these concerts"; and three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," ballet by the rising Spaniard, de Falla, played seemingly for the first times in America. A word about him will be said in these columns in the course of next week. As assisting singer Mme. Homer will be heard in a cantata of Bach for solo voice, and an air from Mozart's opera, "Titus." De Falla's dances promise lively interest, and Rossini—in an overture—is indeed new comer to the Symphony Concerts. Yet much can be made, as Mr. Toscanini proved, of this Italian operatic music of a century ago.

TRANS. DEC. 24

Homer Symphony Soloist

At the tenth pair of regular Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 30 and 31, the soloist will be Louise Homer, the distinguished American contralto. She will sing with the orchestra Bach's cantata for solo voice, "Begone, ye gloomy shadows," and a principal recitative and rondo from Mozart's late opera "Titus."

Pierre Monteux has chosen as the symphony for this programme Mozart's Symphony in D major, Kochel No. 385, which will be preceded by Rossini's Overture to the Opera "Italiana in Alghieri." A new work by Chadwick, the noted New England composer, entitled Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra will also be played. The concerts will close with three dances from the ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat") by de Falla, the celebrated Spanish composer, which on this occasion will have its first performance in America. The dances are entitled: 1, The Neighbors; 2, Dance of the Miller; 3, Final Dance.

POST-DEC 25.

From DEC 2 1921 P
Post Standard
Syracuse, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PRESENT VARIED PROGRAM

Compositions by Franck, Bimsky-Korsakoff, Beethoven and Wagner to Be Played at Armory December 17 Under Direction of Pierre Monteux.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, which organization is to give a concert in the state armory Saturday evening, December 17, at 8.15, has made for this occasion a program notable for its variety and interest.

The principal number will be the symphony by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which is regarded as the noblest and most inspired achievement in the modern French school of music. This symphony stands out above all others for its particular fineness of melody and soaring eloquence.

When the symphony was written and first performed in Paris in the early '90's, the audience was skeptical and even derisive. Only the master was serenely confident in the success of his effort. Gradually through the subsequent years, France and the whole world have come to love and revere the music of Franck in general and this symphony in particular.

The Russian school of music will be represented at this concert by Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," one of the most gorgeously colored and magnificently pictorial scores in the literature of music. It consists of the following movements: Two Alboradas, Variations, Scene and Gypsy Song, and Fandango of the Asturias.

The number by Beethoven on this program will be his early ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," from which the overture and fifth ballet, an Adagio, are to be played. The latter number will enable the following group of distinguished virtuosos of the orchestra to be heard in a series of solos as follows: Violoncello, J. Bedetti; flute, G. Laurent; clarinet, A. Sand; bassoon, A. Laus; harp, A. Holy. The brilliant closing number will be Wagner's perennially popular overture to "Tannhauser."

JOURNAL DEC 1 0 1921 P
Syracuse, N. Y.

PROVES MASTER OF VIOLONCELLO

JEAN BEDETTI.

He will play the solo passages in the "Creatures of Prometheus," which the Boston Symphony will include in its program.

FROM DEC 3 1 1921 K
EVE. POST
New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes

Next Thursday evening, January 5, and Saturday afternoon, January 7, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third regular pair of concerts in New York.

For the Thursday programme Pierre Monteux has selected Handel's double concerto in F major, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, Massenet's overture to "Phèdre," and two unusual numbers by Rimsky-Korsakoff and De Falla, respectively. The first is the third act from the opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged by the Russian composer in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff." The music of the Spanish composer consists of three dances from his ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" (The Three-Cornered Hat), which, written in characteristic Spanish rhythms, will have its first performance in New York on this occasion.

At the Saturday matinée Mozart's symphony in D major, Kochel No. 504, will be played, also Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The novelty on this programme will be the overture, pastorale, and nocturne from the second orchestral suite by Darius Milhaud, the French composer, whose larger music will on this occasion have its first hearing in New York.

From DEC 3 1 1921
EVENING MAIL
New York City

WHEN the Boston Symphony vis- us next Thursday night, Pie Monteux will conduct Handel's doubl concerto for string and woodwind or chestras, Brahms' Variations on Haydn Theme and the third act o Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arrange by the composer for concert form ar called "Night on Mount Triglaff." Th Spanish composer, De Falla, will b represented by three dances from th ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

FROM DEC 3 1 1922 P
EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

The Boston Orchestra gives its next pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Two interesting numbers on the programme of the former are Rimsky-Korsakov's "Night on Mount Triglaff," arranged from the third act of his ballet-opera, "Mlada," and three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-cornered Hat." On Saturday the novelty will be Darius Milhaud's "Le boeuf sur la toit."

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony programme at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, yesterday afternoon, was devoted to Cesar Franck's D minor symphony, three but little heard pieces for orchestra by Liadoff, namely, "Baba-Yaga" (Op. 56), "The Enchanted Lake" (Op. 62), and "Kilimora," (Op. 63); the Brahms' "Tragic" overture and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphinis and Chloe" overture.

DEC 1 0 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Wilhelm Bachaus, the great pian-st, the beauty of whose art is still emembered and talked of by those who heard him during his former our of the United States several years ago, has returned to this country and will appear as soloist at he second regular concert in Providence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place a week from next Tuesday, December 0th, at 8:15. Bachaus, during his ormer visit here, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boson and other cities with supreme uccess. By his several tours of Europe in subsequent years he has further heightened his fame, and, now in his thirty-seventh year, he takes his place as one of the greatest pianists living. Last summer he played in the larger cities of South America, winning superlative praise n every hand.

TIMES DEC 11 1921
NEW YORK CITY

It is interesting to friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to learn that the demand for additional symphony concerts in its home city has been so great, and because of the unprecedented sale of season tickets for the regular [illegible] five additional concerts of the season [illegible] in Boston in the course of the [illegible]. A considerable number of the tickets for these concerts have already been subscribed for by various organizations. The orchestra regularly gives twenty-four Friday and twenty-four Saturday concerts. The Chicago Orchestra gives twenty-eight regular concerts in its [illegible] season. The Philadelphia Orchestra's series [illegible] Philadelphia numbers twenty-five, with several extra ones for various [illegible].

NINTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Adagio by Saint-Saens Added to Program in Memory of Composer

FIRST PERFORMANCE OF 'MLADA' SELECTION

By PHILIP HALE

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Massenet, Overture to "Phedre"; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Night on Mount Triglaff" (act 3 of "Mlada") —first time at these concerts; Liszt, "Dante" Symphony.

The Adagio from Saint-Saens's symphony with organ, added to this program, was played in memory of the composer, who died at Algiers on the 16th. No selection from his many works could have been more appropriate. The peculiar serenity and dignity of this Adagio made it a fitting tribute; more fitting to Saint-Saens's character than any wailing lamentation or mighty funeral march.

Massenet's overture is intensely theatrical, as feverish as the heroine in the legend. Whether it expresses the mood of Racine's tragedy is another question, for surely Racine in exposition and in dialogue was not feverish in the modern manner. His stately lines are to many cold. It takes a Frenchman familiar with the history of the classic stage and a reverer of the classic outline and spirit in art to appreciate him fully. Massenet's overture, however, might well have been a prelude to a performance in which Rachel played the heroine, for Rachel, according to report, was consumed with a raging fire. Mr. Monteux gave the overture a superbly dramatic reading.

Although Rimsky-Korsakov arranged the third act of his "Mlada" for concert use, the expediency of playing this music in a Symphony concert may well be doubted, even if curiosity is thus gratified and the ear tickled or surprised by the extraordinary instrumentation. A description of what is doing on the stage—a witches' Sabbat—is printed for insertion in a program book, but the hearer, if he attempts to identify the lovers, Yaromir and Mlada, the Black God disguised as a he-goat, the apparition of the voluptuous and tempting Cleopatra, spectral shapes and perturbations of nature, will hardly be able to concentrate his attention on the music. Perhaps this would not greatly matter; for there are few purely musical ideas in this score. The music is necessarily of the theatre, decorative, emphasizing, explanatory if you will. The more salient features might embellish a treatise on instrumentation with an accompanying text, showing the possible use of little clarinets, piccolos etc. Or, if the music must be played the scenes for which it was written should be thrown on a screen, a panoramic moving picture, carefully timed with the orchestral measures. The performance was brilliant, but the music itself left no marked impression.

Liszt took his Inferno and Purgatorio in music very seriously as became a future abbe; but his "Dante" symphony is not to be compared for imagination and poetic beauty with his symphony of Faust. His "Inferno" is a stage hell; his "Purgatorio," with its endless repetitions of unmeaning little phrases, its affected simplicity, is, indeed, a "Purgatory" to the hearer, who waits patiently for the Magnificat and at times in his boredom would gladly go back to the "Inferno," as Don Juan in the play was weary of heaven because it contained so many middle-class Englishmen. Yet by this Inferno one is reminded of Hazlitt's description of a parliamentary orator who launched platitudes with the jury of a thunderbolt. On the other hand the opening measures of "Purgatorio" have a calm beauty, a mood that is curiously like that of the first measures in Rimsky's "Night on Mount Trigloff." In this symphony as in other works of Liszt the Russians and Wagner are detected helping themselves with both hands. Mr. Monteux had carefully prepared the orchestra and the female chorus, but even the flames of the "Inferno" left one cold. The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Rosini, overture to L'Italiania in Algeri"; Mozart, Symphony in D (K. 385); Chadwick, Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra; De Falla, three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" (first time in America). Mme. Homer will sing a secular cantata by Bach and the Rondo with Recitative from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito."

HERALD-DEC. 24

[40]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MUSIC OF PICTURE, MUSIC FOR MEMORIAL

Saint-Saens Fittingly Recalled, but Not Too Fittingly Applauded — Massenet Resurrected After Thirty Years—Again the High Lights and Low Lights of Liszt's "Dante Symphony"—From Rimsky-Korsakov Revelation

MEMORIAL pieces are dubious ventures at a Symphony Concert. A miscellaneous audience will hear them as so much music. If they please in themselves and in performance, the usual applause ensues; while some have been known to wonder why the conductor returns no answering bow. Doubtless a whole memorial concert, with a bust of the dead and honored composer set on the stage duly wreathed, with an expansive summary of his life and works filling the programme-book, would sufficiently remind hearers of the purpose and the mood of the occasion. After Wagner's death in 1883, Mr. Henschel risked such an adventure. No conductor at Symphony Hall has since repeated it; possibly no composer, departing this life in those forty years, has warranted it. The only memorial concerts, like those for Liszt and Schumann in Mr. Fiedler's day, have marked a centennial anniversary, and were, presumably, occasions for rejoicing in what orators call "our heritage." Hence the more plaudits the better—even for the commonplaces that illustrious composers, like the rest of us, have also left behind.

The memorial piece, however, has kept place—singularly in Mr. Higginson's time when he bade the orchestra so recall the friends of which death had bereft him; more appositely to the scope and purposes of symphony concerts, when a dead composer was to be mourned in honor. Two months ago Mr. Monteux so commemorated Humperdinck, recently gone away, with the Prelude to his opera, "Hansel and Gretel." So yesterday, he laid wreath on Saint-Saëns's tomb with the slow movement from his Symphony in C minor. Either composer deserved such record and regret; but in the music of neither was the appropriate piece easy to find. Perhaps, the measures of the children's prayer suited the Prelude of Humperdinck's folk-opera to such purpose. Moreover, by "Hansel and Gretel" and nought else will present and future generations remember. Certainly, too, the fragment from Saint-Saëns's Symphony—above all else that casual retrospect of his music summons—was fitting memorial piece. It is serene and grave of progress; the musical line expands gently and little adorned; no passion of longing or of woe tinges the measures; Virgil-like, they sound no more than "the tears of things.'

As the music was played yesterday, conductor and orchestra seemed to be carving a relief, in Grecian purity and continence, upon some marble tomb holding the dust of Saint-Saëns beneath his loved Mediterranean skies. . . . Yet at the end the audience applauded as roundly as though this Adagio were appointed or inserted number in the routine of the day; while Mr. Monteux aited with unresponsive back for the clapping to subside. The custom of the country—and an innocent custom. For, had each comer been asked at the door whether Saint-Saëns were still alive—an old man carved in yellowed ivory—or dead within the week, how many might have answered truly?

As ironic chance would have it, Massenet and Saint-Saëns companioned each other in the order of the day, though little was the love lost between them when both flourished in Paris. For the first time in thirty years, Massenet's overture to Racine's tragedy of "Phèdre" was replayed by the Symphony Orchestra. Written for a concert nearly fifty years ago, it was finally tacked to revival of the play at the Odéon and yesterday Mr. Monteux made its rhetoric of the theatre sound clear and high. The chords at the beginning thundered ominously; hollow gaped the intervals between; the tumult of the end might have been raised by the avenging sea-monster, churning tonal no less than watery waves. Racine chiselled his verses; they carve longing and woe, deceit, retribution, with the finest of needles. With still step Fate stalks the play; inevitable blows fall still. Yet Massenet saw only the sights, heard only the sounds, plied only the strokes of the theatre—and waited for its applause.

Once Massenet forbore, caught the voice of Racine the tragedy and the legend, remembered, perhaps, Bernhardt's flutings of amorous fire. The quiver of desire that even in those early days he could summon and intensify in tones, trembles through the measures for clarinet and oboe. Dread and pity perceptibly color them. The ear hears, the eye sees the Bernhardt, who used to speak so out of Phædra, and in tones no less fraught with music. But no Bernhardt, no Racine, inspired the subsequent pages of love avowed. Only the everlasting "Je t'aime, je t'adore" of the commonplace French theatre bred—and killed —Massenet's melodramatic platitudes. The music of Phædra and Hippolytus—play of Euripides, play of Racine, legend, poetry, tragedy—has yet to be heard. It is possible to wonder what Pizzetti set down, when he clothed d'Annunzio's "Fedra" with music.

Liszt, friend as well as admirer of Saint-Saëns—for so wide was the span of his life—more fittingly companioned him. Yet it was the Liszt of the "Dante Symphony," revived, as now seems the custom of the Symphony Concerts, at intervals of five years, and yesterday lucid, coherent, graphic and luminous at the hands of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra. Moments come, short or long, when the music penetrates the listening imagination and stirs it to vision. So sounds the hollow clang, the stark and emptied reverberance, of the measures of the gates of Hell and hope abandoned. So stills the orchestra, so broods the English horn upon happiness in misery recalled, when Francesca and Paolo are about to pass, fires and winds and pangs forgotten in the deeper pleasure and pain of love quenchless. (Yet not so deep and dismal cut the tones as the words.) Of such again, is the music singing their passion—of ghosts embraced, remembering. So also comes the tone-picturing the calm, the radiance everlasting. Ear and imagination bathe in the still, lucent flood.

On the other hand as often as not, Liszt is no more than rumbling and clattering and shrieking in the cellar of the theatre, when he sets his orchestra to the infernal din. He heard it maybe; his music hardly makes every ear hear with him. He would write sardonically, rackingly. Not here, but in the measures of Mephistopheles in the "Faust Symphony" has he fulfilled his will. Padded pages of a troubled Purgatory precede the Magnificat, and that canticle—pure-voiced and artful as were the women-singers with it yesterday—rises to no beauty celestial. Better the hidden choir that Liszt desired if the voices are to ascend and sway bodiless, in ineffable aspiration.

Primarily, however, the music itself falls short; for instants, it even plods. Once like inspiration came to Liszt—at the end of the 'Faust Symphony.' Neither in this Magnificat nor in the "sacred works" of his later years does it return. The "Faust Symphony" he wrote with pen of fire, sharp and sure. Mind, imagination, heart and soul were aflame with the theme and the utterance. Into it went his whole musical being many-sided. Therein he expressed and drained himself—into a masterpiece. He willed the "Symphony to the 'Divine Comedy' of Dante." With labor he wrote much within it. He would be infernal, he would be celestial—and often he is theatre-bound. The rare pages where genius stirred, the great theme, perpetuate the music.

The intruder, of whom Saint-Saëns knew little, whom he might have mistrusted, was Rimsky-Korsakov in a piece little known to western concert halls— the " symphonic picture" of "Night on the Mount Triglav," drawn from the third act of his opera, "Mlada," discarding human voices. Essentially, it is music of the stage, to join with settings, lights, action, pictorial figures, in the working of illusion. Intrinsically, it is music developed less within and from itself than by suggestion from all these factors and in accord with them. The expert and too scholastic ear dwells upon the play through it of harmonic and instrumental color, of modulation, rhythm, transition. Not often, so far as we in America know his music, has Rimsky-Korsakov, risen to such invention, range, skill, with these expressive means or used them with such delineative and illuding imagination. The curtains of Petrograd and Moscow may shut the stage; but through the music—even in drab Symphony Hall—the inner eye sees, glows, feasts.

Figures of flesh and blood might thicken and stay this tone-picturing of teetering ghosts and shades, spectral lovers in fantasmal darkness. Grotesque spirits of evil would but delude the eye, while their music snaps and snivels, curls, tweaks, rasps upon the ear. The evocation of Cleopatra is drenched in the sensuous rhythms, modulations, melodies, colors, of oriental music as only Rimsky has written it—with occidental means. It caresses, drugs, cloys. Here are gums and spices, perfumes and rich wines, stuffs and jewels, that the body and the joys of the body may yet more and in magic lure. . . . Then a dawn escaping the usual tonal platitudes a-quiver with light and sound out of still shadow quickening. . . . Some day we in America may know more of Rimsky's operas. These fragments do but hint at the passing wonders of them.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. DEC. 24

A MISCELLANY of no less than seven pieces fills Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—a Symphony in D Major (K. 385) by Mozart, first revived here in Dr. Muck's day; the overture of Rossini to his opera, "L'Italiana in Alger," heard a few years ago in resurrection at the Metropolitan; a Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra by Mr. Chadwick, familiar work played once before "at these concerts"; and three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," ballet by the rising Spaniard, de Falla, played seemingly for the first times in America. A word about him will be said in these columns in the course of next week. As assisting singer Mme. Homer will be heard in a cantata of Bach for solo voice, and an air from Mozart's opera, "Titus." De Falla's dances promise lively interest, and Rossini—in an overture—is indeed new comer to the Symphony Concerts. Yet much can be made, as Mr. Toscanini proved, of this Italian operatic music of a century ago.

TRANS. DEC. 24

Homer Symphony Soloist

At the tenth pair of regular Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 30 and 31, the soloist will be Louise Homer, the distinguished American contralto. She will sing with the orchestra Bach's cantata for solo voice, "Begone, ye gloomy shadows," and a principal recitative and rondo from Mozart's late opera "Titus."

Pierre Monteux has chosen as the symphony for this programme Mozart's Symphony in D major, Kochel No. 385, which will be preceded by Rossini's Overture to the Opera "Italiana in Alghieri." A new work by Chadwick, the noted New England composer, entitled Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra will also be played. The concerts will close with three dances from the ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat") by de Falla, the celebrated Spanish composer, which on this occasion will have its first performance in America. The dances are entitled: 1, The Neighbors; 2, Dance of the Miller; 3, Final Dance.

POST-DEC. 25.

From DEC 2 1921 P
Post Standard
Syracuse, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PRESENT VARIED PROGRAM

Compositions by Franck, Bimsky-Korsakoff, Beethoven and Wagner to Be Played at Armory December 17 Under Direction of Pierre Monteux.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, which organization is to give a concert in the state armory Saturday evening, December 17, at 8.15, has made for this occasion a program notable for its variety and interest.

The principal number will be the symphony by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which is regarded as the noblest and most inspired achievement in the modern French school of music. This symphony stands out above all others for its particular fineness of melody and soaring eloquence.

When the symphony was written and first performed in Paris in the early '90's, the audience was skeptical and even derisive. Only the master was serenely confident in the success of his effort. Gradually through the subsequent years, France and the whole world have come to love and revere the music of Franck in general and this symphony in particular.

The Russian school of music will be represented at this concert by Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," one of the most gorgeously colored and magnificently pictorial scores in the literature of music. It consists of the following movements: Two Alboradas, Variations, Scene and Gypsy Song, and Fandango of the Asturias.

The number by Beethoven on this program will be his early ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," from which the overture and fifth ballet, an Adagio, are to be played. The latter number will enable the following group of distinguished virtuosos of the orchestra to be heard in a series of solos as follows: Violoncello, J. Bedetti; flute, G. Laurent; clarinet, A. Sand; bassoon, A. Laus; harp, A. Holy. The brilliant closing number will be Wagner's perennially popular overture to "Tannhauser."

JOURNAL DEC 10 1921 E.
Syracuse, N. Y.

PROVES MASTER OF VIOLONCELLO

JEAN BEDETTI.

He will play the solo passages in the "Creatures of Prometheus," which the Boston Symphony will include in its program.

FROM DEC 3 1 1921 A
EVE. POST
New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes

Next Thursday evening, January 5, and Saturday afternoon, January 7, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third regular pair of concerts in New York.

For the Thursday programme Pierre Monteux has selected Handel's double concerto in F major, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, Massenet's overture to "Phèdre," and two unusual numbers by Rimsky-Korsakoff and De Falla, respectively. The first is the third act from the opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged by the Russian composer in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff." The music of the Spanish composer consists of three dances from his ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" (The Three-Cornered Hat), which, written in characteristic Spanish rhythms, will have its first performance in New York on this occasion.

At the Saturday matinée Mozart's symphony in D major, Kochel No. 504, will be played, also Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The novelty on this programme will be the overture, pastorale, and nocturne from the second orchestral suite by Darius Milhaud, the French composer, whose larger music will on this occasion have its first hearing in New York.

From DEC 3 1 1921
EVENING MAIL
New York City

WHEN the Boston Symphony visits us next Thursday night, Pierre Monteux will conduct Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms' Variations on Haydn Theme and the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer for concert form and called "Night on Mount Triglaff." The Spanish composer, De Falla, will be represented by three dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

FROM DEC 3 1 1922 P
EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

The Boston Orchestra gives its next pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Two interesting numbers on the programme of the former are Rimsky-Korsakov's "Night on Mount Triglaff," arranged from the third act of his ballet-opera, "Mlada," and three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-cornered Hat." On Saturday the novelty will be Darius Milhaud's "Le boeuf sur la toit."

Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Boston Symphony programme at Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, yesterday afternoon, was devoted to Cesar Franck's D minor symphony, three but little heard pieces for orchestra by Liadoff, namely, "Baba-Yaga" (Op. 56), "The Enchanted Lake" (Op. 62); and "Kilimora," (Op. 63); the Brahms' "Tragic" overture and the second suite from Ravel's "Daphinis and Chloe" overture.

DEC 10 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Wilhelm Bachaus, the great pianist, the beauty of whose art is still remembered and talked of by those who heard him during his former tour of the United States several years ago, has returned to this country and will appear as soloist at the second regular concert in Providence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place a week from next Tuesday, December 20th, at 8:15. Bachaus, during his former visit here, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and other cities with supreme success. By his several tours of Europe in subsequent years he has further heightened his fame, and now in his thirty-seventh year, he takes his place as one of the greatest pianists living. Last summer he played in the larger cities of South America, winning superlative praise on every hand.

TIMES DEC 11 1921
NEW YORK CITY

It is interesting to friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to learn that the demand for additional symphony concerts in its home city has been so great, and because of the unprecedented sale of season tickets for the regular series, five additional concerts will be given in Boston in the course of the season. A considerable number of the tickets for these concerts have already been subscribed for by various organizations. The orchestra regularly gives twenty-four Friday and twenty-four Saturday concerts. The Chicago Orchestra gives twenty-eight regular concerts in its Chicago seasons, with several extra. The Philadelphia Orchestra's series numbers twenty-five, with several extra ones for various reasons.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM
Binghamton, N. Y.
DEC 12 1921

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE ON THURSDAY

Seat Sale for Symphony Concert to Open at Kalurah Temple This Morning

Next Thursday evening, December 15, at 8:15 o'clock, in Kalurah Temple, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a memorable concert.

This famous organization of 103 musicians has, during this, its 41st season, actually enhanced its preeminent reputation under its illustrious leader, Pierre Monteux. Furthermore, the program chosen for this concert is such as to reveal the supreme qualities of the Orchestra and of the celebrity who presides over it.

Probably no symphony ever written has had more enduring favor with all audiences than Beethoven's Third Symphony, entitled "Eroica," which Pierre Monteux has placed as the principal number upon this program. Written in the early manhood of the composer, this work overflows with the vigorous vitality of youth and the enthusiasm which Beethoven felt in the early exploits of his contemporary, Napoleon Bonaparte. The first and last movements abound in martial measures. The funeral march is perhaps the noblest ever written, and the Scherzo, which moves in a swift pianissimo, and contains a fine horn trio, has also become famous.

The colorful modern Russian school of music will be eloquently represented on this program by Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes," which consists of a series of dances in characteristic Spanish rhythms, featuring the distinguished virtuosos of the orchestra in a number of solo passages for the various instruments.

The remaining numbers will be Schbuert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," including two ballets and the second entr'acte, and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

The seat sale opens this morning at Kalurah Temple box office. Phone 1627.

---

rom DEC 18 1921 Y Y
OURANT
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT MONTH

An attractive program has been planned by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its sale concert to be given in Hartford this season, which will take place in Parsons's Theater Monday evening, January 9, at 8:15. The principal number will be the celebrated symphony by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which is generally considered the masterpiece of the modern French school of music.

Under Franck's compatriot, Pierre Monteux, the Boston Symphony Orchestra performs this symphony with inspired eloquence. It was the first number to be conducted by Mr. Monteux when he came to the head of the orchestra. It has been repeated in Boston, New York, and elsewhere, last season and this, with notable success.

The soloist at this concert will be Paul Kochanski, the genius of the violin, who came from Poland last winter, unknown and unheralded, and impressed his audiences in New York City as the finest newcomer of the season. A native of Warsaw, Kochanski showed extraordinary talent when a mere boy and studied under the foremost masters.

Mr. Kocnanski held the post of professor at the Petrograd Conservatory when the Bolsheviki came into power. He was then ordered by the government to play, with food cards for recompense. After two years of this servitude he made an attempt to leave Russia, was arrested, and commanded to serve as professor of the Kieff Conservatory. Finally, he succeeded in reaching Warsaw, his native city, and thence came to America by way of London. He will play Burch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs, a work of imposing difficulty and melodic charm.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will close the concert with the humorous masterpiece of Richard Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," one of the favorite works of this greatest of living composers, who is now in

---

FROM DEC 18 1921 A
TRIBUNE
Providence

BACHAUS SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

The program to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert on Tuesday evening will be additionally interesting in the appearance as soloist of Wilhelm Bachaus.

Although this great artist is not so well known as others in this country, in that his visits here have hitherto been limited to two seasons (1912-13 and 1913-14), his fame in Europe is of the highest, and in South America, where last summer he played in the various larger cities, his concerts were acclaimed as placing him among the very finest masters of his instrument. Now only 37 years of age, he has had bestowed upon him the highest honors which can be given a virtuoso. A brilliant graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory, he became the favorite pupil of Eugene d'Albert. He began to give concerts when he was 15, and at 21 he took by unanimous vote the famous Rubinstein Prize of 5000 francs over 25 other competitors. Since then his career has been marked by an unceasing advance in his command of his art, until to-day he has become a scarcely unrivalled master in the interpretation of the romantic school of music. His powers should therefore be heard to the finest advantage in Grieg's painoforte concerto in A-minor, which work of dashing brilliance and lyric eloquence he will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence.

The concert will begin with Brahms' Tragic Overture, one of the most admired and beloved of that master's works, and will close with the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky in F-minor. The performance of this symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux in Boston and other cities this season has been praised as one of its finest achievements. The splendid work was created in its composer's best years, and placed by him above all his other works. In a letter Tschaikowsky explains how the movements of the symphony depict the hopes and aspirations of life, over which is imposed suddenly and fearfully the inexorable theme of Fate. The melodious portion of the first movement for clarinet solo was to its composer a dream of happiness. The wondrous slow movement he identifies with a mood of sweet melancholy, and the opening of the last movement, built upon a Russian folk theme, was to him a picture of a folk holiday. At its height it is shattered by the recurring theme of Fate given out by the full brass choir.

From DEC 18 192 A
JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

* * *

Wilhelm Bachaus, the pianist, who ha just returned to this country, will as soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the Providence season, which will take place next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall at 8:15 o'clock. A young man of 37, Bachaus is remembered by his former visits to the United States in the two seasons of 1912-1913, when he appeared as soloist with this orchestra in Boston and other cities.

Bachaus was the favorite pupil of Eugene d'Albert. In 1905 he won the celebrated Rubinstein prize of 5000 francs in competition with 25 others by an unprecedented verdict of the jury. Particularly admired by his critics is his reading of the music of the romantic school, an example of which will be Grieg's popular concerto in A-minor, which he will play with the orchestra at this concert.

The concert will open with the Tragic Overture of Brahms and close with the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky in F-minor. The composer's dedication of this work "To my best friend," refers to Mme. von Mack, who was benefactress of the unfortunate artist through a large part of his career. In a letter, Tschaikowsky explains how the movements of the symphony depict the hopes and aspirations of life, over which is imposed suddenly and fearfully the inexorable theme of fate. The melodious portion of first movement for clarinet solo was its composer a dream of happiness. The wondrous slow movement he identifies with a mood of sweet melancholy, and the opening of the last movement, built upon a Russian folk theme, was to him a picture of a folk holiday. At its height it is shattered by the recurring theme of fate given out by the full brass choir.

~~TRIBUNE~~ Journal DEC 2

Provide

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TO BE GIVEN HERE TO-NIGHT

Wilhelm Bachaus, Pianist, to Play Grieg's Concerto in A-Minor.

The second regular concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place to-night at 8:15 o'clock in Infantry Hall. Pierre Monteux will conduct on this occasion the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky in F-minor, the performance of which splendid work by the famous orchestra in Boston and other cities this season has had signal success. The other purely orchestral number will be the Tragic Overture of Brahms.

Appearing as soloist with the orchestra, Wilhelm Bachaus, the celebrated pianist, will be heard in Grieg's pianoforte concerto in A-minor. This artist is remembered by some from his appearances in America in two former seasons, 1911-12 and 1912-13, when he played with this orchestra in several cities.

FROM DEC 20 1921 A
TRIBUNE
Providence

SYMPHONY CONCERT TO-NIGHT.

Wilhelm Bachaus, the distinguished pianist, who holds an enviable place among the eminent artists now living in Europe, has returned to America and will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra when New England's famous musical organization gives the second regular concert of its Providence series in Infantry Hall to-night at 8:15 o'clock.

Bachaus is not new to America, having made tours of this country in the seasons of 1911-12 and 1912-13. Het has since then, in his early maturity, heightened the enviable reputation he held by several tours of Europe. He comes to the United States from South America where last summer his concerts in the larger cities were praised as revealing an executant of the first order. His openings in New York following his [illegible] were similarly successful. [illegible] play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Grieg's pianoforte concerto in A minor. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, will also present the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky in F minor and the Tragic Overture of Brahms.

FROM DEC 21 1921 A
TRIBUNE
Providence

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Pierre Monteux conductor, was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Mr. Wilhelm Bachaus was the soloist and the program was given as follows: Brahms, tragic overture, op. 81; Grieg, Concerto, in A-minor for pianoforte, op. 16; Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4 in F-minor, op. 36.

The concert opened with Brahm's Tragic Overture, which, as is well known, is among the greatest works of Brahms and by its structure and depth of feeling affords abundant opportunity for some wonderful effects of orchestration. These massive effects were brought out in all their majesty and power by the orchestra, in a thrilling performance.

The overture was followed by the Grieg Concerto for pianoforte, a work of such dashing brilliance and lyric eloquence as to give ample opportunity for the display of the pianist's absolute mastery of his instrument. Rythmic sweep and swing, compelling dynamic force, and here and there, unfailing melody, together with an emotional force and fire held the audience tense throughout the three movements.

Mr. Bachaus, it will be recalled, was heard in Providence several years ago when he played before the Chaminade Club in Churchill House. His rise to fame since that time has been little short of phenomenal.

Now but 37 years of age he has had bestowed upon him the highest honors which can be given a virtuoso. He is a graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory and is recognized to-day as a scarcely unrivalled master in the interpretation of the romantic school of music.

The orchestral support in the concerto was altogether delightful and at the end of the big number Mr. Bachaus was recalled six times before the audience subsided into silence.

The chief number on the program the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky in F-minor, was given a magnificent reading by Mr. Monteux. This massive work, considered by many as Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, had for its inspiration the theme of fate and throughout the four movements are interwoven the hopes and aspirations of life over which fate is inexorable.

The work, as is well known, was dedicated to Madame Van Meck, his romantic benefactor through all his troubled career, who never permitted him to see her lest embarrassment might be his because of the allowance which he received from this lady, his benefactress, for many years and thus was enabled to give to the world the great masterpieces so universally beloved. In the first movement of the symphony the clarion theme of fate was given out by the brass choirs with splendid effect. In "Andantino," which followed the ravishing sweetness and graceful tenderness of the movement was exquisitely brought out by the orchestra while the continuous pizzicato of the scherzo in the third movement in which the strings are plucked and no bows used was so superb in its effect as to fill the listeners with amazement and called fourth spontaneous applause. A playful bit of writing yet it was full of fascinating charm.

N. B. P.

NEWS, DEC 22 1921 A
Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES SECOND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its Providence season Tuesday in Infantry Hall. Wilhelm Bachaus, pianist, was the assisting artist. The programme follows:

Brahms.....Tragic Overture, Op. 81
Grieg .... Concerto
I. Allegro molto moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro moderator molto e marcato.
Tschaikowsky ....
Symphony No. 4 in F-Minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto.
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

In point of popular esteem the fourth symphony has never quite attained the vogue that the sixth—the so-called "Pathetic"—holds with the general public. That Tschaikowsky himself was fond of it is amply attested by his frequent mention of it in his published correspondence and those who delight in such matters take a perennial interest in attaching to its several moments—its least significant phrases, even—all manner of personal interpretations and "inner meanings." Chacun a son gout! Others will be content to find in it only a work of considerable emotional intensity, even then when it is superficially gay in form and tempo, music of propulsive force and sweeping passion. Of the first movement one might say with Polonius: "This is too long." But the Scherzo is altogether charming; Tschaikowsky has written comparatively few pages that are like unto it: and the finale puts the orchestra on its mettle. The symphony, which the Boston orchestra last played here on the occasion of Dr. Muck's final appearance in Providence, was warmly applauded.

The orchestra's only other number was Brahm's "Tragic" overture, which began the concert.

Mr. Bachaus, who is revisiting America after an absence of several years, chose for his medium that ancient and honorable cheval de bataille, the Grieg Concerto in A-minor. Among the literature of the piano it is apparently one of those things that, in its hold upon the public (to say nothing of pianists) age cannot wither nor custom stale. And yet, judged from the standards of absolute music, it barely escapes at times the suggestion of banality. It undoubtedly is calculated to exhibit the virtuosity of the solo player and it contains sundry sugary themes that have a certain rather sentimental appeal. For the most part, however, it consists of episodic bravura passages, pianistic colorature. The years have not abated Mr. Bachaus's skill with such music and he gave an engrossing performance that often ennobled passages of little intrinsic value. He was acclaimed by the audience.

The audience, which was kept waiting until some time after the appointed hour of the concert because of a delay in the arrival of the greater part of the orchestra (due to a late train) was singularly applausive, though it was regrettable that its enthusiasm should have felt the need for expression in the untimely hand-clapping that interrupted the Concerto. Our ways are our ways, however, and will doubtless remain so to the end of the chapter.

J. HARVEY BARBER.

au in the

---

rom SUN
ddress New York City
ate DEC 24 1921 D

For the third pair of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, which will take place on Thursday evening, January 5, and Saturday afternoon, January 7. Pierre Monteux has compiled the following program: For the Thursday concert, Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras in F major, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," three dances from the ballet of the Spanish composer, De Falla, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three Cornered Hat"), which is being introduced to this country by Pierre Monteux, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." For the Saturday matinee. Mozart's symphony in D major, Kochel 385, Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Island of the Dead"; the overture, pastorale and nocturne from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, the celebrity of the Parisian "Six."

FROM DEC 24 1921 Y
TIMES,
Hartford, Conn.

KOCHANSKI

Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra at Parsons's Theater January 9.

Paul Kochanski, the distinguished Polish violinist, who, since he came to America for the first time last spring, has taken a foremost and undisputed place among the masters of his instrument, will appear in Hartford as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra when this famous organization of 100 musicians gives a concert in Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 9, at 8:15.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the orchestra, who is now in his third season at the post, will head the program with the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which has taken its place as the masterpiece of the modern French school and one of the noblest symphonies of all time. This work is particularly noted for its imposing and melodious themees, and for the noble exaltation with which the work finally rises to glorious affirmation of faith in God. The beautiful solo for English horn in the second movement is looked upon as a landmark in orchestration.

Paul Kochanski will be heard in Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs, a score of formidable difficulty but nevertheless captivating in its piquant rhythms and melody. A native of Warsaw, Poland, and a pupil of the famous Polish master, Mlynarski, and of the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson, Kochanski first won acclaim in public concerts as a mere boy and has lately, in Europe, in this his early maturity, taken his unquestioned place among the finest executive artists of the day. He came to America from Russia where, having rebelled against the bolshevik government, which attempted to subsidize his talents, he was imprisoned and made his escape in December, 1919. Kochanski is to play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston as well as in Hartford.

The humorous tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," will be the closing number on this program. This work has become probably the most popular and admired of the number of great scores by the distinguished composer, who is now visiting America. Seats are now on sale at Sedgwick and Casey's, Asylum street.

From DEC 25 1921
COURANT
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES JANUARY 9

Brilliant and Imposing Program Arranged For Concert at Parsons's.

A program imposing by its brilliance and engrossing by its beauty and variety should make memorable the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra when this famous institution of New England gives its sole concert of the season in this city at Parsons's Theater on Monday evening, January 9, at 8:15. The principal number will be the celebrated symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which, steadily increasing in favor since it was composed a generation ago, has now taken its place as probably the finest symphony in modern music. This work is particularly admired for the stirring beauty of its melodious themes, for the English horn solo in the second movement, and for the noble and triumphant affirmation of religious faith with this the score closes.

The distinguished soloist at this concert will be Paul Kochanski, the young genius of the violin, who first came to this country last year and by his several concerts in New York and elsewhere impressed the public as one of the very finest violinists living. A native of Warsaw, Poland, and a pupil of the famous Polish master, Mlynarski, and of the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson, Kochanski first won acclaim in public concerts as a mere boy, and lately, in Europe in this his early mateurity, has taken his unquestioned place among the finest executive artists of the day. He came to America from Russia where, having rebelled against the bolshevik government, which attempted to subsidize his talents, he was imprisoned and made his escape in December, 1919. Kochanski is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston as well as in Hartford. He will be heard in Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs, a score of formidable difficulty but nevertheless captivating in its piquant rhythms and melody.

The humorous tone poem of Richard Straus, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," will be the closing number on this program. This work has become probably the most popular and admired of the number of great scores by the distinguished composer, who is now visiting America. Seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, Asylum street.

Morning Telegraph
New York

The following programs have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the third pair of New York concerts in Carnegie Hall on the evening of January 5 and the afternoon of the 7th.

For the evening concert: Handel's double concerto for string and wood wind orchestras, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera ballet "Mlada," arranged in concert form by the composer and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff"; Massenet's Overture to "Phedre" and three dances by De Falla, the Spanish composer, from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," which Mr. Monteux is giving its first performance in this country. For the matinee the novelty will be the Overture; Pastorale and Nocturne from Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, the daring young French composer and member of the celebrated Parisian "Six." This work was introduced to America by Pierre Monteux when he performed it in Boston last Spring. The remainder of the program will be Mozart's Symphony in D major (K. 385), Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Isle of the Dead," and the Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

[41]

From DEC 25 1921
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The principal number on the program to be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, January 6, will be the symphony in D minor by the Belgian master, Cesar Franck. This concert will be made additionally eventful by the appearance as soloist of Louise Homer. She will sing a principal aria from Mozart's late opera, "Titus." The orchestra will also present "Carnival in Paris" by Svendsen, and the third act of the opera ballet "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

From
EAGLE DEC 25 1921 D
Brooklyn, New York

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Louise Homer, the great American contralto, the beauty of whose tone is considered supreme by her countless admirers, will add further interest to a notable program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the Brooklyn season. This concert will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 6. The principal number will be the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which is said to receive at the hands of this great New England organization a performance of inspired eloquence scarcely excelled. Pierre Monteux, the confrere of Franck, led this score as the first number in his initial appearance as conductor of the orchestra and has repeated it subsequently in Boston, New York and elsewhere.

Mme. Homer will sing with the orchestra Bach's cantata, "Begone Thou Gloomy Shadows," and a principal aria from Mozart's late opera, "Titus." The Boston Symphony Orchestra will also present at this concert the riotous "Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, the noted Norwegian composer, and the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada," by Rimsky Korsakoff, which the famous composer has arranged in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff."

EAGLE DEC 25 1921 D
Brooklyn, New York

Boston Symphony.

The following programs have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in New York this season, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan 5 and 7. For the Thursday concert Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged in concert form by the composer and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff" Massenet's Overture to "Phedre" and three dances from the ballet by De Falla, the Spanish composer, entitled "El Sombrero de tres picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat"), which Mr. Monteux is giving its first performance in this country. For the Saturday matinee the novelty will be the Overture, Pastorale and Nocturne from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, the daring young French composer and member of the celebrated Parisian "Six." This work was introduced to America by Pierre Monteux when he performed it in Boston last spring. The remainder of the program will be Mozart's Symphony in D major (Koechel 385) Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Established 1881
FROM DEC 27 1921 K
COMMERCIAL
New York

For the third pair of concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, which will take place on Thursday evening, Jan. 5 and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 7, Pierre Monteux has compiled the following programs For Thursday concert Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras in F major Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydin, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by the composer in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff"; three dances from the ballet of the Spanish composer, de Falla, "El Sombrero de tres picos" ("The Three Cornered Hat"), which is being introduced to this country by Pierre Monteux, and Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." For the Saturday matinee, Mozart's Symphony in D major, Kochel 385; Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Island of the Dead"; the Oveture, Pastorale and Nocturne from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, the celebrity of the Parisian "Six." This work had its first performance in America when Mr. Monteux presented it in Boston last spring. The last number will be the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

DEC 31 1921 X
Evening Globe
New York

Next Thursday evening, Jan. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 7, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third regular pair of New York concerts for the present season. For the Thursday programme Pierre Monteux has selected Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras in F major, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Massenet's overture to "Phèdre," and two unusual numbers by Rimsky-Korsakoff and by deFalla, respectively. The first is the third act from the opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged by the Russian composer in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff." The music of the Spanish composer consists of three dances from his ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat"), which, written in characteristic Spanish rhythms, will have its first performance in New York on this occasion.

At the Saturday matinée Mozart's Symphony in D major (Köchel No. 504) will be played, also Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The notable novelty on this programme will be the overture, pastorale, and nocturne from the second orchestral suite of Darius Milhaud, the French composer, whose larger music will on this occasion have its first hearing in New York. Milhaud is a prominent member of the famous Parisian "Six," whose burlesque, "Le Boeuf sur le Toit," aroused a considerable storm of enthusiasm and opposition in London last year. This suite was first performed in this country when Mr. Monteux conducted it in Boston last spring.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer, who will sing Bach's cantata for solo voice, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and a recitative and rondo from Mozart's opera "Titus." Mozart's Symphony in D major will be preceded by Rossini's overture to the "Italians in Algiers." A new work by G. W. Chadwick entitled "Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra," and three dances from the ballet "El Sombraro de Tres Picos," by de Falla, Spanish composer, offered for the first time in America, are also on the program.

ADVTSR - DEC 25

Friday, at 2:30, and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10th program. Overture to "L'Italiana in Alghieri," Rossini; Symphony in D major (K 385), Mozart; Cantata for solo contralto, "Begone, ye gloomy shadows," Bach; Recitative and Rondo from "Titus," Mozart; Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra, Chadwick (first performance); dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," de Falla (first performance in the United States); soloist, Louise Homer.

GLOBE - DEC. 25

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISCELLANY MAKES AN AMUSING AFTERNOON

Pieces Recalling Again Mr. Monteux's Ways as Programme-Maker—Once More They Praise Him — From Mozart, and Also Rossini, to Russian Liapunov and Spanish de Falla—Variegated Entertainment

To read the programme set by Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, to hear the music it assembled, to watch the interest and applause of the audience, was to perceive how far he has liberalized the Symphony Concerts. Five numbers filled the list: The overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri," nearly forgotten opera buffa, dated 1813, by the Italian, Rossini; a symphony in D major, dated 1783, by the Viennese and the universal Mozart; a "Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra," written a dozen years ago by Mr. Chadwick of this town; a "Rhapsody on Folk-Songs of the Ukraine," devised, probably in the nineties, for piano and orchestra by the Russian, Liapunov; three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," ballet of 1919, by the Spaniard, de Falla. A miscellany of short pieces none too exacting; a century and a quarter spanned; five composers of as many different nationalities, styles, manners; an overture and a ballet from the theatre, two virtuoso-pieces, a symphony that in most ears was no more than entertainment. An audience besides, that listened and departed quite content.

Far, happily far, is all this from the days when a symphony, an overture, a concerto, and possibly a miscellaneous piece, were presumed to make an "ideal programme," German-like, rigid, "reverential" and much too often filled with the music customary to Teutonic concert-halls. As stiff in formula, as narrow in range was Mr. Rabaud's Parisian model, beginning with a classic German symphony, ending with an assortment of French pieces. Dimly, too, out of a past, more distant in rememberance than in actual time, rise the "unified" programmes of Dr. Muck—too uncompromisingly logical for the variable Anglo-Saxon mind, too exacting for pleasure-seeking in the concert-room. Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Paur, Mr. Fiedler, were relatively free-handed in range and choice, but they, no less than a Gericke or a Muck, might have shied at an overture to one of Rossini's minor operas, at two virtuoso-pieces in a single list; whereas not until Mr. Monteux's day has music of the dance gained just and exhilarating [illegible] elder conductors would have been at little pains to spy out a risen Spanish composer; not too often did they give ear to the secondary Russians. At heart, they preferred the standardized, the institutional music—or music written in imitation or extension thereof. If there must be intruders, if the catholic tradition of the Symphony Concerts did now and then spur, be ye sure that the newcomers were hallowed of Berlin, of Paris, of Vienna or other "capital of music."

Mr. Monteux has departed from these precedents, waived these limitations. Within the longest memory, the programmes of the Symphony Concerts have hardly been so well made. Hackneyed, moribund "repertory pieces" seldom cumber them. The living classics are not repeated until they become routine alike to orchestra and audience. Overlooked music of the illustrious is re-discovered and restored for interesting moments. The more characteristic work of the secondary moderns gains place and gives pleasure. Farther than ever before, over the whole world that writes and hears music—from Spain to Scandinavia, from Boston to Moscow—ranges Mr. Monteux. None of his predecessors has been so open-eared to the composers, rising, risen, barely discovered, of our immediate day. If they have been brave and bold in the newer ways, so also has been he; while the consequent praise or blame—or indifference—has fallen soonest and most directly on his head.

In the choice of pieces, Mr. Monteux has made the Symphony Concerts, as they should be, a fostering chronicle of the music of our time. He is conductor-curator of no museum of the classics, preferring to keep the better few alive in their native eloquence. With the established moderns, he has not a prejudice of nationality or school, of matter or manner. He hears music as music—for intrinsic worth, significance, pleasure. Being quite human and playing, presumably, to as human a public, he now and then dares, as he did yesterday, a programme that sufficed because it was steadily and variously amusing. Such bits deserve place in the long scheme of our Symphony Concerts. The priests of music, if they repine, may nurse dignity at home.

Item by item, each piece justified itself or was justified by pleasured hearers. True, Mr. Chadwick's music for orchestra and organ is not exactly work of the imagination. As expert craftsman rather than as inventive and individual composer he wrote it. The intrinsic quality of his breeding theme the fancy, the freshness, or the felicity of his variations, the verve and the plasticity of his fugue are not his primary purpose with the piece. They are means to an end, and that end is the combination and contrast of organ and orchestra under the conditions of this day. Mr. Chadwick has set himself a problem of skill and scholarship; in degree he brings mind and imagination to the solution, but not as he would, and as he has, employed them in composition for its own sake. To ask too much of this "Theme, Variations and Fugue" is to mistake the composer's purpose. To reproach him with the commonplaces of melody, modulation, sentiment, once and again sounding from the pages, is to forget that he was rightly occupied with the mating and the parting of his two media. If the organ must be heard at the Symphony Concerts, if eminent organists, like other noted virtuosi, must have place there Mr. Chadwick's music—and Mr Snow to play it, serve the turn.

In similar case was Liapunov's "Rhapsody upon Ukrainian Folk-Tunes." (Only one was readily discoverable as the music swiftly passed.) If the enthusiasts are to be believed, all things are possible with folk-song and folk-dance. A whole music-drama, to say nothing of symphony or tone-poem, may be made from them. if the composer have the true faith and fervor. Less hot, perhaps, with folk-song gospel, Liapunov has been content to write a piece for piano and orchestra in familiar Russian fashion. The music exacts much of the pianist's skill, fluency, pliancy and élan, but repays him with displayful opportunity. Fancy and dexterity speed and vary the composer's workmanship—fancy with the music, fancy plus dexterity with the piano. Folk-melody, folk-rhythms give pungency to the whole. So was the Rhapsody designed, so it is written. There was nothing else to ask except the mingled precision and freedom, the elastic modulation, the glitter of tone, the snap of rhythm, the glint of ornament, the pervading animation of Mr. Schmitz, playing the piano part. Strange that he should almost always be accessory (as with Mr. Carpenter's Concertino) or substitute (as for the disabled Mme. Homer yesterday) at the Symphony Concerts.

Gay are the melodies of Rossini's old overture; he writes them for instruments as though he believed they also could sing. They did yesterday from the lips and the fingers of Mr. Monteux's choirs. Amusing as the overture runs course are Rossini's suspensive pauses, his advances and retreats, his "grand crescendo" at the end. They were his way with such pieces, the way also of his day in the opera house. It were easy to make the music sound both thin and blatant, faded and trumpery. Mr. Monteux caught the characteristic, the enduring quality; phrased and modulated the instrumental song; set in artfully the suspenses, resumptions and turns, graduated and rhythmed the climax, gave the whole music sunny sheen. Thereby it is still fresh; while most else in "L'Italiana in Algeri," resurrected at the Metropolitan two years ago, has crumpled and shredded.

As fortunate in turn were orchestra and conductor with Mozart's little symphony. They kept the balance and the euphony; they gained the lightness and the elegance which such music invites. They were supple with outline and progress; at every turn the tone was transparent, the pace elastic. So played, the first movement went swiftly, brightly, with flash now and then of Mozartian fire; while Mozartian melancholy shadowed gently the succeeding song. Steadily conductor and orchestra better their version of eighteenth-century music. Hitherto it has been the weakest spot in their new armor.

The final and the novel pieces of the day were the three dances out of de Falla's ballet of "The Three-Cornered Hat," piece and composer already known to these columns. Upon them, whether they were the Dance of the Neighbors, the Dance of the Miller or the rejoicing of the general Jota of the Finale, fell the fate that for a while will light upon all such truly Spanish music outside its own Spain. The listener expects to hear one more variation of the Spanish pieces (so called) of, say, Rimsky-Korsakov and a horde of minor composers. Or else his ears are attuned to the Spanish manner of Debussy in "Iberia," of Ravel or of Chabrier in Spanish Rhapsodies. The same listener in the opera house anticipates Spanish opera in the manner of 'Carmen' and is puzzled when he hears it in native voice in the music-dramas of Laparra. In native voice, upon foundation and against background of veritable Andalusian folk-tune and folk-rhythm went these dances of de Falla before a puzzled audience hearing much but comprehending too little. A second hearing a second comment will be more enlightening.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. DEC. 31

LA BOSTON SYMPHONY

L'un des plus beaux concerts de mémoire de musiciens nous fut donné lundi dernier par l'orchestre symphonique de Boston, sous la direction de Pierre Monteux et avec l'éminent compositeur Vincent d'Indy, au théâtre St-Denis. En voici le programme : Symphonie héroïque (No 3) de Beethoven ; Concerto en ré, pour piano, No 12, de Bach ; Deux Nocturnes : Nuages, Fêtes, de Debussy ; Istar, variations symphoniques, de Vincent d'Indy ; Marche hongroise, La Damnation de Faust, Berlioz.

M. Monteux, le chef d'orchestre dont la sobriété des gestes n'enlève rien à son empire sur l'instrument parfait qu'est le Boston Symphony Orchestra, s'est révélé à nous un musicien profond et un penseur aux larges conceptions, capable d'intéresser son public indépendamment des oeuvres qu'il interprète. D'un regard, d'un mouvement, sans la moindre affectation ou souci de jeter de la poudre aux yeux, il commande et obtient les effets désirés : la phrase s'élève ou s'estompe dans les différents groupes d'instruments selon son importance, suivant le degré de force requis pour présenter le thème suivant l'intention de l'auteur. Et les musiciens — tous des exécutants éprouvés — le suivent docilement, confiants en la valeur de sa direction, en la sûreté de son talent. C'est merveille d'écouter ce magnifique ensemble sonore, de sentir vibrer tous ces éléments dont l'esprit tendu n'a qu'une pensée, celle de l'âme qui les dirige.

Dès les premières notes de l'Allegro con brio (Symphonie), on a l'impression d'une sérénité qui règne sur toute l'organisation : le fondu, l'unité, la chaleur des sonorités, tout concourt à satisfaire les sens excités par l'attente de quelque chose d'extraordinaire. Quelle belle expression de tristesse plane sur cette Marche funèbre à l'allure pompeuse, solennelle, où l'on fait connaissance avec le groupe des bois qui ne peut pas être dépassé en beauté tonale. Dans ce mouvement, la richesse des nuances est incomparable ; Pierre Monteux y déploie une maîtrise complète, un doigter sûr, d'une élévation artistique pleine de noblesse. Le Scherzo est enlevé avec une maestria sans pareille, une légèreté, une grâce vraiment captivantes ; dans le Trio qui le termine, on admire le jeu des cors qui surmontent les difficultés sans le moindre effort et avec des sonorités exquises. Le Finale achève de nous conquérir. Il y a là des traits de violons à l'unisson qui sont rendus magnifiquement, comme par un seul instrument.

Les Nocturnes de Debussy ont été composés en 1899, à une époque pourtant assez rapprochée où l'auteur de Pelléas et Mélisande était considéré comme un compositeur dévoyé, incompréhensible. Que de chemin parcouru depuis! On voit son nom sur tous les programmes et, parmi ses oeuvres les plus jouées, les deux nocturnes qui sont de larges tableaux naturistes ; l'école impressionniste picturale a sans doute eu quelque part d'influence dans leur écriture orchestrale. Les Variations symphoniques d'Istar, sous l'oeil approbateur de l'auteur, reçoivent une exécution digne du maître qui fut le plus brillant élève de César Franck. La Marche hongroise, à l'allure guerrière et bien rythmée, remporte un succès énorme et les applaudissements se prolongent, mais M. Monteux, fidèle aux traditions de l'orchestre, refuse de jouer le rappel réclamé par l'auditoire.

L'apparition de M. d'Indy en scène fut le signal d'une démonstration chaleureuse que le public lui accorda spontanément. Simplement, le distingué musicien se met au piano. De la façon la plus lucide, avec une clarté de compréhension transcendante, il exécute le Concerto de Bach qui devient sous ses doigts une oeuvre filtrée comme de l'eau de roche, pure comme le diamant. Des auditions comme celle-là restent gravées pour toujours dans le souvenir de ceux qui ont le bonheur d'être au nombre des assistants. On fait une ovation au pianiste, on en profite pour saluer en même temps l'un des plus grands représentants de l'école française de musique. Dix fois il est obligé de reparaître sur l'estrade et c'est à grand peine que les acclamations cessent.

Pendant la soirée, les membres de la Chorale Brassard présentèrent des palmes à M. d'Indy, en témoignage d'estime et d'admiration pour sa haute personnalité.

C. O. L.

E-CANADA-MUSICAL-DEC. 17.

From DEC 25 1921
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The principal number on the program to be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, January 6, will be the symphony in D minor by the Belgian master, Cesar Franck. This concert will be made additionally eventful by the appearance as soloist of Louise Homer. She will sing a principal aria from Mozart's late opera, "Titus." The orchestra will also present "Carnival in Paris" by Svendsen, and the third act of the opera ballet "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

EAGLE DEC 25 1921 D
Brooklyn, New York

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Louise Homer, the great American contralto, the beauty of whose tones is considered supreme by her countless admirers, will add further interest to a notable program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the Brooklyn season. This concert will take place in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 6. The principal number will be the Symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which is said to receive at the hands of this great New England organization a performance of inspired eloquence scarcely excelled. Pierre Monteux, the confrere of Franck, led this score as the first number in his initial appearance as conductor of the orchestra and has repeated it subsequently in Boston, New York and elsewhere.

Mme. Homer will sing with the orchestra Bach's cantata, "Begone Thou Gloomy Shadows," and a principal aria from Mozart's late opera, "Titus." The Boston Symphony Orchestra will also present at this concert the riotous "Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, the noted Norwegian composer, and the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada," by Rimsky Korsakoff, which the famous composer has arranged in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff."

EAGLE DEC 25 1921 D
Brooklyn, New York

Boston Symphony.

The following programs have been arranged by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in New York this season, which will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan 5 and 7. For the Thursday concert Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged in concert form by the composer an entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff" Massenet's Overture to "Phedre" an three dances from the ballet by D Falla, the Spanish composer, entitle "El Sombrero de tres picos" ("Th Three-Cornered Hat"), which Mr Monteux is giving its first performance in this country. For the Saturday matinee the novelty will be th Overture, Pastorale and Nocturn from the Second Orchestral Suite b Darius Milhaud, the daring young French composer and member of th celebrated Parisian "Six." This work was introduced to America by Pierr Monteux when he performed it i Boston last spring. The remainde of the program will be Mozart's Symphony in D major (Koechel 385) Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Island of the Dead," and the Polovtsia Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

Established 1881
FROM DEC 27 1921 K
COMMERCIAL
New York

For the third pair of concerts to b given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, which wil take place on Thursday evening, Jan. 5 and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 7, Pierr Monteux has compiled the followin programs For Thursday concert Handel's double concerto for strin and woodwind orchestras in F majo Brahms' Variations on a Theme b Haydin, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada," arranged by th composer in concert form and entitle "Night on Mount Triglaff"; thre dances from the ballet of the Spanis composer, de Falla, "El Sombrero d tres picos" ("The Three Cornere Hat"), which is being introduced t this country by Pierre Monteux, an Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Fo the Saturday matinee, Mozart's Symphony in D major, Kochel 385; Rachmaninoff's tone poem, "The Island o the Dead"; the Oveture, Pastorale an Nocturne from the Second Orchestra Suite by Darius Milhaud, the celebrit of the Parisian "Six." This work ha its first performance in America whe Mr. Monteux presented it in Bosto last spring. The last number will b the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin' opera, "Prince Igor."

Evening Globe DEC 31 1921 X
New York

Next Thursday evening, Jan. 5, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 7, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third regular pair of New York concerts for the present season. For the Thursday programme Pierre Monteux has selected Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras in F major, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Massenet's overture to "Phèdre," and two unusual numbers by Rimsky-Korsakoff and by deFalla, respectively. The first is the third act from the opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged by the Russian composer in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff." The music of the Spanish composer consists of three dances from his ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat"), which, written in characteristic Spanish rhythms, will have its first performance in New York on this occasion.

At the Saturday matinée Mozart's Symphony in D major (Köchel No. 504) will be played, also Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The notable novelty on this programme will be the overture, pastorale, and nocturne from the second orchestral suite of Darius Milhaud, the French composer, whose larger music will on this occasion have its first hearing in New York. Milhaud is a prominent member of the famous Parisian "Six," whose burlesque, "Le Boeuf sur le Toit," aroused a considerable storm of enthusiasm and opposition in London last year. This suite was first performed in this country when Mr. Monteux conducted it in Boston last spring.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer, who will sing Bach's cantata for solo voice, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and a recitative and rondo from Mozart's opera "Titus." Mozart's Symphony in D major will be preceded by Rossini's overture to the "Italians in Algiers." A new work by G. W. Chadwick entitled "Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra," and three dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de Tres Picos," by de Falla, Spanish composer, offered for the first time in America, are also on the program.

ADVTSR - DEC 25

Friday, at 2:30, and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 10th program. Overture to "L'Italiana in Alghieri," Rossini; Symphony in D major (K 385), Mozart; Cantata for solo contralto, "Begone, ye gloomy shadows," Bach; Recitative and Rondo from "Titus," Mozart; Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra, Chadwick (first performance); dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," de Falla (first performance in the United States); soloist, Louise Homer.

GLOBE - DEC. 25

LA BOSTON SYMPHONY

L'un des plus beaux concerts de mémoire de musiciens nous fut donné lundi dernier par l'orchestre symphonique de Boston, sous la direction de Pierre Monteux et avec l'éminent compositeur Vincent d'Indy, au théâtre St-Denis. En voici le programme : Symphonie héroïque (No 3) de Beethoven ; Concerto en ré, pour piano, No 12, de Bach ; Deux Nocturnes : Nuages, Fêtes, de Debussy ; Istar, variations symphoniques, de Vincent d'Indy ; Marche hongroise, La Damnation de Faust, Berlioz.

M. Monteux, le chef d'orchestre dont la sobriété des gestes n'enlève rien à son empire sur l'instrument parfait qu'est le Boston Symphony Orchestra, s'est révélé à nous un musicien profond et un penseur aux larges conceptions, capable d'intéresser son public indépendamment des oeuvres qu'il interprète. D'un regard, d'un mouvement, sans la moindre affectation ou souci de jeter de la poudre aux yeux, il commande et obtient les effets désirés : la phrase s'élève ou s'estompe dans les différents groupes d'instruments selon son importance, suivant le degré de force requis pour présenter le thème suivant l'intention de l'auteur. Et les musiciens — tous des exécutants éprouvés — le suivent docilement, confiants en la valeur de sa direction, en la sûreté de son talent. C'est merveille d'écouter ce magnifique ensemble sonore, de sentir vibrer tous ces éléments dont l'esprit tendu n'a qu'une pensée, celle de l'âme qui les dirige.

Dès les premières notes de l'Allegro con brio (Symphonie), on a l'impression d'une sérénité qui règne sur toute l'organisation : le fondu, l'unité, la chaleur des sonorités, tout concourt à satisfaire les sens excités par l'attente de quelque chose d'extraordinaire. Quelle belle expression de tristesse plane sur cette Marche funèbre à l'allure pompeuse, solennelle, où l'on fait connaissance avec le groupe des bois qui ne peut pas être dépassé en beauté tonale. Dans ce mouvement, la richesse des nuances est incomparable ; Pierre Monteux y déploie une maîtrise complète, un doigter sûr, d'une élévation artistique pleine de noblesse. Le Scherzo est enlevé avec une maestria sans pareille, une légèreté, une grâce vraiment captivantes ; dans le Trio qui le termine, on admire le jeu des cors qui surmontent les difficultés sans le moindre effort et avec des sonorités exquises. Le Finale achève de nous conquérir. Il y a là des traits de violons à l'unisson qui sont rendus magnifiquement, comme par un seul instrument.

Les Nocturnes de Debussy ont été composés en 1899, à une époque pourtant assez rapprochée où l'auteur de Pelléas et Mélisande était considéré comme un compositeur dévoyé, incompréhensible. Que de chemin parcouru depuis! On voit son nom sur tous les programmes et, parmi ses oeuvres les plus jouées, les deux nocturnes qui sont de larges tableaux naturistes ; l'école impressionniste picturale a sans doute eu quelque part d'influence dans leur écriture orchestrale. Les Variations symphoniques d'Istar, sous l'oeil approbateur de l'auteur, reçoivent une exécution digne du maître qui fut le plus brillant élève de César Franck. La Marche hongroise, à l'allure guerrière et bien rythmée, remporte un succès énorme et les applaudissements se prolongent, mais M. Monteux, fidèle aux traditions de l'orchestre, refuse de jouer le rappel réclamé par l'auditoire.

L'apparition de M. d'Indy en scène fut le signal d'une démonstration chaleureuse que le public lui accorda spontanément. Simplement, le distingué musicien se met au piano. De la façon la plus lucide, avec une clarté de compréhension transcendante, il exécute le Concerto de Bach qui devient sous ses doigts une oeuvre filtrée comme de l'eau de roche, pure comme le diamant. Des auditions comme celle-là restent gravées pour toujours dans le souvenir de ceux qui ont le bonheur d'être au nombre des assistants. On fait une ovation au pianiste, on en profite pour saluer en même temps l'un des plus grands représentants de l'école française de musique. Dix fois il est obligé de reparaître sur l'estrade et c'est à grand peine que les acclamations cessent.

Pendant la soirée, les membres de la Chorale Brassard présentèrent des palmes à M. d'Indy, en témoignage d'estime et d'admiration pour sa haute personnalité.

C. O. L.

E-CANADA-MUSICAL - DEC. 17

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISCELLANY MAKES AN AMUSING AFTERNOON

Pieces Recalling Again Mr. Monteux's Ways as Programme-Maker—Once More They Praise Him — From Mozart, and Also Rossini, to Russian Liapunov and Spanish de Falla—Variegated Entertainment

To read the programme set by Mr. Monteux at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, to hear the music it assembled, to watch the interest and applause of the audience, was to perceive how far he has liberalized the Symphony Concerts. Five numbers filled the list: The overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri," nearly forgotten opera buffa, dated 1813, by the Italian, Rossini; a symphony in D major, dated 1783, by the Viennese and the universal Mozart; a "Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra," written a dozen years ago by Mr. Chadwick of this town; a "Rhapsody on Folk-Songs of the Ukraine," devised, probably in the nineties, for piano and orchestra by the Russian, Liapunov; three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," ballet of 1919, by the Spaniard, de Falla. A miscellany of short pieces none too exacting; a century and a quarter spanned; five composers of as many different nationalities, styles, manners; an overture and a ballet from the theatre, two virtuoso-pieces, a symphony that in most ears was no more than entertainment. An audience besides, that listened and departed quite content.

Far, happily far, is all this from the days when a symphony, an overture, a concerto, and possibly a miscellaneous piece, were presumed to make an "ideal programme," German-like, rigid, "reverential" and much too often filled with the music customary to Teutonic concert-halls. As stiff in formula, as narrow in range was Mr. Rabaud's Parisian model, beginning with a classic German symphony, ending with an assortment of French pieces. Dimly, too, out of a past, more distant in rememberance than in actual time, rise the "unified" programmes of Dr. Muck—too uncompromisingly logical for the variable Anglo-Saxon mind, too exacting for pleasure-seeking in the concert-room. Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Paur, Mr. Fiedler, were relatively free-handed in range and choice, but they, no less than a Gericke or a Muck, might have shied at an overture to one of Rossini's minor operas, at two virtuoso-pieces in a single list; whereas not until Mr. Monteux's day has music of the dance gained just and exhilarating place at the Symphony Concerts. The elder conductors would have been at little pains to spy out a risen Spanish composer; not too often did they give ear to the secondary Russians. At heart, they preferred the standardized, the institutional music—or music written in imitation or extension thereof. If there must be intruders, if the catholic tradition of the Symphony Concerts did now and then spur, be ye sure that the newcomers were hallowed of Berlin, of Paris, of Vienna or other "capital of music."

Mr. Monteux has departed from these precedents, waived these limitations. Within the longest memory, the programmes of the Symphony Concerts have hardly been so well made. Hackneyed, moribund "repertory pieces" seldom cumber them. The living classics are not repeated until they become routine alike to orchestra and audience. Overlooked music of the illustrious is re-discovered and restored for interesting moments. The more characteristic work of the secondary moderns gains place and gives pleasure. Farther than ever before, over the whole world that writes and hears music—from Spain to Scandinavia, from Boston to Moscow—ranges Mr. Monteux. None of his predecessors has been so open-eared to the composers, rising, risen, barely discovered, of our immediate day. If they have been brave and bold in the newer ways, so also has been he; while the consequent praise or blame—or indifference—has fallen soonest and most directly on his head.

In the choice of pieces, Mr. Monteux has made the Symphony Concerts, as they should be, a fostering chronicle of the music of our time. He is conductor-curator of no museum of the classics, preferring to keep the better few alive in their native eloquence. With the established moderns, he has not a prejudice of nationality or school, of matter or manner. He hears music as music—for intrinsic worth, significance, pleasure. Being quite human and playing, presumably, to as human a public, he now and then dares, as he did yesterday, a programme that sufficed because it was steadily and variously amusing. Such lists deserve place in the long scheme of our Symphony Concerts. The prigs of music, if they repine, may nurse dignity at home.

Item by item, each piece justified itself or was justified by pleasured hearers. True, Mr. Chadwick's music for orchestra and organ is not exactly work of the imagination. As expert craftsman rather than as inventive and individual composer he wrote it. The intrinsic quality of his breeding theme the fancy, the freshness, or the felicity of his variations, the verve and the plasticity of his fugue are not his primary purpose with the piece. They are means to an end, and that end is the combination and contrast of organ and orchestra under the conditions of this day. Mr. Chadwick has set himself a problem of skill and scholarship; in degree he brings mind and imagination to the solution, but not as he would, and as he has, employed them in composition for its own sake. To ask too much of this "Theme, Variations and Fugue" is to mistake the composer's purpose. To reproach him with the commonplaces of melody, modulation, sentiment, once and again sounding from the pages, is to forget that he was rightly occupied with the mating and the parting of his two media. If the organ must be heard at the Symphony Concerts, if eminent organists, like other noted virtuosi, must have place there Mr. Chadwick's music—and Mr Snow to play it, serve the turn.

In similar case was Liapunov's "Rhapsody upon Ukrainian Folk-Tunes." (Only one was readily discoverable as the music swiftly passed) If the enthusiasts are to be believed, all things are possible with folk-song and folk-dance. A whole music-drama, to say nothing of symphony or tone-poem, may be made from them, if the composer have the true faith and fervor. Less hot, perhaps, with folk-song gospel, Liapunov has been content to write a piece for piano and orchestra in familiar Russian fashion. The music exacts much of the pianist's skill, fluency, pliancy and élan, but repays him with displayful opportunity. Fancy and dexterity speed and vary the composer's workmanship—fancy with the music, fancy plus dexterity with the piano. Folk-melody, folk-rhythms give pungency to the whole. So was the Rhapsody designed, so it is written. There was nothing else to ask except the mingled precision and freedom, the elastic modulation, the glitter of tone, the snap of rhythm, the glint of ornament, the pervading animation of Mr. Schmitz, playing the piano part. Strange that he should almost always be accessory (as with Mr. Carpenter's Concertino) or substitute (as for the disabled Mme. Homer yesterday) at the Symphony Concerts.

Gay are the melodies of Rossini's old overture; he writes them for instruments as though he believed they also could sing. They did yesterday from the lips and the fingers of Mr. Monteux's choirs. Amusing as the overture runs course are Rossini's suspensive pauses, his advances and retreats, his "grand crescendo" at the end. They were his way with such pieces, the way also of his day in the opera house. It were easy to make the music sound both thin and blatant, faded and trumpery. Mr. Monteux caught the characteristic, the enduring quality; phrased and modulated the instrumental song; set in artfully the suspenses, resumptions and turns, graduated and rhythmed the climax, gave the whole music sunny sheen. Thereby it is still fresh; while most else in "L'Italiana in Algeri," resurrected at the Metropolitan two years ago, has crumpled and shredded.

As fortunate in turn were orchestra and conductor with Mozart's little symphony. They kept the balance and the euphony; they gained the lightness and the elegance which such music invites. They were supple with outline and progress; at every turn the tone was transparent, the pace elastic. So played, the first movement went swiftly, brightly, with flash now and then of Mozartian fire; while Mozartian melancholy shadowed gently the succeeding song. Steadily conductor and orchestra better their version of eighteenth-century music. Hitherto it has been the weakest spot in their new armor.

The final and the novel pieces of the day were the three dances out of de Falla's ballet of "The Three-Cornered Hat," piece and composer already known to these columns. Upon them, whether they were the Dance of the Neighbors, the Dance of the Miller or the rejoicing of the general Jota of the Finale, fell the fate that for a while will light upon all such truly Spanish music outside its own Spain. The listener expects to hear one more variation of the Spanish pieces (so called) of, say, Rimsky-Korsakov and a horde of minor composers. Or else his ears are attuned to the Spanish manner of Debussy in "Iberia,' of Ravel or of Chabrier in Spanish Rhapsodies. The same listener in the opera house anticipates Spanish opera in the manner of 'Carmen' and is puzzled when he hears it in native voice in the music-dramas of Laparra. In native voice, upon foundation and against background of veritable Andalusian folk-tune and folk-rhythm went these dances of de Falla before a puzzled audience hearing much but comprehending too little A second hearing a second comment will be more enlightening.

H. T. PARKER

TRANS. DEC. 31

[42]

Thursday evening, Jan. [illegible] Theatre at Cambridge, the fourth of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paul Kochanski, musician, virtuoso and remarkable as both, for assisting violinist.

[illegible]day afternoon, Jan. 13, in Symphony Hall, the eleventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mr. Kochanski as assisting violinist. The programme traverses a Concerto of Handel for String and Wind Choirs; Brahms's Variations in a Theme of Haydn; Bruch's Scottish Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra; Ravel's newest piece, a "choreographic poem" by title "The Waltz."

Monday evening, Jan. 16, in Symphony Hall, the second in the series of "special" Symphony Concerts, designed for a more miscellaneous public than frequents them in regular course and well begun a month ago. Mr. Monteux will set an interesting programme. Miss Estelle Liebling will be the assisting singer.

TRANS-DEC.31

NOVELTIES ON SYMPHONY BILL

Two novelties, one chosen almost at the eleventh hour, mark this week's Symphony program.

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

One is Liapounoff's "Rhapsody on Folk Songs of the Ukraine," for piano and orchestra, which brought forward as soloist E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist. The other, three dances from a Spanish ballet by Manuel DeFalla, was given its first performance in this country yesterday.

The Russian work gave the pianist rather than the orchestra an opportunity to make a signal success. Mr. Schmitz was recalled several times after his brilliant performance. DeFalla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," was performed by Diaghilev's Russian dancers in Paris two years ago. Even without the dancers it is highly entertaining. It is music of the sort that Mr. Monteux interprets with singular effectiveness.

Rossini's light and melodious "Italiana in Algeri" overture, performed for the first time at these concerts; Mozart's classic symphony in D major and the "Theme, Variations and Fugue," for organ and orchestra, by G. W. Chadwick, the Boston composer, complete the thoroughly enjoyable program, which will be repeated tonight. Albert W. Snow, organist, distinguished himself in the Chadwick number.

ADVTS-DEC.31

Second Symphony Concert

Estelle Liebling, the noted soprano, will appear as soloist at the second concert of the extra series of five which are being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. This concert will take place on Monday evening, Jan. 16.

TRAV. DEC-31

SCHMITZ IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Pianist Substitutes for Louise Homer and Performs With Great Skill

The soloist at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday was E. Robert Schmitz, the pianist who was hastily substituted for Louise Homer, indisposed. He performed with great skill, considering the lack of rehearsals due to the short notice, a rhapsody for piano and orchestra by Liapounoff, which is based on folk songs of the Ukraine. A very brilliant and effective piece of composition by a little-known composer.

The symphony was Mozart's in D major, a work which was performed in a rather interesting manner. The Rossini overture, "L'Italiana in Algiers," was done briskly and brilliantly. Chadwick's Theme, Variations and Fugue, for organ and orchestra, was given a splendid performance, and one which must have delighted the composer, who was present.

The novelty on the program was three dances from a ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," written by Manuel de Falla, a young Spanish composer, for the Diaghileff Russian ballet [illegible] ago, music which is fantas[illegible] in its rhythms and agree[illegible].

MORE NEW WORKS BY SYMPHONY

Robert Schmitz Soloist in Place of Mme. Homer

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mme. Louise Homer having been suddenly taken ill, E. Robert Schmitz was piano soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Snow, organist of the Boston Symphony, was soloist in the performance of George W. Chadwick's "Theme, Variations and Fugue" for organ and orchestra. There were three "first performances." Rossini's overture to his forgotten opera, "L'Italiana in Algeri," and Liapounoff's "Rhapsody on Folk Songs of the Ukraine" for piano and orchestra were played for the first time at these concerts. Three dances from the ballet of De Falla, "The Three Cornered Hat," were played for the first time in America.

IMPRESS BY INGENUITY

De Falla's music was suggested by a scenario which Sergei Diaghileff, director of the Russian Ballet, offered the composer when his troupe was travelling in Spain. The first public performance of the ballet was in 1919. Much has been said and printed about it, and about the brilliant musical personality of the composer. The three dances heard yesterday impressed rather by their ingenuity, their appropriateness for dancing, and brilliancy of orchestration, than by latent originality. There are many effects and many harmonies, written by other composers, and found in other of the scores to which Mr. Diaghileff's Ballet has danced in Europe and America, which De Falla uses skilfully.

Despite the fact that this man is a Spaniard, much influenced in composing by modern French idioms, we prefer for musical pictures of Spain the "Espana" of Chabrier, the Frenchman; the "Iberia" of Debussy, the Frenchman; the "Spanish Rhapsody" by Ravel, the Frenchman. In a word, modern Frenchmen, out with their palettes to get musical impressions of Spain, may not be more plausible, but are certainly more interesting, than modern Spaniards who have taken their palettes and their sketch books with them to Paris.

Liapounoff's Rhapsody

The word "themes" is used in the title of Liapounoff's Rhapsody of which the piano part was played in so masterly a manner by Mr. Schmitz. We detected but one theme that amounted to anything, a theme subjected to many transformations, advantageous for a virtuoso display by the pianist, clever rather than of musical value on the part of the composer. But it is not astonishing that Mr. Schmitz was so enthusiastically applauded. He played with dash, speed, and aplomb which would have made a poorer piece than this rather poor piece of Liapounoff effective, exciting.

After all, the one unmistakable masterwork on the programme was the symphony of Mozart, (D major, Kochel no. 504). It is not perhaps of the sustained strength of the great three symphonies of this master, but the first movement is highly dramatic, the orchestration is often modern in spirit, and the whole work is beautiful, and inspired. Furthermore, there is the musical form. Form is hooted at by some very young people as if it were nothing but a skeleton of a composition, a bone-dry framework on which music is hung. Mozart's form is in itself noble. Sometimes it is Attic in its simplicity and purity of line.

Rossini knew Liszt, knew the tendencies of the modern school of his later years, even read the score of one of Liszt's symphonies. And shut up. In his last years he suddenly stopped composing. Perhaps he had a conscience, and knew that he had nothing for the new era.

As for the music of Mr. Chadwick, it is in greater part commonplace, sentimental. The composition is written by a past master of instrumentation. There are effective and practical combinations of the organ, excellently played by Mr. Snow, and the orchestra. Let those especially interested in such matters give thanks. This is far, indeed, from the Chadwick of the early "Melpomene" overture, or the later "Symphonic Sketches," or certain rousing pages of the symphonic poem, "Tam O' Shanter."

POST-DEC.31.

LOUISE HOMER ILL, SCHMITZ SOLOIST

Plays With the Orchestra Liapounoff's Rhapsody

Owing to the illness of Louise Homer, E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, took her place as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played with the orchestra Liapounoff's rhapsody on a Ukrainian folk theme, previously unheard at these concerts. Mr. Schmitz' performance had his usual restless technical fluency and rather brittle quality of tone. He is a competent pianist, rather than a genius.

Liapounoff's rhapsody was announced as on "Ukrainian themes," but there seemed to be only one fragment of a tune in it, which was treated at length, with none too subtle technique. Such hammering in of the obvious as this betrays a lamentable poverty of melodic inspiration.

Manuel de Falla's dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," with which Mr Diaghilev's company has recently delighted London and Paris, is the work of a composer with far more melodic invention and subtlety of technique than Liapounoff.

The themes have the characteristic rhythms of Spanish popular music, but they are obviously the product of a sensitive, musically sophisticated imagination. The orchestration is brilliant after the manner of Ravel.

This piece is the best Spanish orchestral music yet heard in Boston, easy to like, yet not banal or crude. It was unusually well played and very warmly received.

Another somewhat antiquated "novelty" was the spirited overture to Rossini's opera "L'Italiana in Algeri," noisy, light-hearted, rather vulgar music of a century ago, but still very much alive in the excellent performance.

Mozart's D-major symphony was played with more brilliance and precision than Mr Monteux has yet elicited from the orchestra in his music. The first and last movements are among Mozart's finest, the slow movement has a curiously romantic theme, with the imaginative quality of Beethoven at his worst.

The other number was Mr Chadwick's theme, variations and fugue, written to illustrate the possibilities of the organ as an adjunct to the orchestra. The music is intrinsically commonplace. The variation "alla pastorella" in particular, is utterly unworthy of the composer of such individual and dignified pieces as the "Melpomene" overture. But Mr Chadwick was presumably interested in technical rather than imaginative problems in composing this music.

It fails to convince the listener that the organ can duplicate the wood wind, strings and brass of an orchestra with any success. The great organ music is still that which like Bach's depends for its effect on the sustained tones, volume of sound and distinctive diapason quality of the instrument. Mr Snow was the assisting organist.

GLOBE-DEC.31.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on December 30 with the following program: Rossini, Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri"; Mozart, Symphony in D major; Chadwick's Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra (Albert W. Snow, organist); Liapounoff, Rhapsody on Folk Songs of the Ukraine for Piano and Orchestra (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist); DeFalla, Three Dances from the "Three-Cornered Hat."

This program was relatively uninteresting—to record a merely personal impression. Rossini's overture, in spite of its light-hearted gayety is but poor stuff musically and even Mr. Monteux's careful reading and the superlatively fine playing of the solo wood-wind instruments of the orchestra failed to make it acceptable music for a symphony concert. The Mozart Symphony is one of the composer's least striking productions and while no composition of the great master can be characterized as uninteresting, yet the andante and finale of this symphony are not Mozart at his best. Next followed Mr. Chadwick's theme, variations and fugue for orchestra and organ which, although written many years ago, still retains much of its charm and freshness. There are many clever effects and we know of no piece in which the organ is so skillfully combined and contrasted with the orchestra. It opens up to the composer seeking after novel combinations, an absolutely new field of tonal combinations.

Mr. Schmitz is no newcomer to the Symphony concerts and has often given evidence of his talents both as a pianist and as a musician, two terms which are unfortunately not always synonymous; yet the vehicles which he has chosen for the display of these talents have not been fortunate. He is a pianist who is not content to follow the stereotyped fashions of many of his confreres and often, as every good artist should be, he is willing to sacrifice opportunities for personal display in order that an interesting composition may be brought to a performance or that a more familiar one may be given an adequate interpretation. But surely this artistic self denial may be carried to extremes and for what reason Mr. Schmitz chose to appear in the Liapounoff Rhapsody it is difficult to discover. Its only reason for existence is as a work for vir[illegible] display [illegible] fails of its purpose, for many of the most brilliant passages in the piano part are obscured by the heavy orchestration. One realizes the difficulties which the soloist is surmounting at every moment, but this realization is brought about through the gestures and movements of the pianist rather than by any appreciable effects which his efforts make on the ear. As music, apart from its virtuoso character, this rhapsody has little to express. The themes are conventionally developed and the orchestration while colorful, for what Russian could write otherwise, contains little that is original.

DeFalla's ballet music brought the program to a close. It was played for the first time in America. It would seem that it requires a Frenchman or a Russian to picture Spain in music for there is more local color in one page of Chabrier's "España" or Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" than in all three of DeFalla's dances. There is little melodic invention and where the orchestration is not dull and colorless it is noisy and vulgar.

The works of the afternoon were played with great finish and brilliancy. No pains, apparently, had been spared to bring out every effect possible in works so inherently dull. Mr. Monteux's reading of Chadwick's theme and variations is particularly commendable, for in the past many American compositions have seriously suffered from perfunctory and careless performance. This piece gained much in interest from the careful performance which it received at yesterday's concert.

MONITR - DEC. 31.

KOCHANSKI SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Pierre Monteux will conduct, at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 13-14, the double concerto of Handel for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, and Maurice Ravel's new choreographic poem, "La Valse," which is supposed to suggest an imperial ball in the early part of the last century.

There is considerable interest in Paul Kochanski, the young violinist, who will make his Boston debut as soloist at these concerts. Kochanski first came to America last season and by his several appearances in New York and elsewhere immediately took a foremost place among the violinists now in this country.

AMER-JAN.7.

TENTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

One Number on Program Played for the First Time in America

NEXT PERFORMANCE IN BOSTON JAN. 13

BY PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rossini, overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri"; Mozart, Symphony in D major; Chadwick, Theme, variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra (Mr. Snow, organist); Liapounov, Rhapsody on Folk Songs of the Ukraine for piano and orchestra (first time at these concerts); De Falla, three dances from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" (first time in America). The pianist was E. Robert Schmitz.

Some may have rubbed their eyes in wonder at seeing Rossini's overture on the program. Old as this music is there are more musical ideas in it than in many of the ultra-modern compositions; furthermore it gave Mr. Longy the opportunity of playing in a beautiful manner the oboe solo in the introduction. The modern Italians, even the most radical, do not point derisive thumbs at Rossini. Casella, for example, recently wrote a long article in praise of this careless, unbuttoned genius, one of the great born melodists, whose operas were for years the joy of thousands, whose "Barber of Seville" is immortal. And Rossini could strike the tragic note, as in the last act of "Othello"—witness the song of the gondolier, heard by Desdemona, fearful of her fate; witness the Willow Song, she sings, which equals, if it does not surpass, that of Verdi's in the same scene.

Mozart as well as Rossini, was a man of his period's formulas. May no bolt strike us from an angry heaven! After Rossini's overture, the formulas in the past movements of Mozart's symphony seemed many and wearisome. The suave Andante, however, was a reasonable excuse for the performance.

Mr. Chadwick's composition greatly pleased the audience. It is true that the introduction of an organ, with all the stops drawn, in any composition, excites an audience to applause. The majestic roar impresses the hearers, especially in a peroration. But the success of Mr. Chadwick's piece did not rest solely on the strong dynamic impact; the musical scheme would seem to contradict the dictum of some, Berlioz among them, that the organ and the orchestra are deadly rivals, not to be brought together in sympathy. The organists in the audience were interested in the adroitness of Mr. Chadwick in contrast and combination, while the musical contents themselves were grateful to the other hearers.

Mr. Schmitz at short notice replaced as soloist Mme. Homer who, suffering from a cold, was unable to fill her engagement. Liapounov is a name not unknown to symphony audiences. A concerto by him was played in February, 1918, by Mme. Leginska. The Rhapsody is frankly a bravura piece for a virtuoso, and, of course, Mr. Schmitz played it brilliantly. The chief interest lies in the Folk Songs themselves; the development, such as it was, and the ornamentation left us cold. The association of ideas is often whimsical. For the life of us, while Mr. Schmitz and the orchestra were playing so well, we could not help thinking of the horse, a noble steed, brought out for Mazeppa's justly celebrated bareback act; for this horse was of the Ukraine breed.

Manuel De Falla's music, especially the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," is widely discussed, warmly praised in Europe. Mr. Monteux feels it his duty—and in this he is right—to acquaint his audiences with the works of contemporaneous composers, rather than to exhume the so-called classics, which have been safely entombed for many years. No doubt this music of De Falla serves well the scenario for the stage. In the concert hall, "The Neighbors" seemed to us ineffective. "The Dance of the Miller" has much more character. The Final Dance with the rhythm of the jota is stirring, but one kept thinking of Chabrier's "Espana," incomparable in its class. There was a music hall song once popular, "All Coons Look Alike to Me." It might be said that too many Spanish rhapsodies sound alike.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Jan. 13, 14 is as follows: Handel, Concerto in F-major for strings and two wind orchestras; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Bruch, Fantasia on Scottish Airs (Paul Kochanski, violinist); Ravel "Le Valse" (first time in Boston).

HERALD-DEC 3

EXTRA SYMPHONY

Estelle Liebling, soprano, will be the soloist at the second concert of the extra series of five which are being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. This concert will take place on Monday evening, Jan. 16. A few desirable seats are still available at subscription rates for the remaining four concerts.

HERALD-JAN.1.

The overtures to Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" was composed in 1813. That was an early date in the career of Rossini and it was before the romantic movement in music had fairly set in. No one can blame the later Rossini for the foibles of the earlier one. Nor can anyone pretend for an instant that Rossini was less than a very great genius. Nevertheless, it is strange to realize that the man who wrote the superficially brilliant music of the overture heard Friday afternoon and yesterday evening at the Boston Symphony concerts was the same man who only a few years later was to consort with Liszt, with the romantic writers, painters, dramatists who had such a powerful effect on the development of music in the 19th century. Yes! This same man, this Rossini, received only a few years later the score of Liszt's "Dante" Symphony. He conversed with all the amazing geniuses of the 30's. He wrote music, nevertheless, a hundred years old in its style, however human, melodious, immortal it may be in certain pages of the "Barber of Seville." The restless tonalities, the chromatics, the swollen orchestras which composers were commencing to demand, the philosophy, mysticism, romanticism, and what not "ism" that the composers of the day were infusing into their scores, were contemptuously disregarded by Rossini, who wrote opera after opera, and then, soon after the great operatic successes of Meyerbeer, which undoubtedly interfered with his vogue, suddenly, in the prime of life, apparently at the height of his powers—shut up. There is no other case in Europe just like it. After "William Tell" Rossini simply stopped composing. He told jokes and was seen at opera. He entertained his friends royally, often with spaghetti of his own cooking, was gourmand, connoisseur, the wit and the fashion, for a time, of Paris. But he had finished writing music.

The great composers lived in their art. They were music. They continued to write it, for better or worse, until they died. Rossini stopped in mid-career. This has been ascribed to laziness, to annoyance at the way he was treated in Paris and to pique of the success of Meyerbeer.

But was Rossini afraid of Meyerbeer? He was a very clever man, a very shrewd critic, not only of the music of others, but also of himself. Rossini must have known that his genius far surpassed that of Meyerbeer.

The question arises: Was not the issue much deeper than is yet realized? Did not the brilliant Rossini realize that his time was past, that he could offer little to assuage the artistic craving of the generation coming up about him? A thing like that would be big enough to affect the actions of a man as great as Rossini, where smaller things might well have no effect at all. He had not only a mind, but also a conscience. Perhaps that conscience had begun to get acute, as he was forced to listen to much of the foolishness which he had sold his public during days of expansion, and perhaps he thought it time, creatively speaking, to shut up shop.

POST-JAN.1

Thursday evening, Jan. 12, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the fourth of the annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paul Kochanski, musician, virtuoso and remarkable as both, for assisting violinist.

[illegible]day afternoon, Jan. 13, in Symphony Hall, the eleventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mr. Kochanski as assisting violinist. The programme traverses a Concerto of Handel for String and Wind Choirs; Brahms's Variations in a Theme of Haydn; Bruch's Scottish Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra; Ravel's newest piece, a "choreographic poem" by title "The Waltz."

Monday evening, Jan. 16, in Symphony Hall, the second in the series of "special" Symphony Concerts, designed for a more miscellaneous public than frequents them in regular course and well begun a month ago. Mr. Monteux will set an interesting programme. Miss Estelle Liebling will be the assisting singer.

TRANS-DEC.31

NOVELTIES ON SYMPHONY BILL

Two novelties, one chosen almost at the eleventh hour, mark this week's Symphony program.

E. ROBERT SCHMITZ

One is Liapounoff's "Rhapsody on Folk Songs of the Ukraine," for piano and orchestra, which brought forward as soloist E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist. The other, three dances from a Spanish ballet by Manuel DeFalla, was given its first performance in this country yesterday.

The Russian work gave the pianist rather than the orchestra an opportunity to make a signal success. Mr. Schmitz was recalled several times after his brilliant performance. DeFalla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," was performed by Diaghilev's Russian dancers in Paris two years ago. Even without the dancers it is highly entertaining. It is music of the sort that Mr. Monteux interprets with singular effectiveness.

Rossini's light and melodious "Italiana in Algeri" overture, performed for the first time at these concerts; Mozart's classic symphony in D major and the "Theme, Variations and Fugue," for organ and orchestra, by G. W. Chadwick, the Boston composer, complete the thoroughly enjoyable program, which will be repeated tonight. Albert W. Snow, organist, distinguished himself in the Chadwick number.

ADVTS-DEC.31

Second Symphony Concert

Estelle Liubling, the noted soprano, will appear as soloist at the second concert of the extra series of five which are being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. This concert will take place on Monday evening, Jan. 16.

TRAV. DEC-31

SCHMITZ IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Pianist Substitutes for Louise Homer and Performs With Great Skill

The soloist at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday was E. Robert Schmitz, the pianist who was hastily substituted for Louise Homer, indisposed. He performed with great skill, considering the lack of rehearsals due to the short notice, a rhapsody for piano and orchestra by Liapounoff, which is based on folk songs of the Ukraine. A very brilliant and effective piece of composition by a little-known composer.

The symphony was Mozart's in D major, a work which was performed in a rather interesting manner. The Rossini overture, "L'Italiana in Algiers," was done briskly and brilliantly. Chadwick's Theme, Variations and Fugue, for organ and orchestra, was given a splendid performance, and one which must have delighted the composer, who was present.

The novelty on the program was three dances from a ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," written by Manuel de Falla, a young Spanish composer, for the Diaghileff Russian ballet two years ago, music which is fantastically effective in its rhythms and agreeable in its tunes.

-DEC.31

MORE NEW WORKS BY SYMPHONY

Robert Schmitz Soloist in Place of Mme. Homer

BY OLIN DOWNES

Mme. Louise Homer having been suddenly taken ill, E. Robert Schmitz was piano soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Snow, organist of the Boston Symphony, was soloist in the performance of George W. Chadwick's "Theme, Variations and Fugue" for organ and orchestra. There were three "first performances." Rossini's overture to his forgotten opera, "L'Italiana in Algeri," and Liapounoff's "Rhapsody on Folk Songs of the Ukraine" for piano and orchestra were played for the first time at these concerts. Three dances from the ballet of De Falla, "The Three Cornered Hat," were played for the first time in America.

IMPRESS BY INGENUITY

De Falla's music was suggested by a scenario which Sergei Diaghileff, director of the Russian Ballet, offered the composer when his troupe was travelling in Spain. The first public performance of the ballet was in 1919. Much has been said and printed about it, and about the brilliant musical personality of the composer. The three dances heard yesterday impressed rather by their ingenuity, their appropriateness for dancing, and brilliancy of orchestration, than by latent originality. There are many effects and many harmonies, written by other composers, and found in other of the scores to which Mr. Diaghileff's Ballet has danced in Europe and America, which De Falla uses skilfully.

Despite the fact that this man is a Spaniard, much influenced in composing by modern French idioms, we prefer for musical pictures of Spain the "Espana" of Chabrier, the Frenchman; the "Iberia" of Debussy, the Frenchman; the "Spanish Rhapsody" by Ravel, the Frenchman. In a word, modern Frenchmen, out with their palettes to get musical impressions of Spain, may not be more plausible, but are certainly more interesting, than modern Spaniards who have taken their palettes and their sketch books with them to Paris.

Liapounoff's Rhapsody

The word "themes" is used in the title of Liapounoff's Rhapsody of which the piano part was played in so masterly a manner by Mr. Schmitz. We detected but one theme that amounted to anything, a theme subjected to many transformations, advantageous for a virtuoso display by the pianist, clever rather than of musical value on the part of the composer. But it is not astonishing that Mr. Schmitz was so enthusiastically applauded. He played with dash, speed, and aplomb which would have made a poorer piece than this rather poor piece of Liapounoff effective, exciting.

After all, the one unmistakable masterwork on the programme was the symphony of Mozart, (D major, Kochel no. 504). It is not perhaps of the sustained strength of the great three symphonies of this master, but the first movement is highly dramatic, the orchestration is often modern in spirit, and the whole work is beautiful, and inspired. Furthermore, there is the musical form. Form is hooted at by some very young people as if it were nothing but a skeleton of a composition, a bone-dry framework on which music is hung. Mozart's form is in itself noble. Sometimes it is Attic in its simplicity and purity of line.

Rossini knew Liszt, knew the tendencies of the modern school of his later years, even read the score of one of Liszt's symphonies. And shut up. In his last years he suddenly stopped composing. Perhaps he had a conscience, and knew that he had nothing for the new era.

As for the music of Mr. Chadwick, it is in greater part commonplace, sentimental. The composition is written by a past master of instrumentation. There are effective and practical combinations of the organ, excellently played by Mr. Snow, and the orchestra. Let those especially interested in such matters give thanks. This is far, indeed, from the Chadwick of the early "Melpomene" overture, or the later "Symphonic Sketches," or certain rousing pages of the symphonic poem, "Tam O' Shanter."

POST-DEC.31.

[43]

LOUISE HOMER ILL, SCHMITZ SOLOIST

Plays With the Orchestra Liapounoff's Rhapsody

Owing to the illness of Louise Homer, E. Robert Schmitz, the French pianist, took her place as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He played with the orchestra Liapounoff's rhapsody on a Ukrainian folk theme, previously unheard at these concerts. Mr Schmitz' performance had his usual restless technical fluency and rather brittle quality of tone. He is a competent pianist, rather than a genius.

Liapounoff's rhapsody was announced as on "Ukrainian themes," but there seemed to be only one fragment of a tune in it, which was treated at length, with none too subtle technique. Such hammering in of the obvious as this betrays a lamentable poverty of melodic inspiration.

Manuel de Falla's dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," with which Mr Diaghilev's company has recently delighted London and Paris, is the work of a composer with far more melodic invention and subtlety of technique than Liapounoff.

The themes have the characteristic rhythms of Spanish popular music, but they are obviously the product of a sensitive, musically sophisticated imagination. The orchestration is brilliant after the manner of Ravel.

This piece is the best Spanish orchestral music yet heard in Boston, easy to like, yet not banal or crude. It was unusually well played and very warmly received.

Another somewhat antiquated "novelty" was the spirited overture to Rossini's opera "L'Italiana in Algeri," noisy, light-hearted, rather vulgar music of a century ago, but still very much alive in the excellent performance.

Mozart's D-major symphony was played with more brilliance and precision than Mr Monteux has yet elicited from the orchestra in his music. The first and last movements are among Mozart's finest, the slow movement has a curiously romantic theme, with the imaginative quality of Beethoven at his worst.

The other number was Mr Chadwick's theme, variations and fugue, written to illustrate the possibilities of the organ as an adjunct to the orchestra. The music is intrinsically commonplace. The variation "alla pastorella" in particular, is utterly unworthy of the composer of such individual and dignified pieces as the "Melpomene" overture. But Mr Chadwick was presumably interested in technical rather than imaginative problems in composing this music.

It fails to convince the listener that the organ can duplicate the wood wind, strings and brass of an orchestra with any success. The great organ music is still that which like Bach's depends for its effect on the sustained tones, volume of sound and distinctive diapason quality of the instrument. Mr Snow was the assisting organist.

GLOBE-DEC.31

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on December 30 with the following program: Rossini, Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri"; Mozart, Symphony in D major; Chadwick's Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra (Albert W. Snow, organist); Liapounoff, Rhapsody on Folk Songs of the Ukraine for Piano and Orchestra (E. Robert Schmitz, pianist); DeFalla, Three Dances from the "Three-Cornered Hat."

This program was relatively uninteresting—to record a merely personal impression. Rossini's overture, in spite of its light-hearted gayety is but poor stuff musically and even Mr. Monteux's careful reading and the superlatively fine playing of the solo wood-wind instruments of the orchestra failed to make it acceptable music for a symphony concert. The Mozart Symphony is one of the composer's least striking productions and while no composition of the great master can be characterized as uninteresting, yet the andante and finale of this symphony are not Mozart at his best. Next followed Mr. Chadwick's theme, variations and fugue for orchestra and organ which, although written many years ago, still retains much of its charm and freshness. There are many clever effects and we know of no piece in which the organ is so skillfully combined and contrasted with the orchestra. It opens up to the composer seeking after novel combinations, an absolutely new field of tonal combinations.

Mr. Schmitz is no newcomer to the Symphony concerts and has often given evidence of his talents both as a pianist and as a musician, two terms which are unfortunately not always synonymous; yet the vehicles which he has chosen for the display of these talents have not been fortunate. He is a pianist who is not content to follow the stereotyped fashions of many of his confreres and often, as every good artist should be, he is willing to sacrifice opportunities for personal display in order that an interesting composition may be brought to a performance or that a more familiar one may be given an adequate interpretation. But surely this artistic self denial may be carried to extremes and for what reason Mr. Schmitz chose to appear in the Liapounoff Rhapsody it is difficult to discover. Its only reason for existence is as a work for virtuoso display but in this respect it fails of its purpose, for many of the most brilliant passages in the piano part are obscured by the heavy orchestration. One realizes the difficulties which the soloist is surmounting at every moment but this realization is brought about through the gestures and movements of the pianist rather than by any appreciable effects which his efforts make on the ear. As music, apart from its virtuoso character, this rhapsody has little to express. The themes are conventionally developed and the orchestration while colorful, for what Russian could write otherwise, contains little that is original.

DeFalla's ballet music brought the program to a close. It was played for the first time in America. It would seem that it requires a Frenchman or a Russian to picture Spain in music for there is more local color in one page of Chabrier's "España" or Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" than in all three of DeFalla's dances. There is little melodic invention and where the orchestration is not dull and colorless it is noisy and vulgar.

The works of the afternoon were played with great finish and brilliancy. No pains, apparently, had been spared to bring out every effect possible in works so inherently dull. Mr. Monteux's reading of Chadwick's theme and variations is particularly commendable, for in the past many American compositions have seriously suffered from perfunctory and careless performance. This piece gained much in interest from the careful performance which it received at yesterday's concert.

MONTR-DEC.31

KOCHANSKI SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Pierre Monteux will conduct, at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 13-14, the double concerto of Handel for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, and Maurice Ravel's new choreographic poem, "La Valse," which is supposed to suggest an imperial ball in the early part of the last century.

There is considerable interest in Paul Kochanski, the young violinist, who will make his Boston debut as soloist at these concerts. Kochanski first came to America last season and by his several appearances in New York and elsewhere immediately took a foremost place among the violinists now in this country.

AMER-JAN.7.

TENTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

One Number on Program Played for the First Time in America

NEXT PERFORMANCE IN BOSTON JAN. 13

BY PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Rossini, overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri"; Mozart, Symphony in D major; Chadwick, Theme, variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra (Mr. Snow, organist); Liapounov, Rhapsody on Folk Songs of the Ukraine, for piano and orchestra (first time at these concerts); De Falla, three dances from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" (first time in America). The pianist was E. Robert Schmitz.

Some may have rubbed their eyes in wonder at seeing Rossini's overture on the program. Old as this music is there are more musical ideas in it than in many of the ultra-modern compositions; furthermore it gave Mr. Longy the opportunity of playing in a beautiful manner the oboe solo in the introduction. The modern Italians, even the most radical, do not point derisive thumbs at Rossini. Casella, for example, recently wrote a long article in praise of this careless, unbuttoned genius, one of the great born melodists, whose operas were for years the joy of thousands, whose "Barber of Seville" is immortal. And Rossini could strike the tragic note, as in the last act of "Othello"—witness the song of the gondolier, heard by Desdemona, fearful of her fate; witness the Willow Song, she sings, which equals, if it does not surpass, that of Verdi's in the same scene.

Mozart as well as Rossini, was a man of his period's formulas. May no bolt strike us from an angry heaven! After Rossini's overture, the formulas in the past movements of Mozart's Symphony seemed many and wearisome. The suave Andante, however, was a reasonable excuse for the performance.

Mr. Chadwick's composition greatly pleased the audience. It is true that the introduction of an organ, with all the stops drawn, in any composition, excites an audience to applause. The majestic roar impresses the hearers, especially in a peroration. But the success of Mr. Chadwick's piece did not rest solely on the strong dynamic impact: the musical scheme would seem to contradict the dictum of some, Berlioz among them, that the organ and the orchestra are deadly rivals, not to be brought together in sympathy. The organists in the audience were interested in the adroitness of Mr. Chadwick in contrast and combination, while the musical contents themselves were grateful to the other hearers.

Mr. Schmitz at short notice replaced as soloist Mme. Homer who, suffering from a cold, was unable to fill her engagement. Liapounov is a name not unknown to symphony audiences. A concerto by him was played in February, 1918, by Mme. Leginska. The Rhapsody is frankly a bravura piece for a virtuoso, and, of course, Mr. Schmitz played it brilliantly. The chief interest lies in the Folk Songs themselves; the development, such as it was, and the ornamentation left us cold. The association of ideas is often whimsical. For the life of us, while Mr. Schmitz and the orchestra were playing so well, we could not help thinking of the horse, a noble steed, brought out for Mazeppa's justly celebrated bareback act; for this horse was of the Ukraine breed.

Manuel De Falla's music, especially the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," is widely discussed, warmly praised in Europe. Mr. Monteux feels it his duty—and in this he is right—to acquaint his audiences with the works of contemporaneous composers, rather than to exhume the so-called classics, which have been safely entombed for many years. No doubt this music of De Falla serves well the scenario for the stage. In the concert hall, "The Neighbors" seemed to us ineffective. "The Dance of the Miller" has much more character. The Final Dance with the rhythm of the jota is stirring, but one kept thinking of Chabrier's "Espana," incomparable in its class. There was a music hall song once popular, "All Coons Look Alike to Me." It might be said that too many Spanish rhapsodies sound alike.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Jan. 13, 14 is as follows: Handel, Concerto in F-major for strings and two wind orchestras; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Bruch, Fantasia on Scottish Airs (Paul Kochanski, violinist); Ravel "Le Valse" (first time in Boston).

HERALD-DEC

EXTRA SYMPHONY

Estelle Liebling, soprano, will be the soloist at the second concert of the extra series of five which are being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. This concert will take place on Monday evening, Jan. 16. A few desirable seats are still available at subscription rates for the remaining four concerts.

HERALD-JAN

The overtures to Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" was composed in 1813. That was an early date in the career of Rossini and it was before the romantic movement in music had fairly set in. No one can blame the later Rossini for the foibles of the earlier one. Nor can anyone pretend for an instant that Rossini was less than a very great genius. Nevertheless, it is strange to realize that the man who wrote the superficially brilliant music of the overture heard Friday afternoon and yesterday evening at the Boston Symphony concerts was the same man who only a few years later was to consort with Liszt, with the romantic writers, painters, dramatists who had such a powerful effect on the development of music in the 19th century. Yes! This same man, this Rossini, received only a few years later the score of Liszt's "Dante" Symphony. He conversed with all the amazing geniuses of the 30's. He wrote music, nevertheless, a hundred years old in its style, however human, melodious, immortal it may be in certain pages of the "Barber of Seville." The restless tonalities, the chromatics, the swollen orchestras which composers were commencing to demand, the philosophy, mysticism, romanticism, and what not "ism" that the composers of the day were infusing into their scores, were contemptuously disregarded by Rossini, who wrote opera after opera, and then, soon after the great operatic successes of Meyerbeer, which undoubtedly interfered with his vogue, suddenly, in the prime of life, apparently at the height of his powers—shut up. There is no other case in Europe just like it. After "William Tell" Rossini simple stopped composing. He told jokes and was seen at opera. He entertained his friends royally, often with spaghetti of his own cooking, was gourmand, connoisseur, the wit and the fashion, for a time, of Paris. But he had finished writing music.

The great composers lived in their art. They were music. They continued to write it, for better or worse, until they died. Rossini stopped in mid-career. This has been ascribed to laziness, to annoyance at the way he was treated in Paris and to pique of the success of Meyerbeer.

But was Rossini afraid of Meyerbeer? He was a very clever man, a very shrewd critic, not only of the music of others, but also of himself. Rossini must have known that his genius far surpassed that of Meyerbeer.

The question arises: Was not the issue much deeper than is yet realized? Did not the brilliant Rossini realize that his time was past, that he could offer little to assuage the artistic craving of the generation coming up about him? A thing like that would be big enough to affect the actions of a man as great as Rossini, where smaller things might well have no effect at all. He had not only a mind, but also a conscience. Perhaps that conscience had begun to get acute, as he was forced to listen to much of the foolishness which he had sold his public during days of expansion, and perhaps he thought it time, creatively speaking, to shut up shop.

POST-JAN.1

SECOND CONCERT OF EXTRA SYMPHONY SERIES

Estelle Liebling, soprano, will appear as soloist at the second concert of the extra series of five which are being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. This concert will take place on Monday evening, Jan. 16.

POST-JAN. 1

Coming Events

The soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be Paul Kochanski, said by New York reviewers to be an exceptionally fine violinist. He will play Bruch's rather dull Fantasy on Scotch Airs. The other numbers for Jan 13 and 14 are Handel's Double Concerto for String and Woodwind Orchestras; Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Ravel's "La Valse," new to Paris last year. The orchestra will be in New York this week.

The Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, heard here last season in a rather dull program, promises pieces by Beethoven, Stravinsky and Strauss at its Boston concert in Symphony Hall Jan 25 at 8:15.

Estelle Liebling will be the soloist at the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday concerts Jan 16. A few season tickets for the remaining four concerts [illegible]

Esther Dale, soprano, will give a recital at Jordan Hall Jan 14.

GLOBE-JAN. 1

FROM JAN 1 1922
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

Brooklyn Music.

Marie Jeritza makes her first Brooklyn appearance at the Academy on Tuesday in Korngold's "Die Tote Stadt," with Orville Harrold.

Louise Homer sings at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert at the Brooklyn Academy on Friday evening.

AMERICAN
New York City
JAN 1 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the following programme in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening: Double Concerto, by Handel; Variations on a Haydn Theme, by Brahms; "Night on Mount Triglaff," by Rimsky-Karsakoff; overture to "Phedre," by Massenet; three dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos," by de Falla. The programme of Saturday afternoon consists of Overture, Pastorale and Nocturne from suite, by Milhaud; Symphony D major, by Mozart; "Island of the Dead," by Rachmaninoff; Polotsian Dances from "Prince Igor," by Borodin.

FROM JAN 1 1922
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Montreal last week, after a long absence, for the special purpose, apparently, of presenting Vincent d'Indy to "the largest French city in America." He did not conduct, though his "Istar" variations were played, but appeared as pianist, playing Bach's concerto in D. There was an "ovation" and a wreath of palms was presented to him. He replied in a speech declaring himself a humble pupil of César Franck.

FROM JAN 1 1922
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

Pierre Monteux's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening includes Handel's double concerto for strings and wood-wind, the Brahms-Haydn variations, "Night on Mount Triglaff" from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada" ballet, Massenet's overture to "Phedre" and Manuel de Falla's new dances from "The Three Cornered Hat."

For the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday in Carnegie Hall the novelty will be an overture, pastorale and nocturne from the "Second Orchestral Suite" by Darius Milhaud, a young French composer and one of the Parisian "Six." There are also Mozart's symphony in D major, Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" and Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor."

HERALD
ess New York City JAN 1 1922 M

The programs for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall are: Thursday evening: Handel, double concerto for strings and wood wind F; Brahms, variations on a theme of Haydn; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Night on Mount Triglaff," act 3 of the opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged in concert form; De Falla, three dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos ("The Three Cornered Hat"); Massenet, overture to "Phedre." The De Falla work is announced for a first hearing in this country. Saturday afternoon: Mozart, symphony in D major, No. 385; Rachmaninov, "Die Toteninsel," symphonic poem for full orchestra, to the picture by Arnold Boecklin; Milhaud, second orchestral suite, first time in New York; Borodin, Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor." In its home city, Boston, the orchestra is giving an extra series outside the regular forty-eight concerts of the season, so great is the demand for symphony tickets.

HERALD
ess New York City JAN 1 1922 M

Taylor, and various other things.

But the easiest thing to procure and likewise to read is the Boston Symphony Orchestra program book of January 1, 1921, when Pierre Monteux conducted a performance of the overture to the opera and Philip Hale, the human encyclopedia who emits the brilliant and comprehensive program notes for the concerts, loosed the flood of his information about the entire subject. In this belated and insufficient manner the writer of this article acknowledges an infinitesimal part of his debt to his old friend.

FROM JAN 1 1922 L
WORLD,
New York City.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, at Carnegie Hall, will play an overture, pastorale and nocturne from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, a young modernist French composer; together with Mozart's Symphony in D major, Rachmaninoff's tone poem "The Isle of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 1 1922 A

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The principal number upon the programme to be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the present season in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 6, will be the symphony in D minor by the Belgian master, Cesar Franck. Louise Homer will sing with the orchestra Bach's cantata, "Begone Thou Gloomy Shadows" and a principal aria from Mozart's late opera, "Titus." The orchestra will also present "Carnival in Paris" by Svendsen, and the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which the famous composer has arranged in concert and entitled "Night on Mou laff."

From JAN 1 1922
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

HOMER, BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Louise Homer, the American contralto, will be heard as soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, January 6. Pierre Monteux will conduct. She will sing Bach's secular cantata for solo voice, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and the recitative and rondo from Mozart's opera, "Clemenza di Tito."

The principal number on the program will be Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

The remaining numbers will be Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and to close, the third act of the opera "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which has been arranged for concert use by the composer.

FROM JAN 1 1922
WORLD,
New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting, on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, will play Handel's Double Concerto for string and wood-wind orchestras; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn; the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera ballet, arranged in concert form by the composer and entitled 'Night on Mount Triglaff;' Massenet's overture to "Phedre" and a first American performance of three dances by the Spanish composer, de Falla, from his ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat.'

For the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York tomorrow evening and Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux has set on his programmes: Milhaud's Suite for Orchestra, played in Boston last spring and mocked by those who love not bold innovation; de Falla's three Spanish Dances, heard at home last week; Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture, "A Night on Mount Triglav," recently applauded in Boston; Rahkmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead"; Massenet's Overture to Racine's play, "Phedre"; the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," out of the concerts in Symphony Hall last season; Mozart's Symphony in D major of last week; Brahms's orchestral Variations on a Theme of Haydn; and a Concerto of Handel for String and Woodwind Choirs. The items from Brahms and Handel will not be heard in Boston until next week. Wide-ranging is the conductor in this miscellany.

The chamber-concerts of the new Boston Symphony String Quartet—Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti en tête—are to begin in Steinert Hall, a perfect room for such purpose, on Thursday evening, Jan. 26. They will continue on Thursday evenings, Feb. 16 and March 9 and on Tuesday evening, April 4. There is good reason to expect much of them.

H. T. P.

TRANS. JAN. 4.

[44]

The second of the "special concerts" of the Symphony Orchestra will take place on Monday evening, Jan. 16, in Symphony Hall. Familiar pieces fill Mr. Monteux's programme, viz.: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Svendsen's Rhapsody, "Carnival in Paris"; Debussy's Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; the Overture to Wagner's opera "Tannhäuser." Miss Estelle Liebling will also sing airs from Saint-Saëns, "Etienne Marcel" and Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding."

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge next Thursday evening, Mr. Monteux has chosen Massenet's Overture to Racine's play, "Phedre". Schönberg's Sextet for Strings, "Transfiguring Night"; Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture, "A Night on Mount Triglav," and Bruch's Scottish Fantasia for violin and orchestra. In the Fantasia, Mr. Kochanski will play the solo-part.

TRAN. JAN. 5.

From Boston to New York

The Boston Symphony's one hundred men marked vividly their third winter visit to Carnegie Hall last evening with a gorgeous gay "first time in New York" of Manuel de Falla's dances of "The Three Cornered Hat," with which Diaghilev's ballet had made a great noise in London last summer, and of which the young (sic) Cadiz composer can hardly have heard so stirring a performance by his "seventeen players" two years since in Spain. Taken as music alone, de Fal gossippy episode of "The Neighbors" much liked by last night's critical ho h's "Miller's Dance," that the Spania found most striking in Moorish flav was less recognizable to Western ea but the "Final Dance," a whirlwind popular Spanish rhythms in all the ag grandized modernism of instrumental ap paratus, fairly outdanced Chabrier's "Es paña" as an orchestral setting of fol melodies of the peninsula. The novelt ended in many recalls, shared by Monteu and his men.

Mr. Monteux preceded the Spanish bre ties with Rimsky-Korsakov's long "Night on the Triple Mountain"—a th act from the ballet of "Mlada," much which had been used by the Diaghil troupe in a "Cleopatra" scene on the earlier American tour. The glowing no turne of Baltic Slav romance, a ghost dream of poisoned Princess, revell spirits, and awakening at dawn on t mountain amid the singing of birds, a was greatly applauded. Beginning t evening Handel's concerto in F for strin and two wind choirs, and Brahms's Va ations on a Theme of Haydn, both co ducted with elegance and suavity, and smoothly played as they were enthu astically received. The lovely Variati of Brahms were most appreciated, perha as shown by rapt silence of the house d ing successive numbers. [The New Y Times

SEEMINGLY, Mr. Monteux is not only French conductor with an open to Mendelssohn. The new " chestre de Paris," with Francis Casade as conductor, has lately played both "Scotch" and the "Italian" Symphoni unheard there for many a year. "Conservative" and "advanced" listeners clapp hands together; while some one labell Mendelssohn "the Racine of music."

The projected concert of the Symph Orchestra for its Pension Fund with Ri ard Strauss conducting in his own other music has been finally abando By no effort could his engagements the engagements of the orchestra be justed. Within a few days, moreover, departs for concerts in England.

TRANS JAN 6

[illegible] Dec. 17

EW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEM

SUPERB CONCERT GIVEN AT BAILEY HALL LAST NIGHT

Auditorium Filled to Capacity to Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra.

VARIED PROGRAM GIVEN

Examples of Different Schools of Music Included—Pierre Monteux Conducting.

The undoubted claim of the Boston Symphony to be placed in the front rank of modern orchestras was amply substantiated in the playing of the organization at Bailey Hall last evening before a throng of students, faculty members and townspeople, which filled the spacious auditorium to capacity. Under the able leadership of Pierre Monteux the Boston Symphony orchestra has retained the mastery of technique which has characterized the playing of the organization during the 40 years of its existence, and has gained a recognized subtlety and delicacy of rendition.

The program which Mr. Monteux arranged for last evening's concert was representative of four great schools of music, a variety of style which is seldom incorporated into one program.

All Schools Represented.

The opening number was Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," a perfect example of the classic school of music, considered by many to be the greatest of Beethoven's works.

The Nationalistic school was represented by the "Carnival in Paris," one of the compositions of Svendson, a modern Norwegian musician. Two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," by the contemporary composer, Debussy, represented the Impressionistic form, now developed in its highest form by the French school of music.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a narrative composition by Richard Strauss, one of the greatest living composers, completed the program. The modern German school is sponsoring the program form of music, of which the composition given last evening is a good example

Ithaca Journal
Dec. 17-21

NEWS, SATURDAY EVENI

RARE MUSICAL TREAT OFFERED AT BAILEY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Sets New High Mark in Cornell Concert Series — Beethoven Number Feature of Interesting Program.

The opportunity to hear a master orchestra in Ithaca is all too rare, and a local concert by the Boston Symphony even rarer, so that for devotees of orchestra music last evening's was a gala occasion. There is, after all, nothing quite so exciting in a musical way as a master organization of this kind—an hundred instruments blending so perfectly as to form a single voice, or the ensemble breaking up into a score of individual voices each with its part and its own characteristics like a human being. Needless to state the concert was a delight from beginning to end, and the conducting of Pierre Monteux a marvel of controlled vitality.

The program, too, was an unusual one—at least for Ithaca which is so often given the "Hungarian Rhapsody," an overture from one of Wagner's operas and other equally popular numbers. The first half of last evening's program was Beethoven's "Symphony Eroica" with which were contrasted the more modern compositions of the latter half—Svendsen, Debussy, and Strauss.

The symphony was undoubtedly, as was intended, the piece-de-resistance of the evening. Aside from the beauty of the scoring, the composition is interesting because of its dedication to Napoleon, and the story of Beethoven's disgust when, subsequently, he learned that Bonaparte had had himself declared emperor. The third division, including the scherzo, allegro vivace, and trio; and the finale especially indicated the musicanship of the conductor and his organization.

A short intermission formed the only bridge between the old master and the modern descriptive composer—between Beethoven and Svendsen whose "Carnival in Paris" was the second number on the program. The carnival is an interesting composition and there are pasages of unquestionable melody, but it was not the most pleasing number of the evening.

Debussy's Nocturnes.

Two of Debussy's nocturnes followed—"Nuages" and "Fetes." The first of these is a weird, pagan bit with the hand of the great modern evident all through the scoring. It is full of harsh passages and unexpected harmonies, but is unquestionably fascinating. The second is a very spirited composition for a nocturne, and is especially notable for a harp and drum passage which is as effective as it is wild. To whom but a Debussy would have occurred the combination of a trio of kettledrums and two harps.

On encountering this type of descriptive music one is always tempted to wonder whether the composition would furnish a picture of "Agony-tinted clouds" if the program did not specifically admonish the audience to visualize, or rather to hear, such a picture. But quite aside from any emotional appeal the second at least of the nocturnes is intriguing to a degree, though it tends more to pique the hearer's curiosity and awaken his reasoning powers than to lull him to sleep, according to the accepted fashion of the nocturne.

The final number—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" followed the lead of the preceding selections as a distinctly descriptive bit of modernism. It is unquestionably humorous and manages to play more than one trick on the audience. It is also interesting in connection with Mr. Strauss' presence in this country and the prevalent revival of Strauss music everywhere.

No encores were given last evening owing to the length and exacting nature of the program, but Mr. Monteux was repeatedly recalled by the enthusiasm of the audience which filled the hall to its capacity and was not at all desirous of leaving at the end of the final number.

From JAN 1 1922 D
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

with orchestra.

Boston Symphony.

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

For the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux's program will begin with Handel's Double Concerto for string and woodwind orchestras in F major and Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," which the earlier master used in his Chorale of St. Anthony, and end with Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Two unusual numbers on this program will be the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera-ballet, "Mlada," which the Russian composer has arranged for concert purposes and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff." The other number will be Three Dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos" ("Three-Cornered Hat"), by deFalla, the noted Spanish composer, which is having its first performances in this country under Mr. Monteux. The dances are scored in characteristic Spanish rhythms and are entitled "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller," Final Dance."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be that of Mozart in D major (No. 504 in the Kochel edition). The symphonic poem, "Die Toteninsel" ("The Island of the Dead"), by Rachmaninoff, and the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," by Borodin, will be performed, and a notable novelty in the numbers from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, consisting of the Overture, Pastorale and Nocturne. Milhaud is known as a prominent member of the famous Parisian "Six" of daring young composers, whose burlesque, "Le Boeuf sur le Toit" ("The Nothing-Doing Bar"), made a sensation in London last season. Mr. Monteux gave this suite its first American performance in Boston last spring, and will on this occasion introduce the larger music of Milhaud to New York.

From JAN 1 1922 D
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Thursday evening in the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the third of its series of concerts. The soloist is Louise Homer, whose selections are the Bach aria, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and a recitative and aria from Mozart's unfamiliar opera, "Tito." The strictly orchestral numbers on Mr. Monteux's program are the Cesar Franck D Minor Symphony, Svendsen's "Carnivalin Paris," and a concert-arrangement of the music from the Third Act of Rimsky-Korskoff's opera, "Mlada."

FROM [illegible]
WORLD,
New York City.

The principal number of the programme to be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Jan. 6, will be the symphony in D minor by the Belgian master, Cesar Franck, which generally is considered the masterpiece of the modern French school of music. When this work was first performed in Paris in 1889 it was sceptically received on account of its innovations and after the performance Franck's ardent group of pupils all looked downcast, while "Father Franck" alone appeared contented and joyful. When asked by his friends as to the reception of the work, he replied, "It sounded very well, just as I thought it would." Steadily from that time to this, this symphony has increased in favor until now the enemies of Franck's music are no more and this, his masterpiece, is beloved wherever symphonic music is heard.

This concert will be made additionally eventful by the appearance as soloist of Louise Homer, American contralto, the beauty of whose voice is considered unexcelled by her countless admirers. She will sing with the Orchestra Bach's cantata, "Begone Thou Gloomy Shadows," and a principal aria from Mozart's late opera, "Titus." The Boston Symphony Orchestra will also present at this concert the riotous "Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, the noted Norwegian composer, and the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which the famous composer has arranged in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Tri

SECOND CONCERT OF EXTRA SYMPHONY SERIES

Estelle Liebling, soprano, will appear as soloist at the second concert of the extra series of five which are being given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in Symphony Hall. This concert will take place on Monday evening, Jan. 16.

POST-JAN. 1

Coming Events

The soloist at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be Paul Kochanski, said by New York reviewers to be an exceptionally fine violinist. He will play Bruch's rather dull Fantasy on Scotch Airs. The other numbers for Jan 13 and 14 are Handel's Double Concerto for String and Woodwind Orchestras; Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Ravel's "La Valse," new to Paris last year. The orchestra will be in New York this week.

The Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, heard here last season in a rather dull program, promises pieces by Beethoven, Stravinsky and Strauss at its Boston concert in Symphony Hall Jan 25 at 8:15.

Estelle Liebling will be the soloist at the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday concerts Jan 16. A few season tickets for the remaining four concerts are on sale.

Esther Dale, soprano, will give a recital at Jordan Hall Jan 14.

GLOBE-JAN. 1

FROM
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

Brooklyn Music.

Marie Jeritza makes her first Brooklyn appearance at the Academy on Tuesday in Korngold's "Die Tote Stadt," with Orville Harrold.

Louise Homer sings at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert at the Brooklyn Academy on Friday evening.

AMERICAN
New York City
JAN 1 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the following programme in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening: Double Concerto, by Handel; Variations on a Haydn Theme, by Brahms; "Night on Mount Triglaff," by Rimsky-Karsakoff; overture to "Phedre," by Massenet; three dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos," by de Falla. The programme of Saturday afternoon consists of Overture, Pastorale and Nocturne from Suite, by Milhaud; Symphony D major, by Mozart; "Island of the Dead," by Rachmaninoff; Polotaian Dances from "Prince Igor," by Borodin.

FROM
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra visited Montreal last week, after a long absence, for the special purpose, apparently, of presenting Vincent d'Indy to "the largest French city in America." He did not conduct, though his "Istar" variations were played, but appeared as pianist, playing Bach's concerto in D. There was an "ovation" and a wreath of palms was presented to him. He replied in a speech declaring himself a humble pupil of César Franck.

FROM
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

Pierre Monteux's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening includes Handel's double concerto for strings and wood-wind, the Brahms-Haydn variations, "Night on Mount Triglaff" from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada" ballet, Massenet's overture to "Phèdre" and Manuel de Falla's new dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat."

For the Boston Symphony matinee on Saturday in Carnegie Hall the novelty will be an overture, pastorale and nocturne from the "Second Orchestral Suite" by Darius Milhaud, a young French composer and one of the Parisian "Six." There are also Mozart's symphony in D major, Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" and Borodin's dances from "Prince Igor."

HERALD
ess New York City JAN 1 1922 M

The programs for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall are: Thursday evening: Handel, double concerto for strings and wood wind F; Brahms, variations on a theme of Haydn; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Night on Mount Triglaff," act 3 of the opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged in concert form; De Falla, three dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos ("The Three Cornered Hat"); Massenet, overture to "Phedre." The De Falla work is announced for a first hearing in this country. Saturday afternoon: Mozart, symphony in D major, No. 385; Rachmaninov, "Die Toteninsel," symphonic poem for full orchestra, to the picture by Arnold Boecklin; Milhaud, second orchestral suite, first time in New York; Borodin, Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor." In its home city, Boston, the orchestra is giving an extra series outside the regular forty-eight concerts of the season, so great is the demand for symphony tickets.

HERALD
ess New York City JAN 1 1922 M

...Taylor, and various other things.

But the easiest thing to procure and likewise to read is the Boston Symphony Orchestra program book of January 1, 1921, when Pierre Monteux conducted a performance of the overture to the opera and Philip Hale, the human encyclopedia who emits the brilliant and comprehensive program notes for the concerts, loosed the flood of his information about the entire subject. In this belated and insufficient manner the writer of this article acknowledges an infinitesimal part of his debt to his old friend.

JAN 1 1922 L
WORLD,
New York City.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, at Carnegie Hall, will play an overture, pastorale and nocturne from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, a young modernist French composer; together with Mozart's Symphony in D major, Rachmaninoff's tone poem "The Isle of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor."

CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 1 1922 A

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The principal number upon the programme to be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the present season in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 6, will be the symphony in D minor by the Belgian master, Cesar Franck. Louise Homer will sing with the orchestra Bach's cantata, "Begone Thou Gloomy Shadows" and a principal aria from Mozart's late opera, "Titus." The orchestra will also present "Carnival in Paris" by Svendsen, and the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which the famous composer has arranged in concert and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff."

From JAN 1 1922
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Monday evening, January 16.

HOMER, BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Louise Homer, the American contralto, will be heard as soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, January 6. Pierre Monteux will conduct. She will sing Bach's secular cantata for solo voice, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and the recitative and rondo from Mozart's opera, "Clemenza di Tito."

The principal number on the program will be Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

The remaining numbers will be Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris" and to close, the third act of the opera "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which has been arranged for concert use by the composer.

JAN 1 1922
WORLD,
New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Pierre Monteux conducting, on Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall, will play Handel's Double Concerto for string and wood-wind orchestras; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn; the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera ballet, arranged in concert form by the composer and entitled 'Night on Mount Triglaff;' Massenet's overture to "Phedre" and a first American performance of three dances by the Spanish composer, de Falla, from his ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat.'

For the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York tomorrow evening and Saturday afternoon, Mr. Monteux has set on his programmes: Milhaud's Suite for Orchestra, played in Boston last spring and mocked by those who love not bold innovation; de Falla's three Spanish Dances, heard at home last week; Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture, "A Night on Mount Triglav," recently applauded in Boston; Rahkmaninov's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead"; Massenet's Overture to Racine's play, "Phèdre"; the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," out of the concerts in Symphony Hall last season; Mozart's Symphony in D major of last week; Brahms's orchestral Variations on a Theme of Haydn; and a Concerto of Handel for String and Wood-wind Choirs. The items from Brahms and Handel will not be heard in Boston until next week. Wide-ranging is the conductor in this miscellany.

The chamber-concerts of the new Boston Symphony String Quartet—Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti en tête—are to begin in Steinert Hall, a perfect room for such purpose, on Thursday evening, Jan. 26. They will continue on Thursday evenings, Feb. 16 and March 9 and on Tuesday evening, April 4. There is good reason to expect much of them.

H. T. P.

TRANS. JAN. 4.

[44]

The second of the "special concerts" of the Symphony Orchestra will take place on Monday evening, Jan. 16, in Symphony Hall. Familiar pieces fill Mr. Monteux's programme, viz.: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Svendsen's Rhapsody, "Carnival in Paris"; Debussy's Prelude to Mallarmé's Eclogue, "The Afternoon of a Faun"; the Overture to Wagner's opera "Tannhäuser." Miss Estelle Liebling will also sing airs from Saint-Saëns, "Etienne Marcel" and Mozart's "Figaro's Wedding."

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge next Thursday evening, Mr. Monteux has chosen Massenet's Overture to Racine's play, "Phèdre". Schönberg's Sextet for Strings, "Transfiguring Night"; Rimsky-Korsakov's tone-picture, "A Night on Mount Triglav." and Bruch's Scottish Fantasia for violin and orchestra. In the Fantasia, Mr. Kochanski will play the solo-part.

TRAN. JAN. 5.

From Boston to New York

The Boston Symphony's one hundred men marked vividly their third winter visit to Carnegie Hall last evening with a gorgeous gay "first time in New York" of Manuel de Falla's dances of "The Three Cornered Hat," with which Diaghilev's ballet had made a great noise in London last summer, and of which the young (sic) Cadiz composer can hardly have heard so stirring a performance by his "seventeen players" two years since in Spain. Taken as music alone, de Fal gossippy episode of "The Neighbors" much liked by last night's critical ho h's "Miller's Dance," that the Spania found most striking in Moorish flav was less recognizable to Western ea but the "Final Dance," a whirlwind popular Spanish rhythms in all the ag grandized modernism of instrumental ap paratus, fairly outdanced Chabrier's "Es paña" as an orchestral setting of fol melodies of the peninsula. The novelt ended in many recalls, shared by Monteu and his men.

Mr. Monteux preceded the Spanish bre ties with Rimsky-Korsakov's long "Night on the Triple Mountain"—a th act from the ballet of "Mlada." much which had been used by the Diaghil troupe in a "Cleopatra" scene on the earlier American tour. The glowing no turne of Baltic Slav romance, a ghost dream of poisoned Princess, revell spirits, and awakening at dawn on t mountain amid the singing of birds, a was greatly applauded. Beginning t evening Handel's concerto in F for strin and two wind choirs, and Brahms's Va ations on a Theme of Haydn, both co ducted with elegance and suavity, and smoothly played as they were enthu astically received. The lovely Variati of Brahms were most appreciated, perha as shown by rapt silence of the house d ing successive numbers. [The New Y Times

SEEMINGLY, Mr. Monteux is not only French conductor with an open to Mendelssohn. The new "O chestre de Paris," with Francis Casade as conductor, has lately played both "Scotch" and the "Italian" Symphoni unheard there for many a year. "Conservative" and "advanced" listeners clapp hands together; while some one labell Mendelssohn "the Racine of music."

The projected concert of the Symphc Orchestra for its Pension Fund with Ri ard Strauss conducting in his own other music has been finally abando By no effort could his engagements the engagements of the orchestra be justed. Within a few days, moreover, departs for concerts in England.

TRANS JAN 6

EW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEM

SUPERB CONCERT GIVEN AT BAILEY HALL LAST NIGHT

Auditorium Filled to Capacity to Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra.

VARIED PROGRAM GIVEN

Examples of Different Schools of Music Included—Pierre Monteux Conducting.

The undoubted claim of the Boston Symphony to be placed in the front rank of modern orchestras was amply substantiated in the playing of the organization at Bailey Hall last evening before a throng of students, faculty members and townspeople, which filled the spacious auditorium to capacity. Under the able leadership of Pierre Monteux the Boston Symphony orchestra has retained the mastery of technique which has characterized the playing of the organization during the 40 years of its existence, and has gained a recognized subtlety and delicacy of rendition.

The program which Mr. Monteux arranged for last evening's concert was representative of four great schools of music, a variety of style which is seldom incorporated into one program.

All Schools Represented.

The opening number was Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," a perfect example of the classic school of music, considered by many to be the greatest of Beethoven's works.

The Nationalistic school was represented by the "Carnival in Paris," one of the compositions of Svendson, a modern Norwegian musician. Two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," by the contemporary composer, Debussy, represented the Impressionistic form, now developed in its highest form by the French school of music.

"'Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a narrative composition by Richard Strauss, one of the greatest living composers, completed the program. The modern German school is sponsoring the program form of music, of which the composition given last evening is a good example

---

NEWS, SATURDAY EVENE

RARE MUSICAL TREAT OFFERED AT BAILEY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Sets New High Mark in Cornell Concert Series — Beethoven Number Feature of Interesting Program.

The opportunity to hear a master orchestra in Ithaca is all too rare, and a local concert by the Boston Symphony even rarer, so that for devotees of orchestra music last evening's was a gala occasion. There is, after all, nothing quite so exciting in a musical way as a master organization of this kind—an hundred instruments blending so perfectly as to form a single voice, or the ensemble breaking up into a score of individual voices each with its part and its own characteristics like a human being. Needless to state the concert was a delight from beginning to end, and the conducting of Pierre Monteux a marvel of controlled vitality.

The program, too, was an unusual one—at least for Ithaca which is so often given the "Hungarian Rhapsody," an overture from one of Wagner's operas and other equally popular numbers. The first half of last evening's program was Beethoven's "Symphony Eroica" with which were contrasted the more modern compositions of the latter half—Svendsen, Debussy, and Strauss.

The symphony was undoubtedly, as was intended, the piece-de-resistance of the evening. Aside from the beauty of the scoring, the composition is interesting because of its dedication to Napoleon, and the story of Beethoven's disgust when, subsequently, he learned that Bonaparte had had himself declared emperor. The third division, including the scherzo, allegro vivace, and trio; and the finale especially indicated the musicanship of the conductor and his organization.

A short intermission formed the only bridge between the old master and the modern descriptive composer—between Beethoven and Svendsen whose "Carnival in Paris" was the second number on the program. The carnival is an interesting composition and there are pasages of unquestionable melody, but it was not the most pleasing number of the evening.

Debussy's Nocturnes.

Two of Debussy's nocturnes followed—"Nuages" and "Fetes." The first of these is a weird, pagan bit with the hand of the great modern evident all through the scoring. It is full of harsh passages and unexpected harmonies, but is unquestionably fascinating. The second is a very spirited composition for a nocturne, and is especially notable for a harp and drum passage which is as effective as it is wild. To whom but a Debussy would have occurred the combination of a trio of kettledrums and two harps.

On encountering this type of descriptive music one is always tempted to wonder whether the composition would furnish a picture of "Agony-tinted clouds" if the program did not specifically admonish the audience to visualize, or rather to hear, such a picture. But quite aside from any emotional appeal the second at least of the nocturnes is intriguing to a degree, though it tends more to pique the hearer's curiosity and awaken his reasoning powers than to lull him to sleep, according to the accepted fashion of the nocturne.

The final number—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" followed the lead of the preceding selections as a distinctly descriptive bit of modernism. It is unquestionably humorous and manages to play more than one trick on the audience. It is also interesting in connection with Mr. Strauss' presence in this country and the prevalent revival of Strauss music everywhere.

No encores were given last evening owing to the length and exacting nature of the program, but Mr. Monteux was repeatedly recalled by the enthusiasm of the audience which filled the hall to its capacity and was not at all desirous of leaving at the end of the final number.

ESTABLISHED 1841
From JAN 1 1922 D
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

with orchestra.

Boston Symphony.

The third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

For the Thursday concert Pierre Monteux's program will begin with Handel's Double Concerto for string and woodwind orchestras in F major and Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," which the earlier master used in his Chorale of St. Anthony, and end with Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Two unusual numbers on this program will be the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera-ballet, "Mlada," which the Russian composer has arranged for concert purposes and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff." The other number will be Three Dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres piees" ("Three-Cornered Hat"), by deFalla, the noted Spanish composer, which is having its first performances in this country under Mr. Monteux. The dances are scored in characteristic Spanish rhythms and are entitled "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller," Final Dance."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be that of Mozart in D major (No. 504 in the Kochel edition). The symphonic poem, "Die Toteninsel" ("The Island of the Dead"), by Rachmaninoff, and the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," by Borodin, will be performed, and a notable novelty in the numbers from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, consisting of the Overture, Pastorale and Nocturne. Milhaud is known as a prominent member of the famous Parisian "Six" of daring young composers, whose burlesque, "Le Boeuf eur le Toit" ("The Nothing-Doing Bar"), made a sensation in London last season. Mr. Monteux gave this suite its first American performance in Boston last spring, and will on this occasion introduce the larger music of Milhaud to New York.

From
EAGLE JAN 1 1922 D
Brooklyn, New York

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

Thursday evening in the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the third of its series of concerts. The soloist is Louise Homer, whose selections are the Bach aria, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and a recitative and aria from Mozart's unfamiliar opera, "Tito." The strictly orchestral numbers on Mr. Monteux's program are the Cesar Franck D Minor Symphony, Svendsen's "Carnivalin Paris," and a concert-arrangement of the music from the Third Act of Rimsky-Korskoff's opera, "Mlada."

FROM
WORLD,
New York City

The principal number of the programme to be presented by Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season in the Academy of Music Friday evening, Jan. 6, will be the symphony in D minor by the Belgian master, Cesar Franck, which generally is considered the masterpiece of the modern French school of music. When this work was first performed in Paris in 1889 it was sceptically received on account of its innovations, and after the performance Franck's ardent group of pupils all looked downcast, while "Father Franck" alone appeared contented and joyful. When asked by his friends as to the reception of the work, he replied, "It sounded very well, just as I thought it would." Steadily from that time to this, this symphony has increased in favor until now the enemies of Franck's music are no more and this, his masterpiece, is beloved wherever symphonic music is heard.

This concert will be made additionally eventful by the appearance as soloist of Louise Homer, American contralto, the beauty of whose voice is considered unexcelled by her countless admirers. She will sing with the Orchestra Bach's cantata, "Begone Thou Gloomy Shadows," and a principal aria from Mozart's late opera, "Titus." The Boston Symphony Orchestra will also present at this concert the riotous "Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, the noted Norwegian composer, and the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which the famous composer has arranged in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Trig

FROM JAN 1 1922 A
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Homer, the American contralto, whose voice and art are scarcely rivalled by the singers of two generations, will be heard as soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Jan. 6, at 8:15. The majestic beauty of her tones could hardly be heard to finer advantage than in the two classic numbers which she will sing with the great orchestra: Bach's secular Cantata for solo voice, "Begone ye gloomy shadows," and the Recitative and Rondo from Mozart's Opera, "Clemenza di Tito."

The principal number on the programme will be Cesar Franck's masterpiece, the symphony in D minor, for the eloquent and inspired performance of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of its French conductor, Pierre Monteux, has won superlative praise in New York. Boston and other cities. This wonderful score, since it was composed a generation ago, and then sceptically received in Paris, has steadily increased in the estimation of the world, until now it has taken its place as probably the finest symphony in modern music. The score is particularly beloved for the stirring splendour of its melodious themes, for the English horn solo in the second movement, and for the noble and triumphant affirmation of faith which is its climax. The remaining numbers will be Svendsen's brilliant "Carnival in Paris," and, to close, the third act of the opera "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which has been arranged for concert use by the composer, and which is said to reveal this master painter of Russian fairy tales in music in his most piquant and enchanting vein.

Established JAN 3 1922 R
FROM COMMERCIAL
New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Heifetz Soloist With N. Y. Symphony—'Le Roi d'Ys' Premiere on Thursday.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts in New York.

For the Thursday program Pierre Monteux has selected Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras in F major, Brahm's variations on a theme, by Haydn; Massenet's overture to "Phedre," and two unusual numbers by Rimsky-Korsakoff and de Falla, respectively. The first is the third act from the opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged by the Russian composer in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff." The music of the Spanish composer consists of three dances from his ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat"), which, written in characteristic Spanish rhythms, will have its first performance in New York on this occasion.

At the Saturday matinee, Mozart's Symphony in D major, Kochel No. 504, will be played; also Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The notable novelty on this program will be the Overture, Pastorale and Nocturne from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, the French composer, whose larger music will on this occasion have its first hearing in New York. Milhaud is a prominent member of the famous Parisian "Six," whose burlesque, "Le Boeuf sur le toit" ("The Nothing-Doing Bar"), aroused a considerable storm of enthusiasm and opposition in London last year. This suite was first performed in this country when Mr. Monteux conducted it in Boston last spring.

EAGLE JAN 1
Brooklyn, New York

However, this story was to be of conductors. Time was when we were blessed with transcendent orchestral music. That was when the Boston Symphony Orchestra came monthly to New York and under the direction of Dr. Muck revealed, without fuss and feathers of conductorial plumage, the music of the masters. Dr. Muck, Arthur Nikisch and Arturo Toscanini make music entirely for its own sake, and the personality of the conductor may be discerned only in the quality of the music he makes.

Pierre Monteux, present conductor of the Boston Symphony, is an earnest musician. He is not of the prima donna type. He is a specialist who can reveal the spirit of the moderns but who seems to lack that essential vision which endows classic compositions with their needed clarity. Either he is [illegible] or he suffers his men to be [illegible] the orchestra does not reveal [illegible] of its potentialities. Off[illegible] would say that in personnel [illegible] is the best in the

---

Play Spanish Dances

The Boston Symphony Orchestra signalized its third visit of the current season by playing in Carnegie Hall last night one of the most curiously miscellaneous programmes it has ever given here. To make up that programme its conductor, Pierre Monteux, had ranged from Handel to the present day, gathered together (without much regard for their appositeness in programmatic sequence) works by German, Russian, Spanish, and French composers, and included in the queer potpourri a set of three short pieces never before heard in New York.

This novelty of the evening was a group of lively, boisterously gay, and brilliantly orchestrated Spanish dances taken from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" ("El Sombrero de Tres Picos"), which Manuel de Falla of Cadiz composed to order for the Russian Ballet and which was staged for the first time by the Diaghilev troupe in London in the summer of 1919. The first of the three dances, entitled "The Neighbors," is a buzzing, gossipy musical delineation of a typical Spanish scene, and its gay and dashing performance made an instant hit with the audience last night.

The second, "The Miller's Dance," which according to Philip Hale's erudite and exhaustive programme notes, the Spaniards found the most interesting "because of its typically Andalusian character, its fascinating rhythm, which is like an affirmation of southern art, and its Moorish character," was less appealing and indeed seemed a bit vulgar. The third, a "Final Dance," a veritable whirlwind of rhythmic motion transmuted into a gorgeous display of orchestral colors produced by the addition to the full orchestra of tam-tam, xylophone, castanets, celesta, and piano, again captivated its hearers, and after several recalls the conductor got his men to their feet to share in the applause.

The concert began with Handel's "Concerto in F major for Strings and Wood Wind Orchestras"; included also Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, op. 56a, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," a concert arrangement of the third act from his ballet "Mlada," probably new to many hearers, although it had been played here several years ago by Modeste Altschuler and his Russian Symphony Orchestera, and ended with Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Despite its miscellaneous character it was all found enjoyable by the large audience.

G. W. H.

N.Y. POST JAN. 6.

Second Symphony Concert

On Monday evening, Jan. 16, at 8:15, will be given the second concert of the extra series of five Monday evening concerts which has been inaugurated this year, by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux.

Symphony Soloist

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 13-14, Paul Kochanski, the young violinist, will make his Boston debut as soloist. He will play Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs.

TRAV. JAN. 7.

Music Notes Afield.

As the slow movement from Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in memory of the dead composer, Mr. Parker in The Transcript says: "Conductor and orchestra seemed to be carving a relief, in Grecian purity and continence, upon some marble tomb holding the dust of Saint-Saëns beneath his loved Mediterranean skies. Yet at the end the audience applauded as roundly as though this Adagio were an appointed or inserted number in the routine of the day, while Mr. Monteux waited with unresponsive back for the clapping to subside, the custom of the country—and an innocent custom. For, had each comer been asked at the door whether Saint-Saëns were still alive—an old man carved in yellowed ivory—or dead within the week, how many might have answered truly?

N.Y. TIMES - JAN. 8.

Monteux Presents Surprise at Boston Orchestra Concert

Mozart Movements Given on Program, and Some of Rachmaninoff's Are Played at Carnegie Hall

By H. E. Krehbiel

Mr. Monteux, at the third afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday, gave his audience a surprise of a quietly pleasurable kind with a symphony which does not belong to the familiar last three works of the kind by Mozart, and an undeniable shock by playing three movements of a suite by Darius Milhaud. The symphony (Mr. Monteux omitted the minuet) was the so-called "Haffner" in D—not altogether a stranger to old concertgoers like a score or so of others by Mozart, but still one that is played so infrequently that it sounded as new as anything can which has so pronounced a Mozartian physiognomy. Its last movement, at least, entitled it to companionship with the E flat, G minor and C major symphonies which are the only works in their form by the composer with which the public is familiar.

After it had been played and enjoyed by all of the hearers whose ears have remained open to the charms of euphony Mr. Monteux threw the helm far over and set sail for the high seas of modern cacophony, though he did [illegible] the turbulence of the Gulf [illegible] the suite by new to local programs. It was written for a play designed for an open-air theater with a tank stage, in which, among other things, seals are supposed to make mock of the love of an old man for a young girl—a subject, we submit, not necessarily invocative of satirical mocking. We do not know whether or not the seals were in the music played yesterday, nor whether the nocturne which was played was the "nocturnal bacchanale made of silence" which a program note informed us the author had requested of the composer. Had all of the music been made of silence we fancy the audience would have found it more enjoyable. As it was, it awakened in us imaginings of what might be the result had the composer given each of the orchestral musicians a transcript of his themes and bidden him fall in whenever and wherever he pleased, regardless of their tonality. The themes were all agreeable and ingenious in themselves and their exposition at the beginning of each movement promised much pleasure. After that M. Milhaud, like Goethe's Mephistopheles, in conversation with the ambitious young scholar, seemed to say that he was weary of rational discourse and thenceforth would play the very devil. And this he did until our ears ached.

When the composition was played for the first time in Paris, a year ago last October, Mr. Hale tells us it provoked such an uproar of hisses and howls that the police cleared the fauteuils of the balcony. New Yorkers never give such frank expression to their sentiments. If bad music is played at a concert by an orchestra of good men (and all our orchestras are composed of good men, and so are the conductors good men) they applaud mildly and relapse into grateful silence. Perhaps they are afraid to express their convictions; or, maybe their attitude is like that of the Hindu before his idol—he knows that it is ugly, but feels that it is great.

The other music of the afternoon was Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" and some of the ballet in Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

N.Y. TRIBUNE - JAN. 8.

BOSTON MEN PLAY A NOVELTY

Milhand's Second Orchestral Suite Given Here for First Time.

The program for the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was well selected for the occasion. It consisted of Mozart's symphony in D major, Koechel, No. 385, and three contrasting modern numbers, Rachmaninov's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," three movements from Darius Milhand's second orchestral suite, the "Overture," "Pastoral" and "Nocturne"—which were a novelty here—and Borodin's brilliant "Polovtsian Dances" from his opera, "Prince Igor."

The Rachmaninov work was given in the composer's revised editions, which had been heard here last October at a Philharmonic concert. Milhand, who is one of the young ultra modern French writers called the Parisian "Six," was fortunate in having his suite, a larger work of his, introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra in their home city last spring. The parts omited yesterday were the fugue (a travesty on a fugue) and the finale. When heard in Boston the fugue is said to have produced "snickers of superiority mingled with hearty laughs" from the audience.

Of the whole suite Mr. Hale in his program notes says that at its first hearing at a Colonne concert in Paris on October 24, 1920, the music "provoked hissing and howling so that the police cleared the fautenils of the balcony." There were no such demonstrations made at yesterday's hearing of the new music, though the overture was received with only scant recognition and the pastorale and nocturne with scarcely more than apathy (except on the part of a few persons). The music in itself has themes, spirit and a striking palette of orchestral colors, also rhythmic feeling, but as a whole it strained severely the ear of the hearer.

One of the many instruments called for by the score is called a fouet, which is explained by Mr. Hale as "modern clappers to imitate the crack of a whip." The orchestra performed the difficult music with excellent finish.

N.Y. HERALD - JAN. 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Second Extra Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give the second concert of its extra series Monday evening, Jan 16, at Symphony Hall. Estelle Liebling, a soprano, who made an exceptionally favorable impression at a recital here last season, will sing with the orchestra an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel," and "Non so piu," from Mozart's "Figaro," which is by a coincidence also upon Hempel's Sunday concert program the day before.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, the most popular as well as one of the noblest pieces of symphonic music, is the chief item on the unusually fine program. The other numbers are Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," his best orchestral work; Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser," in which the main theme is the impressive "Pilgrim's Chorus," and Svendsen's lively but comparatively mediocre "Carnival at Paris." Anyone unaccustomed to symphony concerts could hardly hope to find a better or more readily enjoyable first program to hear than this one, which needs no recommendation to connoisseurs.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 11th program. Double Concerto for strings and woodwind, Handel; variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms; Fantasia on Scottish Airs, Bruch; "La Valse" (first time here), Ravel. Soloist, Paul Kochanski, violinist (first appearance in Boston).

GLOBE - JAN. 8.

Kochanski Symphony Soloist

Paul Kochanski, the young Polish violinist, who first came to this country last spring, will make his debut in Boston when he appears a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 13-14.

Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert the double concerto of Handel for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Hayden, and a new work by Maurice Ravel, which is called a "Choreographic Poem" and entitled "La Valse." The music is supposed to suggest an imperial ball in the early part of the 19th century.

Kochanski will play with the orchestra Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs. A native of Warsaw, this young violinist was a pupil of the famous Polish master, Mlyarski, and of the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson. Since he first played in public when a mere boy, he is now well known and has been long highly admired in Europe as a virtuoso. He came to America from Russia. There he passed some time in prison whence he made his escape in December, 1919.

Extra Symphony Concert

The second of the series of five Monday evening concerts which have been inaugurated this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Monday, Jan. 16, at 8:15. Mr. Monteux, conductor, has made a fine programme for this occasion, with numbers all different from those heard at the regular Symphony concerts this season. The principal work will be the great Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor. The soloist on this occasion will be Estelle Leibling, soprano, who will sing with the orchestra an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel" and the gem from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Non so piu." The remaining orchestral numbers will be Svendsen's riotous Episode for Full Orchestra, "The Carnival at Paris," "Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

POST - JAN. 8.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second of five Monday evening concerts inaugurated this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on January 16. The principal work will be the great fifth symphony of Beethovxen. The soloist will be Estelle Liebling, soprano, who will sing with Orchestra an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel" and Mozart's "Non so piu." Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" music, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture are the other orchestral numbers.

ADVTSR - JAN. 8.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The second of the series of five Monday evening concerts, inaugurated this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given in Symphony Hall on Monday, Jan. 16, at 8:15. Mr. Monteux has made a fine program for this occasion, with numbers all different from those heard at the regular symphony concerts this season. The principal work will be the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. The soloist will be Estelle Liebling, soprano, who will sing with the orchestra an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel" and from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Non so piu." The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be Svendsen's riotous episode for full orchestra, "The Carnival at Paris," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

KOCHANSKI, SOLOIST

Paul Kochanski, the young Polish violinist, who first came to this country last spring, and by his several concerts in New York and elsewhere impressed the public as one of the finest violinists of the day, will make his debut in Boston when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Monteux will conduct at these concerts the double concerto of Handel for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and a new work by Maurice Ravel, a "Chorographic Poem," entitled "La Valse." The music is supposed to suggest an imperial ball in the early part of the 19th century. Mr. Kochanski will play Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs. A native of Warsaw, this young violinist was a pupil of the Polish master, Mlyarski, and of the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson. He first played in public a mere boy; he is now well known and has been long highly admired in Europe.

HERALD - JAN. 8.

DE FALLA'S GUITAR

An Astute Suggestion About the Spaniard's Music as Lately Heard Here

WHEN Mr. Edward J. Dent, the reviewer of concerts for The Athenæum in London, heard a new piano-piece by de Falla, "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," he wrote a note setting the composer's music at a fresh angle. It deserves to be reprinted before the Spaniard's dances, played at Symphony Hall last week, are quite forgotten.

"When I first heard 'The Three-Cornered Hat,'" writes Mr. Dent, "I received the impression that the composer had conceived much of it in terms of the pianoforte, but as I came to know his music better I saw that I was wrong in my first judgment. The instrument which dominates de Falla's music is the guitar.

the guitar is perpetually present to the imagination. Indeed, in Spain some of the pianoforte pieces are played as trios for guitar and two Spanish mandolins. The guitar in Spain is taken seriously—how seriously we may judge from the fact that de Falla's contribution to the 'Tombeau de Debussy,' published last autumn by La Revue Musicale, is a piece for guitar. There are probably very few people in England who could play it. On the pianoforte it is impossible to realize its right effect. Yet it is instructive to study it carefully at the pianoforte, to endeavor to hear in imagination how it should sound on the guitar, and then do the best one can to reproduce that effect at the keyboard. One hardly ever hears a guitar in England. In Italy one hears it in the streets, generally played no better than the banjo is played here. In Spain it is an instrument for serious music; it still seems to retain something of the position which the lute held in the days of the Renaissance. Through all de Falla's music, from 'La Vida Breve' to the 'Nights in the Gardens of Spain,' we hear the guitar murmur and throb.

"In 'The Three-Cornered Hat' there were also obvious illusions to Domenico Scarlatti. Spanish musicians seem now to regard Domenico Scarlatti as the father o Spanish music, as the French look back t Rameau and we to the Elizabethans. Scarlatti illuminates de Falla, and de Fall Scarlatti in his turn. When we conside them both together, when we note t rhythms, the clashes of harmony, the peculiarities of melodic line that are common both, we begin to see that behind both them stands the same inspiring muse, a that she carries, not a lyre, but a guit Here in the North our music is gradual becoming more and more degraded American vulgarity. Spain sets before ideal of a grave and passionate nob it.

Items and Incidents

From Mr. Monteux and the Sympho Orchestra New York heard on Saturd afternoon three movements of Milhau Suite, not a little mocked and bera when it was played in Boston last spri Yet the reviewer for The Herald wro "The music in itself has themes, spirit a striking palette of orchestral colors, rhythmic feeling; but as a whole strained severely the ear of the hear And that reviewer is no apostle of "ultra-modern." The finale and the p ody of a fugue were the omitted divisi

---

TRANS. JAN. 9.

FULL MODERN PROGRAM GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Great Works of Debussy, Liszt, Tschaikowsky and Strauss Are Given Powerful Rendering Under Monteux

Modernity prevailed at the annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Young Men's Christian association series at the Auditorium yesterday afternoon. There used in the old days to be mild complainings, at times, that some of the programs of this famous organization, while full of beautiful music, were such as a smaller orchestra might have quite adequately given—what the public wanted on such all too infrequent occasions was a chance to hear some of the great works that can be heard only from a great orchestra. Whether or not yesterday's program was consciously shaped by this principle, it amply gratified the natural desire to hear exploited the full resources of the modern orchestra.

Such a program may be better or more interesting than one made up of works in the older style, but it does bring out the wonderful richness and variety of tonal combinations which have been made possible, not merely by the enlargement of the orchestra or by the addition of new instruments of striking timbre, but even more by the incessant experimentation of a century, and most of all by the creative imagination of a few great men like Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner and Richard Strauss. But the matter is not wholly of technic; to make the possible new effects artistically valuable, it was necessary to evolve a style and a subject matter requiring them. The evolution of the modern orchestra, therefore, is closely related to the transition from classical to romantic ideals in literature and painting, as well as in music. The impressionist calls for brilliant colors, for striking effects, for new resources of expression, and each such development in turn reacts upon the art. Beethoven could say great things with a small orchestra, but they were not the same things that are said in a concert like that of yesterday.

It was devoted entirely, for example, to what is called "program music," as opposed to "absolute music," a matter of hot controversy half a century ago, but now settled amicably with both sides victorious. Program music is a broader term than "description music," but the general idea is the same—descriptive has an important place in whatever program of scenes, events or moods a modern composer may undertake to express in musical terms. How this characteristic ran through all the music yesterday may be seen from the following program:—

Symphony No 4, in F minor	Tschaikowsky
Two Nocturnes	Debussy
"Death and Transfiguration"	Richard Strauss
"Mazeppa," symphonic poem, No 2	Liszt

A "symphonic poem" declares itself to be program music, and its title usually gives a hint of the program. In a symphony there is no such declaration, though there may be a hint, in Tschaikowsky's sixth, the "Path

FROM JAN 1 1922 A
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Louise Homer, the American contralto, whose voice and art are scarcely rivalled by the singers of two generations, will be heard as soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Jan. 6, at 8:15. The majestic beauty of her tones could hardly be heard to finer advantage than in the two classic numbers which she will sing with the great orchestra: Bach's secular Cantata for solo voice, "Begone ye gloomy shadows," and the Recitative and Rondo from Mozart's Opera, "Clemenza di Tito."

The principal number on the programme will be Cesar Franck's masterpiece, the symphony in D minor, for the eloquent and inspired performance of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of its French conductor, Pierre Monteux, has won superlative praise in New York, Boston and other cities. This wonderful score, since it was composed a generation ago, and then sceptically received in Paris, has steadily increased in the estimation of the world, until now it has taken its place as probably the finest symphony in modern music. The score is particularly beloved for the stirring splendour of its melodious themes, for the English horn solo in the second movement, and for the noble and triumphant affirmation of faith which is its climax. The remaining numbers will be Svendsen's brilliant "Carnival in Paris," and, to close, the third act of the opera "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which has been arranged for concert use by the composer, and which is said to reveal this master painter of Russian fairy tales in music in his most piquant and enchanting vein.

Established JAN 3 1922 H
FROM COMMERCIAL
New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Heifetz Soloist With N. Y. Symphony—'Le Roi d'Ys' Premiere on Thursday.

Next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third pair of concerts in New York.

For the Thursday program Pierre Monteux has selected Handel's double concerto for string and woodwind orchestras in F major, Brahm's variations on a theme, by Haydn; Massenet's overture to "Phedre," and two unusual numbers by Rimsky-Korsakoff and de Falla, respectively. The first is the third act from the opera-ballet, "Mlada," arranged by the Russian composer in concert form and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff." The music of the Spanish composer consists of three dances from his ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" ("The Three-Cornered Hat"), which, written in characteristic Spanish rhythms, will have its first performance in New York on this occasion.

At the Saturday matinee, Mozart's Symphony in D major, Kochel No. 504, will be played; also Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," and the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The notable novelty on this program will be the Overture, Pastorale and Nocturne from the Second Orchestral Suite by Darius Milhaud, the French composer, whose larger music will on this occasion have its first hearing in New York. Milhaud is a prominent member of the famous Parisian "Six," whose burlesque, "Le Boeuf sur le toit" ("The Nothing-Doing Bar"), aroused a considerable storm of enthusiasm and opposition in London last year. This suite was first performed in this country when Mr. Monteux conducted it in Boston last spring.

EAGLE JAN 1
Brooklyn, New York

However, this story was to be of conductors. Time was when we were blessed with transcendent orchestral music. That was when the Boston Symphony Orchestra came monthly to New York and under the direction of Dr. Muck revealed, without fuss and feathers of conductorial plumage, the music of the masters. Dr. Muck, Arthur Nikisch and Arturo Toscanini make music entirely for its own sake, and the personality of the conductor may be discerned only in the quality of the music he makes.

Pierre Monteux, present conductor of the Boston Symphony, is an earnest musician. He is not of the prima donna type. He is a specialist who can reveal the spirit of the moderns but who seems to lack that essential vision which endows classic compositions with their needed clarity. Either he is careless or he suffers his men to be so, for the orchestra does not reveal the utmost of its potentialities. Off-hand, I should say that in personnel the Boston Orchestra is the best in the

---

Bostonians Play Spanish Dances

The Boston Symphony Orchestra signalized its third visit of the current season by playing in Carnegie Hall last night one of the most curiously miscellaneous programmes it has ever given here. To make up that programme its conductor, Pierre Monteux, had ranged from Handel to the present day, gathered together (without much regard for their appositeness in programmatic sequence) works by German, Russian, Spanish, and French composers, and included in the queer potpourri a set of three short pieces never before heard in New York.

This novelty of the evening was a group of lively, boisterously gay, and brilliantly orchestrated Spanish dances taken from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" ("El Sombrero de Tres Picos"), which Manuel de Falla of Cadiz composed to order for the Russian Ballet and which was staged for the first time by the Diaghilev troupe in London in the summer of 1919. The first of the three dances, entitled "The Neighbors," is a buzzing, gossipy musical delineation of a typical Spanish scene, and its gay and dashing performance made an instant hit with the audience last night.

The second, "The Miller's Dance," which according to Philip Hale's erudite and exhaustive programme notes, the Spaniards found the most interesting "because of its typically Andalusian character, its fascinating rhythm, which is like an affirmation of southern art, and its Moorish character," was less appealing and indeed seemed a bit vulgar. The third, a "Final Dance," a veritable whirlwind of rhythmic motion transmuted into a gorgeous display of orchestral colors produced by the addition to the full orchestra of tam-tam, xylophone, castanets, celesta, and piano, again captivated its hearers, and after several recalls the conductor got his men to their feet to share in the applause.

The concert began with Handel's "Concerto in F major for Strings and Wood Wind Orchestras"; included also Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, op. 56a, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," a concert arrangement of the third act from his ballet "Mlada," probably new to many hearers, although it had been played here several years ago by Modeste Altschuler and his Russian Symphony Orchestera, and ended with Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Despite its miscellaneous character it was all found enjoyable by the large audience. G. W. H.

N.Y. POST JAN. 6

Second Symphony Concert

On Monday evening, Jan. 16, at 8:15, will be given the second concert of the extra series of five Monday evening concerts which has been inaugurated this year, by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux.

Symphony Soloist

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 13-14, Paul Kochanski, the young violinist, will make his Boston debut as soloist. He will play Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs.

TRAV. JAN. 7.

Music Notes Afield.

As the slow movement from Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in memory of the dead composer, Mr. Parker in The Transcript says: "Conductor and orchestra seemed to be carving a relief, in Grecian purity and continence, upon some marble tomb holding the dust of Saint-Saëns beneath his loved Mediterranean skies. Yet at the end the audience applauded as roundly as though this Adagio were an appointed or inserted number in the routine of the day, while Mr. Monteux waited with unresponsive back for the clapping to subside, the custom of the country—and an innocent custom. For, had each comer been asked at the door whether Saint-Saëns were still alive—an old man carved in yellowed ivory—or dead within the week, how many might have answered truly?

N.Y. TIMES-JAN. 8.

Monteux Presents Surprise at Boston Orchestra Concert

Mozart Movements Given on Program, and Some of Rachmaninoff's Are Played at Carnegie Hall

By H. E. Krehbiel

Mr. Monteux, at the third afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday, gave his audience a surprise of a quietly pleasurable kind with a symphony which does not belong to the familiar last three works of the kind by Mozart, and an undeniable shock by playing three movements of a suite by Darius Milhaud. The symphony (Mr. Monteux omitted the minuet) was the so-called "Haffner" in D—not altogether a stranger to old concertgoers like a score or so of others by Mozart, but still one that is played so infrequently that it sounded as new as anything can which has so pronounced a Mozartian physiognomy. Its last movement, at least, entitled it to companionship with the E flat, G minor and C major symphonies which are the only works in their form by the composer with which the public is familiar.

After it had been played and enjoyed by all of the hearers whose ears have remained open to the charms of euphony Mr. Monteux threw the helm far over and set sail for the high seas of modern cacophony, though he did not reach the turbulence of the Gulf Stream until he came to the suite by

This was new to local programs. It was written for a play designed for an open-air theater with a tank stage, in which, among other things, seals are supposed to make mock of the love of an old man for a young girl—a subject, we submit, not necessarily invocative of satirical mocking. We do not know whether or not the seals were in the music played yesterday, nor whether the nocturne which was played was the "nocturnal bacchanale made of silence" which a program note informed us the author had requested of the composer. Had all of the music been made of silence we fancy the audience would have found it more enjoyable. As it was, it awakened in us imaginings of what might be the result had the composer given each of the orchestral musicians a transcript of his themes and bidden him fall in whenever and wherever he pleased, regardless of their tonality. The themes were all agreeable and ingenious in themselves and their exposition at the beginning of each movement promised much pleasure. After that M. Milhaud, like Goethe's Mephistopheles, in conversation with the ambitious young scholar, seemed to say that he was weary of rational discourse and thenceforth would play the very devil. And this he did until our ears ached.

When the composition was played for the first time in Paris, a year ago last October, Mr. Hale tells us it provoked such an uproar of hisses and howls that the police cleared the fauteuils of the balcony. New Yorkers never give such frank expression to their sentiments. If bad music is played at a concert by an orchestra of good men (and all our orchestras are composed of good men, and so are the conductors good men) they applaud mildly and relapse into grateful silence. Perhaps they are afraid to express their convictions; or, maybe their attitude is like that of the Hindu before his idol—he knows that it is ugly, but feels that it is great.

The other music of the afternoon was Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" and some of the ballet in Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

N.Y. TRIBUNE JAN. 8.

BOSTON MEN PLAY A NOVELTY

Milhand's Second Orchestral Suite Given Here for First Time.

The program for the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was well selected for the occasion. It consisted of Mozart's symphony in D major, Koechel. No. 385, and three contrasting modern numbers, Rachmaninov's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," three movements from Darius Milhand's second orchestral suite, the "Overture," "Pastoral" and "Nocturne"—which were a novelty here—and Borodin's brilliant "Polovtsian Dances" from his opera, "Prince Igor."

The Rachmaninov work was given in the composer's revised editions, which had been heard here last October at a Philharmonic concert. Milhand, who is one of the young ultra modern French writers called the Parisian "Six," was fortunate in having his suite, a larger work of his, introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra in their home city last spring. The parts omited yesterday were the fugue (a travesty on a fugue) and the finale. When heard in Boston the fugue is said to have produced "snickers of superiority mingled with hearty laughs" from the audience.

Of the whole suite Mr. Hale in his program notes says that at its first hearing at a Colonne concert in Paris on October 24, 1920, the music "provoked hissing and howling so that the police cleared the fautenils of the balcony." There were no such demonstrations made at yesterday's hearing of the new music, though the overture was received with only scant recognition and the pastorale and nocturne with scarcely more than apathy (except on the part of a few persons). The music in itself has themes, spirit and a striking palette of orchestral colors, also rhythmic feeling, but as a whole it strained severely the ear of the hearer.

One of the many instruments called for by the score is called a fouet, which is explained by Mr. Hale as "modern clappers to imitate the crack of a whip." The orchestra performed the difficult music with excellent finish.

NY. HERALD-JAN. 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Second Extra Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give the second concert of its extra series Monday evening, Jan 16, at Symphony Hall. Estelle Liebling, a soprano, who made an exceptionally favorable impression at a recital here last season, will sing with the orchestra an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel," and "Non so piu," from Mozart's "Figaro," which is by a coincidence also upon Hempel's Sunday concert program the day before.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, the most popular as well as one of the noblest pieces of symphonic music, is the chief item on the unusually fine program. The other numbers are Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," his best orchestral work; Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser," in which the main theme is the impressive "Pilgrim's Chorus," and Svendsen's lively but comparatively mediocre "Carnival at Paris." Anyone unaccustomed to symphony concerts could hardly hope to find a better or more readily enjoyable first program to hear than this one, which needs no recommendation to connoisseurs.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, 11th program. Double Concerto for strings and woodwind, Handel; variations on a theme by Haydn, Brahms; Fantasia on Scottish Airs, Bruch; "La Valse" (first time here), Ravel. Soloist, Paul Kochanski, violinist (first appearance in Boston).

GLOBE-JAN. 8.

[45]

Kochanski Symphony Soloist

Paul Kochanski, the young Polish violinist, who first came to this country last spring, will make his debut in Boston when he appears a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 13-14.

Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert the double concerto of Handel for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Hayden, and a new work by Maurice Ravel, which is called a "Choreographic Poem" and entitled "La Valse." The music is supposed to suggest an imperial ball in the early part of the 19th century.

Kochanski will play with the orchestra Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs. A native of Warsaw, this young violinist was a pupil of the famous Polish master, Mlyarski, and of the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson. Since he first played in public when a mere boy, he is now well known and has been long highly admired in Europe as a virtuoso. He came to America from Russia. There he passed some time in prison whence he made his escape in December, 1919.

Extra Symphony Concert

The second of the series of five Monday evening concerts which have been inaugurated this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Monday, Jan. 16, at 8:15. Mr. Monteux, conductor, has made a fine programme for this occasion, with numbers all different from those heard at the regular Symphony concerts this season. The principal work will be the great Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor. The soloist on this occasion will be Estelle Leibling, soprano, who will sing with the orchestra an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel" and the gem from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Non so piu." The remaining orchestral numbers will be Svendsen's riotous Episode for Full Orchestra, "The Carnival at Paris," "Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

POST-JAN. 8.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second of five Monday evening concerts inaugurated this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on January 16. The principal work will be the great fifth symphony of Beethovxen. The soloist will be Estelle Liebling, soprano, who will sing with Orchestra an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel" and Mozart's "Non so piu." Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" music, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture are the other orchestral numbers.

ADVTSR-JAN. 8

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The second of the series of five Monday evening concerts, inaugurated this year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be given in Symphony Hall on Monday, Jan. 16, at 8:15. Mr. Monteux has made a fine program for this occasion, with numbers all different from those heard at the regular symphony concerts this season. The principal work will be the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. The soloist will be Estelle Liebling, soprano, who will sing with the orchestra an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel" and from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," "Non so piu.' The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be Svendsen's riotous episode for full orchestra, "The Carnival at Paris," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

KOCHANSKI, SOLOIST

Paul Kochanski, the young Polish violinist, who first came to this country last spring, and by his several concerts in New York and elsewhere impressed the public as one of the finest violinists of the day, will make his debut in Boston when he appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Monteux will conduct at these concerts the double concerto of Handel for string and woodwind orchestras, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and a new work by Maurice Ravel, a "Chorographic Poem," entitled "La Valse." The music is supposed to suggest an imperial ball in the early part of the 19th century. Mr. Kochanski will play Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs. A native of Warsaw, this young violinist was a pupil of the Polish master, Mlyarski, and of the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson. He first played in public a mere boy; he is now well known and has been long highly admired in Europe.

HERALD-JAN. 8.

DE FALLA'S GUITAR

An Astute Suggestion About the Spaniard's Music as Lately Heard Here

WHEN Mr. Edward J. Dent, the reviewer of concerts for The Athenæum in London, heard a nev piano-piece by de Falla, "Nights in th Gardens of Spain," he wrote a note settin the composer's music at a fresh angle. I deserves to be reprinted before the Spaniard's dances, played at Symphony Hal last week, are quite forgotten.

"When I first heard 'The Three-Cornere Hat'," writes Mr. Dent, "I received the impression that the composer had conceive much of it in terms of the pianoforte, bu as I came to know his music better I sa that I was wrong in my first judgmen The instrument which dominates de Falla music is the guitar. In the ballet, as the 'Pièces Espagnoles' for the pianoforte, the guitar is perpetually present to the imagination. Indeed, in Spain some of the pianoforte pieces are played as trios for guitar and two Spanish mandolins. The guitar in Spain is taken seriously—how seriously we may judge from the fact that de Falla's contribution to the 'Tombeau de Debussy,' published last autumn by La Revue Musicale, is a piece for guitar. There are probably very few people in England who could play it. On the pianoforte it is impossible to realize its right effect. Yet it is instructive to study it carefully at the pianoforte, to endeavor to hear in imagination how it should sound on the guitar, and then do the best one can to reproduce that effect at the keyboard. One hardly ever hears a guitar in England. In Italy one hears it in the streets, generally played no better than the banjo is played here. In Spain it is an instrument for serious music; it still seems to retain something of the position which the lute held in the days of the Renaissance. Through all de Falla's music, from 'La Vida Breve' to the 'Nights in the Gardens of Spain,' we hear the guitar murmur and throb.

"In 'The Three-Cornered Hat' there wer also obvious illusions to Domenico Scarlatti. Spanish musicians seem now to re gard Domenico Scarlatti as the father o Spanish music, as the French look back t Rameau and we to the Elizabethans. Scar latti illuminates de Falla, and de Fall Scarlatti in his turn. When we conside them both together, when we note th rhythms, the clashes of harmony, the pec liarities of melodic line that are common both, we begin to see that behind both them stands the same inspiring muse, an that she carries, not a lyre, but a guita Here in the North our music is graduall becoming more and more degraded American vulgarity. Spain sets before ideal of a grave and passionate nob it."

Items and Incidents

From Mr. Monteux and the Sympho Orchestra New York heard on Saturd afternoon three movements of Milhau Suite, not a little mocked and bera when it was played in Boston last spri Yet the reviewer for The Herald wro "The music in itself has themes, spirit a striking palette of orchestral colors, rhythmic feeling; but as a whole strained severely the ear of the heare And that reviewer is no apostle of "ultra-modern." The finale and the p ody of a fugue were the omitted divisio

---

TRANS. JAN. 9.

FULL MODERN PROGRAM GIVEN BY SYMPHONY

Great Works of Debussy, Liszt, Tschaikowsky and Strauss Are Given Powerful Rendering Under Monteux

Modernity prevailed at the annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Young Men's Christian association series at the Auditorium yesterday afternoon. There used in the old days to be mild complainings, at times, that some of the programs of this famous organization, while full of beautiful music, were such as a smaller orchestra might have quite adequately given—what the public wanted on such all too infrequent occasions was a chance to hear some of the great works that can be heard only from a great orchestra. Whether or not yesterday's program was consciously shaped by this principle, it amply gratified the natural desire to hear exploited the full resources of the modern orchestra.

Such a program may be better or more interesting than one made up of works in the older style, but it does bring out the wonderful richness and variety of tonal combinations which have been made possible, not merely by the enlargement of the orchestra or by the addition of new instruments of striking timbre, but even more by the incessant experimentation of a century, and most of all by the creative imagination of a few great men like Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner and Richard Strauss. But the matter is not wholly of technic; to make the possible new effects artistically valuable, it was necessary to evolve a style and a subject matter requiring them. The evolution of the modern orchestra, therefore, is closely related to the transition from classical to romantic ideals in literature and painting, as well as in music. The impressionist calls for brilliant colors, for striking effects, for new resources of expression, and each such development in turn reacts upon the art. Beethoven could say great things with a small orchestra, but they were not the same things that are said in a concert like that of yesterday.

It was devoted entirely, for example, to what is called "program music," as opposed to "absolute music," a matter of hot controversy half a century ago, but now settled amicably with both sides victorious. Program music is a broader term than "description music," but the general idea is the same—descriptive has an important place in whatever program of scenes, events or moods a modern composer may undertake to express in musical terms. How this characteristic ran through all the music yesterday may be seen from the following program:—

Symphony No 4, in F minor ....Tschaikowsky
Two Nocturnes..........Debussy
"Death and Transfiguration" .Richard Strauss
"Mazeppa," symphonic poem, No 2.....Liszt

A "symphonic poem" declares itself to be program music, and its title usually gives a hint of the program. In a symphony there is no such declaration, though there may be a hint, as in Tschaikowsky's sixth, the "Pathetic." But the fourth the uninstructed [illegible] quickly divine to be [illegible] unfolding of a somber program, and indeed Tschaikowsky in a letter to a friend gave the key. The opening theme is "Fate, the fatal power which hinders one in the pursuit of happiness." A clarinet solo expresses a delusive dream of something better, but there is a cruel awakening with the return to the fatal theme: "There is no port; you will be tossed hither and thither until the sea swells over you." A gloomy theme, but that of the andante is no more cheerful—the composer's account of it recalls the somber opening of Turguenieff's "Smoke." The scherzo with its brisk plucking of strings and crisp responses from the wind choir is gay, to be sure, but not happy—there is always something delirious in Tschaikowsky's gayety. In the finale is depicted the vain effort of the pessimist to find satisfaction in the noisy pleasures of the rustic crowd, but the gibbering beasts and birds, creatures of a disordered mind, come braying and fluttering in, and the country fair quickly becomes an asylum again. The composer stoutly asserts that the ending is meant to be happy, but it gets no further than "Rejoice in the happiness of others—and you can still live." It is a cross-section of the Russian temperament.

It is a long step from this somber and powerful fatalism to the refined paganism of Claude Debussy. The two nocturnes played, "Nuages" and "Fetes," are in a set of three, but the third, "Sirenes," has a chorus of women's voices. Both of the two given are program music, and in addition are admirable examples of a delicate and beautiful kind of impressionism in which France took the lead as clearly as in the corresponding development in modern painting; Debussy is sometimes likened to Corot, and in their imaginative suggestiveness, their power of evoking poetic images, there is a parallel. The first of the nocturnes, "Clouds," was the only quiet spot in a restless concert; they are not storm clouds, but a "slow and solemn march," "dissolving in a gray agony tinted with white." Not very easy to say in music, and without this key nobody could possibly guess what was being said, but the ethereal charm of the music needs no key. If Debussy gave the one gentle touch in a somber and strenuous program he also gave it its one relatively cheerful moment in the second nocturne, "Festivals," the orchestration of which is brilliant, gay and beautiful; here again a vague impressionism prevails rather than what is commonly called description.

The rest of the program was high tragedy, and it was interesting, if rather hard on infirm nerves, to hear the same tragic theme, (akin for that matter to Tschaikowsky's), treated twice in such different ways by Strauss and Liszt. Liszt is a great composer and this is one of his great works, yet it was to some extent an anticlimax after Strauss's masterpiece. In melodic fertility and spontaneous charm, neither the German nor the Magyar compares with the great and gloomy Russian, but in firmness of grip both have the advantage of him. But as between Strauss and Liszt, both ultra-modern in spirit and both great masters of the modern orchestra, it is the German who has the advantage in architectonic.

Much of his music is lean and ungenial; like much of Brahms, it gets hold but slowly of the listener's emotions. But there is always something in reserve, always a progress, a building up, a tight hold on the technical and emotional development, so that by and by the hearer finds himself getting above the timber belt and looking off over Himalayan distances at snow-peaks inaccessible to man. Such ascents are the glory of German music; there is nothing of it in the great Russians, who with all their greatness are of the steppes. They say beautiful things and say them again, meandering level with the source. But in Strauss, hard and unsympathetic as much of his music is, there is at any rate a mental grip of the most powerful sort, and in "Death and Transfiguration," it achieves thrilling things.

It was a strenuous program to play as well as to listen to, but the Boston musicians threw themselves into it with ardor under the leadership of Pierre Monteux and it was by far the finest performance which the Symphony orchestra has given here since its great upheaval during the war. To bring it back to its old superlative excellence was necessarily a slow matter; music lovers everywhere must rejoice with Boston that it is being accomplished. There have been concerts, perhaps, of more varied interest, less taxing to ear and mind than the cumulative gloom of yesterday's program, surcharged as it was with modern pessimism and modern melancholy. But as has been said, the great works of this kind can only be heard when thre is a great orchestra to play them, and we need not complain if "Lear" piled on Hamlet." And one must turn back far indeed for such magnificent playing as the reorganized Symphony orchestra did yesterday.

SPRNGFILD-REPUB. JAN. 9

COURANT 1922 Y

Hartford, Conn.

WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, IN CONCERT AT PARSONS'S THEATER, JANUARY 19th. (AT LEFT) PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR, (IN CIRCLE) PAUL KOCHANSKI, VIOLINIST, SOLOIST.

TIMES, JAN 2 1922 Y

Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

How the Orchestra Rehearses— To Appear Here Next Monday.

When Pierre Monteux, the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, came to his present post two years ago, he noticed at the first rehearsal the acoustical difference of the empty hall, and ordered that a great curtain be hung in front of the stage reaching from floor to roof. It has hung at each of his rehearsals since, absorbing the sound and replacing the auditors of Fridays and Saturdays, who probably little realize that they make the music mellow by their physical presence.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Mr. Monteux's alert ear is a thing to wonder at, nor has he travelled the world over, training concert, opera and ballet orchestras, without perfecting the art of routine to the Nth degree.

Every morning in the week, except on a concert day, is devoted to rehearsing. If a layman could penetrate the mysteries of Symphony hall when a work is being read off at sight for the first time by the orchestra he might believe that he is hearing a finished performance. He would indeed be hearing a finished performance, but the public performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra must be super-finished. The ability to read the most difficult scores at sight is with the musicians a starting point, which is taken for granted. They familiarize themselves with the music in hand, so that they can free themselves from the effort of reading—so that the music may flow with ease from their instruments. The orchestra will make its only local appearance this season at Parsons Theater next Monday evening under the auspices of the Sedgwick Concert course. Seats now selling at Sedgwick & Casey's.

FALL RIVER Jan 2 NEWS

FINEST MUSICAL EVENT OF SEASON

RARE TREAT FURNISHED BY CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Empire Theater Filled, and Many Unable To Obtain Seats—Varied and Interesting Program Arranged by Conductor Monteux.

Fall River music lovers enjoyed the greatest event of the season in the form of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon at the Empire Theater, under the auspices of the Woman's Club. The orchestra played here a year ago under the same auspices, and on Sunday the theater was filled to its capacity, duplicating the success of last year. Many, unable to obtain seats, stood throughout the performance.

Those who heard the orchestra a year ago anticipated a treat, and they were not disappointed. Mr. Monteux is an expert arranger of programs, and that of Sunday was varied and interesting. From the opening notes of the symphony to the climax of the Tannhauser Overture, the great audience sat spell-bound by the matchless playing of the 100 men who compose the orchestra. The following program was given:

Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Op. 36 ....Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
"Carnival in Paris," Episode for Orchestra ....Svendsen
Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21 ....Lalo
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Andante.
3. Rondo: Allegro.
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner

The Symphony No. 4, by Tschaikowsky, though composed over 40 years ago, has the freshness of modern music, and is considered by many critics the finest he ever wrote. Tschaikowsky himself had a peculiar weakness for this symphony. He spoke of it "as a labor of love, an enjoyment like "Orriegin" and the second quartet." It ranks with the great symphonies of the musical world.

It is dedicated "To my best friend," and this friend was a widow, Mrs. von Meck, who befriended him in a pecuniary way, though they never met. In the introduction is heard the sinister theme of "Fate," given out by horns and bassoons. One is reminded at once of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and Tschaikowsky himself wrote, "In reality my work is a reflection of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. I have not copied his musical contents, only borrowed the central idea." The whole first movement is tinged with Russian despondency, though the second theme of this movement, a clarinet solo, is charming, and introduces an element of brightness.

The second movement is also sad. There was a striking theme, played in unison, which was heard repeatedly.

The Scherzo was unique, due to the fact that all the stringed instruments were plucked with the fingers throughout, instead of played with the bows. It was played at a rapid tempo and the shading was remarkably fine.

The last movement was brilliant and was also played presto. It was founded on a Russian folk-tune, "In the fields there stood a birch-tree," which was given out over and over again in varied forms. The brazen theme of "Fate" was also heard in this movement. The end of the symphony was stupendous and at its close Mr. Monteux was recalled to acknowledge the applause.

A foil to the symphony was given in "The Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, the Norwegian composer. It depicts the varied aspects of the capitol of pleasure. It was a vivacious number, with a beautiful legato passage in the middle, after which the sprightly themes returned, more attractive than before.

The soloist of the afternoon was Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra. It is the first time he has played here as soloist, and he more than fulfilled expectations. Richly endowed both technically and temperamentally, he gave a vivid and glowing interpretation of Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Only three of the five movements were played. At the close of the symphony, Mr. Burgin was recalled several times. During the playing of the "Carnival in Paris" and the "Spanish Symphony" Mr. Theodorowicz acted as concert master.

The closing number, the Overture to "Tannhauser," formed a splendid climax to a magnificent concert. The noble and reverent strains of the Pilgrim's Chorus alternated with the wild bacchanalian music from the Venus Mountain. Aside from the fact that the brass section lagged considerably in the coda, it was a notable performance and aroused great enthusiasm. Mr. Monteux was recalled twice at the close of the concert.

The Woman's Club has done much to bring the finest music here, and the large audiences which attend the Sunday afternoon concerts testify that its efforts are appreciated. Last Sunday's concert gave pleasure to hundreds of people and added one more to the notable musical events under the auspices of this organization.

FROM JAN 3 1922

TIMES,

Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concert by Famous Orchestra Here Next Monday Evening.

A program imposing by its brilliance and engrossing by its beauty and variety should make memorable the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony orchestra when this famous institution of New England and the world at large gives its sole concert of the season in this city at Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 9, at 8:15. The principal number will be the celebrated symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which, steadily increasing in favor since it was composed a generation ago, has now taken its place as probably the finest symphony in modern music. This work is particularly admired for the stirring beauty of its melodious themes, for the English horn solo in the second movement, and for the noble and triumphant affirmation of religious faith with this the score closes.

The distinguished soloist at this concert will be Paul Kochanski, the young genius of the violin, who first came to this country last year, and by his several concerts in New York and elsewhere impressed our public as one of the very finest violinists living. A native of Warsaw, Poland, and a pupil of the famous Polish master, Mlynarski, and of the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson, Kochanski first won acclaim in public concerts as a mere boy, and has lately, in Europe, in this, his early maturity, taken his unquestioned place among the finest executive artists of the day. He came to America from Russia where, having rebelled against the bolshevik government, which attempted to subsidize his talents, he was imprisoned and made his escape in December, 1919. Kochanski is to play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston as well as in Hartford. He will be heard in Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," a score of formidable difficulty, but nevertheless captivating in its piquant rhythms and melody.

The humorous tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," will be the closing number on this program. This work has become probably the msot popular and admired of the number of great scores by the distinguished composer, who is now visiting America. Seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, Asylum street.

FROM JAN 4 1922 P

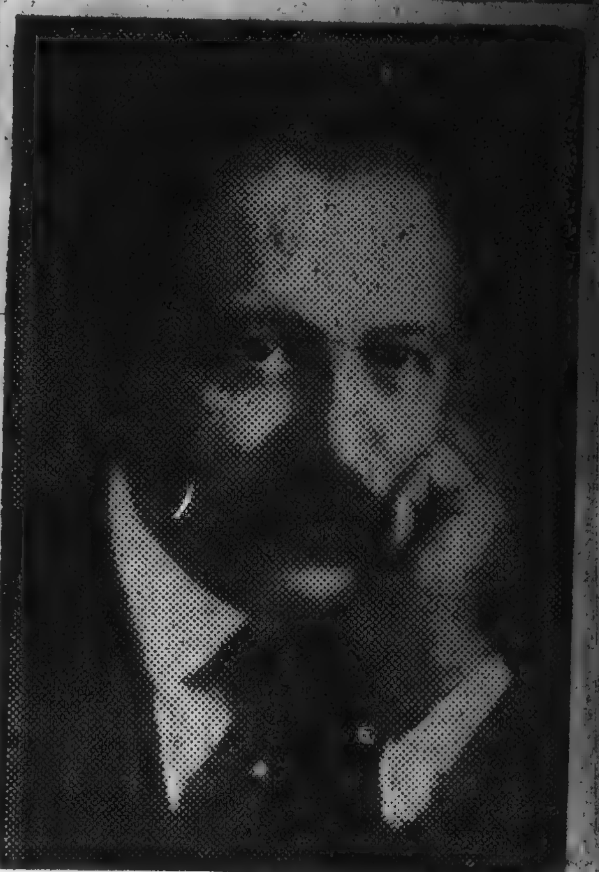
REPUBLICAN,

Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ON SUNDAY

"Y" Feels Elated Over Ability to Present Great Musical Offering at Auditorium

The crowning musical event of this season in Springfield is anticipated in the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Auditorium Sunday under the auspices of the



PIERRE MONTEUX

Young Men's Christian association. This is the 44th season of the organization and the third under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The full orchestra of 100 will be present, and a program of variety and brilliance will be given.

In no other city in the world is a concert of such high quality as this included in a series of free entertainments year after year. The promoters of the London Monday popular concerts, which for years were regarded as unique in an attempt to bring the best in musical effort within reach of all of the people, were not able to present them at Covent Garden at a lower admission fee than 36 cents. The Young Men's Christian association is very proud of its success in putting, and keeping, Springfield first on the world's map in this respect, an achievement which has been made possible only by the generous voluntary support of the music-loving residents of this city and surrounding towns.

TIMES, JAN 5 1922 Y

Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Paul Kochanski, the Polish violinist, who will be heard at Parsons's theater next Monday evening with the Boston Symphony orchestra, might be said to have become famous in this country over night. Practically unknown and unheralded, Mr. Kochanski made his debut, winning public favor at the very outset. How well he succeeded is evidenced in the fact that he was immediately scheduled for four more hearings in the metropolis, making five public appearances within the short period of five weeks.

For his initial test in the new world this remarkable violinist elected to stake all upon the performance of what is probably the most difficult of violin music, the Brahms Concerto. Katherine Spaeth said the next day in the New York Evening Mail:

"It is something new for a violinist to make his American debut by playing the Brahms Concerto—only that and nothing more, but Paul Kochanski, who thus introduced himself with the New York Symphony orchestra at Carnegie hall yesterday afternoon, made perhaps a greater impression by his sudden leap to the heights of violin music than if he had sawed the conventional program of cloying melodies and obvious tricks. Brahms is the master who writes only for masters and it may be doubted if the opening movement of his concerto has ever been better played here than it was yesterday."

The New York World compared Paul Kochanski to the great Kreisler:

"He played but one number yesterday, staking his success on one of the most difficult of compositions written for his instrument, the Brahms Concerto in D. There is little opportunity in it for showy playing, and the interpreter has to put aside all the embellishments dear to the fiddler's heart and concern himself only with the composer's meaning. Here is where Mr. Kochanski revealed himself the student and musician.

"The first movement has seldom been so brilliantly played, and the adagio had the classic repose and refinement that Mr. Kreisler brings to it."

Seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, Asylum street.

[46]

listener would quickly divine to be the musical unfolding of a somber program, and indeed Tschaikowsky in a letter to a friend gave the key. The opening theme is "Fate, the fatal power which hinders one in the pursuit of happiness." A clarinet solo expresses a delusive dream of something better, but there is a cruel awakening with the return to the fatal theme: "There is no port; you will be tossed hither and thither until the sea swells over you." A gloomy theme, but that of the andante is no more cheerful—the composer's account of it recalls the somber opening of Turguenieff's "Smoke." The scherzo with its brisk plucking of strings and crisp responses from the wind choir is gay, to be sure, but not happy—there is always something delirious in Tschaikowsky's gayety. In the finale is depicted the vain effort of the pessimist to find satisfaction in the noisy pleasures of the rustic crowd, but the gibbering beasts and birds, creatures of a disordered mind, come braying and fluttering in, and the country fair quickly becomes an asylum again. The composer stoutly asserts that the ending is meant to be happy, but it gets no further than "Rejoice in the happiness of others—and you can still live." It is a cross-section of the Russian temperament.

It is a long step from this somber and powerful fatalism to the refined paganism of Claude Debussy. The two nocturnes played, "Nuages" and "Fetes," are in a set of three, but the third, "Sirenes," has a chorus of women's voices. Both of the two given are program music, and in addition are admirable examples of a delicate and beautiful kind of impressionism in which France took the lead as clearly as in the corresponding development in modern painting; Debussy is sometimes likened to Corot, and in their imaginative suggestiveness, their power of evoking poetic images, there is a parallel. The first of the nocturnes, "Clouds," was the only quiet spot in a restless concert; they are not storm clouds, but a "slow and solemn march," "dissolving in a gray agony tinted with white." Not very easy to say in music, and without this key nobody could possibly guess what was being said, but the ethereal charm of the music needs no key. If Debussy gave the one gentle touch in a somber and strenuous program he also gave it its one relatively cheerful moment in the second nocturne, "Festivals," the orchestration of which is brilliant, gay and beautiful; here again a vague impressionism prevails rather than what is commonly called description.

The rest of the program was high tragedy, and it was interesting, if rather hard on infirm nerves, to hear the same tragic theme, (akin for that matter to Tschaikowsky's), treated twice in such different ways by Strauss and Liszt. Liszt is a great composer and this is one of his great works, yet it was to some extent an anticlimax after Strauss's masterpiece. In melodic fertility and spontaneous charm, neither the German nor the Magyar compares with the great and gloomy Russian, but in firmness of grip both have the advantage of him. But as between Strauss and Liszt, both ultra-modern in spirit and both great masters of the modern orchestra, it is the German who has the advantage in architectonic.

Much of his music is lean and ungenial; like much of Brahms, it gets hold but slowly of the listener's emotions. But there is always something in reserve, always a progress, a building up, a tight hold on the technical and emotional development, so that by and by the hearer finds himeslf getting above the timber belt and looking off over Himalayan distances at snow-peaks inaccessible to man. Such ascents are the glory of German music; there is nothing of it in the great Russians, who with all their greatness are of the steppes. They say beautiful things and say them again, meandering level with the source. But in Strauss, hard and unsympathetic as much of his music is, there is at any rate a mental grip of the most powerful sort, and in "Death and Transfiguration," it achieves thrilling things.

It was a strenuous program to play as well as to listen to, but the Boston musicians threw themselves into it with ardor under the leadership of Pierre Monteux and it was by far the finest performance which the Symphony orchestra has given here since its great upheaval during the war. To bring it back to its old superlative excellence was necessarily a slow matter; music lovers everywhere must rejoice with Boston that it is being accomplished. There have been concerts, perhaps, of more varied interest, less taxing to ear and mind than the cumulative gloom of yesterday's program, surcharged as it was with modern pessimism and modern melancholy. But as has been said, the great works of this kind can only be heard when thre is a great orchestra to play them, and we need not complain if "Lear" piled on Hamlet." And one must turn back far indeed for such magnificent playing as the reorganized Symphony orchestra did yesterday.

SPRNGFILD REPUB. JAN. 9

COURANT JAN 1 1922
Hartford, Conn.

WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, IN CONCERT AT PARSONS'S THEATER, JANUARY 19th. (AT LEFT) PIERRE MONTEUX, CONDUCTOR, (IN CIRCLE) PAUL KOCHANSKI, VIOLINIST, SOLOIST

TIMES, JAN 2 1922
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

How the Orchestra Rehearses— To Appear Here Next Monday.

When Pierre Monteux, the eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, came to his present post two years ago, he noticed at the first rehearsal the acoustical difference of the empty hall, and ordered that a great curtain be hung in front of the stage reaching from floor to roof. It has hung at each of his rehearsals since, absorbing the sound and replacing the auditors of Fridays and Saturdays, who probably little realize that they make the music mellow by their physical presence.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Mr. Monteux's alert ear is a thing to wonder at, nor has he travelled the world over, training concert, opera and ballet orchestras, without perfecting the art of routine to the Nth degree.

Every morning in the week, except on a concert day, is devoted to rehearsing. If a layman could penetrate the mysteries of Symphony hall when a work is being read off at sight for the first time by the orchestra he might believe that he is hearing a finished performance. He would indeed be hearing a finished performance, but the public performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra must be super-finished. The ability to read the most difficult scores at sight is with the musicians a starting point, which is taken for granted. They familiarize themselves with the music in hand, so that they can free themselves from the effort of reading—so that the music may flow with ease from their instruments. The orchestra will make its only local appearance this season at Parsons Theater next Monday evening under the auspices of the Sedgwick Concert course. Seats now selling at Sedgwick & Casey's.

FALL RIVER
Jan 2 NEWS

FINEST MUSICAL EVENT OF SEASON

RARE TREAT FURNISHED BY CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Empire Theater Filled, and Many Unable To Obtain Seats—Varied and Interesting Program Arranged by Conductor Monteux.

Fall River music lovers enjoyed the greatest event of the season in the form of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon at the Empire Theater, under the auspices of the Woman's Club. The orchestra played here a year ago under the same auspices, and on Sunday the theater was filled to its capacity, duplicating the success of last year. Many, unable to obtain seats, stood throughout the performance.

Those who heard the orchestra a year ago anticipated a treat, and they were not disappointed. Mr. Monteux is an expert arranger of programs, and that of Sunday was varied and interesting. From the opening notes of the symphony to the climax of the Tannhauser Overture, the great audience sat spell-bound by the matchless playing of the 100 men who compose the orchestra. The following program was given:

Symphony No. 4, in F minor, Oj. 36 ....Tschaikowsky
1. Andante sostenuto.
2. Andantino in modo di canzona.
3. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
4. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.
"Carnival in Paris," Episode for Orchestra ....Svendsen
Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21 ....Lalo
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Andante.
3. Rondo: Allegro.
Overture to "Tannhauser"....Wagner

The Symphony No. 4, by Tschaikowsky, though composed over 40 years ago, has the freshness of modern music, and is considered by many critics the finest he ever wrote. Tschaikowsky himself had a peculiar weakness for this symphony. He spoke of it "as a labor of love, an enjoyment like "Orriegin" and the second quartet." It ranks with the great symphonies of the musical world.

It is dedicated "To my best friend," and this friend was a widow, Mrs. von Meck, who befriended him in a pecuniary way, though they never met.

In the introduction is heard the sinister theme of "Fate," given out by the horns and bassoons. One is reminded at once of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and Tschaikowsky himself wrote, "In reality my work is a reflection of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. I have not copied his musical contents, only borrowed the central idea." The whole first movement is tinged with Russian despondency, though the second theme of this movement a clarinet solo, is charming, and introduces an element of brightness.

The second movement is also sad. There was a striking theme, played in unison, which was heard repeatedly.

The Scherzo was unique, due to the fact that all the stringed instruments were plucked with the fingers throughout, instead of played with the bows. It was played at a rapid tempo and the shading was remarkably fine.

The last movement was brilliant and was also played presto. It was founded on a Russian folk-tune, "In the fields there stood a birch-tree," which was given out over and over again in varied forms. The brazen theme of "Fate" was also heard in this movement. The end of the symphony was stupendous and at its close Mr. Monteux was recalled to acknowledge the applause.

A foil to the symphony was given in "The Carnival in Paris," by Svendsen, the Norwegian composer. It depicts the varied aspects of the capitol of pleasure. It was a vivacious number, with a beautiful legato passage in the middle, after which the sprightly themes returned, more attractive than before.

The soloist of the afternoon was Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra. It is the first time he has played here as soloist, and he more than fulfilled expectations. Richly endowed both technically and temperamentally, he gave a vivid and glowing interpretation of Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Only three of the five movements were played. At the close of the symphony, Mr. Burgin was recalled several times. During the playing of the "Carnival in Paris" and the "Spanish Symphony" Mr. Theodorowicz acted as concert master.

The closing number, the Overture to "Tannhauser," formed a splendid climax to a magnificent concert. The noble and reverent strains of the Pilgrim's Chorus alternated with the wild bacchanalian music from the Venus Mountain. Aside from the fact that the brass section lagged considerably in the coda, it was a notable performance and aroused great enthusiasm. Mr. Monteux was recalled twice at the close of the concert.

The Woman's Club has done much to bring the finest music here, and the large audiences which attend the Sunday afternoon concerts testify that its efforts are appreciated. Last Sunday's concert gave pleasure to hundreds of people and added one more to the notable musical events under the auspices of this organization.

FROM JAN 3 1922
TIMES,
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concert by Famous Orchestra Here Next Monday Evening.

A program imposing by its brilliance and engrossing by its beauty and variety should make memorable the concert to be given here by the Boston Symphony orchestra when this famous institution of New England and the world at large gives its sole concert of the season in this city at Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 9, at 8:15. The principal number will be the celebrated symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck, the Belgian master, which, steadily increasing in favor since it was composed a generation ago, has now taken its place as probably the finest symphony in modern music. This work is particularly admired for the stirring beauty of its melodious themes, for the English horn solo in the second movement, and for the noble and triumphant affirmation of religious faith with this the score closes.

The distinguished soloist at this concert will be Paul Kochanski, the young genius of the violin, who first came to this country last year, and by his several concerts in New York and elsewhere impressed our public as one of the very finest violinists living. A native of Warsaw, Poland, and a pupil of the famous Polish master, Mlynarski, and of the Belgian master, Cesar Thomson, Kochanski first won acclaim in public concerts as a mere boy, and has lately, in Europe, in this, his early maturity, taken his unquestioned place among the finest executive artists of the day. He came to America from Russia where, having rebelled against the bolshevik government, which attempted to subsidize his talents, he was imprisoned and made his escape in December, 1919. Kochanski is to play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston as well as in Hartford. He will be heard in Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," a score of formidable difficulty, but nevertheless captivating in its piquant rhythms and melody.

The humorous tone poem of Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," will be the closing number on this program. This work has become probably the msot popular and admired of the number of great scores by the distinguished composer, who is now visiting America. Seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, Asylum street.

FROM JAN 4 1922
REPUBLICAN,
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ON SUNDAY

"Y" Feels Elated Over Ability to Present Great Musical Offering at Auditorium

The crowning musical event of this season in Springfield is anticipated in the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Auditorium Sunday under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association. This is the 44th season of the organization and the third under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The full orchestra of 100 will be present, and a program of variety and brilliance will be given.

PIERRE MONTEUX

In no other city in the world is a concert of such high quality as this included in a series of free entertainments year after year. The promoters of the London Monday popular concerts, which for years were regarded as unique in an attempt to bring the best in musical effort within reach of all of the people, were not able to present them at Covent Garden at a lower admission fee than 36 cents. The Young Men's Christian association is very proud of its success in putting, and keeping, Springfield first on the world's map in this respect, an achievement which has been made possible only by the generous voluntary support of the music-loving residents of this city and surrounding towns.

FROM JAN 5 1922
TIMES,
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Paul Kochanski, the Polish violinist, who will be heard at Parsons's theater next Monday evening with the Boston Symphony orchestra, might be said to have become famous in this country over night. Practically unknown and unheralded, Mr. Kochanski made his debut, winning public favor at the very outset. How well he succeeded is evidenced in the fact that he was immediately scheduled for four more hearings in the metropolis, making five public appearances within the short period of five weeks.

For his initial test in the new world this remarkable violinist elected to stake all upon the performance of what is probably the most difficult of violin music, the Brahms Concerto. Katherine Spaeth said the next day in the New York Evening Mail:

"It is something new for a violinist to make his American debut by playing the Brahms Concerto—only that and nothing more, but Paul Kochanski, who thus introduced himself with the New York Symphony orchestra at Carnegie hall yesterday afternoon, made perhaps a greater impression by his sudden leap to the heights of violin music than if he had sawed the conventional program of cloying melodies and obvious tricks. Brahms is the master who writes only for masters and it may be doubted if the opening movement of his concerto has ever been better played here than it was yesterday."

The New York World compared Paul Kochanski to the great Kreisler:

"He played but one number yesterday, staking his success on one of the most difficult of compositions written for his instrument, the Brahms Concerto in D. There is little opportunity in it for showy playing, and the interpreter has to put aside all the embellishments dear to the fiddler's heart and concern himself only with the composer's meaning. Here is where Mr. Kochanski revealed himself the student and musician.

"The first movement has seldom been so brilliantly played, and the adagio had the classic repose and refinement that Mr. Kreisler brings to it."

Seats are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, Asylum street.

From JAN 6 1922 D
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Last evening also in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony gave eloquent expression to a varied program that held among other things the tone-poem "Night on Mount Triglaff," which Rimsky-Korsakoff made out of the third-act music of his opera "Mlada" and three dances from the De Falla ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat." The former will be repeated in the Academy this eveing and will be reviewed here in connection therewith. The De Falla music is picturesque, colorful, rhythmical and supposedly Spanish. Its Spanish quality, however, has a strangely familiar and Rimsky-Korsakoffian flavor. But sharply accentuated rhythms always have a thrill in store. Of course the music ought to be danced. Mr. Monteux gave the composition an ideal reading.

W. B. M.

SUN
ss New York City
JAN 6 1922 D

The Boston Symphony.

An ill-assorted collection of interesting pieces was presented last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. A Handel Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras was followed by the Brahms Variations on the Haydn St. Antoni theme, both conscientiously performed with dignity and breadth.

The next two numbers, although contrasting with the German half of the program, lost by proximity to each other. The concert version of the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Mlada" brought the audience to a melodramatic scene on Mount Triglar, the same eminence known under Moussorgsky as Bald Mountain. Here the Young Prince from Scheherezade met the Princess of the Coq d'Or in a wild revel of piccolos. Wagner, who had just been introduced to Rimsky through the conductor Niemann, peered in among the fantastic flames, and the audience gave as much approval to the spectacle as if they had been much more numerous, which they very well could have been.

Equal applause greeted the ensuing quotations from Manuel de Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat." Although new to New York these three dances made an immediate impression through their tingling rhythms; imposed rather forcibly upon the orchestra by its conductor, it is true, but subtle enough to survive even more athletic treatment than this. Massenet's Phedre overture brought the concert to a Gallic close.

FROM JAN 6 1922 M
EVE. POST
New York City

Boston Symphony Programme

The Boston Symphony Orchestra signalized its third visit of the current season by playiing n Carnegie Hall last nght one of the most curiously miscellaneous programmes it has ever given here. To make up that programme its conductor, Pierre Monteux, had ranged from Handel to the present day, gathered together (without much regard for their appositeness in programmatic sequence) works by German, Russian, Spanish, and French composers, and included in the queer pot-pourri a set of three short pieces never before heard in New York.

This novelty of the evening was a group of lively, boisterously gay, and brilliantly orchestrated Spanish dances taken from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" ("El Sombrero de Tres Picos"), which Manuel de Falla of Cadiz composed to order for the Russian ballet and which was staged for the first time by the Diaghilev troupe in London in the summer of 1919. The first of the thre dances, entitled "The Neighbors," is a buzzing, gossipy musical delineation of a typical Spanish scene, and its gay and dashing performance made an instant hit with the audience last night.

The second, "The Miller's Dance," which according to Philip Hale's erudite and exhaustive programme notes, the Spaniards found the most interesting "because of its typically Andalusian character, its fascinating rhythm, which is like an affirmation of Southern art, and its Moorish character," was less appealing and indeed seemed a bit vulgar. The third, a "Final Dance," a veritable whirlwind of rhythmic motion transmuted into a gorgeous display of orchestral colors produced by the addition to the full orchestra of tam-tam, xylophone, castanets, celesta, and piano, again captivated its hearers, and after several recalls the conductor got his men to their feet to share in the applause.

The concert began with Handel's "Concerto in F major for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras"; included also Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," a concert arrangement of the third act from his ballet "Mlada," probably new to many hearers, although it had been played here several years ago by Modeste Altschuler and his Russian Symphony Orchestera, and ended with Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Despite its miscellaneous character it was all found enjoyable to the large audience. G. W. H.

FROM JAN 6 1922 A
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mr. Monteux, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, offered numbers by Handel, Brahms, Rimsky-Korsakoff, de Falla and Massenet. The orchestra is scheduled for a Brooklyn concert to-night at the Academy of Music.

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 6 1922 H
From
EVENING WORLD
New York City

Albert Coates almost dismissed his audience yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with Serabine's long third symphony, entitled "The Divine Poem," the final number on the New York Symphony's programme. After two hours of music the thoroughly satiated started an exodus and the final welcome chords of the Russian's intense and colorful work came just in time. Elgar's violin concerto, dedicated to Fritz Kreisler, was played by Jascha Heifetz. Involved, difficult, with dull spots, it is not the type of composition Heifetz admirers fancy. The violinist, however, was roundly applauded for his performance which was not impeccable as to intonation and which lacked imaginative touches.

In the evening, in Carnegie, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux's direction, played to more unoccupied boxes and seats than it is accustomed to. Another tremendous Russian orchestral piece, "Night on Mount Triglav," third act of the opera ballet "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakov, introducing Night and Egypt and Cleopatra and Morning, stirred the audience. This piece calls for one of the largest orchestras in captivity. A new ballet piece by a Spaniard, Manuel de Falla, written in 1919, followed it. It comprised three dances taken from the ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," a fitting companion piece to "Triglav," which means three heads. Signor Falla has written good music, sprightly, rhythmic and melodious, putting in a touch of modernism to make it different and, at the same time, showing that it can be done without distorting things.

From JAN 6 1922 M
EVENING MAIL
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

PIQUANT Spanish rhythms and gay melodies were heard in De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" ballet music, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. There were reminiscences of the younger Rimsky-Korsakoff in his "Mlada" excerpt.

FROM JAN 6 1922 A
Evening Globe
New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The feature of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall was the first New York performance of three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," which was produced in London by Diaghileff's nimble Russians nearly three years ago. The music is brilliant and picturesque enough to suggest to at least one hearer that Stravinsky has a dangerous Iberian rival. Paris has long admired this young composer, but very little of his music has yet been played here. Arthur Rubinstein has performed one of his piano pieces set to an orchestral accompaniment and Marguerite d'Alvarez has sung the lascivious Gypsy ditty from "El Amor Brujo." There, if memory serves, the record ends. His two operas and the ballet under consideration are hereby brought to the attention of Mr. Gatti-Casazza.

Mr. Monteux further led his men through a fine performance of a concerto for strings and wind instruments by Samuel Butler's favorite composer, George Frederic Handel, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on the Mount Triglav," a portion of the third act of the opera-ballet, "Mlada," the Cleopatra episode from which, with its hysterical flutes and its panting cymbals, was utilized by the Russians for the unveiling of Ida Rubenstein, and, finally, Massenet's effective overture to "Phèdre." An oboe solo in the concerto and the Rimsky-Korsakoff opus were singled out by the customers for special manual enconiums.

FROM JAN 6 1922 K
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Monteux Gives Dances of "Three-Cornered Hat" for First Time Here.

The Boston Symphony's 100 men marked vividly their third Winter visit to Carnegie Hall last evening with a gorgeously gay "first time in New York" of Manuel de Falla's dances of "The Three Cornered Hat," with which Diaghileff's ballet had made a great noise in London last Summer, and of which the young Cadiz composer can hardly have heard so stirring a performance by his "seventeen players" two years since in Spain. In its action there had appeared oversea Mme. Karsavina, Messrs. Massine and Idzikowsky, the last two remembered here.

Taken as music alone, de Falla's gossippy episode of "The Neighbors" was much liked by last night's critical house; his "Miller's Dance," that the Spaniards found most striking in Moorish flavor, was less recognizable to Western ears, but the "Final Dance," a whirlwind of popular Spanish rhythms in all the aggrandized modernism of instrumental apparatus, fairly outdanced Chabrier's "España" as an orchestral setting of folk melodies of the peninsula. The novelty ended in many recalls, shared by Monteux and his men.

Mr. Monteux preceded the Spanish brevities with Rimsky-Korsakoff's longer "Night on the Triple Mountain," a third act from the ballet of "Mlada," much of which had been used by the Diaghileff troupe in a "Cleopatra" scene on their earlier American tour, while this music had been played here by Altschuler as early as Nov. 19, 1904. The glowing nocturne of Baltic Slav romance, a ghostly dream of poisoned Princess, revelling spirits, and awakening at dawn on the mountain amid the singing of birds, also was greatly applauded.

Beginning the evening were Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind choirs, and Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn's, both conducted with elegance and suavity, and as smoothly played as they were enthusiastically received. The lovely Brahms variations were most appreciated, perhaps, as hown by the rapt silence of the house during successive numbers.

From JAN 7 1922 Y
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

Boston Symphony Here With Homer as Soloist

Louise Homer was soloist for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. This popular contralto deserves well of her audiences. Her tones are mellow, rich and well-sustained, and she knows her limitations well enough to make the most of them. This intelligent and skillful use of a rare and excellent instrument she demonstrated last evening in the Bach aria, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and in a recitative and aria from Mozart's unfamiliar opera, "Tito." Her audience was deeply stirred and vainly demanded encores.

Pierre Monteux, directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, shared the honors of the evening with her. His program included Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," and a concert arrangement of the music from the third act of Rimsky-Korskoff's opera "Mlada." In performing these numbers he led his aggregation with admirable control, bringing to the surface exceptional qualities of tone and color, particularly in the last mentioned number. The music of this colorful Russian composer may have presented difficulties to Mr. Monteux, but if so his audience could not have suspected it. He interpreted this number with disarming ease and artistry.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York
JAN. 7

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening in the Academy of Music the third of its Brooklyn series of concerts. Louise Homer, soloist of the occasion, sang a Bach aria, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and a recitative and aria from Mozart's little known opera, "Tito." The strictly orchestral selections included Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on the Mount Triglaff."

Mme. Homer's art seems perennial. Last evening she sang with fulness of tone and with complete mastery of style. Not many contemporary singers could phrase this Bacharia with such breadth and such nobility. Unfortunately Mme. Homer's diction was not altogether comprehensible.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the popular Franck symphony was vigorous yet poetic. These mystic measures found able interpretation last evening, when the band met surely and eloquently every demand of the conductor. As successful also was the playing of Svendsen's light and merry composition. It ran rippingly.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Night on Mount Triglaff" was made by the composer out of musical material used in the third act of his opera "Mlada." [illegible] is unneeded for

---

JAN 7 1922 Y
ES,
Hartford, Conn. TIMES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra At Parsons's Theater, Monday Night

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor.

PAUL KOCHANSKI,
Solo Violinist.

KOCHANSKI WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted Polish Violinist To Be Soloist at Concert of Famous Orchestra Monday.

The appearance of Paul Kochanski, the young Polish violinist, as soloist here with the Boston Symphony orchestra, together with the beauty and brilliance of the program, should make memorable the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in Parsons's theater next Monday evening, January 9. Kochanski is a comparative newcomer to America, having first crossed the seas last spring and impressed his audience deeply by his several concerts in New York. He has fast risen to a foremost place among the finest living geniuses of the violin. Kochanski will be heard at this concert in Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs, which he is also to play with the famous orchestra in Boston. The purely orchestra portion of this program will comprise Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor, the master work of the Belgian composer, which has taken an undisputed place as one of the most inspired of modern symphonies, and beloved by many above all others. The interpretative genius of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious French conductor of the orchestra, is shown to especial advantage in this foremost achievement of the French school of music.

The final number will be "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," the humorous orchestral rondo by Richard Strauss which probably more than any other work has established the fame broadcast of this leading composer of the German school, who is now in this country. The adventures of "Till," the impish character of mediaeval legend and his final execution, are here depicted in tones in a way which has set down this work as one of the most remarkable examples of graphic delineation in music. Seats are on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, Asylum street.

---

andard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN. 7

The Boston Symphony

That the Boston Symphony concerts have become to be, year after year, not only artistic events of the "first water," but social functions of importance as well, was again demonstrated last evening by the distinguished audience (gathered under the Institute auspices) present to greet Pierre Monteux and his men of the Boston orchestra, in the opera house of the Academy of Music, upon occasion of the third of the season's five appearances of this famous organization. Brooklynites appreciate the honor conerred by reason of the seperate course of concerts that the orchestra gives in their own borough.

Matters opened with Cesar Franck's D minor symphony, oft heard and much loved nowadays, albeit that professors of the Paris Conservatoire, were scandalized at the time of its premier performance (Feb. 17, 1889), because the composer had made use of the English horn "in a symphony." Last evening's performance revealed the hall mark of all that is typified by the expression French interpretation. Mr. Monteux's reading brought into play all the traditions. In the polyphonic development of the first movement the brass and wood-wind choirs covered themselves with glory, both in tonal shading and purity of timbre. This composition is indeed one of the few symphonies good all the way through. Too often are many composers inclined to weakness in their finale movements, but not so Franck in this masterpiece. With him the inspiration is as fresh and spontaneous at the close as at the opening of the symphony.

The reviewer must needs ransack his thesaurus of superlatives to write of the Bostonian's playing of Franck last night. It was a performance marked by directness and clearness in thematic delivery, suavity and extreme beauty in tonal coloring, and a noble dignity in character of outline in the interpretation. The orchestra may possibly not possess the vibrant nerve and powerful attack so noticeable in certain other prominent organizations, but the dynamics, lights and shades, nuances, etc., are wonderfully well balanced.

The programme's latter half opened with Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," and episode for orchestra (opus 9), in which the better portions are strongly marked by the Wagnerian trademark, much of the rest of the composition remaining a combination of commonplace utterance and some very pleasant salon music. All of which was possibly very "fetching" in the early eighties but decidedly passe in these ultra-modern musical days.

Mme. Louise Homer, America's famous operatic contralto, was again a soloist with the Boston players at a Brooklyn concert. Mme. Homer attempted a Bach number, the cantata "Now Begone, Ye Gloomy Shadows," for solo voice. A trying and risky thing to undertake for a single concert number. In all kindness to Mme. Homer, be it said that her voice, as heard last evening, is not what it once was. In the upper register and in the loud passages it was hard and unpleasant, and the lower tones, at any rate some of them, had lost their luscious beauty and rich fullness. In a Mozart recitative and aria that followed, selected from the second act, seventh scene of the opera "Titus," Mme. Homer came more into her own and gave an intensely dramatic and interesting performance.

In these days of many fine singers with fresh voices now appearing on the concert stage but unknown to the larger music public, the suggestion might be made to give at least one of them a chance to be heard at a future Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn.

"Night on the Mount Triglav," a drearily lengthsome Rimsky-Korsakoff score, the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada," was played as closing number, endeavoring to picture the fearful things that congregate o' nights in a mountain gorge, with snakes and toads an devil spirits, spectres and apparition. Terribly tedious stuff, truth to tell. In the matter of musical scene painting how crude this Russian composer's methods (despite an admirable instrumentation) as compared with more modern works of the present French, Italian and British schools. Memory of a recently heard modern score, Holst's "The Planets," would not down as the reviewer listened to the Rimsky-Korsakoffian delineation of the moon, of clouds, of shooting stars. In Holst's music all was subtle and often mystic—but not so with the R. K. number played last night, where all effects were as plain to the ears and eyes as the proverbial pikestaff. Mr. Monteux might better have presented, had he wished to close with a Russian score, the immensely vivid and emotionally tense "Francesca di Rimini" of Tschaikowsky. That fantasie would have made a corking climax to last night's programme scheme. Perhaps Mr Monteux will vouchsafe it, nevertheless, at the February or March concerts.

[97]

From JAN 6 1922 D
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Last evening also in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony gave eloquent expression to a varied program that held among other things the tone-poem "Night on Mount Triglaff," which Rimsky-Korsakoff made out of the third-act music of his opera "Mlada" and three dances from the De Falla ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat." The former will be repeated in the Academy this eveing and will be reviewed here in connection therewith. The De Falla music is picturesque, colorful, rhythmical and supposedly Spanish. Its Spanish quality, however, has a strangely familiar and Rimsky-Korsakoffian flavor. But sharply accentuated rhythms always have a thrill in store. Of course the music ought to be danced. Mr. Monteux gave the composition an ideal reading.

W. B. M.

SUN
ss New York City
JAN 6 1922 D

The Boston Symphony.

An ill-assorted collection of interesting pieces was presented last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. A Handel Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras was followed by the Brahms Variations on the Haydn St. Antoni theme, both conscientiously performed with dignity and breadth.

The next two numbers, although contrasting with the German half of the program, lost by proximity to each other. The concert version of the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Mlada" brought the audience to a melodramatic scene on Mount Triglar, the same eminence known under Moussorgsky as Bald Mountain. Here the Young Prince from Scheherezade met the Princess of the Coq d'Or in a wild revel of piccolos. Wagner, who had just been introduced to Rimsky through the conductor Niemann, peered in among the fantastic flames, and the audience gave as much approval to the spectacle as if they had been much more numerous, which they very well could have been.

Equal applause greeted the ensuing quotations from Manuel de Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat." Although new to New York these three dances made an immediate impression through their tingling rhythms; imposed rather forcibly upon the orchestra by its conductor, it is true, but subtle enough to survive even more athletic treatment than this. Massenet's Phedre overture brought the concert to a Gallic close.

FROM JAN 6 1922 M
EVE. POST
New York City

Boston Symphony Programme

The Boston Symphony Orchestra signalized its third visit of the current season by playiing n Carnegie Hall last nght one of the most curiously miscellaneous programmes it has ever given here. To make up that programme its conductor, Pierre Monteux, had ranged from Handel to the present day, gathered together (without much regard for their appositeness in programmatic sequence) works by German, Russian, Spanish , and French composers, and included in the queer pot-pourri a set of three short pieces never before heard in New York.

This novelty of the evening was a group of lively, boisterously gay, and brilliantly orchestrated Spanish dances taken from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" ("El Sombrero de Tres Picos"), which Manuel de Falla of Cadiz composed to order for the Russian ballet and which was staged for the first time by the Diaghilev troupe in London in the summer of 1919. The first of the thre dances, entitled "The Neighbors," is a buzzing, gossipy musical delineation of a typical Spanish scene, and its gay and dashing performance made an instant hit with the audience last night.

The second, "The Miller's Dance," which according to Philip Hale's erudite and exhaustive programme notes, the Spaniards found the most interesting "because of its typically Andalusian character, its fascinating rhythm, which is like an affirmation of Southern art, and its Moorish character," was less appealing and indeed seemed a bit vulgar. The third, a "Final Dance," a veritable whirlwind of rhythmic motion transmuted into a gorgeous display of orchestral colors produced by the addition to the full orchestra of tam-tam, xylophone, castanets, celesta, and piano, again captivated its hearers, and after several recalls the conductor got his men to their feet to share in the applause.

The concert began with Handel's "Concerto in F major for Strings and Two Wind Orchestras"; included also Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56a, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," a concert arrangement of the third act, from his ballet "Mlada," probably new to many hearers, although it had been played here several years ago by Modeste Altschuler and his Russian Symphony Orchestera, and ended with Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Despite its miscellaneous character it was all found enjoyable by the large audience.

G. W. H.

FROM JAN 6 1922 A
Standard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mr. Monteux, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, offered numbers by Handel, Brahms, Rimsky-Korsakoff, de Falla and Massenet. The orchestra is scheduled for a Brooklyn concert to-night at the Academy of Music.

ESTABLISHED 1861 JAN 6 1922 H
From
EVENING WORLD
New York City

Albert Coates almost dismissed his audience yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with Serabine's long third symphony, entitled "The Divine Poem," the final number on the New York Symphony's programme. After two hours of music the thoroughly satiated started an exodus and the final welcome chords of the Russian's intense and colorful work came just in time. Elgar's violin concerto, dedicated to Fritz Kreisler, was played by Jascha Heifetz. Involved, difficult, with dull spots, it is not the type of composition Heifetz admirers fancy. The violinist, however, was roundly applauded for his performance which was not impeccable as to intonation and which lacked imaginative touches.

In the evening, in Carnegie, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux's direction, played to more unoccupied boxes and seats than it is accustomed to. Another tremendous Russian orchestral piece, "Night on Mount Triglav," third act of the opera ballet "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakov, introducing Night and Egypt and Cleopatra and Morning, stirred the audience. This piece calls for one of the largest orchestras in captivity. A new ballet piece by a Spaniard, Manuel de Falla, written in 1919, followed it. It comprised three dances taken from the ballet, "The Three Cornered Hat," a fitting companion piece to "Triglav," which means three heads. Signor Falla has written good music, sprightly, rhythmic and melodious, putting in a touch of modernism to make it different and, at the same time, showing that it can be done without distorting things.

From JAN 6 1922 M
EVENING MAIL
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

PIQUANT Spanish rhythms and gay melodies were heard in De Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" ballet music given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. There were reminiscences of the younger Rimsky-Korsakoff in his "Mlada" excerpt.

FROM JAN 6 1922 A
Evening Globe
New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The feature of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall was the first New York performance of three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," which was produced in London by Diaghileff's nimble Russians nearly three years ago. The music is brilliant and picturesque enough to suggest to at least one hearer that Stravinsky has a dangerous Iberian rival. Paris has long admired this young composer, but very little of his music has yet been played here. Arthur Rubinstein has performed one of his piano pieces set to an orchestral accompaniment and Marguerite d'Alvarez has sung the lascivious Gypsy ditty from "El Amor Brujo." There, if memory serves, the record ends. His two operas and the ballet under consideration are hereby brought to the attention of Mr. Gatti-Casazza.

Mr. Monteux further led his men through a fine performance of a concerto for strings and wind instruments by Samuel Butler's favorite composer, George Frederic Handel, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on the Mount Triglav," a portion of the third act of the opera-ballet, "Mlada," the Cleopatra episode from which, with its hysterical flutes and its panting cymbals, was utilized by the Russians for the unveiling of Ida Rubenstein, and, finally, Massenet's effective overture to "Phèdre." An oboe solo in the concerto and the Rimsky-Korsakoff opus were singled out by the customers for special manual enconiums.

Established 1851
FROM JAN 6 1922 K
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Monteux Gives Dances of "Three-Cornered Hat" for First Time Here.

The Boston Symphony's 100 men marked vividly their third Winter visit to Carnegie Hall last evening with gorgeously gay "first time in New York" of Manuel de Falla's dances of "The Three Cornered Hat," with which Diaghileff's ballet had made a great noise in London last Summer, and of which the young Cadiz composer can hardly have heard so stirring a performance by his "seventeen players" two years since in Spain. In its action there had appeared oversea Mme. Karsavina, Messrs. Massine and Idzikowsky, the last two remembered here.

Taken as music alone, de Falla's gossippy episode of "The Neighbors" was much liked by last night's critical house; his "Miller's Dance," that the Spaniards found most striking in Moorish flavor, was less recognizable to Western ears, but the "Final Dance," a whirlwind of popular Spanish rhythms in all the aggrandized modernism of instrumental apparatus, fairly outdanced Chabrier's "España" as an orchestral setting of folk melodies of the peninsula. The novelty ended in many recalls, shared by Monteux and his men.

Mr. Monteux preceded the Spanish brevities with Rimsky-Korsakoff's longer "Night on the Triple Mountain," a third act from the ballet of "Mlada," much of which had been used by the Diaghileff troupe in a "Cleopatra" scene on their earlier American tour, while this music had been played here by Altschuler as early as Nov. 19, 1904. The glowing nocturne of Baltic Slav romance, a ghostly dream of poisoned Princess, revelling spirits, and awakening at dawn on the mountain amid the singing of birds, also was greatly applauded.

Beginning the evening were Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind choirs, and Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn's, both conducted with elegance and suavity, and as smoothly played as they were enthusiastically received. The lovely Brahms variations were most appreciated, perhaps, as hown by the rapt silence of the house during successive numbers.

From JAN 7 1922 Y
TIMES,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

Boston Symphony Here With Homer as Soloist

Louise Homer was soloist for the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. This popular contralto deserves well of her audiences. Her tones are mellow, rich and well-sustained, and she knows her limitations well enough to make the most of them. This intelligent and skillful use of a rare and excellent instrument she demonstrated last evening in the Bach aria, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and in a recitative and aria from Mozart's unfamiliar opera, "Tito." Her audience was deeply stirred and vainly demanded encores.

Pierre Monteux, directing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, shared the honors of the evening with her. His program included Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," and a concert arrangement of the music from the third act of Rimsky-Korskoff's opera "Mlada." In performing these numbers he led his aggregation with admirable control, bringing to the surface exceptional qualities of tone and color, particularly in the last mentioned number. The music of this colorful Russian composer may have presented difficulties to Mr. Monteux, but if so his audience could not have suspected it. He interpreted this number with disarming ease and artistry.

EAGLE
JAN 7
Brooklyn, New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening in the Academy of Music the third of its Brooklyn series of concerts. Louise Homer, soloist of the occasion, sang a Bach aria, "Begone Ye Gloomy Shadows," and a recitative and aria from Mozart's little known opera, "Tito." The strictly orchestral selections included Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on the Mount Triglaff."

Mme. Homer's art seems perennial. Last evening she sang with fulness of tone and with complete mastery of style. Not many contemporary singers could phrase this Bacharia with such breadth and such nobility. Unfortunately Mme. Homer's diction was not altogether comprehensible.

Mr. Monteuv's reading of the popular Franck symphony was vigorous, yet poetic. These mystic measures found able interpretation last evening, when the band met surely and eloquently every demand of the conductor. As successful also was the playing of Svendsen's light and merry composition. It ran ripplingly.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Night on Mount Triglaff" was made by the composer out of musical material used in the third act of his opera "Mlada." Its elaborate program is unneeded for an understanding of the composition; the music may well speak for itself. A richly and colorfully orchestrated piece, it possesses all the flavor of this Russian at his musical best; though it might well stand a certain amount of curtailment. And in such music. Mr. Monteux is always at home.

JAN - 7 1922 Y
ES,
Hartford, Conn. TIMES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra At Parsons's Theater, Monday Night

PIERRE MONTEUX,
Conductor.

PAUL KOCHANSKI,
Solo Violinist.

KOCHANSKI WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Noted Polish Violinist To Be Soloist at Concert of Famous Orchestra Monday.

The appearance of Paul Kochanski, the young Polish violinist, as soloist here with the Boston Symphony orchestra, together with the beauty and brilliance of the program, should make memorable the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in Parsons's theater next Monday evening, January 9. Kochanski is a comparative newcomer to America, having first crossed the seas last spring and impressed his audience deeply by his several concerts in New York. He has fast risen to a foremost place among the finest living geniuses of the violin. Kochanski will be heard at this concert in Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs, which he is also to play with the famous orchestra in Boston. The purely orchestra portion of this program will comprise Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor, the master work of the Belgian composer, which has taken an undisputed place as one of the most inspired of modern symphonies, and beloved by many above all others. The interpretative genius of Pierre Monteux, the illustrious French conductor of the orchestra, is shown to especial advantage in this foremost achievement of the French school of music.

The final number will be "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," the humorous orchestral rondo by Richard Strauss which probably more than any other work has established the fame broadcast of this leading composer of the German school, who is now in this country. The adventures of "Till," the impish character of mediaeval legend and his final execution, are here depicted in tones in a way which has set down this work as one of the most remarkable examples of graphic delineation in music. Seats are on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, Asylum street.

---

andard Union
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN. 7

The Boston Symphony

That the Boston Symphony concerts have become to be, year after year, not only artistic events of the "first water," but social functions of importance as well, was again demonstrated last evening by the distinguished audience (gathered under the Institute auspices) present to greet Pierre Monteux and his men of the Boston orchestra, in the opera house of the Academy of Music, upon occasion of the third of the season's five appearances of this famous organization. Brooklynites appreciate the honor conerred by reason of the seperate course of concerts that the orchestra gives in their own borough.

Matters opened with Cesar Franck's D minor symphony, oft heard and much loved nowadays, albeit that professors of the Paris Conservatoire, were scandalized at the time of its premier performance (Feb. 17, 1889), because the composer had made use of the English horn "in a symphony." Last evening's performance revealed the hall mark of all that is typified by the expression French interpretation. Mr. Monteux's reading brought into play all the traditions. In the polyphonic development of the first movement the brass and wood-wind choirs covered themselves with glory, both in tonal shading and purity of timbre. This composition is indeed one of the few symphonies good all the way through. Too often are many composers inclined to weakness in their finale movements, but not so Franck in this masterpiece. With him the inspiration is as fresh and spontaneous at the close as at the opening of the symphony.

The reviewer must needs ransack his thesaurus of superlatives to write of the Bostonian's playing of Franck last night. It was a performance marked by directness and clearness in thematic delivery, suavity and extreme beauty in tonal coloring, and a noble dignity in character of outline in the interpretation. The orchestra may possibly not possess the vibrant nerve and powerful attack so noticeable in certain other prominent organizations, but the dynamics, lights and shades, nuances, etc., are wonderfully well balanced.

The programme's latter half opened with Svendsen's "Carnival of Paris," and episode for orchestra (opus 9), in which the better portions are strongly marked by the Wagnerian trademark, much of the rest of the composition remaining a combination of commonplace utterance and some very pleasant salon music. All of which was possibly very "fetching" in the early eighties but decidedly passe in these ultra-modern musical days.

Mme. Louise Homer, America's famous operatic contralto, was again a soloist with the Boston players at a Brooklyn concert. Mme. Homer attempted a Bach number, the cantata "Now Begone, Ye Gloomy Shadows," for solo voice. A trying and risky thing to undertake for a single concert number. In all kindness to Mme. Homer, be it said that her voice, as heard last evening, is not what it once was. In the upper register and in the loud passages it was hard and unpleasant, and the lower tones, at any rate some of them, had lost their luscious beauty and rich fullness. In a Mozart recitative and aria that followed, selected from the second act, seventh scene of the opera "Titus," Mme. Homer came more into her own and gave an intensely dramatic and interesting performance.

In these days of many fine singers with fresh voices now appearing on the concert stage but unknown to the larger music public, the suggestion might be made to give at least one of them a chance to be heard at a future Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn.

"Night on the Mount Triglav," a drearily lengthsome Rimsky-Korsakoff score, the third act of the opera-ballet "Mlada," was played as closing number, endeavoring to picture the fearful things that congregate o' nights in a mountain gorge, with snakes and toads an devil spirits, spectres and apparition. Terribly tedious stuff, truth to tell. In the matter of musical scene painting how crude this Russian composer's methods (despite an admirable instrumentation) as compared with more modern works of the present French, Italian and British schools. Memory of a recently heard modern score, Holst's "The Planets," would not down as the reviewer listened to the Rimsky-Korsakoffian delineation of the moon, of clouds, of shooting stars. In Holst's music all was subtle and often mystic—but not so with the R. K. number played last night, where all effects were as plain to the ears and eyes as the proverbial pikestaff. Mr. Monteux might better have presented, had he wished to close with a Russian score, the immensely vivid and emotionally tense "Francesca di Rimini" of Tschaikow. That fantasie would have made a corking climax to last night's programme scheme. Perhaps Mr Monteux will vouchsafe it, nevertheless at the February or March concerts

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN 8 1922 L
TELEGRAM
New York City

Mozart and Milhaud at Symphony Concer

There was a finely outlined, beautifully refined performance of Mozart's D Major Symphony yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston musicians, is a musician of sensitive tastes. The performance was lively and smooth. There is a calm beauty to be found in Mozart's music, but too often conductors try to make it nervous and forceful. Mr. Monteux, however, always kept his orchestra in the spirit of the music. Later the programme became more dissonant and strident. There was a new orchestral suite by Milhaud, heard for the first time in New York, a work filled with modern French sophistication. Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead" and some dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" completed the programme.

FROM JAN - 8 1922
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

PLAYS MILHAUD'S MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Gives "Second Orchestral Suite," First Time Here.

Darius Milhaud's playful dissonances from a "Second Orchestral Suite," put forth by the most outspoken of those Parisian enfants terribles known as the "Groupe des Six," was new to the Boston Symphony's matinee audience—too new for comfort, if not for curiosity—at the orchestra's parting yesterday for another month of Athenian calm in its home town. Like the boy who rings your bell and runs away, the Bostonians launched three short, exclamatory outbursts from the set, omitting a fugue and finale, all of which had been received in France with howls and hisses, through a later "less turbulent" hearing was since reported there.

Milhaud's music was written for Paul Claudel's poem, "Protée," and his measured noises mocked a hopeless love of the old man, Proteus, for a young girl, whose scorn caused birds of the air and seals in the ocean to laugh and play, as Mary's lamb made the children in the nursery tale. An "Ouverture" of "ultra-violet spectral harmonies, a more perspicacious "Pastorale," in which the composer's "reunion of chords or counterpoint in different tonalities" attained expressive symmetry and a "Nocturne," again of misty cacophonies, were played by the band and greeted by the house with the mutual shyness of Dail Eireann partisans, save for the few eager souls grateful at last to know Milhaud as something besides a name in the Paris cables.

Compensation was afforded for the classicists in Mozart's D major symphony, with which Mr. Monteux led the matinee, and more abundantly in Rachmaninoff's richly intoned "Island of the Dead," after Boecklin's picture, while in conclusion there were Borodin's lively and colorful "Prince Igor" dances.

Morning Telegraph
New York
JAN 8 - 1922

ORCHESTRAS BUSY

Boston Symphony Offers Work of Parisian Composer and Two Numbers of Russian School.

"SCHEHERAZADE" IS PLAYED

The Saturday matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought forth another program of wide variety; a scheme of things evidently very much to the liking of Pierre Monteux as well as New York audiences. The Boston band has greatly enlarged its metropolitan followers this season by consistently good playing and excellent programs. Mr. Monteux and his men are to be congratulated.

The symphony was Mozart's D Major, rendered in perfect unison and beautiful tone under conservative direction. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "Isle of the Dead," changed the tenor of the afternoon rather abruptly, and it became patent that the concert would lean toward the modern type of expression.

This was fully realized in the next number—Overture, Pastorale, and Nocturne from Darius Milhaud's Second Orchestral Suite. Milhaud is a member of the select Parisian "Six," young composers who have gone to daring lengths in music. The work did not sound quite daring enough to be unenjoyable, for which one should be duly thankful, and its irrepressible character sounded pleasantly on the ear. Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances rounded out the program [illegible] their beautiful tunes and inspiring

---

TIMES JAN - 3 1922
NEW YORK CITY

Music Notes Afield.

As the slow movement from Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in memory of the dead composer, Mr. Parker in The Transcript says: "Conductor and orchestra seemed to be carving a relief, in Grecian purity and continence, upon some marble tomb holding the dust of Saint-Saëns beneath his loved Mediterranean skies. Yet at the end the audience applauded as roundly as though this Adagio were an appointed or inserted number in the routine of the day, while Mr. Monteux waited with unresponsive back for the clapping to subside, the custom of the country—and an innocent custom. For, had each comer been asked at the door whether Saint-Saëns were still alive—an old man carved in yellowed ivory—or dead within the week, how many might have answered truly?

Evening Globe
New York
JAN. 9.

Milhaud and the Bostons.

One was all prepared for a shock of the very first order, even a police raid, or an incursion from a neighboring engine house, at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux put on the programme ("for the first time in New York") three movements from the second orchestral suite of Darius Milhaud, the most prominent member of the "Group of Six," which is supposed to be the latest cry of ultra-modernity in French music. This suite was brought out at a Colonne concert in Paris, Oct. 24, 1920.

Although Paris is pretty well inured to strange noises, from Marinetti to the Big Bertha, this suite provoked such hissing and howling, the Boston programme told us, that the police had to come in and clear the fauteuils de balcon (why only that section of the house is not explained.) Nevertheless, the suite was repeated at the concert of Oct. 30. On this second occasion the wily management provided a programme note reminding the public that Wagner and Bizet had not seemed to their first hearers less "cacophonic" than Milhaud. So admonished, the new audience proved more "prudent" in its behavior.

Now, here on Saturday the audience did nothing out of the way at all, and, of course, the management had no need to summon outside aid. There was considerable applause after the overture of the suite, rather less after the "Pastorale" and the "Nocturne." Did Mr. Monteux deny us our shock by omitting the fugue and the finale, in which occurs the "Nouveau-Cirque" music to accompany the repast of seals? And where, oh where, is all that horrible cacophony? The three sections we were permitted to hear are "modern" in their idiom, expert as to orchestration, fanciful, and delicately ironic in their portrayal of the "hopeless love of the old man Protée for a young girl" (the suite is based on music written for Paul Claudel's "Protée"). But where, oh where, was the shock? Not in the performance either, for that was refined and polished to a degree.

On the Boston programme were also the so-called "Haffner" symphony of Mozart (minus its minuet; Mr. Monteux had a day of omitting), Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" (both Böcklin's picture and Rachmaninoff's tone poem seem to count many devoted admirers), and the delightful Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," which Mr. Monteux has conducted so often, with and without the Russian ballet. All of these the orchestra played well.

FROM JAN 9 1922 K
EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

French and British Modernists.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Orchestra, is certainly a conductor without reserves in the matter of modernist music. He took his courage in both hands on Saturday at his Carnegie Hall concert and brought out part of the second orchestral suite of Darius Milhaud, one of that little band of cheek-tonguing, nose-thumbing Parisians known as the "Groupe des six."

The music was written to illustrate Paul Claudel's "Protee," celebrating in bitter and often satiric fashion the hopeless infatuation of age for youth. Milhaud went at this with the zest of his own youth and set his mockery in the idiom of these ultra-modernists, sometimes known as polytony, or the utterance of several contrapuntal voices in differing tonalities. The thing, as a fact, is not new at all, but so old it again seems new; for when the art of harmony was being born the ears of the time found nothing unbeautiful in not greatly dissimilar contrapuntal combinations.

Through the strangeness and cacophony of Milhaud's music, the touch of genuine significance could be discerned; and perhaps when the strangeness has worn off the idiom, the cacophony will not seem more [illegible] than that of Richard Strauss [illegible]

NEW YORK PREMIERES BY MONTEUX PLAYERS

Reviews at Hand of Mlada and Three Cornered Hat; Milhaud Suite Also Played Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reached the first of its third pair of concerts in New York last Thursday evening, playing, in Carnegie Hall, Handel's concerto in F major, Brahms's variations on a Haydn theme, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Mlada, Massenet's Phedre overture, and three dances from Manuel de Falla's Three Cornered Hat

The Herald's comment is short: "The work of the orchestra in the different numbers was generally admirable." The new dances are accounted "gracefully scored with the use of charming Spanish rhythms." That "the performance of the whole program was of a high order of merit" is The Tribune writer's summary. The de Falla novelty was of "gorgeous coloring and intoxicating rhythms," and in spite of some "pseudo-Spanish music, but few composers have so vividly caught and presented" their native country. Noteworthy also for color was the Rimsky-Korsakoff number, "rich in memories of the Spanish Caprice and Le Coq d'Or."

Other Morning Papers

The "gorgeously gay" Spanish music made a deep impression on The Times critic, who is of the opinion that the composer could "hardly ever have heard so stirring a performance." The "glowing nocturne" from Mlada "was also greatly applauded." Brahms and Haydn were treated to "lovely" and "sympathetic" interpretations. In The World, there is special mention for the work of the horns and woodwind in the Handel number. Then Mlada is taken up, and passed as effective, though long in getting under way. The critic feels that this selection is "true" Rimsky-Korsakoff, and detects in it suggestions which the composers of the Caucasian Sketches, The Fire Bird, and Till Eulenspiegel may have caught up. "Pluperfect" was the performance of the de Falla novelty, which is in itself "gay, glittering music, tuneful and vigorous, not all important, and brilliantly scored."

The Evening World; The Sun

The writer for The Evening World finds that the Mlada selections "stirred the audience." As to the pieces of de Falla, they are "good music, sprightly, rhythmic and melodious;" modern, yet restrained in modernism.

Brahms and Hadyn, believes The Sun writer, were "both conscientiously performed with dignity and breadth." Applause is recorded as the deserved greeting of both the Rimsky and de Falla numbers; the latter made "an immediate impression through their tingling rhythms—imposed rather forcibly on the orchestra by its conductor, but subtle enough to survive."

Other Evening Papers

Critical comment in The Globe is restricted to the de Falla number. "The music is brilliant and picturesque enough," it is written, "to suggest that Stravinsky has a dangerous rival." The Evening Post is critical of these Spanish dances. The first, with its "gay and dashing performance," appealed. The second succeeded less—"seemed a bit vulgar." The third is commended by implication for its "rhythm" and "gorgeous" color. The Mail is not represented by other than a news item.

For the first time in New York, Darius Milhaud's second orchestral suite was played under Mr. Monteux last Saturday afternoon. The other numbers on this program were Mozart's D major symphony, Rachmaninoff's Island of the Dead, and the Polovtsi dance from Borodin's Prince Igor. This event will be considered in a later issue of The Digest.

MUS. DIGEST - JAN. 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY WARMLY RECEIVED

Paul Kochanski as Soloist Performs Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs."

A large audience greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at Parsons's theater last evening when it played its first and only concert of the season in this city. The conductor was Pierre Monteux and the soloist Paul Kochanski, violinist. That the concert was enjoyed to the utmost was shown by the liberal and enthusiastic applause after each number. The work of the soloist was especially appreciated and he was compelled to come forward and bow his acknowledgements many times.

The works performed were Cesar Franck's D minor symphony in three movements, Max Bruck's "Scottish Fantasia" for violin with harp and orchestra; and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche."

We have not had the opportunity of hearing this orchestra often in recent years and during that time many important changes have taken place in its management, direction and personnel. The work of Mr. Monteux is quite unfamiliar to us and it has been said that his services were procured merely as a temporary makeshift. If this is so, it must be stated that he has done remarkably well with what is practically a new orchestra. There were still a few of the old faces seen last night—notable among whom was Alvin Schroeder, the veteran first 'cellist of the organization, who must surely now be in his seventies—but for the most part the organization is made of new men, and since this fact is well known, too much cannot be expected.

There is no doubt that the orchestra is a very fine body of players, but it will not be heard at its best until that wonderful transparency of utterance which characterized its performance in former years is regained, and that cannot be until the old perfection of balance is restored. Last night the orchestral tone was often muffled and muddy. There was so much insistence on the strings that the wood-winds were overwhelmed and much of the beauty of their passages was lost. The tone of the violins was never lacking in quantity, but the quality was not of the best.

Special mention must be made of the horn section. They played their parts with brilliancy and unshaken confidence, particularly in the Strauss number, which called for performers of the first order. The solo by the cor anglais in the Allegretto of the Symphony was well done and doubtless would have been appreciated had it not been overpowered by the strings.

There were many strikingly good things about the orchestra's playing. The ensemble was remarkably fine and the tempo always well sustained. It was at its best in the quicker movements which were played with brilliancy, spirit, certainty and a magnificent rhythm. Both the conductor and the musicians showed great familiarity with the works performed.

The soloist, Paul Kochanski, played Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs" for violin with orchestra and harp accompaniment. This number was a great favorite of the violinist Ysaye, and has been heard many times in this country. It is in four movements, Adagio cantabile; Scherzo, Allegro; Andante sostenuto; and Allegro guerriero. Mr. Kochanski's performance of the work was a very enjoyable one, but it was hardly inspired. His tone was round and full and of a warm quality. In the slow movements he played with great repose and confidence. He had the misfortune in the adagio to be tuned to a higher pitch than the orchestra, so that his intonation was at times faulty. His performance after that, however, was perfect in this respect and especially fine was his playing of the rapid and difficult finale in double stops.

Much interest was taken in the work by Richard Strauss, about whom there has been so much discussion of late in musical circles, and it was a great satisfaction to hear a performance of "Till Eulenspiegel", which is considered his finest composition. That it sounded strangely to our ears may be putting it mildly, but if one stopped to analyze why this were so it would be seen that the strangeness was not in the matter but in the way the matter was presented. For it cannot be said that there was anything particularly unusual about the themes. They were striking, but that is requisite to a good theme. The strangeness to us was the suddenness of the contrasts, the ultra harshness of the dissonances and the overpowering orchestral effects employed. Whether these are enjoyed or not is a matter of taste, but it cannot be denied that it was brilliant, if grotesque and that there was real, if gruesome, humor in it.

HTFD-CONN. JAN. 10.
TIMES.

ORCHESTRA CONCERT MIGHTILY ENJOYED

Audience at Parsons's Is Stirred by Boston Symphony Organization.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played at Parsons's Theater last evening before a capacity audience of unusual enthusiasm. The playing was splendid in power in sureness in spontaneity, and from the first lovely measures of the Franck symphony to the last lilt of humor of "Till Eulenspiegel" the concert was a brilliant success.

For the benefit of those who care for comparisons it may be said at once that last evening's orchestra was one of much finer quality and infinitely greater power than the Boston Symphony Orchestra of a year ago. And there certainly is every reason why this should be so. Mr. Monteux has had a year's work with his players and they have had a year's experience with his interpretations. Last year in everything orchestra and conductor were not as one; this year the oneness has come—and with it comes the greatness of the orchestra. The reading of the first movement of the Cesaer Franck D minor Symphony proved this. There was wonderful tonal power. The first climax was positively startling in its sonority. The strings had the mighty sweep of tone based on the firm foundation of the largest double bass section the orchestra has ever brought here; the woodwinds played in all the beauty of their fame of many years; the brasses were powerful, smooth, impressive. This first movement is, to many admirers of the symphony, the greatest; yet in the allegretto there is wonderful charm in the effect produced by the great volume of tone in the picked strings; there is lovely melody in the oboe's song; there is much interest incited in the strangely tricky rhythms that are introduced. And in the finale, after seemingly impossible involvements of tone, there is splendid loveliness in the melodies for cellos and for horn and the climax is tremendous.

Paul Kochanski played Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs with the orchestra and was loudly acclaimed, being recalled to the stage many times when his work was finished. He is young, facile, interested in his palying and possesses a fine tone of sufficient power. There was particularly lovely playing of the adagio cantabile, though there were some minor faults of intonation in earlier measures of the first movement of the work. In the allegro, too, there was beautiful playing, and there was fine brilliance at the last. Mr. Kochanski's excellences, however, must not permit the brilliant playing of the orchestra behind him to be forgotten.

Then came Mr. Monteux's brilliantly humorous and effective reading of Strauss's unique "The Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"—a reading that brought out all the brilliances and queer little humors of the work, that made every melody shine in beauty, that brought a climax of such power and effect that those in the audience, just a little wrought up by the music, burst into spontaneous applause before the last few measures were played.

Strauss in his humor, interpreted by Mr. Monteux and his players last evening, rounded out a concert that was mightily enjoyed. The only possible regret about the concert is that it was the only one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Hartford will have this year.

HARTFORD COURANT. JAN. 10.

Items and Announcements

Illness among the players compels Mr. Monteux to drop from the programme of the Symphony Concerts this week, Handel's Double Concerto for String and Wind Choirs. Instead, the strings will repeat Schönberg's sextet, "Transfiguring Night," which well deserves a third and a fourth hearing in this version for many voices. In few pieces has the orchestra kept finer quality.

For the concerts of next week, Mr. Monteux proposes a new Symphony. Szymanowski, the Polish composer, now resident in New York, wrote it; and a month or more ago Mr. Damrosch announced it for performance. He lacked time, however, for adequate rehearsal and the score passed to Mr. Monteux. Hitherto only a few songs and piano-pieces by Szymanowski have made way to concert-halls in America. For another piece by a living composer, the orchestra will repeat the fragments of Casella's ballet, "The Convent by the Water," well received last autumn. Familiar repertory pieces—the orchestral fragment of Franck's "Redemption" and Weber's Overture to "Oberon" —complete the programme.

TRANS. JAN. 12

ESTABLISHED 1881
From JAN 8 1922 L
TELEGRAM
New York City

Mozart and Milhaud at Symphony Concer

There was a finely outlined, beautifully refined performance of Mozart's D Major Symphony yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston musicians, is a musician of sensitive tastes. The performance was lively and smooth. There is a calm beauty to be found in Mozart's music, but too often conductors try to make it nervous and forceful. Mr. Monteux, however, always kept his orchestra in the spirit of the music. Later the programme became more dissonant and strident. There was a new orchestral suite by Milhaud, heard for the first time in New York, a work filled with modern French sophistication. Rachmaninoff's "The Isle of the Dead" and some dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" completed the programme.

FROM
TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

PLAYS MILHAUD'S MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Gives "Second Orchestral Suite," First Time Here.

Darius Milhaud's playful dissonances from a "Second Orchestral Suite," put forth by the most outspoken of those Parisian enfants terribles known as the "Groupe des Six," was new to the Boston Symphony's matinee audience—too new for comfort, if not for curiosity—at the orchestra's parting yesterday for another month of Athenian calm in its home town. Like the boy who rings your bell and runs away, the Bostonians launched three short, exclamatory outbursts from the set, omitting a fugue and finale, all of which had been received in France with howls and hisses, through a later "less turbulent" hearing was since reported there.

Milhaud's music was written for Paul Claudel's poem, "Protée," and his measured noises mocked a hopeless love of the old man, Proteus, for a young girl, whose scorn caused birds of the air and seals in the ocean to laugh and play, as Mary's lamb made the children in the nursery tale. An "Ouverture" of ultra-violet spectral harmonies, a more perspicacious "Pastorale," in which the composer's "reunion of chords or counterpoint in different tonalities" attained expressive symmetry and a "Nocturne" again of misty cacophonies, were played by the band and greeted by the house with the mutual shyness of Dail Eireann partisans, save for the few eager souls grateful at last to know Milhaud as something besides a name in the Paris cables.

Compensation was afforded for the classicists in Mozart's D major symphony, with which Mr. Monteux led the matinee, and more abundantly in Rachmaninoff's richly intoned "Island of the Dead," after Boecklin's picture, while in conclusion there were Borodin's lively and colorful "Prince Igor" dances.

Morning Telegraph
New York

JAN [illegible] - 1922

ORCHESTRAS BUSY

Boston Symphony Offers Work of Parisian Composer and Two Numbers of Russian School.

"SCHEHERAZADE" IS PLAYED

The Saturday matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought forth another program of wide variety; a scheme of things evidently very much to the liking of Pierre Monteux as well as New York audiences. The Boston band has greatly enlarged its metropolitan followers this season by consistently good playing and excellent programs. Mr. Monteux and his men are to be congratulated.

The symphony was Mozart's D Major, rendered in perfect unison and beautiful tone under conservative direction. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "Isle of the Dead," changed the tenor of the afternoon rather abruptly, and it became patent that the concert would lean toward the modern type of expression.

This was fully realized in the next number—Overture, Pastorale, and Nocturne from Darius Milhaud's Second Orchestral Suite. Milhaud is a member of the select Parisian "Six," young composers who have gone to daring lengths in music. The work did not sound quite daring enough to be unenjoyable, for which one should be duly thankful, and its irrepressible character sounded pleasantly on the ear. Borodin's "Prince [illegible]" dances rounded out the program their beautiful tunes and inspiring

---

TIMES
NEW YORK CITY

Music Notes Afield.

As the slow movement from Saint-Saëns's C minor symphony was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in memory of the dead composer, Mr. Parker in The Transcript says: "Conductor and orchestra seemed to be carving a relief, in Grecian purity and continence, upon some marble tomb holding the dust of Saint-Saëns beneath his loved Mediterranean skies. Yet at the end the audience applauded as roundly as though this Adagio were an appointed or inserted number in the routine of the day, while Mr. Monteux waited with unresponsive back for the clapping to subside, the custom of the country—and an innocent custom. For, had each comer been asked at the door whether Saint-Saëns were still alive—an old man carved in yellowed ivory—or dead within the week, how many might have answered truly?

Evening Globe
New York
JAN. 9

Milhaud and the Bostons.

One was all prepared for a shock of the very first order, even a police raid, or an incursion from a neighboring engine house, at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Mr. Monteux put on the programme ("for the first time in New York") three movements from the second orchestral suite of Darius Milhaud, the most prominent member of the "Group of Six," which is supposed to be the latest cry of ultra-modernity in French music. This suite was brought out at a Colonne concert in Paris, Oct. 24, 1920.

Although Paris is pretty well inured to strange noises, from Marinetti to the Big Bertha, this suite provoked such hissing and howling, the Boston programme told us, that the police had to come in and clear the fauteuils de balcon (why only that section of the house is not explained.) Nevertheless, the suite was repeated at the concert of Oct. 30. On this second occasion the wily management provided a programme note reminding the public that Wagner and Bizet had not seemed to their first hearers less "cacophonic" than Milhaud. So admonished, the new audience proved more "prudent" in its behavior.

Now, here on Saturday the audience did nothing out of the way at all, and, of course, the management had no need to summon outside aid. There was considerable applause after the overture of the suite, rather less after the "Pastorale" and the "Nocturne." Did Mr. Monteux deny us our shock by omitting the fugue and the finale, in which occurs the "Nouveau-Cirque" music to accompany the repast of seals? And where, oh where, is all that horrible cacophony? The three sections we were permitted to hear are "modern" in their idiom, expert as to orchestration, fanciful, and delicately ironic in their portrayal of the "hopeless love of the old man Protée for a young girl" (the suite is based on music written for Paul Claudel's "Protée"). But where, oh where, was the shock? Not in the performance either, for that was refined and polished to a degree.

On the Boston programme were also the so-called "Haffner" symphony of Mozart (minus its minuet; Mr. Monteux had a day of omitting), Rachmaninoff's "The Island of the Dead" (both Böcklin's picture and Rachmaninoff's tone poem seem to count many devoted admirers), and the delightful Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," which Mr. Monteux has conducted so often, with and without the Russian ballet. All of these the orchestra played well.

FROM JAN 9 1922 K
EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

French and British Modernists.

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Orchestra, is certainly a conductor without reserves in the matter of modernist music. He took his courage in both hands on Saturday at his Carnegie Hall concert and brought out part of the second orchestral suite of Darius Milhaud, one of that little band of cheek-tonguing, nose-thumbing Parisians known as the "Groupe des six."

The music was written to illustrate Paul Claudel's "Protee," celebrating in bitter and often satiric fashion the hopeless infatuation of age for youth. Milhaud went at this with the zest of his own youth and set his mockery in the idiom of these ultra-modernists, sometimes known as polytony, or the utterance of several contrapuntal voices in differing tonalities. The thing, as a fact, is not new at all, but so old it again seems new; for when the art of harmony was being born the ears of the time found nothing unbeautiful in not greatly dissimilar contrapuntal combinations.

Through the strangeness and cacophony of Milhaud's music, the touch of genuine significance could be discerned; and perhaps when the strangeness has worn off the idiom, the cacophony will not seem more perilous than that of Richard Strauss did fifteen years ago.

NEW YORK PREMIERES BY MONTEUX PLAYERS

Reviews at Hand of Mlada and Three Cornered Hat; Milhaud Suite Also Played Here.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reached the first of its third pair of concerts in New York last Thursday evening, playing, in Carnegie Hall, Handel's concerto in F major, Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Mlada, Massenet's Phedre overture, and three dances from Manuel de Falla's Three Cornered Hat

The Herald's comment is short: "The work of the orchestra in the different numbers was generally admirable." The new dances are accounted "gracefully scored with the use of charming Spanish rhythms." That "the performance of the whole program was of a high order of merit" is The Tribune writer's summary. The de Falla novelty was of "gorgeous coloring and intoxicating rhythms," and in spite of some "pseudo-Spanish music, but few composers have so vividly caught and presented" their native country. Noteworthy also for color was the Rimsky-Korsakoff number, "rich in memories of the Spanish Caprice and Le Coq d'Or."

Other Morning Papers

The "gorgeously gay" Spanish music made a deep impression on The Times critic, who is of the opinion that the composer could "hardly ever have heard so stirring a performance." The "glowing nocturne" from Mlada "was also greatly applauded." Brahms and Haydn were treated to "lovely" and "sympathetic" interpretations. In The World, there is special mention for the work of the horns and woodwind in the Handel number. Then Mlada is taken up, and passed as effective, though long in getting under way. The critic feels that this selection is "true" Rimsky-Korsakoff, and detects in it suggestions which the composers of the Caucasian Sketches, The Fire Bird, and Till Eulenspiegel may have caught up. "Pluperfect" was the performance of the de Falla novelty, which is in itself "gay, glittering music, tuneful and vigorous, not all important, and brilliantly scored."

The Evening World; The Sun

The writer for The Evening World finds that the Mlada selections "stirred the audience." As to the pieces of de Falla, they are "good music, sprightly, rhythmic and melodious;" modern, yet restrained in modernism.

Brahms and Hadyn, believes The Sun writer, were "both conscientiously performed with dignity and breadth." Applause is recorded as the deserved greeting of both the Rimsky and de Falla numbers; the latter made "an immediate impression through their tingling rhythms—imposed rather forcibly on the orchestra by its conductor, but subtle enough to survive."

Other Evening Papers

Critical comment in The Globe is restricted to the de Falla number. "The music is brilliant and picturesque enough," it is written, "to suggest that Stravinsky has a dangerous rival." The Evening Post is critical of these Spanish dances. The first, with its "gay and dashing performance," appealed. The second succeeded less—"seemed a bit vulgar." The third is commended by implication for its "rhythm" and "gorgeous" color. The Mail is not represented by other than a news item.

For the first time in New York, Darius Milhaud's second orchestral suite was played under Mr. Monteux last Saturday afternoon. The other numbers on this program were Mozart's D major symphony, Rachmaninoff's Island of the Dead, and the Polovtsi dance from Borodin's Prince Igor. This event will be considered in a later issue of The Digest.

MUS. DIGEST - JAN. 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY WARMLY RECEIVED

Paul Kochanski as Soloist Performs Max Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs."

A large audience greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at Parsons's theater last evening when it played its first and only concert of the season in this city. The conductor was Pierre Monteux and the soloist Paul Kochanski, violinist. That the concert was enjoyed to the utmost was shown by the liberal and enthusiastic applause after each number. The work of the soloist was especially appreciated and he was compelled to come forward and bow his acknowledgements many times.

The works performed were Cesar Franck's D minor symphony in three movements; Max Bruck's "Scottish Fantasia" for violin with harp and orchestra; and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche."

We have not had the opportunity of hearing this orchestra often in recent years and during that time many important changes have taken place in its management, direction and personnel. The work of Mr. Monteux is quite unfamiliar to us and it has been said that his services were procured merely as a temporary makeshift. If this is so, it must be stated that he has done remarkably well with what is practically a new orchestra. There were still a few of the old faces seen last night—notable among whom was Alvin Schroeder, the veteran first 'cellist of the organization, who must surely now be in his seventies—but for the most part the organization is made of new men, and since this fact is well known, too much cannot be expected.

There is no doubt that the orchestra is a very fine body of players, but it will not be heard at its best until that wonderful transparency of utterance which characterized its performance in former years is regained, and that cannot be until the old perfection of balance is restored. Last night the orchestral tone was often muffled and muddy. There was so much insistence on the strings that the wood-winds were overwhelmed and much of the beauty of their passages was lost. The tone of the violins was never lacking in quantity, but the quality was not of the best.

Special mention must be made of the horn section. They played their parts with brilliancy and unshaken confidence, particularly in the Strauss number, which called for performers of the first order. The solo by the cor anglais in the Allegretto of the Symphony was well done and doubtless would have been appreciated had it not been overpowered by the strings.

There were many strikingly good things about the orchestra's playing. The ensemble was remarkably fine and the tempo always well sustained. It was at its best in the quicker movements which were played with brilliancy, spirit, certainty and a magnificent rhythm. Both the conductor and the musicians showed great familiarity with the works performed.

The soloist, Paul Kochanski, played Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs" for violin with orchestra and harp accompaniment. This number was a great favorite of the violinist Ysaye, and has been heard many times in this country. It is in four movements, Adagio cantabile; Scherzo, Allegro; Andante sostenuto; and Allegro guerriero. Mr. Kochanski's performance of the work was a very enjoyable one, but it was hardly inspired. His tone was round and full and of a warm quality. In the slow movements he played with great repose and confidence. He had the misfortune in the adagio to be tuned to a higher pitch than the orchestra, so that his intonation was at times faulty. His performance after that, however, was perfect in this respect and especially fine was his playing of the rapid and difficult finale in double stops.

Much interest was taken in the work by Richard Strauss, about whom there has been so much discussion of late in musical circles, and it was a great satisfaction to hear a performance of "Till Eulenspiegel", which is considered his finest composition. That it sounded strangely to our ears may be putting it mildly, but if one stopped to analyze why this were so it would be seen that the strangeness was not in the matter but in the way the matter was presented. For it canot be said that there was anything particularly unusual about the themes. They were striking, but that is requisite to a good theme. The strangeness to us was the suddenness of the contrasts, the ultra harshness of the dissonances and the overpowering orchestral effects employed. Whether these are enjoyed or not is a matter of taste, but it cannot be denied that it was brilliant, if grotesque, and that there was real, if gruesome, humor in it.

HATFD-CONN. JAN. 10.
TIMES.

ORCHESTRA CONCERT MIGHTILY ENJOYED

Audience at Parsons's Is Stirred by Boston Symphony Organization.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played at Parsons's Theater last evening before a capacity audience of unusual enthusiasm. The playing was splendid in power in sureness in spontaneity, and from the first lovely measures of the Franck symphony to the last lilt of humor of "Till Eulenspiegel" the concert was a brilliant success.

For the benefit of those who care for comparisons it may be said at once that last evening's orchestra was one of much finer quality and infinitely greater power than the Boston Symphony Orchestra of a year ago. And there certainly is every reason why this should be so. Mr. Monteux has had a year's work with his players and they have had a year's experienec with his interpretations. Last year in everything orchestra and conductor were not as one; this year the oneness has come—and with it comes the greatness of the orchestra. The reading of the first movement of the Cesaer Franck D minor Symphony proved this. There was wonderful tonal power. The first climax was positively startling in its sonority. The strings had the mighty sweep of tone based on the firm foundation of the largest double bass section the orchestra has ever brought here; the woodwinds played in all the beauty of their fame of many years; the brasses were powerful, smooth, impressive. This first movement is, to many admirers of the symphony, the greatest; yet in the allegretto there is wonderful charm in the effect produced by the great volume of tone in the picked strings; there is lovely melody in the oboe's song; there is much interest incited in the strangely tricky rhythms that are introduced. And in the finale, after seemingly impossible involvements of tone, there is splendid loveliness in the melodies for 'cellos and for horn and the climax is tremendous.

Paul Kochanski played Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Airs with the orchestra and was loudly acclaimed, being recalled to the stage many times when his work was finished. He is young, facile, interested in his palying and possesses a fine tone of sufficient power. There was particularly lovely playing of the adagio cantabile, though there were some minor faults of intonation in earlier measures of the first movement of the work. In the allegro, too, there was beautiful playing, and there was fine brilliance at the last. Mr. Kochanski's excellences, however, must not permit the brilliant playing of the orchestra behind him to be forgotten.

Then came Mr. Monteux's brilliantly humorous and effective reading of Strauss's unique "The Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"—a reading that brought out all the brilliances and queer little humors of the work, that made every melody shine in beauty, that brought a climax of such power and effect that those in the audience, just a little wrought up by the music, burst into spontaneous applause before the last few measures were played.

Strauss in his humor, interpreted by Mr. Monteux and his players last evening, rounded out a concert that was mightily enjoyed. The only possible regret about the concert is that it was the only one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Hartford will have this year.

HARTFORD-COURANT. JAN. 10.

Items and Announcements

Illness among the players compels Mr. Monteux to drop from the programme of the Symphony Concerts this week, Handel's Double Concerto for String and Wind Choirs. Instead, the strings will repeat Schönberg's sextet, "Transfiguring Night," which well deserves a third and a fourth hearing in this version for many voices. In few pieces has the orchestra kept finer quality.

For the concerts of next week, Mr. Monteux proposes a new Symphony. Szymanowski, the Polish composer, now resident in New York, wrote it; and a month or more ago Mr. Damrosch announced it for performance. He lacked time, however, for adequate rehearsal and the score passed to Mr. Monteux. Hitherto only a few songs and piano-pieces by Szymanowski have made way to concert-halls in America. For another piece by a living composer, the orchestra will repeat the fragments of Casella's ballet, "The Convent by the Water," well received last autumn. Familiar repertory pieces—the orchestral fragment of Franck's "Redemption" and Weber's Overture to "Oberon"—complete the programme.

TRANS. JAN. 12.

[49]

Reception Given Boston Symphony Was Enthusiastic

Great Personal Tribute to Pierre Monteux—Vincent d'Indy Receives Palms

An eminently suitable caption for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at St. Denis Theatre would be, "ovations for all." Not just at one period during the evening, but at the conclusion of every number or movement, the applause rose to such enthusiastic heights that it well merited the title of ovation. The conductor, Pierre Monteux, the pianist and composer, Vincent d'Indy, and the orchestra received appreciation that was not only loud and prolonged, but also evidently heartfelt and spontaneous.

Indeed he would be a person who "had no music in his soul" who could fail to be moved by last night's performance. The unmeasured use of superlatives tends to defeat it's own object, but it is difficult to speak of this concert in moderate terms. Every number was a perfect piece of musicianly art.

The programme itself was one of the best-balanced that has been heard in Montreal. Beginning with the "Eroica" symphony is a feat that could only be performed by a great orchestra, and one that was composed of real musicians. The result amply justified the move. The audience, which was very large, drank in every note with avid interest, and broke into one of the most spontaneous bursts of applause at the conclusion of the first movement that I have ever heard in Montreal. From that time on, each number seemed but to increase the enthusiasm, until at the close, nobody seemed to be willing to leave the theatre.

At the close of Vincent d'Indy symphonic variations, "Istar," the veteran musician was presented with an address by a member of the Brassard Choir, accompanied by palms, M. d'Indy was greatly touched by this tribute, and made a short reply in which he thanked the audience for their welcome, and said how greatly he appreciated this acknowledgment from an association wihch had recently presented one of the works of his beloved master Caesar Franck.

Bach's concerto for the piano in D major, Debussy's two nocturnes and symphonic variations of "Istar," all only help to further disclose an orchestra of musicians not only perfect in the execution, but masters and lovers of their instruments.

Under Pierre Monteux, who is now leading the orchestra for the third season, the Boston Symphony concerts have never been so generally and thoroughly enjoyed. His manifest authority, cosmopolitan breadth, and executive skill, can only be attributed to the wide experience of his career. He is a familiar figure in Paris, London, Berlin, Vienna, and Budapest. Wherever he has visited he has won praise, but nowhere has he more fully deserved the praise than at the St. Denis theatre last night. It was a night that music lovers will remember for many days. When the final notes had died away, that silence which held sway immediately previous to a cascade of applause, was always noticeable, as is only in evidence when an audience is yet drinking in the beauty of the music. The orchestra is composed of musicians, experienced, leavened with youth, which perhaps accounts for the fire and verve put into the work where demanded. The discipline is such as can only be obtained by masters deferring to a master mind, the whole going to make an orchestra of which words alone are poor praise.

Md. d'Indy's performance met its merit in the applause of the audience, his contribution being his own composition, and a Bach piano concerto in D Major, in which he had the aid of the strings. Despite the appeals of the audience he would give no encore.

It was a memorable night, and the large audience which gathered at the theatre were reluctant to depart when the programme had closed, perhaps the most worthy tribute that the orchestra and its leader could receive.

"PICKAXE."

MONRL-HERALD-DEC-12

GREAT OVATION GIVEN ORCHESTRA

Epochal Concert by Boston Symphony Players and Monteux

VINCENT D'INDY

Veteran French Composer's Illuminating Reading of Bach Concerto

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Pierre Monteux, conductor; Vincent d'Indy, piano soloist; St. Denis Theatre. Program: Eroica Symphony, Beethoven. Piano Concerto, No. 12, Bach. Two Nocturnes, "Nuages," "Fetes," Debussy. Symphonic Variations, "Istar," d'Indy. Hungarian March, "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz.

A word that is much misused by [illegible] agents in describing the reception [illegible] given performers under their [illegible] the word "ovation." [illegible]

[illegible] Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux and Mr. d'Indy last night. The occasion was indeed a festal, even an epochal, one. There was an orchestra that is universally accepted as one of the best in the world, an orchestra that Paderewski used to speak about as being superior to all others, there was a program made up of representative classical and modern music, there was a conductor of particular distinction and there was one of the greatest composers of the day playing a solo. Add to these factors the attendance of an immense audience, in which were noticed leading local teachers and many critical non-professional musicians, and it will be seen that none of the essentials that go into the construction of a perfect concert were lacking. The ovation was a natural, practically an inevitable, result; and it was an ovation in which orchestra, conductor and soloist all had their important share, an ovation that rose to a climax of cheering that did not die away till the enthusiasts felt they had paid their debt of thanks in full.

WONDERFUL TONE.

In the orchestra itself were found features, in combination that, singly, have been admired in other first-rank orchestras visiting Montreal in the last few years. The tonal strength of the New York Symphony, the firm steadiness of the New York Philharmonic, the suavity and much of the finesse of the Scala band were all there, fused into a beautiful, symmetrical, powerful and deeply expressive whole. It is doubtful if Mr. Toscanini's brasses were smoother, or his wood-wind sweeter, (when sweetness of tone enhanced the meaning of any particular passage) than the tone that Mr. Monteaux called forth from the wind sections of his orchestra; and certainly even Mr. Toscanini did not give us a more ethereal pianissimo than Mr. Monteux evoked from strings and wind alike in the Scherzo of the Symphony—probably no conductor could have bettered it. Technically, of course, the orchestra says the last word.

CONSERVED ENERGY.

People talked last year about Mr. Toscanini being a 'human dynamo.' So is Mr. Monteux. His individuality is so strong that he apparently does not have to put forth any special effort to communicate his ideas; it is rather a question of conserving energy and expending it so that it will produce a maximum of effect with a minimum of outlay. Never was a gesture wasted last night; "every little movement had a meaning all its own;" and through this economy there was accumulated a force that when released (but never once unleashed from a dominent control) had an electrifying effect upon the audience. It seems almost as if a deaf man could have understood the music from watching Mr. Monteux direct it.

INTERPRETATIONS.

Varying opinions will doubtless be heard about Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the symphony, differences of opinion will all spring from the basis of whether the finely spiritual French viewpoint is as correct as the more obviously "profound" and philosophical one. It always seems to me that there is as much strength in the French delicacy as there is in the weightier concepts of some musicians opposed by nature to the French school and out of sympathy with French ideals. Certainly there was abundant strength, though not of the noisy and ostentatious kind in the first movement of the symphony; the Funeral March was kept high above the slough of sentimentalism, deeply affecting as it was from beginning to end; the Scherzo grew, out of a gossamer shimmer, into a Shakespearean-like festival of fairy brightness; and the Finale was impeccably clear in the polyphonic parts and impressively developed throughout. In the French music, Mr. Monteux was, naturally, in the most comfortable circumstances; there no one could dispute him or challenge his authority; and there all his refinement, all his love of brilliance and all his skill in tone painting were given happiest exercise.

D'INDY AS PIANIST.

Modestly, with the air of a professor explaining something to a class, did Mr. d'Indy come forward and play the concerto from copy; and respectfully, almost with an air of reverence, did the audience hold itself in readiness to catch the turn of every phrase. What a wonderful performance it was! How illuminating and uplifting! It seemed as if nothing more could be said after it, as if the completeness of music as an art had been revealed. It was immensely instructive, too, in an historical way; for while the violins of various sizes that were used in the accompaniment are the same as the violins that Bach wrote for, the piano as we know it did not exist in his time; and curiously, and owing without doubt to Mr. d'Indy's clear intention to reproduce as nearly as possible the spirit in which the music was composed, it was the piano that sounded ancient and classical and the accompaniment that seemed modern. It was expected that Mr. d'Indy's reading of this would be scholarly, penetrating and informative; and the fulfillment of this expectation was lit with the light of the pianist's individual interpretative genius. The serenity of mood, so characteristic of Bach, was kept inviolate; nothing small, limited or tainted with anxiety could find place where the only concsiousness was of bigness, goodness and a secure contentment. When again will we be privileged to hear a great composer, who is also a brilliant pianist, acting as interpreter, and with the bearing of a disciple, to one of the greatest composers, perhaps absolutely the greatest yet known to the world? This alone would have made the concert unique.

"ISTAR" VARIATIONS.

Montreal audiences have not had many opportunities to hear Mr. d'Indy's music; and the performance of the "Istar" reversed variations was therefore all the more welcome. The marvel of this score is that the legend which is the basis of it, the story of the woman who went through seven gates leading to the "land of No-Return," and was stripped of jewels and raiment at each gate till she finally passed in revealed in her utter beauty, has been purged of the grossness that a less highly-atuned mind than Mr. d'Indy's might have rejoiced to find in it. And all the flame and radiance of the music, all the swiftly-changing temper and play of color, all the significance of the theme that is finally stated without adornment or accompaniment of any kind, was faithfully reflected in Mr. Monteux's reproduction of it.—P. K.

MONTREAL-STAR-DEC 13

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

The Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge—Schoenberg's Sextet to New Advantage—Mr. Kochanski, Notable Violinist—Other Pieces and Pleasures

Chiefly because of lack of spaciousness but partly because of peculiarities in construction, Sanders Theatre in Cambridge has obvious shortcomings as a room for orchestral concerts. Heard within its walls the tone of the brass instruments in forte passages becomes at one and the same time over-powerful and insufficiently brilliant, with the result that pieces of a robust character when played there lose much in effectiveness. On the other hand, music of a more intimate nature, particularly when the string-tone predominates, may sound to greater advantage than, for example, in Symphony Hall. Partly, therefore, as deliberate experiment, although the piece itself is deserving of many hearings, Mr. Monteux placed upon the programme of last evening's concert in Cambridge Schönberg's Sextet for Strings, "Verklärte Nacht." When played a few weeks ago in Boston Schönberg's music made, as it must always make, a profound impression. Yet it was possible to feel that the composer had not done altogether wisely in transferring his music from the first setting for six string-voices to a string-band of sixty. As one observer shrewdly expressed it, in making his music thick he made it thinner. In short, if the piece was to be rearranged with a view to obtaining greater sonority, why did Schönberg stop half way, why not a setting for full orchestra rather than a mere inflation of the original? As it sounded last evening, however, much of the intimacy of the orignial version was regained, and with it was the largeness and the increased intensity that the composer had newly sought. Once or twice it was still possible to regret the seeming compromise, to desire in certain of the climaxes a foundation of brass tone, but the effect of the music as a whole was singularly satisfying. Not only the former occasional emptiness but also the occasional faltering and dryness disappeared. From the first measure to the last the piece was engrossing, while the moments of transcendent beauty, of unearthly illumination, were more beautiful, more penetrating than ever before. And what music this is! Not inspiration alone has made it; only a powerful intellectuality and fervent inspiration combined can at such length and in such fashion spin a complex and many-stranded web of tone, that will constantly grip and enthrall the hearer, without for a moment relaxing severity of construction, adherence to the loftiest ideals. What composer, ancient or modern, has in a single movement showed a greater earnestness and concentration, a greater contrapuntal mastery, and yet contrived to sound the note of beauty from beginning to end? Schönberg wrought this marvel at the age of twenty-five. Had he died a year later the world would have mourned the man who might have raised absolute music—and for all the pretentious programme this is absolute music, in result if not in intention—higher and higher. As it is, we have as present culmination of Schönberg's work the Five Orchestral Pieces!

Not only the many strings of the Symphony Orchestra, profited by their environment last evening. Heard in the setting of Sanders Theatre, the single violin of Paul Kochanski proved to be loveliness incarnate. No doubt the hall played its part; presumably Mr. Kochanski could coax a beautiful tone from any fiddle; but it so happens that the particular instrument upon which he plays is one of the choicest in existence. A "Spanish Stradivarius"—there are six in all, most of them under lock and key—it is a masterpiece of masterpieces, costly in its finish, glorious in tone. But let not the impression be gained that Mr. Kochanski, come last winter to this country after long career in Europe, is merely an able violinist, fortunate in the possession of a miraculous violin. He is, in fact, a virtuoso of rare capacities, poised, sensitive, alert, intelligent, authoritative and resourceful, clearly of the elect. His piece last evening was Bruch's intrinsically superficial "Fantasia upon Scottish Airs," but many a worthier composition has, in less capable hands, made far less impression. The chief virtue of this music is its persistently songful character, and it is also free from the distressing pyrotechnics that mar so many violin concertos. Seemingly it is in songful music that Mr. Kochanski excels, though this one piece may by no means be taken as a test of his range or ability. He showed, too, abundant vigor when it was required, and this without rasp or scratch. There will be more to say of Mr. Kochanski and of Bruch's Fantasia when he has played it at the concerts of today and Saturday. In the meantime it may confidently be stated that those who will hear him then have unusual pleasure in store.

The rest of the concert was divided between Massenet's early Overture to "Phèdre" and the concert-version of the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera-ballet, "Mlada," both recently heard in Boston. Despite its occasional suggestion of an outdoor band-concert, Massenet's Overture is in many ways an admirable achievement. The themes are salient [illegible]

the [illegible] instrumentation highly effective. Such pieces often serve to keep alive the name of a composer wh most of his other music has sunk into obscurity. Herold survives in the Overture to "Zampa," Boieldieu is chiefly known to us through that to "La Dame Blanche," and Adolphe Adam through his instrumental preface to "Si j'étais Roi," although all three pieces have been relegated to programmes of a lighter sort. Perhaps some day this Overture to "Phèdre" with a few, a very few incidental numbers and songs, will keep Massenet's memory green when his many operas have vanished from the repertory.

Mr. Rosenfeld has described Rimsky-Korsakov as a maker of musical picture-books, and this he is indeed in this excerpt from "Mlada." With the printed programme for guide and support the music paints scene and action so vividly that there is little need of stage or characters. It is not always distinguished in invention, at times it is a little empty and contrived, yet it is constantly suggestive, and its instrumental dress by turn charms and stimulates the ear. Rimsky-Korsakov, master-magician of the orchestra, here spreads before us some of his already familiar tricks, and not a few that are new and surprising.

W. S. S.

TRANS. JAN. 13.

SYMPHONY GIVES 11TH CONCERT

Ravel's "The Waltz" Played First Time Before Boston Audience

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Schoenberg, "Radiant Night," sextet for strings arranged for string orchestra; Bruch, Fantasia on Scottish Airs for violin and orchestra; Ravel, "The Waltz" (first time in Boston). The solo violinist was Paul Kochanski, who played here for the first time.

Schoenberg's composition was at the last moment substituted for Handel's Concerto in F major, for strings and two wind instruments. This substitution was enforced on account of the sudden illness of Mr. Wendler, the first horn player. The performance of the concerto was thus necessarily postponed.

In the rearrangement of the program Brahms's Variations were played first in order, and delightfully played; so clearly and with so full an understanding of their structure that fresh beauty was perceived, and what before had seemed dry bones was now clothed in living flesh. Mr. Monteux is singularly happy in reading the music of Brahms. In Paris some conductors put it on their programs because they feel it to be their duty. Mr. Monteux rejoices in the opportunity for a performance because he finds charm as well as strength in the music. He has the ability to reveal these qualities to his audience.

What is to be said of "Radiant Night" that was not said before when it was performed in its original form and in the composer's later version? It was written before Schoenberg made up his mind to be startlingly "original"; before he evolved his elaborate system of cacophony. There are passages in "Radiant Night" that are melodically and harmonically enchanting, sensuous, passionate measures, the very ecstasy of emotion, nor is there any need of Dehmel's erotic poem to strengthen the spell. The absence of this poem in the program-book was not to be regretted. The music itself o'ermastered the hearer. Would that the whole were on the high level of certain sections. Unfortunately, Schoenberg in this work lacked taste and skill in the matter of proportion. The music is too long-drawn-out; while the truly emotional measures are thus the more salient, the many insignificant and dreary passages almost prevent the full enjoyment of those that are inspired. The performance was superb. It may be said in all soberness that in no other orchestra in this country, probably not in Europe, is there a body of strings to be compared with that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Grant that the material is in itself excellent; yet an orchestra is what the conductor makes it, and Mr. Monteux has made this orchestra what it is. Long famous, it was never in a higher estate than it is today.

Ravel's "Waltz"—not "a waltz," but "the waltz," first performed at a Lamoureux concert late in 1920, had been played in San Francisco and in St. Louis before it was produced in Boston. Ravel says that the tempo is "the movement of a Viennese waltz." Mr. Casella, with whom Ravel played a four-handed arrangement for piano in Vienna, says that the work is a triptych: 1. The birth of the waltz, from chaotic measures to form and development; 2, the waltz; 3, the apotheosis of the waltz. Ravel has written a little "argument," a fanciful description of a court ball about 1855. One commentator sees an "ironical" treatment of the dance; another finds "implied anguish" in the "apotheosis," something threatening in the bacchanale; he hears a voice crying: "We dance on a volcano." Well, years ago Marcel saw all things in a minuet; Senac de Meilhan likened life to one and Count Moroni saw in that dance the portrayal of the 18th century. Hearing Ravel's "Waltz," we do not find irony, prophecy or symbolism; we hear certain agreeable measures that remind one of Johann Strauss, the father, who composed the [illegible] and [illegible] "Sou[illegible]" waltzes are world famous; for the better measures of Ravel's are pure Straussian, but not of the first order. Has Ravel shot his bolt? Is he now only writing in the manner of Ravel in the language of New England, has he "run emptins"?

Mr. Kochanski has a fine tone and a facile mechanism. His performance was characterized by taste and elegance in phrasing, which, however, could not redeem the "Scottish Fantasia" from its inherent cheapness, its obvious purpose to excite immediate applause. Mr. Kochanski is a serious musician. When he made his first appearance in New York he played the concerto of Brahms; the programs of his recitals there were of a high order. It will be time to discuss the nobler qualities of his art and he plays something worth while.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Szymanowski, Symphony No. 2 (first time in America); Franck, Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; Casella, Excerpts from "The Convent on the Water"; Weber, Overture to "Oberon."

HERALD-JAN. 14-

KOCHANSKI HAS SOLO ROLE AT SYMPHONY

Russian Violinist Makes Indifferent Impression for Tone and Technique

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Paul Kochanski, a Russian violinist, newly come to these shores, was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

The young man had some harrowing experiences at the hands of the Bolshevists, according to his publicity, being forced to play at free concerts in St. Petersburg, Kiev and elsewhere and being paid in food tickets instead of money. On his attempt to leave Russia he was arrested and sentenced to serve as professor in the Conservatory in that city, presumably for more food tickets.

HE GOT AWAY.

But, somehow, he got away from there and reached London where he played with the London Symphony Orchestra. In New York he appeared with the Symphony Society, and now he is here with us.

He played the Bruch Fantasia on Scottish airs, a good old standby of violinists everywhere. It's an effective violin work, but an affront to every Scotchman because the stolid German chapelmaster, Bruch, distorted the good Scotch tunes to suit himself with sublime disregard for the fact that they would sound all wrong to ears familiar with the melodies.

Despite the affection of the Bolshevists and the ease with which he gets engagements with great symphony orchestras, Kochanski struck me as a very indifferent fiddler, a man whose tone had no special distinction and whose technique was nothing unusual.

NOT A WELL-PLAYED WALTZ.

"La Valse," a choregraphic poem by Ravel, was performed for the first time in Boston. These ballet things lose frightfully when played as concert pieces. Making all allowances for the French composer's technical ingenuity, "La Valse" sounded like a Strauss waltz played by a bad band, all of whose instruments were out of tune and most of whose members couldn't play.

Schonberg's "Radiant Night," a sextet for strings, was the best thing on the program. It is atmospheric music which suggests what the composer wished by his title, and a remarkable piece of instrumentation.

AMER-JAN. 14-

NEW VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY

Paul Kochanski, a young Polish violinist whom the Bolshevists ordered around for several years, giving him food-cards instead of pay-checks, made his Boston debut yesterday at the 11th Symphony matinee.

He chose to play Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Folk-Melodies." It was an international event—a Russian Pole playing near-Scottish music written by a German, being accompanied by a cosmopolitan orchestra led by a Frenchman. Almost everyone was there but the dreaded Bolshevist. Kochanski has a very pleasing tone. He was rapturously applauded.

PAUL KOCHANSKI

The best thing on the program was a Ravel novelty, "The Waltz," a tone picture depicting a court-ball in France during the Second Empire. "We dance," said a Frenchman, "on a volcano." [illegible]

Reception Given Boston Symphony Was Enthusiastic

[49]

Great Personal Tribute to Pierre Monteux—Vincent d'Indy Receives Palms

An eminently suitable caption for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at St. Denis Theatre would be, "ovations for all." Not just at one period during the evening, but at the conclusion of every number or movement, the applause rose to such enthusiastic heights that it well merited the title of ovation. The conductor, Pierre Monteux, the pianist and composer, Vincent d'Indy, and the orchestra received appreciation that was not only loud and prolonged, but also evidently heartfelt and spontaneous.

Indeed he would be a person who "had no music in his soul" who could fail to be moved by last night's performance. The unmeasured use of superlatives tends to defeat it's own object, but it is difficult to speak of this concert in moderate terms. Every number was a perfect piece of musicianly art.

The programme itself was one of the best-balanced that has been heard in Montreal. Beginning with the "Eroica" symphony is a feat that could only be performed by a great orchestra, and one that was composed of real musicians. The result amply justified the move. The audience, which was very large, drank in every note with avid interest, and broke into one of the most spontaneous bursts of applause at the conclusion of the first movement that I have ever heard in Montreal. From that time on, each number seemed but to increase the enthusiasm, until at the close, nobody seemed to be willing to leave the theatre.

At the close of Vincent d'Indy symphonic variations, "Istar," the veteran musician was presented with an address by a member of the Brassard Choir, accompanied by palms. M. d'Indy was greatly touched by this tribute, and made a short reply in which he thanked the audience for their welcome, and said how greatly he appreciated this acknowledgment from an association wihch had recently presented one of the works of his beloved master Caesar Franck.

Bach's concerto for the piano in D major, Debussy's two nocturnes and symphonic variations of "Istar," all only help to further disclose an orchestra of musicians not only perfect in the execution, but masters and lovers of their instruments.

Under Pierre Monteux, who is now leading the orchestra for the third season, the Boston Symphony concerts have never been so generally and thoroughly enjoyed. His manifest authority, cosmopolitan breadth, and executive skill, can only be attributed to the wide experience of his career. He is a familiar figure in Paris, London, Berlin, Vienna, and Budapest. Wherever he has visited he has won praise, but nowhere has he more fully deserved the praise than at the St. Denis theatre last night. It was a night that music lovers will remember for many days. When the final notes had died away, that silence which held sway immediately previous to a cascade of applause, was always noticeable, as is only in evidence when an audience is yet drinking in the beauty of the music. The orchestra is composed of musicians, experienced, leavened with youth, which perhaps accounts for the fire and verve put into the work where demanded. The discipline is such as can only be obtained by masters deferring to a master mind, the whole going to make an orchestra of which words alone are poor praise.

Md. d'Indy's performance met its merit in the applause of the audience his contribution being his own composition, and a Bach piano concerto in D Major, in which he had the aid of the strings. Despite the appeals of the audience he would give no encore.

It was a memorable night, and the large audience which gathered at the theatre were reluctant to depart when the programme had closed, perhaps the most worthy tribute that the orchestra and its leader could receive.

"PICKAXE."

MONRL-HERALD-DEC.12

GREAT OVATION GIVEN ORCHESTRA

Epochal Concert by Boston Symphony Players and Monteux

VINCENT D'INDY

Veteran French Composer's Illuminating Reading of Bach Concerto

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA; Pierre Monteux, conductor; Vincent d'Indy, piano soloist; St. Denis Theatre. Program: Eroica Symphony, Beethoven. Piano Concerto, No. 12, Bach. Two Nocturnes, "Nuages," "Fetes," Debussy. Symphonic Variations, "Istar," d'Indy. Hungarian March, "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz.

A word that is much misused by press agents in describing the receptions given performers under their special care, the word "ovation," [illegible] called into play in Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteaux and Mr. d'Indy last night. The occasion was indeed a festal, even an epochal, one. There was an orchestra that is universally accepted as one of the best in the world, an orchestra that Paderewski used to speak about as being superior to all others, there was a program made up of representative classical and modern music, there was a conductor of particular distinction and there was one of the greatest composers of the day playing a solo. Add to these factors the attendance of an immense audience, in which were noticed leading local teachers and many critical non-professional musicians, and it will be seen that none of the essentials that go into the construction of a perfect concert were lacking. The ovation was a natural, practically an inevitable, result; and it was an ovation in which orchestra, conductor and soloist all had their important share, an ovation that rose to a climax of cheering that did not die away till the enthusiasts felt they had paid their debt of thanks in full.

WONDERFUL TONE.

In the orchestra itself were found features, in combination, that, singly, have been admired in other first-rank orchestras visiting Montreal in the last few years. The tonal strength of the New York Symphony, the firm steadiness of the New York Philharmonic, the suavity and much of the finesse of the Scala band were all there, fused into a beautiful, symetrical, powerful and deeply expressive whole. It is doubtful if Mr. Toscanini's brasses were smoother, or his wood-wind sweeter, (when sweetness of tone enhanced the meaning of any particular passage) than the tone that Mr. Monteaux called forth from the wind sections of his orchestra; and certainly even Mr. Toscanini did not give us a more ethereal pianissimo than Mr. Monteux evoked from strings and wind alike in the Scherzo of the Symphony—probably no conductor could have bettered it. Technically, of course, the orchestra says the last word.

CONSERVED ENERGY.

People talked last year about Mr. Toscanini being a 'human dynamo.'' So is Mr. Monteux. His individuality is so strong that he apparently does not have to put forth any special effort to communicate his ideas; it is rather a question of conserving energy and expending it so that it will produce a maximum of effect with a minimum of outlay. Never was a gesture wasted last night; "every little movement had a meaning all its own;" and through this economy there was accumulated a force that when released (but never once unleashed from a dominent control) had an electrifying effect upon the audience. It seems almost as if a deaf man could have understood the music from watching Mr. Monteux direct it.

INTERPRETATIONS.

Varying opinions will doubtless be heard about Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the symphony, differences of opinion will all spring from the basis of whether the finely spiritual French viewpoint is as correct as the more obviously "profound" and philosophical one. It always seems to me that there is as much strength in the French delicacy as there is in the weightier concepts of some musicians opposed by nature to the French school and out of sympathy with French ideals. Certainly there was abundant strength, though not of the noisy and ostentatious kind in the first movement of the symphony; the Funeral March was kept high above the slough of sentimentalism, deeply affecting as it was from beginning to end; the Scherzo grew, out of a gossamer shimmer, into a Shakespearean-like festival of fairy brightness; and the Finale was impeccably clear in the polyphonic parts and impressively developed throughout. In the French music, Mr. Montoux was, naturally, in the most comfortable circumstances; there no one could dispute him or challenge his authority; and there all his refinement, all his love of brilliance and all his skill in tone painting were given happiest exercise.

D'INDY AS PIANIST.

Modestly, with the air of a professor explaining something to a class, did Mr. d'Indy come forward and play the concerto from copy; and respectfully, almost with an air of reverence, did the audience hold itself in readiness to catch the turn of every phrase. What a wonderful performance it was! How illuminating and uplifting! It seemed as if nothing more could be said after it, as if the completeness of music as an art had been revealed. It was immensely instructive, too, in an historical way; for while the violins of various sizes that were used in the accompaniment are the same as the violins that Bach wrote for, the piano as we know it did not exist in his time; and curiously, and owing without doubt to Mr. d'Indy's clear intention to reproduce as nearly as possible the spirit in which the music was composed, it was the piano that sounded ancient and classical and the accompaniment that seemed modern. It was expected that Mr. d'Indy's reading of this would be scholarly, penetrating and informative; and the fulfillment of this expectation was lit with the light of the pianist's individual interpretative genius. The serenity of mood, so characteristic of Bach, was kept inviolate; nothing small, limited or tainted with anxiety could find place where the only conciousness was of bigness, goodness and a secure contentment. When again will we be privileged to hear a great composer, who is also a brilliant pianist, acting as interpreter, and with the bearing of a disciple, to one of the greatest composers, perhaps absolutely the greatest yet known to the world? This alone would have made the concert unique.

"ISTAR" VARIATIONS.

Montreal audiences have not had many opportunities to hear Mr. d'Indy's music; and the performance of the "Istar" reversed variations was therefore all the more welcome. The marvel of this score is that the legend which is the basis of it, the story of the woman who went through seven gates leading to the "land of No-Return," and was stripped of jewels and raiment at each gate till she finally passed in revealed in her utter beauty, has been purged of the grossness that a less highly-atuned mind than Mr. d'Indy's might have rejoiced to find in it. And all the flame and radiance of the music, all the swiftly-changing temper and play of color, all the significance of the theme that is finally stated without adornment or accompaniment of any kind, was faithfully reflected in Mr. Monteux's reproduction of it.—P. K.

MONTREAL-STAR-DEC.13

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

The Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge—Schoenberg's Sextet to New Advantage—Mr. Kochanski, Notable Violinist—Other Pieces and Pleasures

Chiefly because of lack of spaciousness but partly because of peculiarities in construction, Sanders Theatre in Cambridge has obvious shortcomings as a room for orchestral concerts. Heard within its walls the tone of the brass instruments in forte passages becomes at one and the same time over-powerful and insufficiently brilliant, with the result that pieces of a robust character when played there lose much in effectiveness. On the other hand, music of a more intimate nature, particularly when the string-tone predominates, may sound to greater advantage than, for example, in Symphony Hall. Partly, therefore, as deliberate experiment, although the piece itself is deserving of many hearings, Mr. Monteux placed upon the programme of last evening's concert in Cambridge Schönberg's Sextet for Strings, "Verklärte Nacht." When played a few weeks ago in Boston Schönberg's music made, as it must always make, a profound impression. Yet it was possible to feel that the composer had not done altogether wisely in transferring his music from the first setting for six string-voices to a string-band of sixty. As one observer shrewdly expressed it, in making his music thick he made it thinner. In short, if the piece was to be rearranged with a view to obtaining greater sonority, why did Schönberg stop half way, why not a setting for full orchestra rather than a mere inflation of the original? As it sounded last evening, however, much of the intimacy of the orignial version was regained, and with it was the largeness and the increased intensity that the composer had newly sought. Once or twice it was still possible to regret the seeming compromise, to desire in certain of the climaxes a foundation of brass tone, but the effect of the music as a whole was singularly satisfying. Not only the former occasional emptiness but also the occasional faltering and dryness disappeared. From the first measure to the last the piece was engrossing, while the moments of transcendent beauty, of unearthly illumination, were more beautiful, more penetrating than ever before. And what music this is! Not inspiration alone has made it; only a powerful intellectuality and fervent inspiration combined can at such length and in such fashion spin a complex and many-stranded web of tone, that will constantly grip and enthrall the hearer, without for a moment relaxing severity of construction, adherence to the loftiest ideals. What composer, ancient or modern, has in a single movement showed a greater earnestness and concentration, a greater contrapuntal mastery, and yet contrived to sound the note of beauty from beginning to end? Schönberg wrought this marvel at the age of twenty-five. Had he died a year later the world would have mourned the man who might have raised absolute music—and for all the pretentious programme this is absolute music, in result if not in intention—higher and higher. As it is, we have as present culmination of Schönberg's work the Five Orchestral Pieces!

Not only the many strings of the Symphony Orchestra, profited by their environment last evening. Heard in the setting of Sanders Theatre, the single violin of Paul Kochanski proved to be loveliness incarnate.. No doubt the hall played its part; presumably Mr. Kochanski could coax a beautiful tone from any fiddle; but it so happens that the particular instrument upon which he plays is one of the choicest in existence. A "Spanish Stradivarius"—there are six in all, most of them under lock and key—it is a masterpiece of masterpieces, costly in its finish, glorious in tone. But let not the impression be gained that Mr. Kochanski, come last winter to this country after long career in Europe, is merely an able violinist, fortunate in the possession of a miraculous violin. He is, in fact, a virtuoso of rare capacities, poised, sensitive, alert, intelligent, authoritative and resourceful, clearly of the elect. His piece last evening was Bruch's intrinsically superficial "Fantasia upon Scottish Airs," but manv a worthier composition has, in less capable hands, made far less impression. The chief virtue of this music is its persistently songful character, and it is also free from the distressing pyrotechnics that mar so many violin concertos. Seemingly it is in songful music that Mr. Kochanski excels, though this one piece may by no means be taken as a test of his range or ability. He showed, too, abundant vigor when it was required, and this without rasp or scratch. There will be more to say of Mr. Kochanski and of Bruch's Fantasia when he has played it at the concerts of today and Saturday. In the meantime it may confidently be stated that those who will hear him then have unusual pleasure in store.

The rest of the concert was divided between Massenet's early Overture to "Phèdre" and the concert-version of the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera-ballet, "Mlada," both recently heard in Boston. Despite its occasional suggestion of an outdoor band-concert, Massenet's Overture is in many ways an admirable achievement. The themes are salient if not distinguished, the structure is sound, the instrumentati highly effective. Such pieces often ser to keep alive the name of a composer wh most of his other music has sunk into o scurity. Herold survives in the Overtur to "Zampa," Boieldieu is chiefly known to us through that to "La Dame Blanche," and Adolphe Adam through his instrumental preface to "Si j'étais Roi," although all three pieces have been relegated to programmes of a lighter sort. Perhaps some day this Overture to "Phèdre" with a few, a very few incidental numbers and songs, will keep Massenet's memory green when his many operas have vanished from the repertory.

Mr. Rosenfeld has described Rimsky-Korsakov as a maker of musical picture-books, and this he is indeed in this excerpt from "Mlada." With the printed programme for guide and support the music paints scene and action so vividly that there is little need of stage or characters. It is not always distinguished in invention, at times it is a little empty and contrived, yet it is constantly suggestive, and its instrumental dress by turn charms and stimulates the ear. Rimsky-Korsakov, master-magician of the orchestra, here spreads before us some of his already familiar tricks, and not a few that are new and surprising.

W. S. S.

TRANS. JAN. 13.

SYMPHONY GIVES 11TH CONCERT

Ravel's "The Waltz" Played First Time Before Boston Audience

CONCERT WILL BE REPEATED TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Schoenberg, "Radiant Night," sextet for strings arranged for string orchestra; Bruch, Fantasia on Scottish Airs for violin and orchestra; Ravel, "The Waltz" (first time in Boston). The solo violinist was Paul Kochanski, who played here for the first time.

Schoenberg's composition was at the last moment substituted for Handel's Concerto in F major, for strings and two wind instruments. This substitution was enforced on account of the sudden illness of Mr. Wendler, the first horn player. The performance of the concerto was thus necessarily postponed.

In the rearrangement of the program Brahms's Variations were played first in order, and delightfully played; so clearly and with so full an understanding of their structure that fresh beauty was perceived, and what before had seemed dry bones was now clothed in living flesh. Mr. Monteux is singularly happy in reading the music of Brahms. In Paris some conductors put it on their programs because they feel it to be their duty. Mr. Monteux rejoices in the opportunity for a performance because he finds charm as well as strength in the music. He has the ability to reveal these qualities to his audience.

What is to be said of "Radiant Night" that was not said before when it was performed in its original form and in the composer's later version? It was written before Schoenberg made up his mind to be startlingly "original"; before he evolved his elaborate system of cacophony. There are passages in "Radiant Night" that are melodically and harmonically enchanting, sensuous, passionate measures, the very ecstasy of emotion, nor is there any need of Dehmel's erotic poem to strengthen the spell. The absence of this poem in the program-book was not to be regretted. The music itself o'ermastered the hearer. Would that the whole were on the high level of certain sections. Unfortunately, Schoenberg in this work lacked taste and skill in the matter of proportion. The music is too long-drawn-out; while the truly emotional measures are thus the more salient, the many insignificant and dreary passages almost prevent the full enjoyment of those that are inspired. The performance was superb. It may be said in all soberness that in no other orchestra in this country, probably not in Europe, is there a body of strings to be compared with that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Grant that the material is in itself excellent; yet an orchestra is what the conductor makes it, and Mr. Monteux has made this orchestra what it is. Long famous, it was never in a higher estate than it is today.

Ravel's "Waltz"—not "a waltz," but "the waltz," first performed at a Lamoureux concert late in 1920, had been played in San Francisco and in St. Louis before it was produced in Boston. Ravel says that the tempo is "the movement of a Viennese waltz." Mr. Casella, with whom Ravel played a four-handed arrangement for piano in Vienna, says that the work is a triptych: 1. The birth of the waltz, from chaotic measures to form and development; 2, the waltz; 3, the apotheosis of the waltz. Ravel has written a little "argument," a fanciful description of a court ball about 1855. One commentator sees an "ironical" treatment of the dance; another finds "implied anguish" in the "apotheosis," something threatening in the bacchanale; he hears a voice crying: "We dance on a volcano." Well, years ago Marcel saw all things in a minuet; Senac de Meilhan likened life to one and Count Moroni saw in that dance the portrayal of the 18th century. Hearing Ravel's "Waltz," we do not find irony, prophecy or symbolism; we hear certain agreeable measures that remind one of Johann Strauss, the father, who composed the haunting and pathetic "Sophia" waltz; the son, whose waltzes are world famous; for the be ter measures of Ravel's are purel Straussian, but not of the first orde Has Ravel shot his bolt? Is he no only writing in the manner of Ravel in the language of New England, ha he "run emptins"?

Mr. Kochanski has a fine tone and facile mechanism. His performanc was characterized by taste and elegance in phrasing, which, however, could not redeem the "Scottish Fantasia" from its inherent cheapness, its obvious purpose to excite immediate applause. Mr. Kochanski is a serious musician. When he made his first appearance in New York he played the concerto of Brahms; the programs o his recitals there were of a high order. It will be time to discuss the nobler qualities of his art and he plays something worth while.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Szymanowski, Symphony No. (first time in America); Franck, Symphonic piece from "The Redemption" Casella, Excerpts from "The Conven on the Water"; Weber, Overture t "Oberon."

HERALD. JAN. 14 -

KOCHANSKI HAS SOLO ROLE AT SYMPHONY

Russian Violinist Makes Indifferent Impression for Tone and Technique

By FRED J. McISAAC.

Paul Kochanski, a Russian violinist, newly come to these shores, was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

The young man had some harrowing experiences at the hands of the Bolshevists, according to his publicity, being forced to play at free concerts in St. Petersburg, Kiev and elsewhere and being paid in food tickets instead of money. On his attempt to leave Russia he was arrested and sentenced to serve as professor in the Conservatory in that city, presumably for more food tickets.

HE GOT AWAY.

But, somehow, he got away from there and reached London where he played with the London Symphony Orchestra. In New York he appeared with the Symphony Society, and now he is here with us.

He played the Bruch Fantasia on Scottish airs, a good old standby of violinists everywhere. It's an effective violin work, but an affront to every Scotchman because the stolid German chapelmaster, Bruch, distorted the good Scotch tunes to suit himself with sublime disregard for the fact that they would sound all wrong to ears familiar with the melodies.

Despite the affection of the Bolshevists and the ease with which he gets engagements with great symphony orchestras, Kochanski struck me as a very indifferent fiddler, a man whose tone had no special distinction and whose technique was nothing unusual.

NOT A WELL-PLAYED WALTZ.

"La Valse," a choregraphic poem by Ravel, was performed for the first time in Boston. These ballet things lose frightfully when played as concert pieces. Making all allowances for the French composer's technical ingenuity, "La Valse" sounded like a Strauss waltz played by a bad band, all of whose instruments were out of tune and most of whose members couldn't play.

Schonberg's "Radiant Night," a sextet for strings, was the best thing on the program. It is atmospheric music which suggests what the composer wished by his title, and a remarkable piece of instrumentation.

AMER-JAN. 1

NEW VIOLINIST AT SYMPHONY

Paul Kochanski, a young Polish violinist whom the Bolshevists ordered around for several years, giving him food-cards instead of pay-checks, made his Boston debut yesterday at the 11th Symphony matinee.

He chose to play Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Folk-Melodies." It was an international event—a Russian Pole playing near-Scottish music written by a German, being accompanied by a cosmopolitan orchestra led by a Frenchman. Almost everyone was there but the dreaded Bolshevist. Kochanski has a very pleasing tone. He was rapturously applauded.

PAUL KOCHANSKI

The best thing on the program was a Ravel novelty, "The Waltz," a tone picture depicting a court-ball in France during the Second Empire. "We dance," said a Frenchman, "on a volcano." This was the volcano dance, wit [illegible] and rhythms [illegible] echoes of internal troubles. A fascinating work, brilliantly interpreted by Mr. Monteux!

Brahms' "Variations on a Handel Theme" and Schoenberg's superman love music, "Radiant Night," were the other numbers.

ADVTSR-JAN.14

Second Extra Concert by Symphony.

Next Monday evening, January 16, at 8:15, in Symphony Hall, will take place the second concert of the extra series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which have so successfully been started this season. Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the orchestra, has made a program for this concert notable by its beauty and interest. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor, which among all symphonies is of the most widespread and enduring favor, will open the concert.

The soloist of the occasion will be Estelle Liebling, the talented young soprano, the beauty of whose voice is attracting considerable attention in the several cities where she has appeared. The numbers which she is to sing with the orchestra are the aria from Mozart's "Figaro," "Non so piu," and an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel."

Symphony Program.

The music of Karl Szymanowski will be introduced to Boston when Pierre Monteux conducts the Second Symphony of this celebrated Polish composer at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be the first performance in America of this score, although it has been played and highly admired in Europe. The composer is now living in New York.

"Le Couvent sur l'eau," (The Convent on the Water) by Alfredo Casella, the highly talented young Italian composer now in this country, which was performed with such high success at these concerts earlier in the season, is to be repeated. The other numbers are the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's choral work, "The Redemption," and Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon."

AMER.JAN.14.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—For its eleventh program of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the following compositions Friday afternoon: Brahms, Variation on a Theme by Hadyn, op. 56a; Schönberg, "Radiant Night," sextet for strings, op. 4, arranged for string orchestra; Bruch, Fantasia on Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, op. 46, (Paul Kochanski, soloist); Ravel, "La Valse," choregraphic poem, (first time in Boston).

Interest was highest, in this program, in the appearance of Paul Kochanski as soloist in the Bruch fantasia. The violinist proved himself a thorough musician. A player who is first of all a showy technician could scarcely justify his engagement for this rather unsatisfactory composition. Only an expressive artist, one who brought a sensitive temperament and poetic feeling as well as a perfected style to this music, could keep one from forgetting how un-Scottish it all was. Mr. Kochanski has depth of feeling as well as volatility of mood, and the result was solidly satisfactory. He was thrice recalled and the men of the orchestra frankly admired his musicianship.

While the Schönberg "Radiant Night," seemed overlong, it made a decidedly good impression, thanks to the inherent freshness of the treatment of the trite nocturne idea. Happily there was nothing in the composition to make one question the use of the radiant in the title; for though there was much that was veiled in feeling, there was not one baleful note, whereas some who have attempted the nocturne have resorted in spots to claptrap "mystical" effects. One had a feeling of honest art; even in long dissonant passages there was consistency of form, continuity of thought. At the end Mr. Monteux was called back again and again, and bade his men to rise to share the thanks of the audience for their spirited performance of a difficult number well-prepared.

The Brahms variations gave pleasure, as always, when well done, and there was much interest as well as amusement in Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," which has recently been described at length in the music correspondence of this paper from Paris, London and Philadelphia.

MONITOR-JAN.14.

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Ravel's 'Waltz' Heard —Kochanski Violin Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Paul Kochanski, violinist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Mon-Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Kochanski has had an eventful career. A pupil of Cesar Thompson and Emil Mlynarski, he became at the age of 21 a professor at the Warsaw Conservatory of Music. He is now 35 years old. He was teaching at Petrograd from 1915 to 1918.

PAID IN FOOD

Under the revolutionary government he was commanded to give many public concerts, receiving payment in foodstuffs; was arrested at Kiev when he tried to escape from the country, and ordered to serve as professor in the conservatory of that place. He succeeded, however, in reaching Warsaw in December, 1919, played the following year in London, and arived in America last season.

Mr. Kochanski played the Bruch Fantasia on Scottish airs. He played it with a mastery which made the music more interesting, more important and more beautiful than it had sounded before at these concerts. He has at once virtuoso dash and refinement and finish of style.

Certain of His Power

His appearance and the effect of his performance were modest, self-effacing, yet there was the authority of a man equally master of technics and of the musical scheme of the work. In sustained passages the tone had the most exceptional body and warmth, the style being full of feeling but never sentimental. In passages of bravura he was as if recklessly certain of his power, but all his virtuosity was at the service of the musical thought, and was never employed in a meretricious manner.

Mr. Monteux's collaboration with the violinist was really past praise. The solo and orchestral parts became an indivisible whole, and it was often the case that when an orchestral instrument took a melodic melody from the violinist it seemed a line unbroken and continuous, and not an episode chopped into small pieces.

Ravel's New Work

The other items of the programme were Brahms' Variations on a theme of Haydn; the Schonberg "Radiant Night," sextet for strings, arranged for string orchestra and substituted, because of the incapacity of a player, for the Handel concerto previously announced, and a new "Choreographic Poem" by Ravel, "The Waltz."

Ravel's piece was written during the war and completed in 1920. "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter bit by bit. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An imperial court about 1855." Thus a note in the score. The piece began promisingly, with delightful take-offs of Viennese waltz strains. But the ball revealed by the lifting clouds was not of a gratifying nature. It was discordant, perhaps sardonic. Was Ravel's fantasy of the spirit of the waltz embittered by the gruesome contrast of the war? Most of the music is ugly and mannered.

Brahms' Variations

The Brahms variations were very beautifully played, and some of them, such as the Siciliano, remain engrossing. The theme is that of Hadyn's "Choral of St. Anthony."

As for Schonberg's sextet, it is already, after three hearings on the part of the writer—the first in its original form for string sextet, the other two in the form heard yesterday—rather tedious and bourgeois. It is really music for a scene or pantomime, music at once poetic and very definite and articulate in its quality. The performance was again a remarkable one, and the audience applauded with enthusiasm.

POST-JAN.14.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF KOCHANSKI HERE

Violinist Is Cordially Received at Concert

The first appearance in Boston of the noted violinist Kochanski, and the first performance here of Ravel's tone poem, "La Valse," and a repetition by request of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" diversified yesterday's Symphony concert. The violinist was very cordially received, the enthusiastic applause from the first and second violin sections of the orchestra being particularly noteworthy. The audience laughed at the sudden end of "La Valse," but there was enough applause to recall Mr Monteux to the stage twice.

An extraordinarily fine performance of "Verklaerte Nacht" made a profound impression on at least one listener. The orchestra was made to stand in acknowledgement of the warm applause of about one-fourth of those present.

The other number was Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," a piece calculated to make few converts to the variation form among listeners not interested in the technique of composition.

Mr Kochanski chose the Brahms concerto for his American debut in New York last Winter, but he offered Boston Bruch's showy, empty "Fantasy on Scottish Themes" yesterday. The dullness and bad taste of the music made it hard to appreciate to the full the excellence of Mr Kochanski's performance. His tone is sweet, pure, not big nor savoring of molasses. He has a good technical equipment, and apparently a genuine feeling for music not too common among virtuosi. His playing is not dazzling, indeed a few minor technical slips were noted, but one surmised that here was a violinist who would wear well and improve upon further acquaintance.

"La Valse" is an interesting experiment, testing the effect upon the rather simple and fixed form of the Viennese waltz as exemplified in "The Beautiful Blue Danube," of the latest modern improvements in harmony orchestration and rhythmic counterpoint. It confirmed an opinion that Ravel is the successor of the late Saint-Saens in France, prodigiously clever, master of music-making, but without any profound originality of the sort exemplified by Berlioz and Debussy. If he had anything to say, Ravel would stop writing "Tomba of Couperin" and "La Valse" and let his music speak for itself. After all Couperin and Johann Strauss each said their own say better than Ravel or anyone else can now say it for them.

The performance kept the fixed waltz rhythm, but so anxiously that it became monotonous through lack of sufficient dynamic gradations.

Schoenberg's music, unified by constant reappearance of leading motives in various guises, like a scene from a Wagner opera, as it might almost have heen if a vocal obligato had been added, is strangely moving. One wanted to hear again the "Five Orchestral Pieces," ridiculed here in 1914 and now being laughed over in New York, to see if Schoenberg's later work really lacks the tremendous vitality of this early piece.

Next week a new symphony by Szymanovski, a repetition of Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," Franck's Symphonic piece from "The Redemption," and the overture to Weber's "Oberon" are announced.

GLOBE-JAN.14.

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Provides Satisfying Musical Feast

When Beethoven's 3rd Symphony, the "Eroica," was published in 1806 it bore this warning note. "Since the symphony is longer than an ordinary symphony it should be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert . . . If it be performed too late there is the danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain." The ancient rule was heeded last night in the program presented by that marvelous orchestra, the Boston Symphony, whose musical virtues number almost as many as its musicians. Though there is disagreement as to whether the much discussed and baffling "Eroica" with its funeral march followed by a lively Scherzo and a buoyant finale, depicts a particular man, Napoleon, or, as Richard Wagner preferred to believe "full-fledged man" in general on this one point, there is almost unanimity—that it is a masterly portrayal of heroic emotions. The Boston Symphony's impressive performance of this great tone-epic is the most forceful answer conceivable to the dissenting Strairnsky's recent assertion that Beethoven created no music though he had greatness in his soul, which he expressed in notes that said nothing to the ear.

The inspired reading given the "Eroica" was a three-fold revelation, manifesting the excellencies of the composition, orchestra and conductor. The work gripped the attention with its vivid delineations and its masterful harmonies, the stages of the tempering of fiery, youthful emotion by deep suffering into a forceful healthy activity were almost visualized as the sweeping climaxes were evoked, only to give way to milder passages of lyric beauty until the triumphant outcome was reached. The instrument by means of which Mr. Monteux sounded this conflict of feelings is superb from every point of view. There is admirable balance of tone and perfection of ensemble. The tone of the string choir is of surpassing beauty and the quality of the wind sections is [illegible]. Through the surety, precision and pliancy of the great symphonic body Mr. Monteux could produce at will any mood and manner. Salient features of the readings of Mr. Monteux are poetic imagination and ever-vigilant attention to the meticulous adjustment of artistic proportions. Unstinted admiration for the work of Mr. Monteux and his men was expressed by the applause of the capacity audience even to the point of urging that the no-encore rule be broken.

For fine phrasing, for bold rhythmic impulse, for wheedling graces, for an abandon that was never once permitted, with all its fire, to become blurred or chaotic the performance of the spirited beauties of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" can hardly be too much commended. The "Caprice" afforded good opportunity in incidental solo work for brilliant cadenza playing by the concertmaster, the flutist and several other of the musicians. To Tschaikowsky's characterization of the composition as a "colossal masterpiece of instrumentation" might well be added a commendation of the Boston Symphony's rendition of it as a colossal masterpiece of interpretation and execution.

Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" shimmered in loveliness. Its manifold subtleties of grace and charm presented a moment of outstanding lyric beauty. The artistic treatment of the melodic content of these numbers distinguished on the score of delicacy and refinement, enraptured all hearers. Splendid contrasts and color shadings illumined the Wagnerian excerpt, the "Rienzi" overture, and the audience was demonstrative in its appreciation of the brilliant reading given the work as well as of the dynamic resources employed.

The feeling of good cheer, inherent in the holiday season was appreciably intensified by the keen enjoyment of the satisfying musical feast provided through Mr. Dow's management.

BURL GTN, VT. F.P. DEC.14

Bronislaw Huberman, the Polish violinist, who came to this country last October, will be the soloist at the third concert in Providence this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Jan. 24, in Infantry Hall. Huberman came to this country for the first time 24 years ago, as a boy. He toured the country then and is said to have won very favorable criticism because of his unusual ability. He is now in the maturity of middle age.

Born in 1882, near Warsaw, he showed musical proclivities as a child, was early entered in the Warsaw Conservatory, playing the most difficult concertos as the age of seven. In 1892 his father took him to Berlin, where he studied for nine months with the great violin master, Joachim. He appeared in public as a prodigy at the age of 12, attracting particular notice in London, where he appeared jointly with Adelina Patti. In 1896, the venerable Brahms was persuaded to attend a concert at which young Huberman played the violin concerto of that master, and, though sceptical at first, he was much moved and tenderly embraced the boy. Growing into manhood, the remarkable genius of this artist attained new heights season after season. He will play Mendelssohn's ever-popular violin concerto, with the orchestra.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the double concert of Handel in F-minor for strings and two wind orchestras. He is bringing out this score from the original manuscript. The second number will be the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, by Brahms. The theme used by the later master is drawn from the Chorale of Saint Anthony. The closing number will be the Polovtsion Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," one of the most interesting pieces of Russian music for the orchestra.

PROV. JOURNAL-JAN15

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the 12th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will play the second symphony by the Polish composer, Karl Szymanowski, which is much admired in Europe, but has hitherto never been performed in this country. The composer is now living in New York. The symphony is in two parts, and the second consists of a theme with variations in many styles.

Also at this pair of concerts Mr. Monteux will repeat the suite of Alfredo Casella, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" (The Convent on the Water), which, performed at the beginning of this season, met with such high favor and interest. The movements are: (a) Ronde d'Enfants; (b) Baracolle, Sarabande; (c) Pas des Vieilles Dames; (d) Nocturne, Danse Finale. The soprano solo part will be sung, as before, by Mrs. Laura Littlefield.

The other numbers on this program will be the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's choral work, "The Redemption," and Weber's overture to the opera, "Oberon."

2D EXTRA SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be heard in the second of the extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening at 8:15. The principal number will be the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor. The soloist at this concert will be Estelle Liebling, the gifted young soprano. She will sing with the orchestra the aria from Mozart's "Figaro," "Non si piu," and an aria from Saint-Saens' opera, "Etienne Marcel."

The remainder of the program will consist of Svendsen's brilliant piece, "Carnival in Paris," "Prelude to the Afternoon of in Faun" by Claude Debussy, which is one of the most notable achievements of the modern French school of music, and, to close, Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

HERALD-JAN.15.

Symphony Programme

At the 12th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will play the Second Symphony by the Polish composer, Karl Szymanowski, which is much admired in Europe but has hitherto never been performed in this country. The composer is now living in New York. The Symphony is in two parts, and the second consists of a theme with variations in many styles.

Also at this pair of concerts Mr. Monteux will repeat the suite of Alfredo Casella, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water") which, performed at the beginning of this season, met with such high favor and interest. The soprano solo part will be sung, as before, by Mrs. Laura Littlefield.

The other members on this programme will be the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's choral work, "The Redemption," and Weber's Overture to the opera, "Oberon."

Extra Symphony Tomorrow

A splendid programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pierre Monteux, its conductor, in the second of the extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall which have been so successfully inaugurated this season.

This concert will take place tomorrow evening at 8:15. The principal number will be the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor which, more than any other work of this master, has made his name revered throughout the world.

The soloist of this concert will be Estelle Liebling, the young soprano. She will sing with the orchestra the aria from Mozart's "Figaro," "Non so piu," and an aria from Saint-Saens' opera, "Etienne Marcel."

The remainder of the programme will consist of Svendsen's brilliant piece "Carnival in Paris," "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," by Claude Debussy, which is one of the most notable achievements of the modern French school of music, and, to close, Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

POST-JAN.15.

Boston Symphony Gives Extra Concert Monday

The second concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's extra series of five will be given tomorrow night at 8:15 in Symphony Hall. The program begins with Beethoven's most popular masterpiece, the Fifth Symphony. This piece is unified by the rhythmic motto of four notes announced at the very beginning, and traceable in the scherzo and finale as well as throughout the first movement.

There is a story, probably untrue, that Beethoven said of this motive "So Fate knocks at one's door." Another story emphasizes the dramatic power of the sudden transition from scherzo to finale, made without pause. It is said that at the first performance of this music in Paris in the 1820s a veteran of Napoleon's armies jumped up at the first notes of the triumphant finale shouting "The Emperor." The pianissimo bridge passage just before this place is to the present writer the most thrilling thing in all music.

Estelle Liebling, who will sing arias by Mozart and Saint-Saens, made an excellent impression at her Jordan Hall recital last season. She has been widely admired in other cities. The other orchestral numbers contain two pieces only less remarkably fine than the Beethoven, "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Tannhauser" Overture. This is the best symphony concert program offered here this season to date.

Monday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Second concert of the extra series of five. Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; "Carnival at Paris," Svendsen; "Non So Piu," from "Figaro," Mozart; aria from "Etienne Marcel," Saint-Saens; "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner. Soloist, Estelle Liebling, soprano.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 12th program. Second Symphony, Szymanovski (first time in America); Suite from "Le Couvent Sur l'Eau," Casella (repeated by request); Symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Franck; Overture to "Oberon," Weber.

GLOBE-JAN.15.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT TOMORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second of the extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow night. The principal number will be the famous Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. The soloist at this concert will be Estelle Liebling, soprano, who will sing Mozart's "Non so piu" aria and an aria from Saint-Saens' opera, "Etienne Marcel." Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser" will complete the program.

ADVTSR.JAN.15.

[50]

Viennese airs and rhythms and rumbling echoes of internal troubles. A fascinating work, brilliantly interpreted by Mr. Monteux!

Brahms' "Variations on a Handel Theme" and Schoenberg's superman love music, "Radiant Night," were the other numbers.

ADVTSR - JAN. 14

Second Extra Concert by Symphony.

Next Monday evening, January 16, at 8:15, in Symphony Hall, will take place the second concert of the extra series of five by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which have so successfully been started this season. Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the orchestra, has made a program for this concert notable by its beauty and interest. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor, which among all symphonies is of the most widespread and enduring favor, will open the concert.

The soloist of the occasion will be Estelle Liebling, the talented young soprano, the beauty of whose voice is attracting considerable attention in the several cities where she has appeared. The numbers which she is to sing with the orchestra are the aria from Mozart's "Figaro," "Non so piu," and an aria from Saint-Saens' "Etienne Marcel."

Symphony Program.

The music of Karl Szymanowski will be introduced to Boston when Pierre Monteux conducts the Second Symphony of this celebrated Polish composer at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be the first performance in America of this score, although it has been played and highly admired in Europe. The composer is now living in New York.

"Le Couvent sur l'eau," (The Convent on the Water) by Alfredo Casella, the highly talented young Italian composer now in this country, which was performed with such high success at these concerts earlier in the season, is to be repeated. The other numbers are the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's choral work, "The Redemption," and Weber's overture to the opera "Oberon."

AMER. JAN. 14.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—For its eleventh program of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the following compositions Friday afternoon: Brahms, Variation on a Theme by Hadyn, op. 56a; Schönberg, "Radiant Night," sextet for strings, op. 4, arranged for string orchestra; Bruch, Fantasia on Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, op. 46, (Paul Kochanski, soloist); Ravel, "La Valse," choregraphic poem, (first time in Boston).

Interest was highest, in this program, in the appearance of Paul Kochanski as soloist in the Bruch fantasia. The violinist proved himself a thorough musician. A player who is first of all a showy technician could scarcely justify his engagement for this rather unsatisfactory composition. Only an expressive artist, one who brought a sensitive temperament and poetic feeling as well as a perfected style to this music, could keep one from forgetting how un-Scottish it all was. Mr. Kochanski has depth of feeling as well as volatility of mood, and the result was solidly satisfactory. He was thrice recalled and the men of the orchestra frankly admired his musicianship.

While the Schönberg "Radiant Night," seemed overlong, it made a decidedly good impression, thanks to the inherent freshness of the treatment of the trite nocturne idea. Happily there was nothing in the composition to make one question the use of the radiant in the title; for though there was much that was veiled in feeling, there was not one baleful note, whereas some who have attempted the nocturne have resorted in spots to claptrap "mystical" effects. One had a feeling of honest art; even in long dissonant passages there was consistency of form, continuity of thought. At the end Mr. Monteux was called back again and again, and bade his men to rise to share the thanks of the audience for their spirited performance of a difficult number well-prepared.

The Brahms variations gave pleasure, as always, when well done, and there was much interest as well as amusement in Ravel's choregraphic poem, "La Valse," which has recently been described at length in the music correspondence of this paper from Paris, London and Philadelphia.

MONITOR JAN 14.

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Ravel's 'Waltz' Heard —Kochanski Violin Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Paul Kochanski, violinist, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Mon-Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Kochanski has had an eventful career. A pupil of Cesar Thompson and Emil Mlynarski, he became at the age of 21 a professor at the Warsaw Conservatory of Music. He is now 35 years old. He was teaching at Petrograd from 1915 to 1918.

PAID IN FOOD

Under the revolutionary government he was commanded to give many public concerts, receiving payment in foodstuffs; was arrested at Kiev when he tried to escape from the country, and ordered to serve as professor in the conservatory of that place. He succeeded, however, in reaching Warsaw in December, 1919, played the following year in London, and arived in America last season.

Mr. Kochanski played the Bruch Fantasia on Scottish airs. He played it with a mastery which made the music more interesting, more important and more beautiful than it had sounded before at these concerts. He has at once virtuoso dash and refinement and finish of style.

Certain of His Power

His appearance and the effect of his performance were modest, self-effacing, yet there was the authority of a man equally master of technics and of the musical scheme of the work. In sustained passages the tone had the most exceptional body and warmth, the style being full of feeling but never sentimental. In passages of bravura he was as if recklessly certain of his power, but all his virtuosity was at the service of the musical thought, and was never employed in a meretricious manner.

Mr. Monteux's collaboration with the violinist was really past praise. The solo and orchestral parts became an indivisible whole, and it was often the case that when an orchestral instrument took a melodic melody from the violinist it seemed a line unbroken and continuous, and not an episode chopped into small pieces.

Ravel's New Work

The other items of the programme were Brahms' Variations on a theme of Haydn; the Schonberg "Radiant Night," sextet for strings, arranged for string orchestra and substituted, because of the incapacity of a player, for the Handel concerto previously announced, and a new "Choreographic Poem" by Ravel, "The Waltz."

Ravel's piece was written during the war and completed in 1920. "Whirling clouds give glimpses, through rifts, of couples waltzing. The clouds scatter bit by bit. One sees an immense hall peopled with a twirling crowd. The scene is gradually illuminated. The light of the chandeliers bursts forth fortissimo. An imperial court about 1855." Thus a note in the score. The piece began promisingly, with delightful takeoffs of Viennese waltz strains. But the ball revealed by the lifting clouds was not of a gratifying nature. It was discordant, perhaps sardonic. Was Ravel's fantasy of the spirit of the waltz embittered by the gruesome contrast of the war? Most of the music is ugly and mannered.

Brahms' Variations

The Brahms variations were very beautifully played, and some of them, such as the Siciliano, remain engrossing. The theme is that of Hadyn's "Choral of St. Anthony."

As for Schonberg's sextet, it is already, after three hearings on the part of the writer—the first in its original form for string sextet, the other two in the form heard yesterday—rather tedious and bourgeois. It is really music for a scene or pantomime, music at once poetic and very definite and articulate in its quality. The performance was again a remarkable one, and the audience applauded with enthusiasm.

POST - JAN. 14.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF KOCHANSKI HERE

Violinist Is Cordially Received at Concert

The first appearance in Boston of the noted violinist Kochanski, and the first performance here of Ravel's tone poem, "La Valse," and a repetition by request of Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht" diversified yesterday's Symphony concert. The violinist was very cordially received, the enthusiastic applause from the first and second violin sections of the orchestra being particularly noteworthy. The audience laughed at the sudden end of "La Valse," but there was enough applause to recall Mr Monteux to the stage twice.

An extraordinarily fine performance of "Verklaerte Nacht" made a profound impression on at least one listener. The orchestra was made to stand in acknowledgement of the warm applause of about one-fourth of those present.

The other number was Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," a piece calculated to make few converts to the variation form among listeners not interested in the technique of composition.

Mr Kochanski chose the Brahms concerto for his American debut in New York last Winter, but he offered Boston Bruch's showy, empty "Fantasy on Scottish Themes" yesterday. The dullness and bad taste of the music made it hard to appreciate to the full the excellence of Mr Kochanski's performance. His tone is sweet, pure, not big nor savoring of molasses. He has a good technical equipment, and apparently a genuine feeling for music not too common among virtuosi. His playing is not dazzling, indeed a few minor technical slips were noted, but one surmised that here was a violinist who would wear well, and improve upon further acquaintance.

"La Valse" is an interesting experiment, testing the effect upon the rather simple and fixed form of the Viennese waltz as exemplified in "The Beautiful Blue Danube," of the latest modern improvements in harmony orchestration and rhythmic counterpoint. It confirmed an opinion that Ravel is the successor of the late Saint-Saens in France, prodigiously clever, master of music-making, but without any profound originality of the sort exemplified by Berlioz and Debussy. If he had anything to say, Ravel would stop writing "Tombs of Couperin" and "La Valse" and let his music speak for itself. After all Couperin and Johann Strauss each said their own say better than Ravel or anyone else can now say it for them.

The performance kept the fixed waltz rhythm, but so anxiously that it became monotonous through lack of sufficient dynamic gradations.

Schoenberg's music, unified by constant reappearance of leading motives in various guises, like a scene from a Wagner opera, as it might almost have been if a vocal obligato had been added, is strangely moving. One wanted to hear again the "Five Orchestral Pieces," ridiculed here in 1914 and now being laughed over in New York, to see if Schoenberg's later work really lacks the tremendous vitalitty of this early piece.

Next week a new symphony by Szymanovski, a repetition of Casella's "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," Franck's Symphonic piece from "The Redemption," and the overture to Weber's "Oberon" are announced.

GLOBE - JAN. 14.

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Provides Satisfying Musical Feast

When Beethoven's 3rd Symphony, the "Eroica," was published in 1806 it bore this warning note. "Since the symphony is longer than an ordinary symphony it should be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert . . . If it be performed too late there is the danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain." The ancient rule was heeded last night in the program presented by that marvelous orchestra, the Boston Symphony, whose musical virtues number almost as many as its musicians. Though there is disagreement as to whether the much discussed and baffling "Eroica" with its funeral march followed by a lively Scherzo and a buoyant finale, depicts a particular man, Napoleon, or, as Richard Wagner preferred to believe "full-fledged man" in general on this one point, there is almost unanimity—that it is a masterly portrayal of heroic emotions. The Boston Symphony's impressive performance of this great tone-epic is the most forceful answer conceivable to the dissenting Strairnsky's recent assertion that Beethoven created no music though he had greatness in his soul, which he expressed in notes that said nothing to the ear.

The inspired reading given the "Eroica" was a three-fold revelation, manifesting the excellencies of the composition, orchestra and conductor. The work gripped the attention with its vivid delineations and its masterful harmonies, the stages of the tempering of fiery, youthful emotion by deep suffering into a forceful healthy activity were almost visualized as the sweeping climaxes were evoked, only to give way to milder passages of lyric beauty until the triumphant outcome was reached. The instrument by means of which Mr. Monteux sounded this conflict of feelings is superb from every point of view. There is admirable balance of tone and perfection of ensemble. The tone of the string choir is of surpassing beauty and the quality of the wind sections is unusually fine. Through the surety, precision and pliancy of the great symphonic body Mr. Monteux could produce at will any mood and manner. Salient features of the readings of Mr. Monteux are poetic imagination and ever-vigilant attention to the meticulous adjustment of artistic proportions. Unstinted admiration for the work of Mr. Monteux and his men was expressed by the applause of the capacity audience even to the point of urging that the no-encore rule be broken.

For fine phrasing, for bold rhythmic impulse, for wheedling graces, for an abandon that was never once permitted, with all its fire, to become blurred or chaotic the performance of the spirited beauties of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes" can hardly be too much commended. The "Caprice" afforded good opportunity in incidental solo work for brilliant cadenza playing by the concertmaster, the flutist and several other of the musicians. To Tschaikowsky's characterization of the composition as a "colossal masterpiece of instrumentation" might well be added a commendation of the Boston Symphony's rendition of it as a colossal masterpiece of interpretation and execution.

Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" shimmered in loveliness. Its manifold subtleties of grace and charm presented a moment of outstanding lyric beauty. The artistic treatment of the melodic content of these numbers distinguished on the score of delicacy and refinement, enraptured all hearers. Splendid contrasts and color shadings illumined the Wagnerian excerpt, the "Rienzi" overture, and the audience was demonstrative in its appreciation of the brilliant reading given the work as well as of the dynamic resources employed.

The feeling of good cheer, inherent in the holiday season was appreciably intensified by the keen enjoyment of the satisfying musical feast provided through Mr. Dow's management.

BURLGTN, VT. F.P. DEC. 14

Bronislaw Huberman, the Polish violinist, who came to this country last October, will be the soloist at the third concert in Providence this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Jan. 24, in Infantry Hall. Huberman came to this country for the first time 24 years ago, as a boy. He toured the country then and is said to have won very favorable criticism because of his unusual ability. He is now in the maturity of middle age.

Born in 1882, near Warsaw, he showed musical proclivities as a child, was early entered in the Warsaw Conservatory, playing the most difficult concertos as the age of seven. In 1892 his father took him to Berlin, where he studied for nine months with the great violin master, Joachim. He appeared in public as a prodigy at the age of 12, attracting particular notice in London, where he appeared jointly with Adelina Patti. In 1896, the venerable Brahms was persuaded to attend a concert at which young Huberman played the violin concerto of that master, and, though sceptical at first, he was much moved and tenderly embraced the boy. Growing into manhood, the remarkable genius of this artist attained new heights season after season. He will play Mendelssohn's ever-popular violin concerto, with the orchestra.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the double concert of Handel in F-minor for strings and two wind orchestras. He is bringing out this score from the original manuscript. The second number will be the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, by Brahms. The theme used by the later master is drawn from the Chorale of Saint Anthony. The closing number will be the Polovtsion Dances from Borodini's opera, "Prince Igor," one of the most interesting pieces of Russian music for the orchestra.

PROV. JOURNEL - JAN 8

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the 12th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will play the second symphony by the Polish composer, Karl Szymanowski, which is much admired in Europe, but has hitherto never been performed in this country. The composer is now living in New York. The symphony is in two parts, and the second consists of a theme with variations in many styles.

Also at this pair of concerts Mr. Monteux will repeat the suite of Alfredo Casella, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" (The Convent on the Water), which, performed at the beginning of this season, met with such high favor and interest. The movements are: (a) Ronde d'Enfants; (b) Baracolle, Sarabande; (c) Pas des Vieilles Dames; (d) Nocturne, Danse Finale. The soprano solo part will be sung, as before, by Mrs. Laura Littlefield.

The other numbers on this program will be the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's choral work, "The Redemption," and Weber's overture to the opera, "Oberon."

2D EXTRA SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be heard in the second of the extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening at 8:15. The principal number will be the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor. The soloist at this concert will be Estelle Liebling, the gifted young soprano. She will sing with the orchestra the aria from Mozart's "Figaro," "Non si piu," and an aria from Saint-Saens' opera, "Etienne Marcel."

The remainder of the program will consist of Svendsen's brilliant piece, "Carnival in Paris," "Prelude to the Afternoon of in Faun" by Claude Debussy, which is one of the most notable achievements of the modern French school of music, and, to close, Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

HERALD - JAN. 15.

Symphony Programme

At the 12th regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will play the Second Symphony by the Polish composer, Karl Szymanowski, which is much admired in Europe but has hitherto never been performed in this country. The composer is now living in New York. The Symphony is in two parts, and the second consists of a theme with variations in many styles.

Also at this pair of concerts Mr. Monteux will repeat the suite of Alfredo Casella, "Le Couvent sur l'eau" ("The Convent on the Water") which, performed at the beginning of this season, met with such high favor and interest. The soprano solo part will be sung, as before, by Mrs. Laura Littlefield.

The other members on this programme will be the symphonic interlude from Cesar Franck's choral work, "The Redemption," and Weber's Overture to the opera, "Oberon."

Extra Symphony Tomorrow

A splendid programme will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pierre Monteux, its conductor, in the second of the extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall which have been so successfully inaugurated this season.

This concert will take place tomorrow evening at 8:15. The principal number will be the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor which, more than any other work of this master, has made his name revered throughout the world.

The soloist of this concert will be Estelle Liebling, the young soprano. She will sing with the orchestra the aria from Mozart's "Figaro," "Non so piu," and an aria from Saint-Saens' opera, "Etienne Marcel."

The remainder of the programme will consist of Svendsen's brilliant piece "Carnival in Paris," "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," by Claude Debussy, which is one of the most notable achievements of the modern French school of music, and, to close, Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser."

POST - JAN. 15.

Boston Symphony Gives Extra Concert Monday

The second concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's extra series of five will be given tomorrow night at 8:15 in Symphony Hall. The program begins with Beethoven's most popular masterpiece, the Fifth Symphony. This piece is unified by the rhythmic motto of four notes announced at the very beginning, and traceable in the scherzo and finale as well as throughout the first movement.

There is a story, probably untrue, that Beethoven said of this motive "So Fate knocks at one's door." Another story emphasizes the dramatic power of the sudden transition from scherzo to finale, made without pause. It is said that at the first performance of this music in Paris in the 1820s a veteran of Napoleon's armies jumped up at the first notes of the triumphant finale shouting "The Emperor." The pianissimo bridge passage just before this place is to the present writer the most thrilling thing in all music.

Estelle Liebling, who will sing arias by Mozart and Saint-Saens, made an excellent impression at her Jordan Hall recital last season. She has been widely admired in other cities. The other orchestral numbers contain two pieces only less remarkably fine than the Beethoven, "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Tannhauser" Overture. This is the best symphony concert program offered here this season to date.

Monday at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Second concert of the extra series of five. Symphony in C minor, No. 5, Beethoven; "Carnival at Paris," Svendsen; "Non So Piu," from "Figaro," Mozart; aria from "Etienne Marcel," Saint-Saens; "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner. Soloist, Estelle Liebling, soprano.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 12th program. Second Symphony, Szymanovski (first time in America); Suite from "Le Couvent Sur l'Eau," Casella (repeated by request); Symphonic piece from "The Redemption," Franck; Overture to "Oberon," Weber.

GLOBE - JAN. 15

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERT TOMORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second of the extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow night. The principal number will be the famous Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. The soloist at this concert will be Estelle Liebling, soprano, who will sing Mozart's "Non so piu" aria and an aria from Saint-Saens' opera, "Etienne Marcel." Svendsen's "Carnival in Paris," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser" will complete the program.

ADVTSR. JAN. 15.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Temple Audience

Music Ebbs and Flows with Varying Volume, but With Undiminished Charm for Large Number of People—Concert Started at Top Notch, and Is Not Let Down

A veritable sea of music ebbed and flowed with varying volume, but with undiminished charm for a vast number of people assembled in Kalurah Temple last night to listen to the program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux.

It was one of the few occasions when the tone of a program played or sung by the artists who come here, is set at the top notch, and is not let down the slightest degree.

If there were those who wanted to hear something of a lighter nature, they should accept the omission gracefully, for there have been times when those who respond to the highest form of musical composition when correctly interpreted, have had to be satisfied with a program prepared entirely for those whose musical tastes do not reach beyond the sentimental song.

A symphony orchestra which does not play symphonies is misnamed, and a symphony is not a simple little song. When a great organization such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Binghamton, it is not giving its audience its best unless it plays symphonic music.

So an obligation was conscientiously fulfilled in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night.

More Than 100 Musicians

More than 100 musicians, answering the suggestions of a brilliant, but unassuming conductor's baton, gave a performance which has seldom if ever been equalled in Binghamton. Many violinists, swinging their arms in such perfect unison that their hands, holding the bows, seemed like projections of a great machine rhythmically raised and lowered by some propelling force, gave to the sum total of the program innumerable rare combinations.

The mechanical processes, the listener felt, were wholly superficial, a matter of outward motion to draw from the instrumental ensemble such expressions of fear and hope, of desire and aspiration, such confessions and accusations as to make the audience acutely conscious of the depth and breath of music's soul.

The Beethoven symphony "Eroica," through the first three movements offered scope for a considerable divergence of opinion. Those who did not care for the opening "Allegro" by some of Beethoven's biographers, said to describe a sea fight, had an opportunity to enjoy the plaintive melody of the funeral march which followed, and those who preferred music with more thrills in it, might find that which appealed to them in the third movement, the "Scherzo," or they might tolerate the first three movements and in the "Finale" which appeared to combine something of the qualities of all the others, realize complete satisfaction.

But it was romance that the audience wanted more than anything else. That was proved when the orchestra had played the Rimsky-Korsakoff on Spanish themes.

Romance Charmingly Suggested

In "Alborada," the opening theme, treated in such a manner that a soprano chorus seemed to overspread the subdued but deep ensemble of the supporting basses, romance was charmingly suggested. Romance continued to make its appeal through the variations, and was brought out into sharp relief in the "Scene and Gypsy Song." The tinkle of cymbals, the projection of brasses from the rich bass volume, the wild and witching melody were elements of a number that was highly picturesque. Not less enjoyable, apparently, did the audience find the Fandango with which this group was closed.

Applause, which brought the conductor back to bow repeatedly continued until the orchestra played its one encore of the evening.

Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" was also highly pleasing, and a Schubert group, "Ballet No. 1," "Entr'acte No. 11," and "Ballet No. 2" proved an enjoyable preparation for the concluding number, Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

Conductor Monteux made a very favorable impression with his quiet but effective leadership.

P. Joseph Congdon accomplished a very important deed, musically speaking, when he brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Binghamton.

BINGHMTN. NY. SUN-DEC. 16-

SYMPHONY IN EXTRA CONCERT

Beethoven's Fifth Opens and Wagner Closes the List

BY OLIN DOWNES

The second of the six concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in addition to its regular subscription series took place last night in Symphony Hall.

BEETHOVEN'S FIFTH

The programme consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Svendsen's overture, "The Carnival in Paris"; an aria from Saint-Saens "Etienne Marcel" and Cherubino's "Non si piu" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," sung by Miss Estelle Liebling; Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun" and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

The performance of Beethoven's symphony was very brilliant, expressive in detail, dramatic in spirit. The last drop of color was extracted from the score, and Mr. Monteux, while making no unnecessary attempt to pour old wine into new bottles, found means to give fresh coloring to certain passages, and to preserve with his musical enthusiasm the conviction of the music. There was at times a tendency to over-particularity of detail, but the performance as a whole was engrossing, the sincerity of the conductor was felt by both players and audience. The music again stirred each hearer by its emotional power, its nobility, its humanity.

Miss Liebling has a voice rich in color and capable of exceptional effect in the concert hall. The Saint-Saens aria is more suitable to her, or was last night, than the music of Mozart. Saint-Saens lies well for the voice. It displays effectively the singer's entire range, and the color in the lower and middle range is unusual and characteristic. But Mozart's music demands a finer technic and style.

Two compositions which would in themselves have made the concert worth a journey were the symphony already referred to and Debussy's miraculous fantasy. This work has the same mysterious and inexplicable quality as certain effects of nature, not to be analyzed, not to be explained, and just as convincing, just as incredible, the millionth time they occur. Much could be said of the individual excellence of many solo players in the orchestra, as of Mr. Monteux's comprehension of the music. Again, as at the first concert of this series, there was a packed house. Again there was enthusiasm that found expression at every possible opportunity.

POST-JAN. 17.

SUPERB CONCERT GIVEN AT BAILEY HALL LAST NIGHT

Auditorium Filled to Capacity to Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra.

VARIED PROGRAM GIVEN

Examples of Different Schools of Music Included—Pierre Monteux Conducting.

The undoubted claim of the Boston Symphony to be placed in the front rank of modern orchestras was amply substantiated in the playing of the organization at Bailey Hall last evening before a throng of students, faculty members and townspeople, which filled the spacious auditorium to capacity. Under the leadership of Pierre Monteux the Boston Symphony orchestra has retained the mastery of technique which has characterized the playing of the organization during the 40 years of its existence, and has gained a recognized subtlety and delicacy of rendition.

The program which Mr. Monteux arranged for last evening's concert was representative of four great schools of music, a variety of style which is seldom incorporated into one program.

All Schools Represented.

The opening number was Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," a perfect example of the classic school of music, considered by many to be the greatest of Beethoven's works.

The Nationalistic school was represented by the "Carnival in Paris," one of the compositions of Svendson, a modern Norwegian musician. Two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," by the contemporary composer, Debussy, represented the Impressionistic form, now developed in its highest form by the French school of music.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a narrative composition by Richard Strauss, one of the greatest living composers, completed the program. The modern German school is sponsoring the program form of music, of which the composition given last evening is a good example.

CORNELL-DAILY SUN. DEC. 17.

RARE MUSICAL TREAT OFFERED AT BAILEY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Sets New High Mark in Cornell Concert Series — Beethoven Number Feature of Interesting Program.

The opportunity to hear a master orchestra in Ithaca is all too rare, and a local concert by the Boston Symphony even rarer, so that for devotees of orchestra music last evening's was a gala occasion. There is, after all, nothing quite so exciting in a musical way as a master organization of this kind—an hundred instruments blending so perfectly as to form a single voice, or the ensemble breaking up into a score of individual voices each with its part and its own characteristics like a human being. Needless to state the concert was a delight from beginning to end, and the conducting of Pierre Monteux a marvel of controlled vitality.

The program, too, was an unusual one—at least for Ithaca which is so often given the "Hungarian Rhapsody," an overture from one of Wagner's operas and other equally popular numbers. The first half of last evening's program was Beethoven's "Symphony Eroica" with which were contrasted the more modern compositions of the latter half—Svendsen, Debussy, and Strauss.

The symphony was undoubtedly, as was intended, the piece-de-resistance of the evening. Aside from the beauty of the scoring, the composition is interesting because of its dedication to Napoleon, and the story of Beethoven's disgust when, subsequently, he learned that Bonaparte had had himself declared emperor. The third division, including the scherzo, allegro vivace, and trio; and the finale especially indicated the musicanship of the conductor and his organization.

A short intermission formed the only bridge between the old master and the modern descriptive composer—between Beethoven and Svendsen whose "Carnival in Paris" was the second number on the program. The carnival is an interesting composition and there are pasages of unquestionable melody, but it was not the most pleasing number of the evening.

Debussy's Nocturnes.

Two of Debussy's nocturnes followed—"Nuages" and "Fetes." The first of these is a weird, pagan bit with the hand of the great modern evident all through the scoring. It is full of harsh passages and unexpected harmonies, but is unquestionably fascinating. The second is a very spirited composition for a nocturne, and is especially notable for a harp and drum passage which is as effective as it is wild. To whom but a Debussy would have occurred the combination of a trio of kettledrums and two harps.

On encountering this type of descriptive music one is always tempted to wonder whether the composition would furnish a picture of "Agony-tinted clouds" if the program did not specifically admonish the audience to visualize, or rather to hear, such a picture. But quite aside from any emotional appeal the second at least of the nocturnes is intriguing to a degree, though it tends more to pique the hearer's curiosity and awaken his reasoning powers than to lull him to sleep, according to the accepted fashion of the nocturne.

The final number—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" followed the lead of the preceding selections as a distinctly descriptive bit of modernism. It is unquestionably humorous and manages to play more than one trick on the audience. It is also interesting in connection with Mr. Strauss' presence in this country and the prevalent revival of Strauss music everywhere.

No encores were given last evening owing to the length and exacting nature of the program, but Mr. Monteux was repeatedly recalled by the enthusiasm of the audience which filled the hall to its capacity and was not at all desirous of leaving at the end of the final number.

ITHICA-JOURNAL DEC. 17.

CLASSICS PLEASE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Beethoven, Debussy and Wagner Delight Crowded House

Mr Monteux chose three of the best liked numbers in the orchestral repertory for the program of the second extra Boston Symphony concert last night. The presence of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser" on a single program probably accounted for the capacity audience, which contrasted pleasingly with the couple of hundred vacant seats at the first extra concert last November.

For good measure Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" and arias by Saint-Saens and Mozart, sung by Estelle Liebling were added to the miscellany, but many in the audience would have been quite content without them. Svendsen's music sounded peculiarly empty and trivial by comparison with Beethoven's and Wagner's. The aria from Saint-Saens' forgotten opera, "Etienne Marcel," scarcely deserved resurrection, except to display the pleasing quality of Miss Liebling's soft high notes. It lacks individuality and distinction.

Mozart's beautiful "Non so piu," from "Figaro," is apparently alien to Miss Liebling's musical imagination. It certainly lies above the more effective portion of her vocal range. She can prolong high notes beautifully, but she cannot produce a clear, full tone on high eighth or 16th notes. She was obviously hampered by the nervousness that besets new singers at Boston Symphony concerts, however.

Mr Monteux gave an individual and careful reading of the Fifth Symphony, with which one was at points disposed to quarrel because some of Beethoven's intentions with regard to tempi and dynamics were not carried out. The finale was given with more delicacy and more zest than usual. The audience caused the orchestra to stand and share the applause by recalling Mr Monteux the customary three times.

The introduction to the "Tannhauser" overture was not played "maestoso," as marked in the score. The pomp and circumstance were reserved for the conclusion of the piece, where the "Pilgrim's Chorus" reenters. The Venusberg music in the middle section was given with unusual spirit. The Debussy was well played and received with marked enthusiasm.

These concerts are fulfilling their purpose when they offer the general public, to whom hearing a symphony orchestra is an occasional pastime, rather than a weekly ritual, the finest music in the orchestral repertory. Whatever dissent a critical listener might feel from some of Mr Monteux' not especially profound or noble interpretations of Beethoven and Wagner, there can be no doubt that last night's performance was to those who never heard the chosen pieces before a revelation of new beauty, which did not fall upon deaf ears.

The third concert of the extra series of five will be given Feb 13, with Alfred Mirovitch, pianist, as the soloist.

GLOBE-JAN. 17-

From JAN 4 1922 X
Evening Globe
New York

The novelty of the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will be three dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos," or, "The Three-Cornered Hat," by Manuel de Falla. This ballet was performed for the first time on any stage by the Russian Ballet at the Alhambra, London, on July 23, 1919. The composer, born in Cadiz in 1877, is active in Europe both as a composer and a pianist. Before he was fourteen the Madrid Academy of Music awarded him the first prize for pianoforte playing. His first opera, "La Vida Breve," won a prize in 1905 in Madrid and later met with some success at Nice. A later opera, "El Amor Brujo," ~~failed~~ upon its production in Madrid in 1915. Various songs of his have been sung in this country by Mme Eva Gauthier.

Other numbers on the programme are Handel's concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras; Brahms's variations on a theme, by Handel; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," from the third act of the opera-ballet, "Mlada," and the overture to Massenet's "Phedre."

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Monteux Gives Dances of "Three-Cornered Hat" for First Time Here.

The Boston Symphony's 100 men marked vividly their third Winter visit to Carnegie Hall last evening with a gorgeously gay "first time in New York" of Manuel de Falla's dances of "The Three Cornered Hat," with which Diaghileff's ballet had made a great noise in London last Summer, and of which the young Cadiz composer can hardly have heard so stirring a performance by his "seventeen players" two years since in Spain. In its action there had appeared oversea Mme. Karsavina, Messrs. Massine and Idzikowsky, the last two remembered here.

Taken as music alone, de Falla's gossippy episode of "The Neighbors" was much liked by last night's critical house; his "Miller's Dance," that the Spaniards found most striking in Moorish flavor, was less recognizable to Western ears, but the "Final Dance," a whirlwind of popular Spanish rhythms in all the aggrandized modernism of instrumental apparatus, fairly outdanced Chabrier's "España" as an orchestral setting of folk melodies of the peninsula. The novelty ended in many recalls, shared by Monteux and his men.

Mr. Monteux preceded the Spanish brevities with Rimsky-Korsakoff's longer "Night on the Triple Mountain," a third act from the ballet of "Mlada," much of which had been used by the Diaghileff troupe in a "Cleopatra" scene on their earlier American tour, while this music had been played here by Altschuler as early as Nov. 19, 1904. The glowing nocturne of Baltic Slav romance, a ghostly dream of poisoned Princess, revelling spirits, and awakening at dawn on the mountain amid the singing of birds, also was greatly applauded.

Beginning the evening were Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind choirs, and Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn's, both conducted with elegance and suavity, and as smoothly played as they were enthusiastically received. The lovely Brahms variations were most appreciated, perhaps, as hown by the rapt silence of the house during successive numbers.

TIMES-JAN 6

At the evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra M. Monteu presented as a novelty three danc from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "E Sombrero de Tres Picos" (The Thre Cornered Hat). These were "Th Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller" an Final Dance. In all three gorgeou coloring and intoxicating rhythms pr dominated, while the music of th final number suggested glorified memories of "The Land of Joy." There much pseudo-Spanish music to b heard, but few composers have so vividly caught and presented the genuin spirit of Spain. May the dances b heard soon again and often.

Another colorful number was "Nigh on Mount Triglaff," the third act o Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada" in concer form, rich in thematic treatment an brilliantly orchestrated, which arouse pleasant memories of the "Spanis Caprice," "L'Oiseau de Feu" and "Co d'Or."

As a well chosen balance for the Spanish and Russian music of sensuous enchantment, M. Monteux and his men played Handel's concerto for string and two wind orchestra in F major, and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme," by Haydn, Op. 56a. Both the orchestra and its conductor were in the vein and the performance of the whole program was of a high order of merit.

TRIBUNE-JAN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAKES THIRD VISIT

Pierre Monteux Offers Program Embracing Handel, Brahms, Rimsky-Korsakov and De Falla Works.

ALFRED BOSWELL PLAYS

American Pianist Gives Recital at Town Hall—Jascha Heifetz Appears as Soloist.

For the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third visit to New York this year Mr. Monteux offered a program of much variety and interest last night at Carnegie Hall, going all the way from the classic Handel to the modern Spanish composer, de Falla.

The evening began with a rendition of Handel's Concerto for String and two Wind orchestras in F Major. This was an opportunity to judge the verity of those who claim the Boston organization to have the finest string section of any orchestra. After hearing the unusual beauty and unity of tone exhibited by the New Englanders last night, and the delicate and conservative reading by Mr. Monteux, one may be well disposed to agree heartily with that assertion.

Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn carried on the classic atmosphere, but a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's ballet, "Mlada," called "Night on Mount Triglaff," brushed the hearer very decisively into the modern era. It is a delightful piece of writing, and last night's audience seemed to gain much pleasure therefrom.

Three dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," by de Falla, also found favor with the audience, the number being marked by characteristic Spanish rhythms and tunes. Massenet's "Phedre" overture ended the concert.

TELEGRAM-JAN

[51]

Boston Symphony Orchestra Delights Temple Audience

Music Ebbs and Flows with Varying Volume, but With Undiminished Charm for Large Number of People—Concert Started at Top Notch, and Is Not Let Down

A veritable sea of music ebbed and flowed with varying volume, but with undiminished charm for a vast number of people assembled in Kalurah Temple last night to listen to the program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux.

It was one of the few occasions when the tone of a program played or sung by the artists who come here, is set at the top notch, and is not let down the slightest degree.

If there were those who wanted to hear something of a lighter nature, they should accept the omission gracefully, for there have been times when those who respond to the highest form of musical composition when correctly interpreted, have had to be satisfied with a program prepared entirely for those whose musical tastes do not reach beyond the sentimental song.

A symphony orchestra which does not play symphonies is misnamed, and a symphony is not a simple little song. When a great organization such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to Binghamton, it is not giving its audience its best unless it plays symphonic music.

So an obligation was conscientiously fulfilled in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night.

More Than 100 Musicians

More than 100 musicians, answering the suggestions of a brilliant, but unassuming conductor's baton, gave a performance which has seldom if ever been equalled in Binghamton. Many violinists, swinging their arms in such perfect unison that their hands, holding the bows, seemed like projections of a great machine rhythmically raised and lowered by some propelling force, gave to the sum total of the program innumerable rare combinations.

The mechanical processes, the listener felt, were wholly superficial, a matter of outward motion to draw from the instrumental ensemble such expressions of fear and hope, of desire and aspiration, such confessions and accusations as to make the audience acutely conscious of the depth and breath of music's soul.

The Beethoven symphony "Eroica," through the first three movements offered scope for a considerable divergence of opinion. Those who did not care for the opening "Allegro" by some of Beethoven's biographers, said to describe a sea fight, had an opportunity to enjoy the plaintive melody of the funeral march which followed, and those who preferred music with more thrills in it, might find that which appealed to them in the third movement, the "Scherzo," or they might tolerate the first three movements and in the "Finale" which appeared to combine something of the qualities of all the others, realize complete satisfaction.

But it was romance that the audience wanted more than anything else. That was proved when the orchestra had played the Rimsky-Korsakoff on Spanish themes.

Romance Charmingly Suggested

In "Alborada," the opening theme, treated in such a manner that a soprano chorus seemed to overspread the subdued but deep ensemble of the supporting basses, romance was charmingly suggested. Romance continued to make its appeal through the variations, and was brought out into sharp relief in the "Scene and Gypsy Song." The tinkle of cymbals, the projection of brasses from the rich bass volume, the wild and witching melody were elements of a number that was highly picturesque. Not less enjoyable, apparently, did the audience find the Fandango with which this group was closed.

Applause, which brought the conductor back to bow repeatedly continued until the orchestra played its one encore of the evening.

Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde" was also highly pleasing, and a Schubert group, "Ballet No. 1," "Entr'acte No. 11," and "Ballet No. 2" proved an enjoyable preparation for the concluding number, Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

Conductor Monteux made a very favorable impression with his quiet but effective leadership.

P. Joseph Congdon accomplished a very important deed, musically speaking, when he brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Binghamton.

BINGHMTN. NY. SUN-DEC.16

SYMPHONY IN EXTRA CONCERT

Beethoven's Fifth Opens and Wagner Closes the List

BY OLIN DOWNES

The second of the six concerts given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in addition to its regular subscription series took place last night in Symphony Hall.

BEETHOVEN'S FIFTH

The programme consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Svendsen's overture, "The Carnival in Paris"; an aria from Saint-Saens "Etienne Marcel" and Cherubino's "Non si piu" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," sung by Miss Estelle Liebling; Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun" and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser."

The performance of Beethoven's symphony was very brilliant, expressive in detail, dramatic in spirit. The last drop of color was extracted from the score, and Mr. Monteux, while making no unnecessary attempt to pour old wine into new bottles, found means to give fresh coloring to certain passages, and to preserve with his musical enthusiasm the conviction of the music. There was at times a tendency to over-particularity of detail, but the performance as a whole was engrossing, the sincerity of the conductor was felt by both players and audience. The music again stirred each hearer by its emotional power, its nobility, its humanity.

Miss Liebling has a voice rich in color and capable of exceptional effect in the concert hall. The Saint-Saens aria is more suitable to her, or was last night, than the music of Mozart. Saint-Saens lies well for the voice. It displays effectively the singer's entire range, and the color in the lower and middle range is unusual and characteristic. But Mozart's music demands a finer technic and style.

Two compositions which would in themselves have made the concert worth a journey were the symphony already referred to and Debussy's miraculous fantasy. This work has the same mysterious and inexplicable quality as certain effects of nature, not to be analyzed, not to be explained, and just as convincing, just as incredible, the millionth time they occur. Much could be said of the individual excellence of many solo players in the orchestra, as of Mr. Monteux's comprehension of the music. Again, as at the first concert of this series, there was a packed house. Again there was enthusiasm that found expression at every possible opportunity.

POST-JAN.17.

SUPERB CONCERT GIVEN AT BAILEY HALL LAST NIGHT

Auditorium Filled to Capacity to Hear Boston Symphony Orchestra.

VARIED PROGRAM GIVEN

Examples of Different Schools of Music Included—Pierre Monteux Conducting.

The undoubted claim of the Boston Symphony to be placed in the front rank of modern orchestras was amply substantiated in the playing of the organization at Bailey Hall last evening before a throng of students, faculty members and townspeople, which filled the spacious auditorium to capacity. Under the able leadership of Pierre Monteux the Boston Symphony orchestra has retained the mastery of technique which has characterized the playing of the organization during the 40 years of its existence, and has gained a recognized subtlety and delicacy of rendition.

The program which Mr. Monteux arranged for last evening's concert was representative of four great schools of music, a variety of style which is seldom incorporated into one program.

All Schools Represented.

The opening number was Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," a perfect example of the classic school of music, considered by many to be the greatest of Beethoven's works.

The Nationalistic school was represented by the "Carnival in Paris," one of the compositions of Svendson, a modern Norwegian musician. Two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," by the contemporary composer, Debussy, represented the Impressionistic form, now developed in its highest form by the French school of music.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a narrative composition by Richard Strauss, one of the greatest living composers, completed the program. The modern German school is sponsoring the program form of music, of which the composition given last evening is a good example.

CORNELL-DAILY SUN. DEC.17.

RARE MUSICAL TREAT OFFERED AT BAILEY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Sets New High Mark in Cornell Concert Series — Beethoven Number Feature of Interesting Program.

The opportunity to hear a master orchestra in Ithaca is all too rare, and a local concert by the Boston Symphony even rarer, so that for devotees of orchestra music last evening's was a gala occasion. There is, after all, nothing quite so exciting in a musical way as a master organization of this kind—an hundred instruments blending so perfectly as to form a single voice, or the ensemble breaking up into a score of individual voices each with its part and its own characteristics like a human being. Needless to state the concert was a delight from beginning to end, and the conducting of Pierre Monteux a marvel of controlled vitality.

The program, too, was an unusual one—at least for Ithaca which is so often given the "Hungarian Rhapsody," an overture from one of Wagner's operas and other equally popular numbers. The first half of last evening's program was Beethoven's "Symphony Eroica" with which were contrasted the more modern compositions of the latter half—Svendsen, Debussy, and Strauss.

The symphony was undoubtedly, as was intended, the piece-de-resistance of the evening. Aside from the beauty of the scoring, the composition is interesting because of its dedication to Napoleon, and the story of Beethoven's disgust when, subsequently, he learned that Bonaparte had had himself declared emperor. The third division, including the scherzo, allegro vivace, and trio; and the finale especially indicated the musicanship of the conductor and his organization.

A short intermission formed the only bridge between the old master and the modern descriptive composer—between Beethoven and Svendsen whose "Carnival in Paris" was the second number on the program. The carnival is an interesting composition and there are pasages of unquestionable melody, but it was not the most pleasing number of the evening.

Debussy's Nocturnes.

Two of Debussy's nocturnes followed—"Nuages" and "Fetes." The first of these is a weird, pagan bit with the hand of the great modern evident all through the scoring. It is full of harsh passages and unexpected harmonies, but is unquestionably fascinating. The second is a very spirited composition for a nocturne, and is especially notable for a harp and drum passage which is as effective as it is wild. To whom but a Debussy would have occurred the combination of a trio of kettledrums and two harps.

On encountering this type of descriptive music one is always tempted to wonder whether the composition would furnish a picture of "Agony-tinted clouds" if the program did not specifically admonish the audience to visualize, or rather to hear, such a picture. But quite aside from any emotional appeal the second at least of the nocturnes is intriguing to a degree, though it tends more to pique the hearer's curiosity and awaken his reasoning powers than to lull him to sleep, according to the accepted fashion of the nocturne.

The final number—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" followed the lead of the preceding selections as a distinctly descriptive bit of modernism. It is unquestionably humorous and manages to play more than one trick on the audience. It is also interesting in connection with Mr. Strauss' presence in this country and the prevalent revival of Strauss music everywhere.

No encores were given last evening owing to the length and exacting nature of the program, but Mr. Monteux was repeatedly recalled by the enthusiasm of the audience which filled the hall to its capacity and was not at all desirous of leaving at the end of the final number.

ITHICA-JOURNAL DEC.17.

CLASSICS PLEASE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Beethoven, Debussy and Wagner Delight Crowded House

Mr Monteux chose three of the best liked numbers in the orchestral repertory for the program of the second extra Boston Symphony concert last night. The presence of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Wagner's Overture to "Tannhauser" on a single program probably accounted for the capacity audience, which contrasted pleasingly with the couple of hundred vacant seats at the first extra concert last November.

For good measure Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" and arias by Saint-Saens and Mozart, sung by Estelle Liebling were added to the miscellany, but many in the audience would have been quite content without them. Svendsen's music sounded peculiarly empty and trivial by comparison with Beethoven's and Wagner's. The aria from Saint-Saens' forgotten opera, "Etienne Marcel," scarcely deserved resurrection, except to display the pleasing quality of Miss Liebling's soft high notes. It lacks individuality and distinction.

Mozart's beautiful "Non so piu," from "Figaro," is apparently alien to Miss Liebling's musical imagination. It certainly lies above the more effective portion of her vocal range. She can prolong high notes beautifully, but she cannot produce a clear, full tone on high eighth or 16th notes. She was obviously hampered by the nervousness that besets new singers at Boston Symphony concerts, however.

Mr Monteux gave an individual and careful reading of the Fifth Symphony, with which one was at points disposed to quarrel because some of Beethoven's intentions with regard to tempi and dynamics were not carried out. The finale was given with more delicacy and more zest than usual. The audience caused the orchestra to stand and share the applause by recalling Mr Monteux the customary three times.

The introduction to the "Tannhauser" overture was not played "maestoso," as marked in the score. The pomp and circumstance were reserved for the conclusion of the piece, where the "Pilgrim's Chorus" reenters. The Venusberg music in the middle section was given with unusual spirit. The Debussy was well played and received with marked enthusiasm.

These concerts are fulfilling their purpose when they offer the general public, to whom hearing a symphony orchestra is an occasional pastime, rather than a weekly ritual, the finest music in the orchestral repertory. Whatever dissent a critical listener might feel from some of Mr Monteux' not especially profound or noble interpretations o Beethoven and Wagner, there can be n doubt that last night's performance wa to those who never heard the chose pieces before a revelation of nev beauty, which did not fall upon dea ears.

The third concert of the extra serie of five will be given Feb 13, with Alfre Mirovitch, pianist, as the soloist.

GLOBE-JAN.17

---

from JAN 4 1922 X
Evening Globe
New York

The novelty of the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will be three dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos," or, "The Three-Cornered Hat," by Manuel de Falla. This ballet was performed for the first time on any stage by the Russian Ballet at the Alhambra, London, on July 23, 1919. The composer, born in Cadiz in 1877, is active in Europe both as a composer and a pianist. Before he was fourteen the Madrid Academy of Music awarded him the first prize for pianoforte playing. His first opera, "La Vida Breve," won a prize in 1905 in Madrid and later met with some success at Nice. A later opera, "El Amor Brujo," failed upon its production in Madrid in 1915. Various songs of his have been sung in this country by Mme Eva Gauthier.

Other numbers on the programm are Handel's concerto in F major fo strings and two wind orchestras Brahms's variations on a theme, b Handel; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Nigh on Mount Triglaff," from the thir act of the opera-ballet, "Mlada," an the overture to Massenet's "Phedre."

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Monteux Gives Dances of "Three-Cornered Hat" for First Time Here.

The Boston Symphony's 100 men marked vividly their third Winter visit to Carnegie Hall last evening with a gorgeously gay "first time in New York" of Manuel de Falla's dances of "The Three Cornered Hat," with which Diaghileff's ballet had made a great noise in London last Summer, and of which the young Cadiz composer can hardly have heard so stirring a performance by his "seventeen players" two years since in Spain. In its action there had appeared oversea Mme. Karsavina, Messrs. Massine and Idzikowsky, the last two remembered here.

Taken as music alone, de Falla's gossippy episode of "The Neighbors" was much liked by last night's critical house; his "Miller's Dance," that the Spaniards found most striking in Moorish flavor, was less recognizable to Western ears, but the "Final Dance," a whirlwind of popular Spanish rhythms in all the aggrandized modernism of instrumental apparatus, fairly outdanced Chabrier's "España" as an orchestral setting of folk melodies of the peninsula. The novelty ended in many recalls, shared by Monteux and his men.

Mr. Monteux preceded the Spanish brevities with Rimsky-Korsakoff's longer "Night on the Triple Mountain," a third act from the ballet of "Mlada," much of which had been used by the Diaghileff troupe in a "Cleopatra" scene on their earlier American tour, while this music had been played here by Altschuler as early as Nov. 19, 1904. The glowing nocturne of Baltic Slav romance, a ghostly dream of poisoned Princess, revelling spirits, and awakening at dawn on the mountain amid the singing of birds, also was greatly applauded.

Beginning the evening were Handel's concerto in F for strings and two wind choirs, and Brahms's variations on a theme of Haydn's, both conducted with elegance and suavity, and as smoothly played as they were enthusiastically received. The lovely Brahms variations were most appreciated, perhaps, as hown by the rapt silence of the house during successive numbers.

TIMES-JAN 6

At the evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra M. Monteu presented as a novelty three danc from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "E Sombrero de Tres Picos" (The Thre Cornered Hat). These were "Th Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller" an Final Dance. In all three gorgeou coloring and intoxicating rhythms pr dominated, while the music of th final number suggested glorified mem ories of "The Land of Joy." There much pseudo-Spanish music to b heard, but few composers have so viv idly caught and presented the genuin spirit of Spain. May the dances b heard soon again and often.

Another colorful number was "Nigh on Mount Triglaff," the third act o Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada" in concer form, rich in thematic treatment an brilliantly orchestrated, which arouse pleasant memories of the "Spanish Caprice," "L'Oisseau de Feu" and "Coq d'Or."

As a well chosen balance for the Spanish and Russian music of sensuous enchantment, M. Monteux and his men played Handel's concerto for string and two wind orchestra in F major, and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme,' by Haydn, Op. 56a. Both the orchestra and its conductor were in the vein and the performance of the whole program was of a high order of merit.

TRIBONE-JAN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAKES THIRD VISIT

Pierre Monteux Offers Program Embracing Handel, Brahms, Rimsky-Korsakov and De Falla Works.

ALFRED BOSWELL PLAYS

American Pianist Gives Recital at Town Hall—Jascha Heifetz Appears as Soloist.

For the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third visit to New York this year Mr. Monteux offered a program of much variety and interest last night at Carnegie Hall, going all the way from the classic Handel to the modern Spanish composer, de Falla.

The evening began with a rendition of Handel's Concerto for String and two Wind orchestras in F Major. This was an opportunity to judge the verity of those who claim the Boston organization to have the finest string section of any orchestra. After hearing the unusual beauty and unity of tone exhibited by the New Englanders last night, and the delicate and conservative reading by Mr. Monteux, one may be well disposed to agree heartily with that assertion.

Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn carried on the classic atmosphere, but a suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's ballet, "Mlada," called "Night on Mount Triglaff," brushed the hearer very decisively into the modern era. It is a delightful piece of writing, and last night's audience seemed to gain much pleasure therefrom.

Three dances from the ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," by de Falla, also found favor with the audience, the number being marked by characteristic Spanish rhythms and tunes. Massenet's "Phedre" overture ended the concert.

TELEGRAPH.JAN.

At Carnegie Hall last night Conductor Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra played a lengthy and varied programme. The wind instruments had a chance to sparkle in the first number, Haendel's concerto for strings and two wind orchestras. It was a beautiful performance, with the horns and oboes singing in an almost unbelievable unity of tone quality. There are no finer oboes in the world than the two that played last night.

The Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn had their second performance this week, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff" had its first of the year. The Rimsky work is a concert arrangement of most of the third act of his opera-ballet, "Mlada." Moussorgsky, who wrote "Night on Bald Mount" (the selfsame mount, by the way), should have edited it. It takes too long to gain momentum and some of its material is ineffective without the stage action. It does reveal Rimsky, however, as a generous source of inspiration for some of his successors. One whole section was borrowed by Ippolitoff Ivanhoff for his "Caucasian Sketches," and a passage for trombones and tuba near the end received the sincerest form of flattery from Stravinsky when he wrote Koshchei's Dance in "L'Oiseau de Feu." The orchestration is elaborate, and a D clarinet makes its appearance in a manner irresistably evocative of "Til Eulenspiegel."

The novelty of the evening was a suite of three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat." The work was first performed at the Alhambra Theatre, London, in the summer of 1919, with Leonid Massine dancing the principal role. Piccaso did the scenery and costumes. The story concerns a miller, his wife and an elderly and amorous Corregidor, and involves a rather elaborate action, all of which is interpreted in pantomime. The three selections that were played last night depict an evening scene with the neighbors dancing in to pay a friendly call; the miller's dance, which he undertakes for the entertainment of his friends; and the grand finale, when all has ended well and the Corregidor is being tossed in a blanket.

The piece suffered somewhat by its close proximity to the Rimsky-Korsakoff work, but it remained amply effective. It is gay, glittering music, tuneful and vigorous, not at all important, and brilliantly scored. The performance was pluperfect, and the final crash brought a storm of applause. Massenet's overture to "Phedre" came as the final ingredient of a heterogeneous evening.

WORLD-JAN. 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The feature of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall was the first New York performance of three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," which was produced in London by Diaghileff's nimble Russians nearly three years ago. The music is brilliant and picturesque enough to suggest to at least one hearer that Stravinsky has a dangerous Iberian rival. Paris has long admired this young composer, but very little of his music has yet been played here. Arthur Rubinstein has performed one of his piano pieces set to an orchestral accompaniment and Marguerite d'Alvarez has sung the lascivious Gypsy ditty from "El Amor Brujo." There, if memory serves, the record ends. His two operas and the ballet under consideration are hereby brought to the attention of Mr. Gatti-Casazza.

Mr. Monteux further led his men through a fine performance of a concerto for strings and wind instruments by Samuel Butler's favorite composer, George Frederic Handel, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on the Mount Triglav," a portion of the third act of the opera-ballet, "Mlada," the Cleopatra episode from which, with its hysterical flutes and its panting cymbals, was utilized by the Russians for the unveiling of Ida Rubenstein, and, finally, Massenet's effective overture to "Phèdre." An oboe solo in the concerto and the Rimsky-Korsakoff opus were singled out by the customers for special manual enconiums.

GLOBE- JAN.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Perry Monteux, conductor, gave the first of its third pair of concerts here last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program was varied and kept the listening powers of the audience in a buoyant mood.

It consisted of Handel's concerto for string and two woodwind choirs in F major, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera ballet, "Mlada," as arranged in concert form by the composer and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," three dances by the Spanish composer, De Falla—which were new here—from his ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos" (The Three Cornered Hat") and Massenet's "Phedre" overture.

The new De Falla dances, based on Alarcon's novel, were written by the composer for Diaghilev of Russian ballet fame. The three parts played last night are "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller" and "Final Dance." They are gracefully scored with the use of charming Spanish rhythms. The work of the orchestra in the different numbers was generally admirable and very warmly applauded.

HERALD-JAN. 6.

Bostonians Play Spanish Dances

The Boston Symphony Orchestra signalized its third visit of the current season by playing in Carnegie Hall last night one of the most curiously miscellaneous programmes it has ever given here. To make up that programme its conductor, Pierre Monteux, had ranged from Handel to the present day, gathered together (without much regard for their appositeness in programmatic sequence) works by German, Russian, Spanish, and French composers, and included in the queer potpourri a set of three short pieces never before heard in New York.

This novelty of the evening was a group of lively, boisterously gay, and brilliantly orchestrated Spanish dances taken from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" ("El Sombrero de Tres Picos"), which Manuel de Falla of Cadiz composed to order for the Russian Ballet and which was staged for the first time by the Diaghilev troupe in London in the summer of 1919.

The first of the three dances, entitled "The Neighbors," is a buzzing, gossipy musical delineation of a typical Spanish scene, and its gay and dashing performance made an instant hit with the audience last night.

The second, "The Miller's Dance," which according to Philip Hale's erudite and exhaustive programme notes, the Spaniards found the most interesting "because of its typically Andalusian character, its fascinating rhythm, which is like an affirmation of southern art, and its Moorish character," was less appealing and indeed seemed a bit vulgar. The third, a "Final Dance," a veritable whirlwind of rhythmic motion transmuted into a gorgeous display of orchestral colors produced by the addition to the full orchestra of tam-tam, xylophone, castanets, celesta, and piano, again captivated its hearers, and after several recalls the conductor got his men to their feet to share in the applause.

The concert began with Handel's "Concerto in F major for Strings and Wood Wind Orchestras"; included also Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, op. 56a, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," a concert arrangement of the third act from his ballet "Mlada," probably new to many hearers, although it had been played here several years ago by Modeste Altschuler and his Russian Symphony Orchestera, and ended with Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Despite its miscellaneous character it was all found enjoyable by the large audience.

G. W. H.

POST- JAN. 6.

The Boston Symphony.

An ill-assorted collection of interesting pieces was presented last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. A Handel Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras was followed by the Brahms Variations on the Haydn St. Antoni theme, both conscientiously performed with dignity and breadth.

The next two numbers, although contrasting with the German half of the program, lost by proximity to each other. The concert version of the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Mlada" brought the audience to a melodramatic scene on Mount Triglar, the same eminence known under Moussorgsky as Bald Mountain. Here the Young Prince from Scheherezade met the Princess of the Coq d'Or in a wild revel of piccolos. Wagner, who had just been introduced to Rimsky through the conductor Niemann, peered in among the fantastic flames, and the audience gave as much approval to the spectacle as if they had been much more numerous, which they very well could have been.

Equal applause greeted the ensuing quotations from Manuel de Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat." Although new to New York these three dances made an immediate impression through their tingling rhythms; imposed rather forcibly upon the orchestra by its conductor, it is true, but subtle enough to survive even more athletic treatment than this. Massenet's Phedre overture brought the concert to a Gallic close.

SUN- JAN. 6

FROM JAN 6 1922 D
TRIBUNE
NEW YORK CITY

At the evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra M. Monteux presented as a novelty three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" (The Three Cornered Hat). These were "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller" and Final Dance. In all three gorgeous coloring and intoxicating rhythms predominated, while the music of the final number suggested glorified memories of "The Land of Joy." There is much pseudo-Spanish music to be heard, but few composers have so vividly caught and presented the genuine spirit of Spain. May the dances be heard soon again and often.

Another colorful number was "Night on Mount Triglaff," the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada" in concert form, rich in thematic treatment and brilliantly orchestrated, which aroused pleasant memories of the "Spanish Capriee," "L'Oisseau de Feu" and "Coq d'Or."

As a well chosen balance for the Spanish and Russian music of sensuous enchantment, M. Monteux and his men played Handel's concerto for string and two wind orchestra in F major, and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme,' by Haydn, Op. 56a. Both the orchestra and its conductor were in the vein and the performance of the whole program was of a high order of merit.

Boſtoner Symphoniekonzert.

Das vorgeſtrige Abendkonzert der Boſtoner in Carnegie Hall brachte ein intereſſantes Programm, das ſehr erfreuliche Leiſtungen bot. Das unter der Leitung von Herrn Monteux ſchöne Werke bietende Konzert hätte entſchieden ein zahlreicheres Publikum verdient als ihm zuteil wurde.

Mit der ſtarken und farbigen Wiedergabe von Brahm's „Haydn“-Variationen hat Herr Monteux uns eine ſeiner gediegenſten und dabei brillanteſten klaſſiſchen Darbietungen geſchenkt, und der Beifall klang nach dieſer Nummer beſonders warm.

Rimsky-Korſakoff's „Eine Nacht auf dem Berge Triglav“ iſt ein düſteres Nachtſtück voll Hexen, Unholden und Spukgeſtalten, daß man das Grauſen lernen könnte. Zum Glück findet Rimsky-Korſakoff für das Stück auch kontraſtierende, mildere Töne, welche einem das Mitgehen erleichtern. Unverkennbar iſt die ſtarke Aehnlichkeit dieſer „Nacht“ mit desſelben Komponiſten „Scheheraſade“. Es iſt ſchließlich kein Wunder, wenn Geſchwiſter einander ähneln. Das Orcheſter tat ſich bei der Wiedergabe dieſer Ballettſuite aus der Oper „Mlada“ ganz beſonders hervor.

Einen ſehr warmen Erfolg feierten die Künſtler mit der ungemein leichtbeſchwingten und charakteriſtiſchen Wiedergabe der drei Tänze aus dem de Falla'ſchen Ballett „Der dreieckige Hut“, welches der geſchätzte ſpaniſche Komponiſt für das ruſſiſche Diaghileff-Ballett geſchrieben hat. Es ſind melodiös erfreuliche und rhythmiſch einfach hinreißende Nummern, genannt „Die Nachbarn“, „Müllertanz“ und „Schlußtanz“, von welchen das zweitgenannte mit ſeinen faszinierenden andaluſiſchen Rhythmen leicht den Preis davontrug, während das auf dem populären Tanze „Jota“ und einer „Vito“ zubenannten Volksmelodie beruhende dritte Exzerpt gleichfalls die vollſte Zufriedenheit des Publikums hervorrief. Das Konzert mit ſeinem faſt zu reichen Programm wurde durch das Haendelſche F Dur-Konzert für Streicher und zwei kleinen Holzbläſerorcheſtern eingeleitet und mit der mit Erfolg klaſſiſche Wege wandelnden Maſſenet'ſchen „Phèdre“-Ouverture beſchloſſen.

JAN. 7.

Boſtoner Symphonieorcheſter.

Das geſtrige Konzert unſerer Boſtoner Gäſte in Carnegie Hall, das gut beſucht war, brachte uns zahlreiche Genüſſe, unter denen die klangſchöne und ſtiliſtiſch feinſinnige Wiedergabe der Mozart'ſchen D-Dur Symphonie beſonderen Effekt machte. Herr Monteux brachte aber auch das effektvolle Rachmaninoff'ſche Tonpoem „Die Inſel der Toten“ nach dem bekannten Boecklin'ſchen Gemälde, ſowie die wilden, ungemein farbenreich gebrachten Tänze aus Borodin's Oper „Fürſt Igor“ zu prächtigſter Wirkung. Die Novität der Veranſtaltung enttäuſchte. Es handelt ſich um drei zu einer Suite zuſammengeſtellten Stücke von Milhaud, einem Neutöner, einem Werk, bei dem die komplizierte Mache und das neumodiſche Orcheſtergebräu über den Mangel an Erfindung und Originalität hinwegtäuſchen müſſen. Herr Monteux und ſeine Mannen ernteten ſehr warmen Beifall. Die Neuheit ging an dem Publikum anſcheinend wirkungslos vorüber.

JAN. 8.

Boston Symphony Offers Work of Parisian Composer and Two Numbers of Russian School.

"SCHEHERAZADE" IS PLAYED

The Saturday matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought forth another program of wide variety; a scheme of things evidently very much to the liking of Pierre Monteux as well as New York audiences. The Boston band has greatly enlarged its metropolitan followers this season by consistently good playing and excellent programs. Mr. Monteux and his men are to be congratulated.

The symphony was Mozart's D Major, rendered in perfect unison and beautiful tone under conservative direction. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "Isle of the Dead," changed the tenor of the afternoon rather abruptly, and it became patent that the concert would lean toward the modern type of expression.

This was fully realized in the next number—Overture, Pastorale, and Nocturne from Darius Milhaud's Second Orchestral Suite. Milhaud is a member of the select Parisian "Six," young composers who have gone to daring lengths in music. The work did not sound quite daring enough to be unenjoyable, for which one should be duly thankful, and its irrepressible character sounded pleasantly on the ear. Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances rounded out the program with their beautiful tunes and inspiring rhythms.

TELEGRAPH- JAN 8.

HARTFORD CONN.
COURANT
ISSUE OF
Jan 8

Conductor and Soloist of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Parsons's Theater Monday

PIERRE MONTEUX

Conductor

PAUL KOCHANSKI

Solo Violinist

Springfield
MASS.
Republican
ISSUE OF
Jan 8

PROGRAM FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Following is the program to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Young Men's Christian association meeting in the Auditorium this afternoon:—

Tschaikovsky—Symphony No 4 in F minor, Op. 36—
  1—Andante sostenuto
  2—Andantino in modo di canzona
  3—Scherzo: Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro
  4—Finale: Allegro con fuoco
Debussy—Two Nocturnes—
  1—Nuages ("Clouds")
  2—Fetes ("Festivals")
Strauss—"Tod un Verklarung" (Death and Transfiguration). Tone Poem, Op. 24
Liszt—"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem, No 6, for Full Orchestra (After Victor Hugo)

BOSTON MEN PLAY A NOVELTY.

Milhaud's Second Orchestral Suite Given Here for First Time.

The program for the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was well selected for the occasion. It consisted of Mozart's symphony in D major, Koechel, No. 385, and three contrasting modern numbers, Rachmaninov's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," three movements from Darius Milhaud's second orchestral suite, th "Overture," "Pastoral" and "Nocturne"—which were a novelty here and Borodin's brilliant "Polovtsia Dances" from his opera, "Prince Igor

The Rachmaninov work was given the composer's revised editions, whic had been heard here last October at Philharmonic concert. Milhaud, who one of the young ultra modern Frenc writers called the Parisian "Six," w fortunate in having his suite, a larg work of his, introduced to America Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchest in their home city last spring. T parts omitted yesterday were the fug (a travesty on a fugue) and the fina When heard in Boston the fugue said to have produced "snickers of s periority mingled with hearty laugh from the audience.

Of the whole suite Mr. Hale in program notes says that at its fi hearing at a Colonne concert in P on October 24, 1920, the music " voked hissing and howling so that police cleared the fauteuils of the cony." There were no such demons tions made at yesterday's hearing the new music, though the over was received with only scant reco tion and the pastorale and noctu with scarcely more than apathy cept on the part of a few pers The music in itself has themes, s and a striking palette of orche colors, also rhythmic feeling, but whole it strained severely the e the hearer.

HERALD-JAN 8.

From Cacophony to Melody

If M. Monteux wants his New York audience to wish he were in Halifax, all he has to do is to play music like the suite by Milhaud he had on Saturday's programme. It was hissed in Paris. New Yorkers never hiss at concerts, but they do a lot of thinking, and they all agree that cacophonic noise is not music and never will be, even when played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A delightful contrast to this cacophony was presented by the Philharmonic concert in the evening, when Stransky presented a programme compact of melody and emotion, including Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Wagner's "Tristan" prelude and finale, Grieg's "Heart Wounds" and "The Last Spring," and Ippolitoff-Ivanoff's "Caucasian Sketches." Never has the Philharmonic played more gloriously; what was particularly noticeable was that the Grieg pieces held their own, even after the tropical splendors of the numbers preceding them, and were applauded rapturously.

POST- JAN. 9.

EXTRA SYMPHONY DRAWS BIG CROWD

Complete capacity was the condition of Symphony Hall last night when the second of the extra series of Symphony concerts was given. Mr. Monteux had chosen a very charming program, which was delightfully performed. It included Beethoven's fifth symphony, Svardins' "Carnival in Paris," Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," and the Tannhauser Overture. The soloist was Estelle Liebling, who sang an air from Marriage of Figaro and from "Etienne Marcel."

AMER- JAN. 17.

A METTLESOME CONCERT

The Second "Special Evening" of the Symphony Orchestra — Beethoven and Mr. Monteux Eloquent—Other Familiar Numbers for the Most Part Well Done—Mrs. Liebling a Capable Singer

IN shaping his programmes for the additional set of Symphony Concerts on Monday evenings, Mr. Monteux has thus far, and with prudence, done no experimenting. Rather he has deliberately avoided music of unproven value and pieces, however worthy, that by newness or oldness make a limited, not a general appeal. As case in point, the programme of last evening's concert, the second of the series, was one that might be judiciously played by any orchestra on an occasional visit to a city that had no symphony concerts of its own—a programme designed to attract as many listeners as possible, and to give them "their money's worth." It comprised the most celebrated of all symphonies, Beethoven's Fifth; perhaps the most popular of all operatic Overtures, that to Wagner's "Tannhäuser;" and for safe venture into the recondite, Debussy's "Prelude To The Afternoon of a Faun," the unquestioned favorite among his orchestral pieces. Only one number on the programme, Svendsen's Episode for Orchestra, "Carnival in Paris," is of doubtful worth, yet it added what surely was for some a welcome touch of lightness and high spirits. Needless to say, that indispensable "drawing card," an assisting artist, must be included in each of these Monday concerts, even though afternoons and evenings in the regular series may frequently and well go their way without one. This desired embellishment last evening was Estelle Liebling, a singer of some reputation, heard here in a recital of her own a year ago last December.

Audiences at the Symphony Concerts have often been undiscriminating [illegible] these assisting artists are concerned [illegible] soloist is a soloist and sufficient [illegible] occasion. As it happens, Mrs. Lie[illegible] competent singer [illegible]

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At Carnegie Hall last night Conductor Monteux and his Boston Symphony Orchestra played a lengthy and varied programme. The wind instruments had a chance to sparkle in the first number, Haendel's concento for strings and two wind orchestras. It was a beautiful performance, with the horns and oboes singing in an almost unbelievable unity of tone quality. There are no finer oboes in the world than the two that played last night.

The Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn had their second performance this week, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff" had its first of the year. The Rimsky work is a concert arrangement of most of the third act of his opera-ballet, "Mlada." Moussorgsky, who wrote "Night on Bald Mount" (the selfsame mount, by the way), should have edited it. It takes too long to gain momentum and some of its material is ineffective without the stage action. It does reveal Rimsky, however, as a generous source of inspiration for some of his successors. One whole section was borrowed by Ippolitoff Ivanhoff for his "Caucasian Sketches," and a passage for trombones and tuba near the end received the sincerest form of flattery from Stravinsky when he wrote Koshchei's Dance in "L'Oiseau de Feu." The orchestration is elaborate, and a D clarinet makes its appearance in a manner irresistably evocative of "Til Eulenspiegel."

The novelty of the evening was a suite of three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat." The work was first performed at the Alhambra Thatre, London, in the summer of 1919, with Leonid Massine dancing the principal role. Piccaso did the scenery and costumes. The story concerns a miller, his wife and an elderly and amorous Corregidor, and involves a rather elaborate action, all of which is interpreted in pantomime. The three selections that were played last night depict an evening scene with the neighbors dancing in to pay a friendly call; the miller's dance, which he undertakes for the entertainment of his friends; and the grand finale, when all has ended well and the Corregidor is being tossed in a blanket.

The piece suffered somewhat by its close proximity to the Rimsky-Korsakoff work, but it remained amply effective. It is gay, glittering music, tuneful and vigorous, not at all important, and brilliantly scored. The performance was pluperfect, and the final crash brought a storm of applause. Massenet's overture to "Phedre" came as the final ingredient of a heterogeneous evening.

WORLD-JAN. 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

The feature of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall was the first New York performance of three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," which was produced in London by Diaghileff's nimble Russians nearly three years ago. The music is brilliant and picturesque enough to suggest to at least one hearer that Stravinsky has a dangerous Iberian rival. Paris has long admired this young composer, but very little of his music has yet been played here. Arthur Rubinstein has performed one of his piano pieces set to an orchestral accompaniment and Marguerite d'Alvarez has sung the lascivious Gypsy ditty from "El Amor Brujo." There, if memory serves, the record ends. His two operas and the ballet under consideration are hereby brought to the attention of Mr. Gatti-Casazza.

Mr. Monteux further led his men through a fine performance of a concerto for strings and wind instruments by Samuel Butler's favorite composer, George Frederic Handel, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on the Mount Triglav," a portion of the third act of the opera-ballet, "Mlada," the Cleopatra episode from which, with its hysterical flutes and its panting cymbals, was utilized by the Russians for the unveiling of Ida Rubenstein, and, finally, Massenet's effective overture to "Phèdre." An oboe solo in the concerto and the Rimsky-Korsakoff opus were singled out by the customers for special manual enconiums.

GLOBE JAN.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Perry Monteux, conductor, gave the first of its third pair of concerts here last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program was varied and kept the listening powers of the audience in a buoyant mood.

It consisted of Handel's concerto for string and two woodwind choirs in F major, Brahms's variations on a theme by Haydn, the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera ballet, "Mlada," as arranged in concert form by the composer and entitled "Night on Mount Triglaff," three dances by the Spanish composer, De Falla—which were new here—from his ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos" (The Three Cornered Hat") and Massenet's "Phedre" overture.

The new De Falla dances, based on Alarcon's novel, were written by the composer for Diaghilev of Russian ballet fame. The three parts played last night are "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller" and "Final Dance." They are gracefully scored with the use of charming Spanish rhythms. The work of the orchestra in the different numbers was generally admirable and very warmly applauded.

HERALD-JAN. 6.

Bostonians Play Spanish Dances

The Boston Symphony Orchestra signalized its third visit of the current season by playing in Carnegie Hall last night one of the most curiously miscellaneous programmes it has ever given here. To make up that programme its conductor, Pierre Monteux, had ranged from Handel to the present day, gathered together (without much regard for their appositeness in programmatic sequence) works by German, Russian, Spanish, and French composers, and included in the queer potpourri a set of three short pieces never before heard in New York.

This novelty of the evening was a group of lively, boisterously gay, and brilliantly orchestrated Spanish dances taken from the ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat" ("El Sombrero de Tres Picos"), which Manuel de Falla of Cadiz composed to order for the Russian Ballet and which was staged for the first time by the Diaghilev troupe in London in the summer of 1919. The first of the three dances, entitled "The Neighbors," is a buzzing, gossipy musical delineation of a typical Spanish scene, and its gay and dashing performance made an instant hit with the audience last night.

The second, "The Miller's Dance," which according to Philip Hale's erudite and exhaustive programme notes, the Spaniards found the most interesting "because of its typically Andalusian character, its fascinating rhythm, which is like an affirmation of southern art, and its Moorish character," was less appealing and indeed seemed a bit vulgar. The third, a "Final Dance," a veritable whirlwind of rhythmic motion transmuted into a gorgeous display of orchestral colors produced by the addition to the full orchestra of tam-tam, xylophone, castanets, celesta, and piano, again captivated its hearers, and after several recalls the conductor got his men to their feet to share in the applause.

The concert began with Handel's "Concerto in [illegible] major for Strings and Wood Wind Orchestras"; included also Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, op. 56a, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Night on Mount Triglaff," a concert arrangement of the third act from his ballet "Mlada," probably new to many hearers, although it had been played here several years ago by Modeste Altschuler and his Russian Symphony Orchestera, and ended with Massenet's Overture to "Phedre." Despite its miscellaneous character it was all found enjoyable by the large audience. G. W. H.

POST-JAN. 6.

The Boston Symphony.

An ill-assorted collection of interesting pieces was presented last night at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux. A Handel Concerto in F major for strings and two wind orchestras was followed by the Brahms Variations on the Haydn St. Antoni theme, both conscientiously performed with dignity and breadth.

The next two numbers, although contrasting with the German half of the program, lost by proximity to each other. The concert version of the third act of Rimsky-Korsakov's opera "Mlada" brought the audience to a melodramatic scene on Mount Triglar, the same eminence known under Moussorgsky as Bald Mountain. Here the Young Prince from Scheherezade met the Princess of the Coq d'Or in a wild revel of piccolos. Wagner, who had just been introduced to Rimsky through the conductor Niemann, peered in among the fantastic flames, and the audience gave as much approval to the spectacle as if they had been much more numerous, which they very well could have been.

Equal applause greeted the ensuing quotations from Manuel de Falla's ballet "The Three-Cornered Hat." Although new to New York these three dances made an immediate impression through their tingling rhythms; imposed rather forcibly upon the orchestra by its conductor, it is true, but subtle enough to survive even more athletic treatment than this. Massenet's Phedre overture brought the concert to a Gallic close.

SUN-JAN. 6.

FROM JAN 6 1922 D
TRIBUNE
NEW YORK CITY

At the evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra M. Monteux presented as a novelty three dances from Manuel de Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de Tres Picos" (The Three Cornered Hat). These were "The Neighbors," "Dance of the Miller" and Final Dance. In all three gorgeous coloring and intoxicating rhythms predominated, while the music of the final number suggested glorified memories of "The Land of Joy." There is much pseudo-Spanish music to be heard, but few composers have so vividly caught and presented the genuine spirit of Spain. May the dances be heard soon again and often.

Another colorful number was "Night on Mount Triglaff," the third act of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada" in concert form, rich in thematic treatment and brilliantly orchestrated, which aroused pleasant memories of the "Spanish Caprice," "L'Oisseau de Feu" and "Coq d'Or."

As a well chosen balance for the Spanish and Russian music of sensuous enchantment, M. Monteux and his men played Handel's concerto for string and two wind orchestra in F major, and Brahms's "Variations on a Theme,' by Haydn, Op. 56a. Both the orchestra and its conductor were in the vein and the performance of the whole program was of a high order of merit.

Boſtoner Symphoniekonzert.

Das vorgeſtrige Abendkonzert der Boſtoner in Carnegie Hall brachte ein intereſſantes Programm, das ſehr erfreuliche Leiſtungen bot. Das unter der Leitung von Herrn Monteux ſchöne Werke bietende Konzert hätte entſchieden ein zahlreicheres Publikum verdient als ihm zuteil wurde.

Mit der ſtarken und farbigen Wiedergabe von Brahm's „Haydn"-Variationen hat Herr Monteux uns eine ſeiner gediegenbſten und dabei brillanteſten klaſſiſchen Darbietungen geſchenkt, und der Beifall klang nach dieſer Nummer beſonders warm.

Rimsky-Korſakoff's „Eine Nacht auf dem Berge Triglav" iſt ein düſteres Nachtſtück voll Hexen, Unholden und Spukgeſtalten, daß man das Grauſen lernen könnte. Zum Glück findet Rimsky-Korſakoff für das Stück auch kontraſtierende, mildere Töne, welche einem das Mitgehen erleichtern. Unverkennbar iſt die ſtarke Aehnlichkeit dieſer „Nacht" mit desſelben Komponiſten „Scheheraſade". Es iſt ſchließlich kein Wunder, wenn Geſchwiſter einander ähneln. Das Orcheſter tat ſich bei der Wiedergabe dieſer Ballettſuite aus der Oper „Mlada" ganz beſonders hervor.

Einen ſehr warmen Erfolg feierten die Künſtler mit der ungemein leichtbeſchwingten und charakteriſtiſchen Wiedergabe der drei Tänze aus dem de Fallaſchen Ballett „Der dreieckige Hut", welches der geſchätzte ſpaniſche Komponiſt für das ruſſiſche Diaghileff-Ballett geſchrieben hat. Es ſind melodiös erfreuliche und rhythmiſch einfach hinreißende Nummern, genannt „Die Nachbarn", „Müllertanz" und „Schlußtanz", von welchen das zweitgenannte mit ſeinen faszinierenden andaluſiſchen Rhythmen leicht den Preis davontrug, während das auf dem populären Tanze „Jota" und einer „Vito" zubenannten Volksmelodie beruhende dritte Exzerpt gleichfalls die vollſte Zufriedenheit des Publikums hervorrief. Das Konzert mit ſeinem faſt zu reichen Programm wurde durch das Haendelſche F Dur-Konzert für Streicher und zwei kleinen Holzbläſerorcheſtern eingeleitet und mit der mit Erfolg klaſſiſche Wege wandelnden Maſſenetſchen „Phèdre"-Ouverture beſchloſſen.

JAN 7.

Boſtoner Symphonieorcheſter.

Das geſtrige Konzert unſerer Boſtoner Gäſte in Carnegie Hall, das gut beſucht war, brachte uns zahlreiche Genüſſe, unter denen die klangſchöne und ſtiliſtiſch feinſinnige Wiedergabe der Mozart'ſchen D-Dur Symphonie beſonderen Effekt machte. Herr Monteux brachte aber auch das effektvolle Rachmaninoff'ſche Tonpoem „Die Inſel der Toten" nach dem bekannten Boecklin'ſchen Gemälde, ſowie die wilden, ungemein farbenreich gebrachten Tänze aus Borodin's Oper „Fürſt Igor" zu prächtigſter Wirkung. Die Novität der Veranſtaltung enttäuſchte. Es handelt ſich um drei zu einer Suite zuſammengeſtellten Stücke von Milhaud, einem Neutöner, einem Werk, bei dem die komplizierte Mache und das neumodiſche Orcheſtergebräu über den Mangel an Erfindung und Originalität hinwegtäuſchen müſſen. Herr Monteux und ſeine Mannen ernteten ſehr warmen Beifall. Die Neuheit ging an dem Publikum anſcheinend wirkungslos vorüber.

JAN. 8.

Boston Symphony Offers Work of Parisian Composer and Two Numbers of Russian School.

"SCHEHERAZADE" IS PLAYED

The Saturday matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought forth another program of wide variety; a scheme of things evidently very much to the liking of Pierre Monteux as well as New York audiences. The Boston band has greatly enlarged its metropolitan followers this season by consistently good playing and excellent programs. Mr. Monteux and his men are to be congratulated.

The symphony was Mozart's D Major, rendered in perfect unison and beautiful tone under conservative direction. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "Isle of the Dead," changed the tenor of the afternoon rather abruptly, and it became patent that the concert would lean toward the modern type of expression.

This was fully realized in the next number—Overture, Pastorale, and Nocturne from Darius Milhaud's Second Orchestral Suite. Milhaud is a member of the select Parisian "Six," young composers who have gone to daring lengths in music. The work did not sound quite daring enough to be unenjoyable, for which one should be duly thankful, and its irrepressible character sounded pleasantly on the ear. Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances rounded out the program with their beautiful tunes and inspiring rhythms.

TELEGRAPH-JAN 8

HARTFORD CONN.
COURANT
ISSUE OF
Jan 8

Conductor and Soloist of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Parsons's Theater Monday

PIERRE MONTEUX

Conductor

PAUL KOCHANSKI

Solo Violinist

Springfield
MASS.
Republican
ISSUE OF
Jan 8

PROGRAM FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Following is the program to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Young Men's Christian association meeting in the Auditorium this afternoon:—

Tschaikovsky—Symphony No 4 in F minor, Op. 36—
  1—Andante sostenuto
  2—Andantino in modo di canzona
  3—Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato; Allegro
  4—Finale: Allegro con fuoco
Debussy—Two Nocturnes—
  1—Nuages ("Clouds")
  2—Fetes ("Festivals")
Strauss—"Tod un Verklarung" (Death and Transfiguration). Tone Poem, Op. 24
Liszt—"Mazeppa," Symphonic Poem, No 6, for Full Orchestra (After Victor Hugo)

BOSTON MEN PLAY A NOVELTY.

Milhaud's Second Orchestral Suite Given Here for First Time.

The program for the matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall was well selected for the occasion. It consisted of Mozart's symphony in D major, Koechel. No. 385, and three contrasting modern numbers, Rachmaninov's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead," three movements from Darius Milhaud's second orchestral suite, th "Overture," "Pastoral" and "Nocturne"—which were a novelty here and Borodin's brilliant "Polovtsia Dances" from his opera, "Prince Igor

The Rachmaninov work was given the composer's revised editions, whic had been heard here last October at Philharmonic concert. Milhaud, who one of the young ultra modern Frenc writers called the Parisian "Six," w fortunate in having his suite, a larg work of his, introduced to America Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchest in their home city last spring. T parts omitted yesterday were the fug (a travesty on a fugue) and the fina When heard in Boston the fugue said to have produced "snickers of s periority mingled with hearty laugh from the audience.

Of the whole suite Mr. Hale in program notes says that at its fi hearing at a Colonne concert in P on October 24, 1920, the music " voked hissing and howling so that police cleared the fauteuils of the cony." There were no such demons tions made at yesterday's hearing the new music, though the over was received with only scant reco tion and the pastorale and noctu with scarcely more than apathy cept on the part of a few perso The music in itself has themes, s and a striking palette of orche colors, also rhythmic feeling, but whole it strained severely the ea the hearer.

HERALD-JAN 8.

From Cacophony to Melody

If M. Monteux wants his New York audience to wish he were in Halifax, all he has to do is to play music like the suite by Milhaud he had on Saturday's programme. It was hissed in Paris. New Yorkers never hiss at concerts, but they do a lot of thinking, and they all agree that cacophonic noise is not music and never will be, even when played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A delightful contrast to this cacophony was presented by the Philharmonic concert in the evening, when Stransky presented a programme compact of melody and emotion, including Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Wagner's "Tristan" prelude and finale, Grieg's "Heart Wounds" and "The Last Spring," and Ippolitoff-Ivanoff's "Caucasian Sketches." Never has the Philharmonic played more gloriously; what was particularly noticeable was that the Grieg pieces held their own, even after the tropical splendors of the numbers preceding them, and were applauded rapturously.

POST-JAN. 9.

EXTRA SYMPHONY DRAWS BIG CROWD

Complete capacity was the condition of Symphony Hall last night when the second of the extra series of Symphony concerts was given. Mr. Monteux had chosen a very charming program, which was delightfully performed. It included Beethoven's fifth symphony, Svardins' "Carnival in Paris, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," and the Tannhauser Overture. The soloist was Estelle Liebling, who sang an air from "Marriage of Figaro and from "Etienne Marcel."

AMER-JAN. 17.

A METTLESOME CONCERT

The Second "Special Evening" of the Symphony Orchestra—Beethoven and Mr. Monteux Eloquent—Other Familiar Numbers for the Most Part Well Done—Mrs. Liebling for Capable Singer

In shaping his programmes for the additional set of Symphony Concerts on Monday evenings, Mr. Monteux has thus far, and with prudence, done no experimenting. Rather he has deliberately avoided music of unproven value and pieces, however worthy, that by newness or oldness make a limited, not a general appeal. As case in point, the programme of last evening's concert, the second of the series, was one that might be judiciously played by any orchestra on an occasional visit to a city that had no symphony concerts of its own—a programme designed to attract as many listeners as possible, and to give them "their money's worth." It comprised the most celebrated of all symphonies, Beethoven's Fifth; perhaps the most popular of all operatic Overtures, that to Wagner's "Tannhäuser;" and for safe venture into the recondite, Debussy's "Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun," the unquestioned favorite among his orchestral pieces. Only one number on the programme, Svendsen's Episode for Orchestra, "Carnival in Paris," is of doubtful worth, yet it added what surely was for some a welcome touch of lightness and high spirits. Needless to say, that indispensable "drawing card," an assisting artist, must be included in each of these Monday concerts, even though afternoons and evenings in the regular series may frequently and well go their way without one. This desired embellishment last evening was Estelle Liebling, a singer of some reputation, heard here in a recital of her own a year ago last December.

Audiences at the Symphony Concerts have often been undiscriminating where these assisting artists are concerned. A soloist is a soloist and sufficient unto the occasion. As it happens, Mrs. Liebling is a competent singer but no more; and [illegible] even [illegible] received her as [illegible]

It applauded [illegible] but not clamorously, nor to unnecessary lengths. The reputedly sophisticated companies of Fridays and Saturdays, who applaud even a mediocre performer with the enthusiasm due to a Kreisler or a Rakhmaninov, might learn from this temperance. Mrs. Liebling's pieces were an Air from Saint-Saëns's opera "Etienne Marcel," and the Aria "Non so piu" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." It has been said of Saint-Saëns that he was the one composer of his time who remained impervious to the influence of Wagner, but in the writing of operas this aloofness and independence did him no great credit. "Etienne Marcel" was produced in 1879, three years after the first festival at Bayreuth, but the Air of last evening is as old-fashioned as anything in Grétry. The text is expressive of violent emotions; the music, which runs amiably and pleasantly, with a pretty if undistinguished turn of melody, is placidity itself. Infinitely fresher, more vital and more alluring is the Air by Mozart, composed nearly a hundred years before. As her recital disclosed her Mrs. Liebling has musical intelligence and a voice that is clear and brilliant, if not conspicuously beautiful. Her chief shortcoming lies in her inability to project herself in her music—even less than a violinist or a pianist, can a singer afford to be impersonal.

If the soloist somewhat lacked animation, conductor and orchestra displayed it in abundance, and the performance of the Symphony, in particular, was uncommonly eloquent. From the first Mr. Monteux has shown himself singularly successful in the intepretation of Beethoven's music—a clear rebuke to those who have questioned the fitness of French conductors for the German classics. Mozart and Haydn, perhaps, have not always found characteristic voice at his hands; with Beethoven he has frequently excelled himself, and once more in the Symphony of last evening. Never was there resort to the theatricalism that may discover an unexpected shiver or thrill. Instead, there was throughout a fervor, always ordered and controlled, yet never cooled or curbed, a sympathy that unfailingly divined the composer's meaning, and the skill that could give it voice. From the orchestra came ready response; fire was met with fire, ardor with ardor. So played the Fifth Symphony can still defy its critics, it can still resist the over-popularity that has threatened it. Certain of the other symphonies of Beethoven may excel it in this or that respect; in them are occasional heights and depths, eloquences and graces that it may not equal. But none of them, save perhaps the eighth, is so free from measures that today seem perfunctory and out-moded, that drag and pall. The "Fifth" goes about its business with sureness and despatch, and in it is that perfect fusion of the intellectual and emotional elements that is the acknowledged ideal of absolute music.

As Saint-Saëns seemed last evening older than Mozart, so was Beethoven younger than Svendsen. No doubt the audience found the pleasure in the "Carnival at Paris" that Mr. Monteux would give. And trite as it is, the piece has redeeming moments, notably in the lyrical passages. Moreover, it is admirably orchestrated: a teacher of instrumentation might well put the score in the hands of his pupils to serve as an example of broad and striking effects, achieved unerringly through simple and clearly understandable means. It was Svendsen's misfortune that his music should have chanced to follow so masterly performance of a masterpiece. And as Mr. Monteux and his men wrought with the Symphony, so did they with Wagner's Overture. If here and there the music failed to convince, the fault was not theirs. To revert to the class-room, the Overture to "Tannhäuser" furnishes an admirable illustration of how and how not to use the trombones. What could be emptier than the repetition of the "Pilgrims' Chant," blatantly proclaimed by the three instruments against the jerky counterpoint in the violins. Yet in the excitements and clamors of the end this same unison is overpoweringly impressive. "Tannhäuser" is waxing old in years, but in the music of the Venusberg that is the glory of this Overture, the composer wrote in a fervor of creation that has so far defied the ravages of time. Only Wagner himself, in the later version of the Bacchanale has surpassed it as an expression of erotic frenzy.

Whether because the programme was cleverly put together, or because there is a definite need for these extra concerts, the audience of yesterday was gratifyingly numerous, hardly an empty seat could be discerned in the hall. If hearers at the first concert were baffled by Franck's Symphony, no one was now perplexed, even by Debussy's enchanting Prelude that for some reason went heavy-footedly. Except for restrained response to Mrs. Liebling and a certain coolness towards the music of Debussy, the audience was clearly appreciative and heartily applausive. A new public in their own city has always a stimulating effect on the orchestra. As so often at a Pension Fund Concert, band and leader were more on their mettle than is sometimes the case in the Symphony Concerts of regular course.

WARREN STOREY-SMITH

TRANS. JAN. 17.

A WEEK hence, on Thursday evening, Jan. 26, in Steinert Hall, the new quartet, in which the leaders in the string-choir of the Symphony Orchestra are joining voices, begins a series of chamber-concerts. In first thought, it was to be named the Boston Symphony Quartet, that it might so gain prestige and suggest qua-ity and standards. Now, it is officially named the Richard Burgin Quartet, since he assembled it and since the controlling powers of the orchestra have no part in its fortunes, as they did in similar ventures in Mr. Higginson's days. None the less, in the Symphony Concerts the public has learned the merit of the four players—Messrs. Burgin, Thillois, Fourel, Bedetti—and will so be drawn to them. By every token, it has reason to expect much. As musician, as violinist, Mr. Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra, shines in ensemble-playing. No violoncellist in the records of the band has excelled Mr. Bedetti. From week to week, Mr. Fourel proved [illegible] with the viola while Mr [illegible] months to gain the instinctive responsiveness, each to each, that only close association may bring, the four musicians have been at persistent practice. If breadth of view may make interesting programmes, their open minds to the ancients, the moderns and the ultra-moderns, to deserving music wherever it may be found, should bring well-balanced stimulating concerts. The Burgin Quartet is modest, preferring to prove virtue before it proclaims it. By faith and works, it would gain and hold a sustaining public. Whatever the outcome, there is room for such a quartet of the highest standards and for more chamber-concerts in Boston. The musical life of the town, if it is to stir afresh, needs such a resident four for the pleasure they may give, for the widening of our horizons. The established "Flonzaleys," the new-born "Burgins" will be only the more interesting to hear, when each vies with the other.

H. T. P.

TRANS. JAN. 18

FROM JAN 19 1922
TIMES,
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Program.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the third season in this post, has made a program of brilliance and variety for the single concert to be given by this famous organization in Washington this year, which will take place at the National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 31st, at 4:30, under management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The symphony on this program will be the Fourth by Tschaikowsky in F minor. This work was considered by the Russian composer as his finest achievement, and the subsequent verdict of posterity is more and more inclining to his view. The work describes the hopes and aspirations of humanity, over which is imposed the final, inexorable theme of Fate, given forth by the full brass choir.

The remainder of the program will consist of "The Carnival in Paris" by the Norwegian composer, Svendsen; Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals), and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

[53]

New Comer, New Interest

Karel Szymanowski

(Transcript Photograph by Colby)

Polish Composer, Now Settled in New York, Whose Music Will Be Heard Tomorrow for the First Time at the Symphony Concerts

SZYMANOWSKI'S SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux to Introduce a New Composer and a New Piece—Music of 1909 with Not a Few Characteristics of the Time—Past and Present of a Promising Pole

THIS week another new name, that of Karel Szymanowski, will appear on the programme of the Symphony Concerts. At present a resident of New York, Mr. Szymanowski was born of Polish parents at Timoshevka, in Southern Russia, in 1883. A pupil in composition of the Pole, Siegmund Noskowski, whose Symphonic Poem, "The Steppe," was played here in 1907, Mr. Szymanowski has devoted himself chiefly to the writing of music of a formal character. Besides songs and small pieces for the piano, his list of compositions includes two piano-sonatas, a sonata for violin and piano, a "Romance" for violin and orchestra, a concert-overture, a set of "Grotesque Dances" for a comedy of Molière (soon to be played in New York) and two symphonies, the second of which is the piece chosen by Mr. Monteux for performance tomorrow and Saturday. Few of Mr. Szymanowski's compositions have thus far been heard in Boston—a Chopin-like study in B-flat minor for the piano, played here two seasons ago by Mme. Szumowska; certain songs sung much further back in a recital of Paul Draper. The performance of his Symphony will be the first in America.

This second symphony was written twelve years ago when Szymanowski was, by his own admission, under the influence of Richard Strauss. It is unmistakably the work of a young composer of great technical resource if not of commanding individuality, of one conscious of the richness of his musical heritage and striving to put the whole of it into a single score. The piece is over-elaborated; there is too much counterpoint and the orchestration is often thick and muddy. Simplicity has been shunned assiduously; complexity has been as eagerly sought. Since the Symphony was first put in rehearsal, Mr. Monteux has been busy with the pruning-knife and no doubt he has in many places produced a sorely needed clarity. Quite exceptionally the piece contains but two movements; while there never was intention to write more, as in the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert. The two, are wholly sufficient to themselves. The first of them begins Allegretto Moderato in three-four time. First violins announce a graceful, melodious theme in B-flat major, which after the second bar assumes a strongly chromatic character. In fact, the music throughout reeks with "chromaticism"; hardly a measure goes unembellished by accidentals. A Meno Mosso, Quasi Andante, in D flat, brings the second theme, in the violas, a songful and sustained melody that, like the first, begins chromatically, and soon runs to semi-tones. Both themes are developed at length by an orchestra that seethes and clamors, and in regular course they return; the first now sung in the center-key of B flat major by the 'cellos, with an accompaniment of woodwind chords (Scherzando), the second in the remote key of C-flat major, given out by all the upper strings. Further development leads to a mighty climax and that, in turn, to an abrupt pianissimo, which brings the end.

The second movement takes the form of a Theme and Variations with Fugue and Finale. The Theme itself is not a theme at all, in the conventional use of the term. Instead it consists of twelve measures, in slow tempo, of expressive, excessively chromatic part-writing for divided strings, in which several germinal motives are disclosed. From each and all of these motives are derived the succeeding variations. The first two variations partake of the character of the Theme, thus supplying in the composer's scheme the place of the usual slow movement. In the present performance the third variation will be omitted. Variation number four, a lengthy Scherzando, and numbers five and six, a Gavotte and Minuet, respectively, supply between them the conventional Scherzo. The succeeding variation is a Largo Maestoso; and after it an Introduction leads to the Fugue which has as its basis a theme of feverishly energetic character. The Finale brings reminiscences of the first movement, and the piece ends lustily.

Although report comes from reliable sources that recent compositions of Szymanowski are of signal interest, there is no published comment on them that is readily available. Certain of the earlier pieces are reviewed in an article by Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt which appeared more than ten years ago in the German journal of music, Die Signale. Making due allowance for German professorial narrowness, it is evident from Dr. Leichtentritt's observations that the early songs and piano-pieces of Szymanowski exhibited many of the tendencies to be found in the Second Symphony. Dr. Leichtentritt speaks of the composer as a man known to readers of that time (August, 1910) as a winner of various prizes and as the composer of a significant and unusual Prelude and Fugue that had attracted the attention of young Polish pianists. The "newer" music of Szymanowski, as it then stood, is discussed at some length. Dr. Leichtentritt finds this music of Szymanowski fraught with difficulties—"music that may be conquered . . . step by step, like a steep mountain, and that gives but clouded vista when the summit has been attained." He sees in it a passionate striving toward an exalted goal, a serious music, intensively glowing, but lacking the clear serenity and grace which most appeal to him. He counts Szymanowski's rhythms monotonous, his melodies not always strikingly original, his harmony teeming with accidentals. The songs present to him still more striking deficiencies. They seem "complicated, vehement, wholly unsingable structures—called 'songs' as though in irony—with obtrusive and robust acompaniments that draw attention from the words, and with voice-parts arbitrary, incidental, seeming throughout to be not inevitable, not flowing from the ideas of the text." But so speak the academically-minded in 1922 concerning the ways in which the composers of the hour would express themselves. Perchance Dr. Leichtentritt gives expression to the wish of many a hearer of the songs of Milhaud or Malipiero when he says, in conclusion, that he desires for Szymanowski a clear and sober judgement and a keen intelligence with which he may see where to seek the true source of his art. Thus rounds the voice of critical conservatism; tomorrow and Saturday the music of Szymanowski will plead its own cause.

W. S. S.

Beethoven and Rakhmaninov will fill the major part of the Symphony Concerts of next week—the one with his Seventh Symphony in dance-rhythms, the other with his second Concerto for Piano and orchestra. Therein Mr. Bachaus, a welcome comer to Boston, will play the solo part. The programme ends with an Overture and a Basque Rhapsody from the incidental music written by the Parisian composer, Pierné, for Pierre Loti's play "Ramuntcho," produced at the Odéon by Antoine.

TRANS. JAN. 19

Mr. Monteux has two novel pieces i hand that, before long, will be played a the Symphony Concerts. One is the Fift Symphony of Sibelius, much-mooted musi wherever heard. The other is a "Prelud to a Drama" by the risen German Schreke none of whose symphonic music has y been heard in Boston.

TRANS-JAN. 20

MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

Karol Szymanovski, a young Polish composer, yesterday heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first performance in this country of his curious Symphony in B flat.

PIERRE MONTEUX

The symphony is not an inspired work. It has most of the vices of modern German music and few of the virtues. On the whole, a laborious, unimpressive imitation of Richard Strauss at his worst. Honors went mostly to the musicians who heroically struggled through work. The composer was han somely applauded.

Cesar Franck's Symphonic intermezzo from "The Redemption," one of the genuine glories of modern French music, and some excerpts from Alfred Casella's "Venetian Convent" ballet music, repeated from one of the earlier concerts of the season, are delightful examples of the new schools. The Casella pieces proved again that much of the worth-while orchestral music is coming from Italian pens. Weber's always brilliant "Oberon" overture is the final number on this 12th program, which will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-JA

COMPOSER HEARS NEW SYMPHONY

Szymanouski's Work Given for First Time in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Karol Szymanowski's 2d symphony in B flat major was played for the first time in America at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The other items of the programme were the symphonic interlude from Franck's "Redemption," orchestral excerpts from Casella's "Couvent su l'Eau," with Mrs. Laura Littlefield

[53]

It applauded her courteously but not clamorously, nor to unnecessary lengths. The reputedly sophisticated companies of Fridays and Saturdays, who applaud even a mediocre performer with the enthusiasm due to a Kreisler or a Rakhmaninov, might learn from this temperance. Mrs. Liebling's pieces were an Air from Saint-Saëns's opera "Etienne Marcel," and the Aria "Non so piu" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." It has been said of Saint-Saëns that he was the one composer of his time who remained impervious to the influence of Wagner, but in the writing of operas this aloofness and independence did him no great credit. "Etienne Marcel" was produced in 1879, three years after the first festival at Bayreuth, but the Air of last evening is as old-fashioned as anything in Grétry. The text is expressive of violent emotions; the music, which runs amiably and pleasantly, with a pretty if undistinguished turn of melody, is placidity itself. Infinitely fresher, more vital and more alluring is the Air by Mozart, composed nearly a hundred years before. As her recital disclosed her Mrs. Liebling has musical intelligence and a voice that is clear and brilliant, if not conspicuously beautiful. Her chief shortcoming lies in her inability to project herself in her music—even less than a violinist or a pianist, can a singer afford to be impersonal.

If the soloist somewhat lacked animation, conductor and orchestra displayed it in abundance, and the performance of the Symphony, in particular, was uncommonly eloquent. From the first Mr. Monteux has shown himself singularly successful in the intepretation of Beethoven's music—a clear rebuke to those who have questioned the fitness of French conductors for the German classics. Mozart and Haydn, perhaps, have not always found characteristic voice at his hands; with Beethoven he has frequently excelled himself, and once more in the Symphony of last evening. Never was there resort to the theatricalism that may discover an unexpected shiver or thrill. Instead, there was throughout a fervor, always ordered and controlled, yet never cooled or curbed, a sympathy that unfailingly divined the composer's meaning, and the skill that could give it voice. From the orchestra came ready response; fire was met with fire, ardor with ardor. So played the Fifth Symphony can still defy its critics, it can still resist the over-popularity that has threatened it. Certain of the other symphonies of Beethoven may excel it in this or that respect; in them are occasional heights and depths, eloquences and graces that it may not equal. But none of them, save perhaps the eighth, is so free from measures that today seem perfunctory and out-moded, that drag and pall. The "Fifth" goes about its business with sureness and despatch, and in it is that perfect fusion of the intellectual and emotional elements that is the acknowledged ideal of absolute music.

As Saint-Saëns seemed last evening older than Mozart, so was Beethoven younger than Svendsen. No doubt the audience found the pleasure in the "Carnival at Paris" that Mr. Monteux would give. And trite as it is, the piece has redeeming moments, notably in the lyrical passages. Moreover, it is admirably orchestrated: a teacher of instrumentation might well put the score in the hands of his pupils to serve as an example of broad and striking effects, achieved unerringly through simple and clearly understandable means. It was Svendsen's misfortune that his music should have chanced to follow so masterly performance of a masterpiece. And as Mr. Monteux and his men wrought with the Symphony, so did they with Wagner's Overture. If here and there the music failed to convince, the fault was not theirs. To revert to the class-room, the Overture to "Tannhäuser" furnishes an admirable illustration of how and how not to use the trombones. What could be emptier than the repetition of the "Pilgrims' Chant," blatantly proclaimed by the three instruments against the jerky counterpoint in the violins. Yet in the excitements and clamors of the end this same unison is overpoweringly impressive. "Tannhäuser" is waxing old in years, but in the music of the Venusberg that is the glory of this Overture, the composer wrote in a fervor of creation that has so far defied the ravages of time. Only Wagner himself, in the later version of the Bacchanale has surpassed it as an expression of erotic frenzy.

Whether because the programme was cleverly put together, or because there is a definite need for these extra concerts, the audience of yesterday was gratifyingly numerous, hardly an empty seat could be discerned in the hall. If hearers at the first concert were baffled by Franck's Symphony, no one was now perplexed, even by Debussy's enchanting Prelude that for some reason went heavy-footedly. Except for restrained response to Mrs. Liebling and a certain coolness towards the music of Debussy, the audience was clearly appreciative and heartily applausive. A new public in their own city has always a stimulating effect on the orchestra. As so often at a Pension Fund Concert, band and leader were more on their mettle than is sometimes the case in the Symphony Concerts of regular course.

WARREN STOREY-SMITH

TRANS. JAN. 17.

A WEEK hence, on Thursday evening, Jan. 26, in Steinert Hall, the new quartet, in which the leaders in the string-choir of the Symphony Orchestra are joining voices, begins a series of chamber-concerts. In first thought, it was to be named the Boston Symphony Quartet, that it might so gain prestige and suggest quality and standards. Now, it is officially named the Richard Burgin Quartet, since he assembled it and since the controlling powers of the orchestra have no part in its fortunes, as they did in similar ventures in Mr. Higginson's days. None the less, in the Symphony Concerts the public has learned the merit of the four players—Messrs. Burgin, Thillois, Fourel, Bedetti—and will so be drawn to them. By every token, it has reason to expect much. As musician, as violinist, Mr. Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra, shines in ensemble-playing. No violoncellist in the records of the band has excelled Mr. Bedetti. From week to week, Mr. Fourel proved his fine mettle with the viola; while Mr [illegible] violin sounds. For three months, to gain the instinctive responsiveness, each to each, that only close association may bring, the four musicians have been at persistent practice. If breadth of view may make interesting programmes, their open minds to the ancients, the moderns and the ultra-moderns, to deserving music wherever it may be found, should bring well-balanced stimulating concerts. The Burgin Quartet is modest, preferring to prove virtue before it proclaims it. By faith and works, it would gain and hold a sustaining public. Whatever the outcome, there is room for such a quartet of the highest standards and for more chamber-concerts in Boston. The musical life of the town, if it is to stir afresh, needs such a resident four for the pleasure they may give, for the widening of our horizons. The established "Flonzaleys," the new-born "Burgins" will be only the more interesting to hear, when each vies with the other.

H. T. P.

TRANS. JAN. 18.

FROM JAN 19 1922

TIMES,

Washington, D. C.

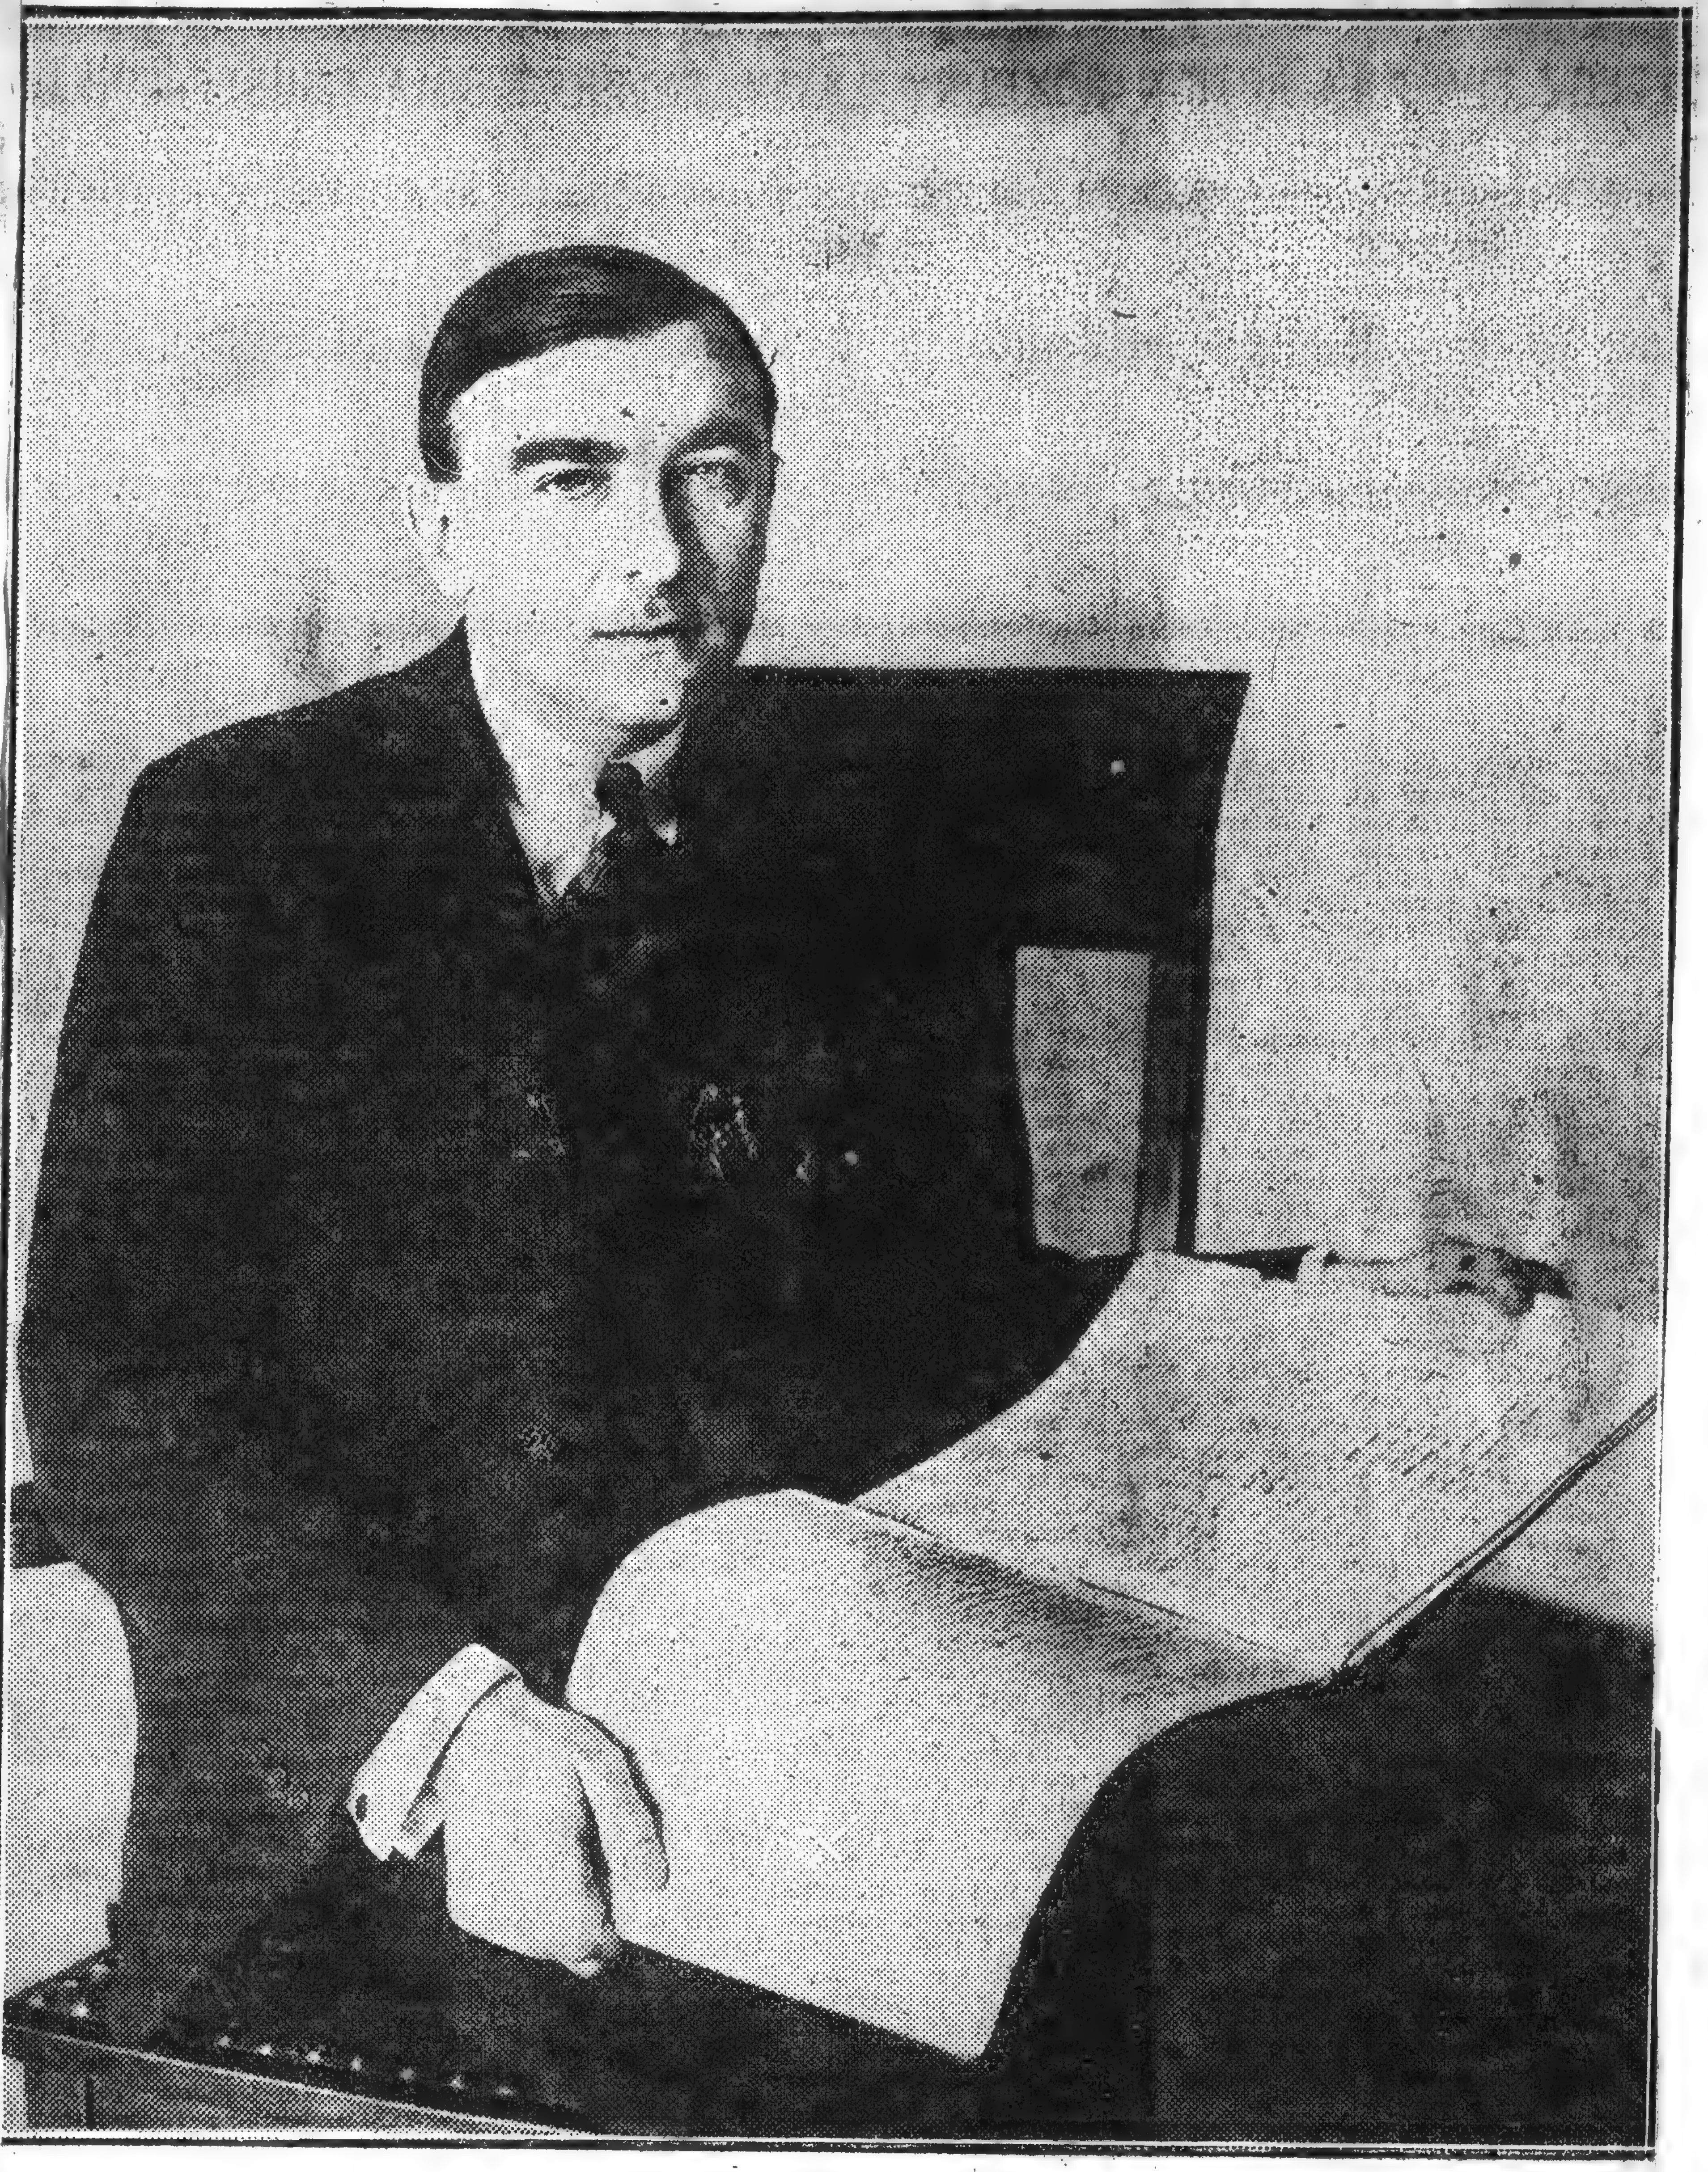
Boston Symphony Program.

Pierre Monteux, the illustrious conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in the third season at this post, has made a program of brilliance and variety for the single concert to be given by this famous organization in Washington this year, which will take place at the National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 31st, at 4:30, under management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene.

The symphony on this program will be the Fourth by Tschaikowsky in F minor. This work was considered by the Russian composer as his finest achievement, and the subsequent verdict of posterity is more and more inclining to his view. The work describes the hopes and aspirations of humanity, over which is imposed the final, inexorable theme of Fate, given forth by the full brass choir.

The remainder of the program will consist of "The Carnival in Paris" by the Norwegian composer, Svendsen; Debussy's Two Nocturnes, "Nuages" (Clouds) and "Fetes" (Festivals), and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi."

New Comer, New Interest



Karel Szymanowski

(Transcript Photograph by Colby)

Polish Composer, Now Settled in New York, Whose Music Will Be Heard Tomorrow for the First Time at the Symphony Concerts

SZYMANOWSKI'S SYMPHONY

Mr. Monteux to Introduce a New Composer and a New Piece—Music of 1909 with Not a Few Characteristics of the Time—Past and Present of a Promising Pole

THIS week another new name, that of Karel Szymanowski, will appear on the programme of the Symphony Concerts. At present a resident of New York, Mr. Szymanowski was born of Polish parents at Timoshevka, in Southern Russia, in 1883. A pupil in composition of the Pole, Siegmund Noskowski, whose Symphonic Poem, "The Steppe," was played here in 1907, Mr. Szymanowski has devoted himself chiefly to the writing of music of a formal character. Besides songs and small pieces for the piano, his list of compositions includes two piano-sonatas, a sonata for violin and piano, a "Romance" for violin and orchestra, a concert-overture, a set of "Grotesque Dances" for a comedy of Molière (soon to be played in New York) and two symphonies, the second of which is the piece chosen by Mr. Monteux for performance tomorrow and Saturday. Few of Mr. Szymanowski's compositions have thus far been heard in Boston—a Chopin-like study in B-flat minor for the piano, played here two seasons ago by Mme. Szumowska; certain songs sung much further back in a recital of Paul Draper. The performance of his Symphony will be the first in America.

This second symphony was written twelve years ago when Szymanowski was, by his own admission, under the influence of Richard Strauss. It is unmistakably the work of a young composer of great technical resource if not of commanding individuality, of one conscious of the richness of his musical heritage and striving to put the whole of it into a single score. The piece is over-elaborated; there is too much counterpoint and the orchestration is often thick and muddy. Simplicity has been shunned assiduously; complexity has been as eagerly sought. Since the Symphony was first put in rehearsal, Mr. Monteux has been busy with the pruning-knife and no doubt he has in many places produced a sorely needed clarity. Quite exceptionally the piece contains but two movements; while there never was intention to write more, as in the Unfinished Symphony of Schubert. The two, are wholly sufficient to themselves. The first of them begins Allegretto Moderato in three-four time. First violins announce a graceful, melodious theme in B-flat major, which after the second bar assumes a strongly chromatic character. In fact, the music throughout reeks with "chromaticism"; hardly a measure goes unembellished by accidentals. A Meno Mosso, Quasi Andante, in D flat, brings the second theme, in the violas, a songful and sustained melody that, like the first, begins chromatically, and soon runs to semi-tones. Both themes are developed at length by an orchestra that seethes and clamors, and in regular course they return; the first now sung in the center-key of B flat major by the 'cellos, with an accompaniment of woodwind chords (Scherzando), the second in the remote key of C-flat major, given out by all the upper strings. Further development leads to a mighty climax and that, in turn, to an abrupt pianissimo, which brings the end.

The second movement takes the form of a Theme and Variations with Fugue and Finale. The Theme itself is not a theme at all, in the conventional use of the term. Instead it consists of twelve measures, in slow tempo, of expressive, excessively chromatic part-writing for divided strings, in which several germinal motives are disclosed. From each and all of these motives are derived the succeeding variations. The first two variations partake of the character of the Theme, thus supplying in the composer's scheme the place of the usual slow movement. In the present performance the third variation will be omitted. Variation number four, a lengthy Scherzando, and numbers five and six, a Gavotte and Minuet, respectively, supply between them the conventional Scherzo. The succeeding variation is a Largo Maestoso; and after it an Introduction leads to the Fugue which has as its basis a theme of feverishly energetic character. The Finale brings reminiscences of the first movement, and the piece ends lustily.

Although report comes from reliable sources that recent compositions of Szymanowski are of signal interest, there is no published comment on them that is readily available. Certain of the earlier pieces are reviewed in an article by Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt which appeared more than ten years ago in the German journal of music, Die Signale. Making due allowance for German professorial narrowness, it is evident from Dr. Leichtentritt's observations that the early songs and piano-pieces of Szymanowski exhibited many of the tendencies to be found in the Second Symphony. Dr. Leichtentritt speaks of the composer as a man known to readers of that time (August, 1910) as a winner of various prizes and as the composer of a significant and unusual Prelude and Fugue that had attracted the attention of young Polish pianists. The "newer" music of Szymanowski, as it then stood, is discussed at some length. Dr. Leichtentritt finds this music of Szymanowski fraught with difficulties—"music that may be conquered . . . step by step, like a steep mountain, and that gives but clouded vista when the summit has been attained." He sees in it a passionate striving toward an exalted goal, a serious music, intensively glowing, but lacking the clear serenity and grace which most appeal to him. He counts Szymanowski's rhythms monotonous, his melodies not always strikingly original, his harmony teeming with accidentals. The songs present to him still more striking deficiencies. They seem "complicated, vehement, wholly unsingable structures—called 'songs' as though in irony—with obtrusive and robust acompaniments that draw attention from the words, and with voice-parts arbitrary, incidental, seeming throughout to be not inevitable, not flowing from the ideas of the text." But so speak the academically-minded in 1922 concerning the ways in which the composers of the hour would express themselves. Perchance Dr. Leichtentritt gives expression to the wish of many a hearer of the songs of Milhaud or Malipiero when he says, in conclusion, that he desires for Szymanowski a clear and sober judgement and a keen intelligence with which he may see where to seek the true source of his art. Thus rounds the voice of critical conservatism; tomorrow and Saturday the music of Szymanowski will plead its own cause.

W. S. S.

Beethoven and Rakhmaninov will fill the major part of the Symphony Concerts of next week—the one with his Seventh Symphony in dance-rhythms, the other with his second Concerto for Piano and orchestra. Therein Mr. Bachaus, a welcome comer to Boston, will play the solo part. The programme ends with an Overture and a Basque Rhapsody from the incidental music written by the Parisian composer, Pierné, for Pierre Loti's play "Ramuntcho," produced at the Odéon by Antoine.

TRANS. JAN. 19

Mr. Monteux has two novel pieces in hand that, before long, will be played at the Symphony Concerts. One is the Fift Symphony of Sibelius, much-mooted musi wherever heard. The other is a "Prelud to a Drama" by the risen German Schreker none of whose symphonic music has y been heard in Boston.

TRANS-JAN. 20

MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

Karol Szymanovski, a young Polish composer, yesterday heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first performance in this country of his curious Symphony in B flat.

PIERRE MONTEUX

The symphony is not an inspired work. It has most of the vices of modern German music and few of the virtues. On the whole, a laborious, unimpressive imitation of Richard Strauss at his worst. Honors went mostly to the musicians who heroically struggled through the work. The composer was handsomely applauded.

Cesar Franck's Symphonic intermezzo from "The Redemption," one of the genuine glories of modern French music, and some excerpts from Alfred Casella's "Venetian Convent" ballet music, repeated from one of the earlier concerts of the season, are delightful examples of the new schools. The Casella pièces proved again that much of the worth-while orchestral music is coming from Italian pens. Weber's always brilliant "Oberon" overture is the final number on this 12th program, which will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-JA

COMPOSER HEARS NEW SYMPHONY

Szymanouski's Work Given for First Time in America

BY OLIN DOWNES

Karol Szymanowski's 2d symphony in B flat major was played for the first time in America at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The other items of the programme were the symphonic interlude from Franck's "Redemption," orchestral excerpts from Casella's "Couvent sur l'Eau," with Mrs. Laura Littlefield the solo soprano, and Weber's overture to "Oberon."

SERIOUS AND POETIC

Mr. Szymanowski is, or rather was, a pupil in composition of Noskowski, whose symphonic poem, "The Steppe," is well known to Boston Symphony audiences. He was born in Kiev in 1883. He now lives in New York. He has composed in many forms.

The symphony heard yesterday is not to be hastily dismissed with a word of praise or blame after a single hearing. It is not frivolous music. It is the work of a composer who has a very considerable skill in the handling of his material, who can invent beautiful melody, as shown by the theme of his second movement, and who is in dead earnest.

The first movement, in particular, is very closely woven. The mood is often melancholy or grim. Occasionally clouds part and there is a poetic vista. Whether the impression of unnecessary thickness and excessive elaboration will be dismissed on repeated hearings of the work has to be seen.

Virile Leading Voice

On first acquaintance one wishes a broader, sweeps, bolder and simpler outlines. One admires the virile voice leading, the dissonances which contain few hints of that which is sensuous or ear-tickling, but craves a more varied instrumental scheme. The scoring is on the whole inclined to dullness and stinginess. On preliminary acquaintance one is impressed by the earnestness of the music without particularly taking to it. The music is learned if it is not academic. Is it possible that in sitting down to compose this work, Mr. Szymanowski insisted on maintaining a formidable mood and a contrapuntal manner, when a freer flight would have been more natural to him and more convincing to the hearer? We put this as a question, not having heard other music by Mr. Szymanowski, and not having reached any conclusion about this symphony satisfactory to ourselves.

The form of the work is unusual: a first movement, more or less after accepted models; a second movement, following without a break, in the form of variations. These variations are of such character that they suggest, now the symphony scherzo or minuet, now the slow movement and at last the fugued finale.

Composer Called to Platform

Thus there are really present all the elements of the classic symphony, with an uncommon unity of design. As a matter of fact, both movements come close together because of the intimate relations of all the themes and the cunning with which they are varied or juxtaposed. This symphony is very serious and very sincere. That is not to say that it is academic. It is a symphony to be heard again. It was well received yesterday, and the composer called to the platform where he bowed his thanks to orchestra and audience.

Franck's interlude from the "Redemption" must be ranked among his poorest music. It is theatrical and cheap. It savors of Meyerbeer far more than of the lofty soul which originated the great symphony, the quartet and quintet and other of the music of the truly noble Franck.

Casella's Suite

The outstanding impression of the concert is the performance of Casella's suite. Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for playing it a second time in a season. Ultra-modern in harmony and instrumental coloring, it produces very wonderfully the sense of beautiful far off things, of another and incomparably more gorgeous age. Mrs. Littlefield sang admirably the voice part in the Barcarolle. The effect haunts the memory, as does that of the entire suite, which is now seen to be a delightful and significant addition to the modern repertory.

Finally Weber's overture to "Oberon" was played with a fancy and a spirit which breathed fresh flame into its dying embers, and made one realize again the fresh and youthful genius of the composer.

POST-JAN-21

COMPOSER APPEARS ON SYMPHONY STAGE

Szymanovski Acknowledges Generous Applause

The novelty on yesterday's Symphony concert program, a Symphony in B flat by Karel Szymanovski, although it showed an individual musical imagination and a personal musical idiom, failed to impress the listener with the sense that a new genius had appeared. If Mr Szymanovski had written as few notes as possible, instead of trying to provide every player with something to do all the time, one's impression might have been different.

The musical ideas were so drowned in the mass of sound from the full orchestra playing almost constant forte that they were hard to grasp. The orchestration was too full to be brilliant. Rescoring and condensation might make this symphony into a really notable work, if more variety of themes, instrumentation and rhythms could be introduced. The composer came upon the stage to acknowledge the applause, which was of encouraging volume.

Casella's suite from his ballet, "Le Couvent sur l'Eau," has the economy of means in producing vivid contrasting effects which Szymanovski's work lacks. But it is as facile, as easily clever as the symphony in B flat is serious. Better such a trifle well done than a masterpiece manque. Mrs Littlefield, as at the first performance earlier in the season, [illegible] admirable performance of the incidental solo for soprano voice, which diversifies Casella's piece.

---

This number and the two familiar classics which filled the rest of the concert were especially well played. The symphonic piece from Franck's "Redemption" has never sounded so impressive at these concerts, nor has Weber's overture to "Oberon" ever been more vividly played. Mr Monteux can do much more than justice to such romantic music as these pieces.

In them his work has the imaginative delicacy and the extraordinary technical competence that often seem to fail him in dealing with the music of such greater, and therefore less human, composers as Mozart and Wagner, and too often Beethoven. He is, of course, in everything a capable routine conductor. But at his best he is much more than that a fact some of his audiences still fail to realize.

Next week Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Rachmaninoff's Second Pianoforte Concerto and numbers from Pierne's incidental music for Pierre Loti's dramatization of his novel, "Ramuntcho," fill the program. Wilhelm Bachaus will be the soloist, reappearing after many years of absence.

GLOBE-JAN. 16

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on January 20. The program was as follows: Szymanowski, Symphony No. 2; Franck, Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; Casella, Suite from "Le Couvent sur l'Eau"; Weber, Overture to "Oberon."

The symphony by Szymanowski, played for the first time in America, might be characterized as a symphony for the violin. The opening theme is first stated by a solo violin which plays a prominent part throughout the remainder of the work and practically all the important melodic designs are confided to the first violins, in unison or divided into groups. The symphony is somewhat novel in form as it is in only two divisions, the second of which is a theme with variations so arranged in matters of tempo and mood as to furnish the contrasts usually offered by the more conventional adagio, scherzo, and finale. This innovation is a not unhappy one, though the day of the symphonic variation is perhaps past.

The harmonic scheme of this symphony is richly chromatic, in fact the uninterrupted flow of chromatic harmonies produces a restless and sometimes incoherent effect. The orchestration, while skillful, is also monotonous and at times thick. All the instruments seem to be playing nearly all the time and one longs for a moment of relaxation from the ceaseless succession of notes. There are also many sequences and similar devices, which are not out of place in themselves and yet tend to increase the prevailing monotony. The finale fugue may be a marvel of contrapuntal ingenuity. Its musical effect, however, was one of extreme harshness.

